THE CLARENDON EDITION OF
THE WORKS OF THOMAS HOBBES

THOMAS HOBBES

LEVIATHAN

1. Introduction

EDITED BY Noel Malcolm

OXFORD

THOMAS HOBBES
Leviathan | 1. Introduction

OXFORD

THOMAS HOBBES
Leviathan | 2. Texts (i)

OXFORD

THOMAS HOBBES
Leviathan | 3. Texts (ii)

Malcolm

Malcolm

Malcolm

THE CLARENDON EDITION OF
THE WORKS OF THOMAS HOBBES

VOLUME III

LEVIATHAN
INTRODUCTION

CLARENDON HOBBES EDITORIAL BOARD

Noel Malcolm Quentin Skinner Keith Thomas

Bibliographical adviser
David McKitterick

SCHEME OF VOLUMES

1: Elements of Law
2: De cive
3, 4, 5: Leviathan
6, 7: Correspondence
8: Autobiographical and occasional writings
9: Writings on rhetoric and literature
10: Behemoth
11: Writings on common law and hereditary right
12: Writings on religion, heresy, and church history
13: Writings on liberty and necessity
14, 15: Anti-White (with 'Objections' to Descartes)
16, 17: De corpore (with related manuscripts)
18: Later writings on physics
19: Writings on optics (including De homine)
20, 21, 22: Writings on mathematics
23: Translations of Thucydides
24, 25: Translations of Homer
26: Cavendish-related writings
27: Index

THOMAS HOBBES

LEVIATHAN

EDITED BY

NOEL MALCOLM

VOLUME 1

EDITORIAL INTRODUCTION

CLARENDON PRESS · OXFORD

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, OX2 6DP,
United Kingdom

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide. Oxford is a registered trademark of Oxford University Press in the UK and in certain other countries

© Noel Malcolm 2012

The moral rights of the author have been asserted

First edition published in 2012
First published in paperback in 2014

Impression: 1

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press, or as expressly permitted by law, by licence or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this work in any other form and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data available

ISBN 978-0-19-870908-4 (3 vol. pack)
ISBN 978-0-19-872396-7 (2 vol. pack)
ISBN 978-0-19-870909-1 (Vol. 1)
ISBN 978-0-19-870910-7 (Vol. 2)
ISBN 978-0-19-870911-4 (Vol. 3)

Typeset in Ehrhardt
by Peter Kahrel Ltd, Lancaster
Printed in Great Britain
on acid-free paper
by CPI Group (UK) Ltd,
Croydon, CR0 4YY

Links to third party websites are provided by Oxford in good faith and for information only. Oxford disclaims any responsibility for the materials contained in any third party website referenced in this work.

CONTENTS

VOLUME 1

Preface xi
A Note on Dates and References xv
List of Abbreviations xvi
List of Figures xvii

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

THE WRITING OF LEVIATHAN 1
Chronology 1
Changes and Developments in Hobbes's Argument 12
Royalist Political Debate 24
Religious Issues 35
Intended Readership 51
Late Adjustments: (i) Independency 61
Late Adjustments: (ii) Obedience to the New Régime 65
Hobbes's Retrospective Accounts 82
The Contemporaneous French Translation 87
The Year of Publication 91

SOME FEATURES OF THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN 101
Materials used in the Composition of Leviathan 101
The Title 114
The Engraved Title Page 128
The Table of the Sciences 141

FROM THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN TO THE LATIN 146
Critical Responses, 1651–1668 146
Some Individual Responses 158
Vernacular Translations 162
The Latin Translation and the Question of Priority 165
Changes in the Latin Translation 175

TEXTUAL INTRODUCTION

THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN 197
The Manuscript 197
The Head Edition 209
The Bear Edition 226
The Ornaments Edition 258

THE LATIN LEVIATHAN 272
A Manuscript 272
The 1668 Edition 274
The 1670 Edition 287
The Undated Issue of the 1670 Edition 295
The 1676 and 1678 Issues of the 1670 Edition 295
The Pardoe Advertisement of 1682 302

THE PRESENT EDITION 303
Previous Modern Editions 303
Basic Features of the Present Edition 308
The Recording of Textual Variants 312
The Promotion of Textual Variants 314
Conventions used in the Presentation of Manuscript Material 318
The Translation Apparatus 318
The Explanatory Notes 321

A BIBLIOGRAPHICAL DESCRIPTION OF
THE EDITIONS USED IN THE PRESENT EDITION 326
The English Leviathan 326
The Latin Leviathan 328

List of Manuscripts 333
Bibliography 337
Index 367

VOLUME 2

Abbreviations and Conventions used in this Edition xi
Leviathan 2
The Epistle Dedicatory 4
The Contents of the Chapters 8
The Introduction 16

PART 1

Chapter 1 22
Chapter 2 26
Chapter 3 38
Chapter 4 48
Chapter 5 64
Chapter 6 78
Chapter 7 98
Chapter 8 104
Chapter 9 124
Chapter 10 132
Chapter 11 150
Chapter 12 164
Chapter 13 188
Chapter 14 198
Chapter 15 220
Chapter 16 244

PART 2

Chapter 17 254
Chapter 18 264
Chapter 19 284
Chapter 20 306
Chapter 21 324
Chapter 22 348

Chapter 23 376
Chapter 24 386
Chapter 25 398
Chapter 26 414
Chapter 27 452
Chapter 28 482
Chapter 29 498
Chapter 30 520
Chapter 31 554

VOLUME 3

PART 3

Chapter 32 576
Chapter 33 586
Chapter 34 610
Chapter 35 634
Chapter 36 650
Chapter 37 682
Chapter 38 698
Chapter 39 730
Chapter 40 736
Chapter 41 760
Chapter 42 774
Chapter 43 928

PART 4

Chapter 44 956
Chapter 45 1012
Chapter 46 1052
Chapter 47 1104
A Review, and Conclusion 1132

APPENDIX

Chapter 1 1142
Chapter 2 1190
Chapter 3 1226

Index to the Latin Leviathan 1244

Register of In-Press Variants (English) 1293
Register of Literal Faults (English) 1298
Ambiguous End-of-Line Hyphenations (English) 1303
Register of In-Press Variants (Latin) 1305
Register of Literal Faults (Latin) 1306
Index of Biblical Citations 1311
General Index 1323

PREFACE

Thomas Hobbes's Leviathan has long been regarded, correctly, as one of the most important works of political philosophy written in the West. So it is somewhat surprising that there has been, hitherto, no adequate critical edition of it. Where the English Leviathan is concerned, readers have not been too badly served by those modern editors who have reproduced the text of the first edition, since that edition must indeed be the starting-point for the construction of the text; but on many points of detail, a critical edition has to discriminate between variants in different copies of the first edition, and must modify the readings of that edition in the light of the manuscript, the second edition, and, occasionally, the need for textual emendation. That is what is attempted in the present edition. As for the Latin text of Leviathan, this has been much more poorly served by modern scholarship: extraordinarily, there has been only one printing of it since 1841. The present edition seeks not only to present a reliable text of the Latin translation, but also to indicate all the significant changes made by Hobbes in that version, marking the omissions of words or passages and translating the material that was added or altered.

Overall, the purpose of this edition is to present to readers, on each opening (i.e., pair of facing pages), all the materials that they will need in order to study the entire development of the text, from the manuscript of the English Leviathan (which itself bears witness to an earlier manuscript, no longer extant) to the second edition of the Latin. On each page, substantive textual variants are listed in an apparatus below the text; underneath that apparatus, running across the opening, there is the series of notes translating the altered or added material in the Latin; and below that there are explanatory notes. This last set of notes pays special attention to the meanings of terms used by Hobbes, while also identifying references, allusions, and so on. Here too, although not every reference made by Hobbes has yielded to investigation, the present edition does explicate a significant number of matters that have been passed over in silence in previous editions.

Before the text itself, there stand two Introductions, General and Textual. The first of these seeks to set the writing of Leviathan in its biographical and political context; to analyse Hobbes's use of sources; to explicate some special features of the English Leviathan (the title itself, the engraved title page, and the table of the sciences); to place the writing of the Latin version in its own biographical context (above all, the early reactions to the English text); and to describe the process of translation. It must be emphasized that, although the first chapter of this General Introduction does of course comment to some extent on the substantive arguments presented in Leviathan, it is in no way intended as a general account of the meaning and significance of the work. Such an account would need to cover many aspects of Leviathan: its relation to natural law theory, the degree to which its political theory is founded on its psychological theory, and so on. This chapter of the General Introduction concentrates on the contemporary political debate, in accordance with the policy of the Clarendon Edition, which requires editorial introductions to confine themselves, so far as possible, to factual and contextual matters. A full interpretation of the meaning and significance of Hobbes's arguments is not called for here—nor, given the richness of that subject on the one hand and the constraints of space on the other, would it be possible to present it while also discussing all the other matters that require explanation in these Introductions.

The Textual Introduction gives an account of the nature of the various forms of the text (manuscript, English editions, Latin editions), paying special attention to the printing history of the English. This topic has required intensive investigation, since, without a full understanding of the printing history, it is not possible to say which changes in which editions might have originated from Hobbes himself. I have previously published three studies of this issue; the Textual Introduction here summarizes the findings of those studies, while also adding some further points of detail. It also gives an account of the printing history of the Latin text which, it is hoped, clarifies some points—especially where the different issues of the first and second editions are concerned—that have not been made clear before.

This edition has been many years in the making, and during those years I have accumulated many debts of gratitude. Two fellow General Editors of the Clarendon Edition have been especially helpful and supportive: Quentin Skinner, whose path-breaking work on Hobbes changed the whole nature of modern scholarship in this field, and Keith Thomas, who has not only supported me with advice and encouragement but also read an entire draft version of the annotated English text, supplying many helpful comments and suggestions. At an early stage, Stephen Plaister went through the entire Latin text, marking and translating the added or altered passages for me. In the light of my subsequent work on the text, and because of some changes in my criteria for the noting of such material, I eventually decided to repeat the process, making my own translations. But as I did so, I was able to check my work against Stephen Plaister's notes; sometimes his work saved me from errors or omissions, and on many occasions, when I had hit on what I thought to be a particularly elegant solution to a problem, I found that he had hit on it first. I am very grateful to him for all the work he did, and for the patience with which he has waited, for so many years, to see the published edition. Similar thanks go also to Jan Moore, who did the primary collation of copies of the 'Head' edition; in the course of my later work I have found a small number of further variants, which I have checked in the copies she collated, and I have also consulted a number of additional copies; but the bedrock of the collation consists of her painstaking work. Also at an early stage, Nigel Hope transcribed the Latin text and noted the changes between the first and second editions; this too has been immensely useful. (The work of Stephen Plaister, Jan Moore, and Nigel Hope was paid for by a British Academy grant, awarded to Quentin Skinner for the Clarendon Hobbes edition; I am very grateful both to him and to the British Academy.) The initial phase of work on this edition also benefited from the microfilms, photocopies, and other materials assembled by the late Howard Warrender—the founder of the Clarendon Edition of the Works of Hobbes—who, at the time of his death, had started work on his own edition of Leviathan.

At a much later stage, I benefited from unpublished work on the Latin text by the late Karl Schuhmann; thanks to the kindness of his widow, Elizabeth Schuhmann, and with the help of his devoted pupil Piet Steenbakkers, I was allowed to make use of his transcription of the text, in which variants were recorded and emendations proposed. Although my own judgements about the emendation of the text have sometimes diverged from his, I have been encouraged, on many points, by finding that our opinions concurred; and on some points his lynx-eyed scrutiny of the text has saved me from omissions or mistakes. So, although I have commented adversely in the Textual Introduction on his edition of the English text, I should like to pay tribute here to the care and skill with which he studied the Latin.

I should also like to express my gratitude to Blair Worden for commenting very helpfully on a draft of the first chapter of the General Introduction, and to Timothy Raylor, who has read parts of the Introductions, and has supplied advice and information on a range of Hobbesian matters over many years. My work on the printing history of the English Leviathan was greatly helped by Giles Mandelbrote and Nicholas Smith; I am indebted to both of them. Special thanks go also to Alban Rrustemi, who devised the word-processing programme which enabled me to prepare the text with multiple layers of annotations. I am very grateful, too, to Afrim Beka for recovering essential material from obsolete diskettes, and to Jeffrey Miller for photographing title pages and ornaments. I am also indebted to a great number of friends and colleagues for help on specific points. The timescale of the preparation of this edition is so great that I cannot be sure that I have included all of them here, but the list must certainly include the following, in addition to those already mentioned: Paul Brand, Robin Briggs, Ted Buttrey, Angelos Chaniotis, Alan Cromartie, George Garnett, Benjamin Gray, the late Philip Grierson, Kinch Hoekstra, Stefanie Kennell, David McKitterick, Ian Maclean, Scott Mandelbrote, Eric Nelson, Jean-Louis Quantin, Richard Serjeantson, Boudewijn Sirks, Johann Sommerville, Mikko Tolonen, and Cecilia Trifogli.

Several of the names in that list are of Fellows of All Souls College; here I should like to express a more general sense of gratitude to the College for enabling me to complete this project. The conditions of modern academic life are increasingly inimical to scholarly labour of this kind, which requires intensive—and, for prolonged periods, apparently unproductive—work on a mass of details; I have been fortunate indeed to be part of a collegiate body in which the traditions and ideals of scholarship are still fully upheld. It is also a pleasure to thank the Master and Fellows of Gonville and Caius College, Cambridge, among whom I began work on this project. I should like to pay tribute, too, to another scholarly institution, the Oxford University Press; Peter Momtchiloff, who has supervised the Clarendon Edition of Hobbes over many years, has been a wise, patient, and altogether exemplary editor.

I am very grateful to His Grace the Duke of Devonshire, and to the Trustees of the Chatsworth Settlement, for allowing me to consult, and quote from, manuscripts at Chatsworth House. In my visits there over the years I have been greatly helped by Peter Day, Michael Pearman, Charles Noble, and Andrew Peppitt, to whom I am extremely grateful. It will be apparent from the List of Manuscripts that I am indebted to the staff of many archives and libraries; in addition to those listed there, I should like to mention the following: King's College Library, Cambridge; the University of Chicago Library; the Royal Library, The Hague; the Houghton Library, Harvard University; Lambeth Palace Library, London; Leiden University Library; the John Rylands Library, Manchester; the New York Public Library; the Codrington Library, All Souls College, Oxford; the Royal Library, Stockholm; the Österreichische Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; the Library of Congress, Washington, DC. And, finally, I am grateful to the editors and publishers of the journals in which some of the material presented in the Introductions first appeared, for permission to reproduce or rework it here: Hobbes Studies (Brill), Intellectual History Review (Routledge), and The Seventeenth Century (Manchester University Press).

A NOTE ON DATES AND REFERENCES

Dates are given in double format, both Julian and Gregorian (with the year dated from 1 January). Where one version of the date is an editorial inference, it is presented in square brackets. Works quoted or referred to in the notes are cited by short title; full details are given in the Bibliography. References to works by Hobbes are given as follows: if the work has been published in the Clarendon Edition, reference is made to that edition; in most other cases a double reference is made, first to the original printing (from which any quotation is derived) and then to the printing in Molesworth's edition (EW or OL: see the List of Abbreviations); in a few cases, where a scholarly modern edition exists, reference is made to that edition (e.g., the 'Answer' to Davenant, in Gladish's edition of Gondibert); and if the cited text is a work which Hobbes divided into chapters and 'articles' or sections, reference is made in that format (e.g., 'De corpore XV.2'), since that reference is valid for all editions. Note that any footnote which refers only to page numbers, without a book title or 'Ibid.', refers to the text of Leviathan in the present edition; in those cases where such a reference appears in a note after a reference to another work, the title 'Leviathan' is given. All translations are my own, unless otherwise attributed. For a fuller account of the conventions used in this edition, see Chapter 3 of the Textual Introduction.

LIST OF ABBREVIATIONS

Add.	Additional
AV	Authorized Version of the Bible
BL	British Library
BN	Bibliothèque nationale de France, Paris
Bodl.	Bodleian Library, Oxford
Correspondence	Hobbes, The Correspondence, ed. Malcolm
CSPD	Calendar of State Papers, Domestic
De cive	Hobbes, De cive, ed. Warrender
edn.	edition
EEBO	Early English Books Online
Elements of Law	Hobbes, The Elements of Law, ed. Tönnies
EW	Hobbes, English Works, ed. Molesworth
Harl.	Harleian
HMC	Historical Manuscripts Commission
l-h	left-hand
MS	manuscript
n.d.	no date (of publication)
n.p.	no place (of publication)
n.s.	new series
ODNB	Oxford Dictionary of National Biography
OED	Oxford English Dictionary
OL	Hobbes, Opera philosophica quae latine scripsit, ed. Molesworth
PG	Migne, ed., Patrologia graeca
PL	Migne, ed., Patrologia latina
r-h	right-hand
Rogers and Schuhmann	Hobbes, Leviathan, ed. Rogers and Schuhmann
SC	Stationers' Company records
TNA	The National Archives

For the books of the Bible, standard abbreviations are used.

For full details of the works cited here, and for publication details of all the works cited by short title in the notes, see the Bibliography.

All references giving page numbers in Leviathan, unless otherwise explained, refer to the text in the present edition; and any footnote which refers only to page numbers, without a book title or 'Ibid.', refers to the text of Leviathan in the present edition.

LIST OF FIGURES

1. Leviathan, Head edition, engraved title page 129
2. Leviathan, MS title page 131
3. Niceron, La Perspective curieuse, the optical device 137
4. Niceron, La Perspective curieuse, the 'Ottoman sultans' design 138
5. Leviathan, Head edition, printed title page 210
6. Leviathan, Head edition, 'crowned head' ornament 212
7. Leviathan, Bear edition, printed title page 227
8. Leviathan, Bear edition, 'St Christopher' ornament 241
9. Leviathan, Ornaments edition, printed title page 259
10. Opera philosophica, title page 275
11. Opera philosophica, section title page of Leviathan 276
12. Leviathan, 1670 edition, title page 288
13. Leviathan, 1676 'Tomson' issue of the 1670 edition, title page 296

I

THE WRITING OF LEVIATHAN

Chronology

The earliest direct reference to the writing of Leviathan comes in a letter from Robert Payne to Gilbert Sheldon, dated 13 [/23] May 1650. Payne was one of Hobbes's closest friends: an Oxford academic, with special interests in mathematics and natural philosophy, he had become acquainted with Hobbes while serving in the 1630s as chaplain to the Earl of Newcastle.[1] Both Payne and Gilbert Sheldon (the Warden of All Souls College) were ejected from their Oxford colleges by the parliamentary authorities in 1648; Sheldon retired to Staffordshire, and Payne then kept up a correspondence with him. Payne's letters to Sheldon from this period (1649–51) make frequent reference to 'my friend in Paris' or 'my friend M^{r} H.', from which it is clear that he was receiving letters on a regular basis—sometimes at the rate of one every three weeks—from Hobbes.[2] There is other evidence that Hobbes had been sending Payne drafts of some his work on De corpore earlier in the 1640s; and, indeed, Payne's letters to Sheldon imply that much of his correspondence with Hobbes was about natural philosophy.[3] But Payne did also show an interest in Hobbes's other writings, and in his letter of 13 [/23] May 1650 he mentioned that he had passed on to Hobbes the news (which he had apparently received from Sheldon) that someone was preparing to publish a translation of De cive:

I sent notice to M^{r} Hobbes, y^{t} his booke de Cive was translated into English, & desird him to prevent y^{t} translation by one of his owne. but he sends me word he hath an

[1] On Payne see Feingold, 'A Friend of Hobbes'; Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 80–145.

[2] See BL, MS Lansdowne 841, fo. 174r (Payne to Sheldon, 16 [/26] July 1650): 'Since I writt to you last, I received 3 from my friend at Paris.' The 'last' letter referred to here was probably that of 13 [/23] May: see below, n. 4.

[3] Chatsworth, Hobbes MSS C. iv. 2 and A. 10 are notes by Payne, dating probably from 1645–6, on early chapters of De corpore. On 29 Apr. [/9 May] 1650 Payne wrote to Sheldon that he had received letters 'very lately' from Hobbes, and that 'y^{e} discourse in them is all on some part of naturall philosophie, which I had proposed to him in some former letters' (BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 126).

other taske in hand, w^ch^ is Politiques, in English; of w^ch^ he hath finishd 37 chapters. (intending about 50 in y^e^ whole) w^ch^ are translated into French, by a learned french man, of good quality, as fast as he finishes them. And y^t^ his booke de Cive, is translated into french, & printed allready.[4]

The news that Hobbes was composing a work of 'Politiques, in English' must have come as something of a surprise to his old friend—and not only because Hobbes had apparently been withholding this information from Payne during the many months in which he had been writing those 37 chapters. That Hobbes should write about politics was, of course, not in itself surprising; he was already quite well known as a political writer. The immediate cause of his departure from England in November 1640 had been his fear that he would be called to account by Parliament for his strongly royalist treatise The Elements of Law, which had been widely circulated in manuscript since its completion in May of that year.[5] During his first year in Paris he wrote another political treatise, De cive; his friend Marin Mersenne, who was an intellectual impresario and 'intelligencer' as well as a theologian, philosopher, and mathematician, organized the printing of this text in a small number of copies in 1642, which were sent to prominent intellectuals for their comments. In response to the criticisms he received, Hobbes made some revisions and added some important explanatory passages in the margins of his copy; and in the spring of 1646 he allowed one of his young admirers, Samuel Sorbière, to take this annotated copy to Amsterdam, where it was used as the basis for a new, commercial publication of the text.[6] When this edition (published by Louis Elzevier in January 1647) sold out, Sorbière wrote to Hobbes in August 1647 to say that the publisher 'is therefore thinking of preparing a new edition, and that if you want to add anything to it, or take anything out, you can let me know'.[7] When Hobbes eventually replied to this request, he sent just one page of corrections to typographical errors, declaring that, otherwise, 'I have nothing to add or subtract'.[8] It thus appears that by early 1646 Hobbes had made all the substantive changes that he thought necessary to this major statement of his political theory, and that as recently as late 1647 he had not felt the need for any further additions or [4] Ibid. no. 128. The published transcription of this letter mistakenly gives 'trifle' instead of 'taske' (Anon. [N. Pocock], 'Illustrations', p. 172; the anonymous editor is identified as Nicholas Pocock in Pocock, Life of Richard Steward, p. vii).

[5] Correspondence, i, p. 115.

[6] Hobbes, De cive, ed. Warrender, pp. 5–13; Correspondence, i, pp. 125–47.

[7] Correspondence, i, p. 161, [9/] 19 Aug. 1647 ('itaque cogitare se de noua Editione adornanda, cui si quid inserendum, demendumue optares, posses mihi significare'); and for the publication in Jan. see i, p. 154.

[8] Ibid. pp. 163–4, [17/] 27 Nov. 1647 ('non enim habeo quicquam quod addam, aut demam').

alterations. Hobbes never disavowed De cive; on the contrary, he was happy to see it reprinted (alongside the Latin translation of Leviathan) in the collection of his Latin works issued by the Dutch publisher Joan Blaeu in 1668. And although he was clearly not involved in the production of the English translation of De cive which appeared in 1651, he had warmly welcomed the idea of such a translation six years earlier, when it was mooted by his friend Edmund Waller.[9] So there was nothing unreasonable about Payne's suggestion in 1650 that Hobbes produce a translation 'of his owne'. Payne must have been left wondering, therefore, why it was that Hobbes felt the need to write a completely new treatise on the same subject.

The other reason for surprise at the news that Hobbes was working on such a task must have been that, with the exception of his work on De cive, Hobbes's intellectual activities during his decade-long stay in Paris had focused almost entirely on the areas of optics, physics, mathematics, logic, and metaphysics. Writing about politics was very much a diversion from his primary concerns. Soon after his arrival in Paris he had been drawn by Mersenne into a prolonged exchange of letters with Descartes on reflection and refraction; he also contributed, at Mersenne's behest, a series of 'Objections' to Descartes's Meditationes, which were printed with that text in 1641.[10] At some time in these early years of his Parisian stay, probably in 1641 or the first half of 1642, Hobbes also completed a lengthy Latin treatise on optics, which was not published.[11] In 1642–3—again, at Mersenne's prompting—Hobbes produced a substantial refutation of a newly published treatise on natural philosophy and metaphysics by the Catholic priest Thomas White; but if, as seems likely, Mersenne wished to persuade Hobbes to publish his refutation, that wish was not fulfilled.[12] In 1644, however, Mersenne did print some short samples of Hobbes's work on topics in natural philosophy (including material drawn from his refutation of White), plus a short treatise on optics, in two compilatory volumes which he edited.[13] In one of those volumes he also printed a mathematical demonstration by the geometer Roberval, which was based on a proposition which Hobbes had made; Hobbes was regarded [9] Ibid. p. 124 (Hobbes to Waller, [29 July/] 8 Aug. 1645); cf. Aubrey's recollection that, according to Waller, 'Mr Hobbes was most willing it should be donne by Mr Wallers hand' (Bodl., MS Aubrey 6, fo. 113r; printed in Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', ii, p. 277). On the translator of the 1651 version (Charles Cotton), see Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 234–58.

[10] Correspondence, i, pp. 54–80, 86–114, 116–20; Descartes, Meditationes, pp. 233–71.

[11] BL, MS Harl. 6796, fos. 193–266, printed in Hobbes, 'Tractatus opticus'. On the dating see Raylor, 'Date and Script', and Malcolm, 'Hobbes, Latin Optical Manuscript'.

[12] BN, MS f. latin 6566A, printed in Hobbes, Anti-White.

[13] Mersenne, Cogitata physico-mathematica and Universae geometriae synopsis; for an almost complete list of Hobbes's contributions see Schuhmann, 'Hobbes dans les publications de Mersenne' (omitting the discussion of percussion and conatus in Cogitata physico-mathematica, 'Tractatus mechanicus theoricus et practicus', pp. 87–9).

(by Roberval, among others) as a serious mathematical practitioner, and was sought out by the teenage Duke of Buckingham, probably in 1645, as a tutor in geometry.[14] In April 1645 Hobbes was joined in Paris by the Marquess of Newcastle and his brother, Sir Charles Cavendish—two patrons who had encouraged and shared Hobbes's interest in Galilean natural philosophy in the 1630s. At the Marquess's behest, Hobbes produced one minor work (a little essay on the mechanics of swordsmanship) and two major texts.[15] The first of these, composed in August 1645, was a short treatise on liberty and necessity, written in response to a 'discourse' on free will by the exiled Anglican cleric John Bramhall, who also enjoyed Newcastle's patronage.[16] The second, composed in 1645–6, was a substantial treatise on optics, written in English at Newcastle's request.[17] Hobbes let it be known that he was eager to publish this work, in a Latin translation, as soon as he could; but many years would pass before a Latin version of one part of it eventually appeared in his De homine in 1658.[18]

The most important project on which Hobbes was engaged for most of the 1640s, however, was his treatise on logic, metaphysics, and physics, De corpore. This was intended to be the first section of the tripartite 'elements of philosophy' which he had promised to his readers in 1642 (when De cive was described on its title page as 'sectio tertia', the third section); the publication of De homine (the second section) seems to have been delayed partly because he felt that the publication of De corpore should precede it, and the non-publication of the refutation of White was probably due to the fact that Hobbes wished to present his metaphysics and natural philosophy in his own systematic form, not in a way that was tied to the mistaken ideas of another author. Unfortunately, however, some parts of the subject-matter of De corpore proved peculiarly intractable, and Hobbes's work on this book dragged on with frustrating slowness over many years. In late 1644 he informed Sir Charles Cavendish that he was putting it 'in order', and Sir Charles was able to inspect a draft of some of the early chapters of the book when he came to Paris in 1645. However, as Sir Charles wrote to his friend John Pell in May of that year, 'he proceeds euerie daie somewhat but he hath a greate deale to doe'.[19] By June 1646, Hobbes was confident that he would complete this task within a year; he had been invited to stay with a French Protestant friend in the south of France, and was looking forward to a period of concentrated

[14] See Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 159–61.
[15] Raylor, 'Hobbes and the Demonstration of the Sword'.
[16] For the dating see Jackson, Hobbes, Bramhall, pp. 84–5, 103.
[17] BL, MS Harl. 3360, printed in Stroud, 'Thomas Hobbes's Optiques'.
[18] For Hobbes's eagerness see Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, p. 434; Correspondence, i, pp. 132–3.
[19] Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, pp. 397, 412–13.

work there.[20] But the arrival of Prince Charles in Paris during the following month put an end to this plan; Hobbes was asked to give the Prince tuition in mathematics, and it was a request that could not be refused.[21] In theory, this employment did not involve a heavy workload: the arrangement was that Hobbes would teach the Prince for one hour a day, while the royal chaplain Dr John Earles (or Earle) would give him more general tuition for another hour.[22] In practice, however, there was no regular timetable, with the result that (as John Earles seems to have complained to his friend Sir Edward Hyde) it was necessary to spend three hours waiting around in order to get the opportunity to give one hour of tuition.[23] These conditions were not conducive to concentrated research and writing. Sir Charles Cavendish commented optimistically in early October 1646 that 'M^{r}: Hobbes reades mathematickes sometimes to oure Prince, but I beleeue he hath spare time enough besides to goe on with his philosophie'; two months later, however, he was predicting that Hobbes would need at least another year to 'finish & publish his phisickes'.[24]

A further reason for delay arose in the second half of 1647, when Hobbes was confined to bed by a serious illness for several months; writing to Sorbière in November of that year, he commented that he would have finished De corpore already if the disease had not intervened, and that he now expected to complete it by late May.[25] In June/July 1648 the Prince left Paris for the Netherlands; Sir Charles Cavendish (who, with his brother, also left Paris shortly thereafter) wrote to Pell in [July/] August that 'M^{r} Hobbes hath nowe leasure to studie', and expressed the hope that De corpore would be finished and printed 'within a twelue moneth'.[26] Ten months later, in early June 1649, Hobbes told Sorbière that he was approaching the end of that work, and that he hoped to complete it 'before the end of this summer'; he also mentioned that he was in the process of getting the plates engraved of the geometrical diagrams, 'so that everything will be ready for the press as soon as I stop

[20] Correspondence, i, pp. 131, 133.

[21] Ibid., pp. 136–7; Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, p. 495. The appointment was probably made in the first half of Aug.: Robert Baillie, writing to a friend from London, was relating the latest news sent by a parliamentary agent in Paris when he mentioned Hobbes's appointment in a letter of 13 [/23] Aug. (Letters and Journals, ii, p. 388; see below, at n. 208).

[22] Bodl., MS Clarendon 29, fo. 40r–v, Hyde to Nicholas, 1 [/11] Jan. 1647: 'The Prince giues good D.^{r} Earles (who is a most worthy man) leaue to read to him an howre in a day, and M.^{r} Hobbs to teach him y^{e} Mathematiques another.'

[23] Ibid., fo. 59r, Hyde to Earles, 8 [/18] Jan. 1647 (commenting on his excuse for being a poor correspondent): 'Well: admitt you do spende 3 houres euery day, that you may spend one wth y^{e} Prince, allowe to [sic] howers to y^{e} Prince, and 2 howres in the proiectinge, where to gett one, you haue still a faire time to y^{r}selfe.'

[24] Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, pp. 490, 496.

[25] Correspondence, i, pp. 163–4.

[26] Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, p. 509.

writing'.[27] By September of that year, Sorbière was confidently informing one of his own correspondents that 'Hobbes will soon publish the first part of his Elements'.[28] At roughly that time, Hobbes also wrote to Sir Charles Cavendish (at Antwerp), giving a similar assurance: as Sir Charles informed Pell on [25 September/] 5 October 1649, 'I receiued a letter latelie from M^r^: Hobbes; which puts me in hope wee shall haue his philosophie printed the next springe'.[29] But from that moment onwards records of Hobbes's work on De corpore, and allusions to its progress in the correspondence of his friends, become extremely scarce, until after Hobbes's return to England at the end of 1651. Sorbière told Pell in May 1650 that 'most of the figures and diagrams, belonging to M^r^ Hobbes his Philosophy, are already graven in Copper at Paris'; but this may have been old news.[30] In July 1650, reporting to Sheldon on his recent correspondence with Hobbes, Payne wrote: 'As for ye other workes, not yet publishd, though I haue sollicited him to hasten their edition, yet I finde him not willing to doe it, till he haue finishd an English Politiques he is now in hand wth.'[31] Sir Charles commented in both [February/] March and [August/] September of that year that he had heard nothing from Hobbes for a long time; on the latter occasion he said that he was going to write to Hobbes, but by [February/] March 1651 he had received no reply from him, and could only express the hope that he was 'busie putting his philosophicall worckes to the press'.[32] Hobbes was indeed busy putting a work to the press; but it was a work—Leviathan—the existence of which, it seems, he had not once mentioned to his old friend and patron.

Hobbes's activities during these final years before the appearance of Leviathan included the writing of one other published work, his 'Answer' to the Preface to Sir William Davenant's Gondibert. Davenant, an accomplished poet and writer of court masques, was a member of the entourage of the exiled Queen Henrietta Maria, working for her and her chief adviser, Lord Jermyn. He had planned an epic poem in five books; at the beginning of 1650 he gave a final version of the first two books, together with a lengthy Preface, to Hobbes for his comments, and shortly thereafter he published, in Paris, [27] Correspondence, i, pp. 176–7. The engravings apparently also included the optical diagrams for De homine (see De corpore, dedicatory epistle, sig. A3v (OL i, p. [cvii])).

[28] Amsterdam University Library, MS III E 8[213], Sorbière to Isaac Vossius, from The Hague, [7/] 17 Sept. 1649: 'Hobbius . . . breui primam partem Elementorum suorum publici Juris faciet.' It seems likely that, once again, Sorbière had agreed to arrange the publication in the Netherlands: in July 1648 he had written to another friend that Hobbes would shortly send him the early parts of his philosophy (i.e., De corpore and De homine) (Sorbière to Thomas Bartholin, [3/] 13 July 1648: BN, MS f. latin 10352, part 1, fo. 135r).

[29] Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, p. 541.

[30] Ibid., pp. 556–7.

[31] BL, MS Lansdowne 841, fo. 174r (16 [/26] July 1650).

[32] Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, pp. 548, 562, 575.

a volume consisting of his own Preface and Hobbes's 'Answer' to it, which was dated [31 December 1649/] 10 January 1650. In the Preface, Davenant thanked Hobbes at the outset for giving his poem 'a daylie examination as it was writing', and again for 'examining, correcting, and allowing this Poem in parcells'. In his Answer, Hobbes returned the compliment: 'For I have vsed your Iudgment no lesse in many thinges of mine, which comming to light will thereby appeare the better.'[33] It seems reasonable to assume that those 'thinges' included drafts of the early chapters of Leviathan; if so, this statement is the earliest datable reference to Hobbes's work on that book.

One other type of evidence, from roughly the same period, can also be connected with the preparation of Leviathan: a discussion of the rights and nature of episcopacy in the correspondence between Hobbes and Robert Payne. As we have seen, Payne did not know of the preparation of Leviathan until May 1650; nevertheless, he seems unwittingly to have played a part in the development of Hobbes's arguments on episcopacy (one of the topics discussed in the book) during the previous winter. In November or early December 1649 he was trying to defend episcopacy against Hobbes's criticisms; he wrote Hobbes a letter dealing with several of the points to which Hobbes objected (the use of the title providentia divina, 'by divine providence'; the practice of anointing kings at coronation services; the claim to exercise a power independent of the civil sovereign), sent a copy of this letter to Sheldon, and received a reply to it from Hobbes not long before 20 December. Payne wrote again to Hobbes, renewing his own arguments on this topic, before 4 February; and, after he had been informed about the preparation of Hobbes's 'Politiques', he continued to discuss these ecclesiological issues with him well into the summer of 1650.[34]

That Hobbes was thinking about these issues (and, to that extent, preparing his arguments about them) during the winter of 1649–50 seems plain enough. That he was writing the relevant parts of Leviathan at that time is, however, much less clear. By May 1650 he had apparently got as far as the end of Chapter 37; but his general treatment of ecclesiastical claims to exercise a power independent of the sovereign, and his particular discussion of the title providentia divina, appear in Chapter 42, while his comments on the anointment of kings by bishops are made in Chapter 44.[35] Much must depend, it seems, on what one means by 'writing' Leviathan. The statement in May 1650 that he had finished 37 chapters, and that they were being translated into French as fast as he finished them, suggests the completion of the final version of each chapter: there could be little point in offering a translator a yet-to-be-perfected draft. At the same time, the statement that he intended 'about 50' chapters altogether (there are in fact 47, or 48 if one includes the 'Review, and Conclusion', which is indeed described in the running titles of the manuscript as 'CHAP. 48') shows that he had a scheme of the whole work, which may have been quite a detailed one; the use of the phrase 'about 50' may well have represented rounding, rather than uncertainty, on Hobbes's part. Many years later, discussing the writing of Leviathan, his close friend John Aubrey recorded the following:

[33] Davenant, Preface to Gondibert, pp. 1, 65, 155–6 (Davenant, Gondibert, ed. Gladish, pp. 3, 24, 54).

[34] For details of all these letters see Collins, 'Christian Ecclesiology', which prints the text of Payne's letter to Hobbes (BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 153) for the first time.

[35] See in general Ch. 42, and in particular pp. 854, 962.

> the manner of writing of which booke (he told me) was thus. He walked much and contemplated, and he had in the head of his staffe a pen and inke-horne, carried alwayes a note-booke in his pocket, and as soon as a thought darted, he presently entred it into his booke, or otherwise he might perhaps have lost it. He had drawne the designe of the booke into chapters, etc. so he knew whereabout it would come in. Thus that booke was made.[36]

Other evidence of Hobbes's working methods is supplied by Sir Charles Cavendish's comments on the draft chapters of De corpore which he read in 1645: writing to the Hamburg scholar Joachim Jungius, he explained that he had looked at Hobbes's 'schedulae'—a term which suggests loose notes consisting of small sheets of paper.[37] No such Hobbesian note drafts survive, of any of his writings; but a reasonable guess as to his working methods might go as follows. First, when 'a thought darted', it was hastily written in a notebook which was not itself governed by any ordering principle. (This was a standard technique of early modern 'commonplacing': such a notebook was sometimes compared to a merchant's 'waste book', in which matters were entered immediately, to be transferred later to the appropriate ledgers.)[38] Then, in his study, Hobbes would enter the 'thought' in the appropriate rough draft chapter on loose leaves, which may have been more a set of approximately ordered aperçus than a piece of continuous prose. And lastly, when he came to write up the chapter, he would place those note drafts in front of him, and compose the final version.

The evidence presented up to this point makes it possible to sketch a line of argument about the timescale of the composition of Leviathan. The most solid piece of information is that Hobbes had finished 37 chapters by May [36] Bodl., MS Aubrey 9, fo. 37r, printed in Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, p. 334.

[37] Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek, Hamburg, MS Pe 1a (= Sup. ep. 97), no. 85, recto, [1/] 11 May 1645 (printed in von Brockdorff, Des Sir Charles Cavendish Bericht, pp. 2–4, here p. 2).

[38] See Beal, 'Notions in Garrison', pp. 132–3, and the comments in Malcolm, 'Thomas Harrison', p. 216.

1650. As we shall see, the book's publisher, Andrew Crooke, entered it in the Stationers' Register in January 1651, and there is good reason to think that he must have had a manuscript copy of the entire work when he did so. This means that Hobbes must have completed the text by the end of December 1650 at the latest. The first 37 chapters represent 60 per cent of the book; if we assume that Hobbes wrote at a constant rate, and that he took eight months to write the remaining 40 per cent, this would imply that he had taken twelve months to write the first 60 per cent—that is, that he had begun circa May 1649. The completion date, however, should probably be brought forward by at least a month, to allow time for revisions and, perhaps, for the copying of the entire text; on that basis, the starting-point might be moved to June or July 1649. But even a simplistic calculation of this sort should be adjusted to take account of the fact that writing the second half of Leviathan would surely have been slower work than writing the first: parts one and two of the book covered much ground that Hobbes had already traversed in The Elements of Law and De cive, whereas most of the material in the third and fourth parts was new. Allowing a faster rate for the earlier part of the book, we might move the starting-point to the late summer or early autumn of 1649.

Such an estimate, though based on a very crude set of assumptions, does yield an approximate date which fits quite neatly with some of the evidence presented above. We have seen that up to 1649 Hobbes was hard at work on De corpore; that he told Sorbière in June 1649 that he hoped to finish it by the end of the summer, and that he was so confident of its imminent completion that he was commissioning the (no doubt expensive) work of having the plates engraved; that in September of that year he told Sir Charles Cavendish that he hoped to see De corpore (and, perhaps, De homine) in print in approximately six months' time; and that from that moment onwards a strange silence descended on this topic in the documentary record. But what exactly happened at this point remains a mystery. We know, of course, that Hobbes had not in fact completed De corpore: in the concluding sentences of Leviathan he declared that he would now 'return to my interrupted Speculation of Bodies Naturall; wherein, (if God give me health to finish it,) I hope the Novelty will . . . please'.[39] Whether he gave up work on De corpore because he felt impelled to concentrate full-time on Leviathan, or whether he was encouraged to devote himself to the latter by the fact that he had reached yet another impasse in his work on the former, cannot now be known. But the speed and concentration of his work on Leviathan do suggest that he was eventually gripped by a powerful impulse to write this book.

[39] p. 1141.

Hobbes's own accounts of the origins of Leviathan, however, placed the commencement of the project at a much earlier date. Offering an explanation in 1656 for the fact that he had never responded to a set of objections to De cive submitted to him in 1645, he wrote that 'shortly after', he formed the plan of writing Leviathan and decided that that text would make a separate response unnecessary.[40] Defending Leviathan in a polemical exchange in 1662, he wrote that it was upon the 'occasion' of teaching the Prince mathematics that Hobbes 'staid about Paris' and wrote the book.[41] Describing his time in Paris in the Latin prose autobiography which he composed in the 1670s, he wrote (referring to himself in the third person) that he had made all the necessary preparations to move to the south of France, 'but having been recommended to the Prince to teach him the elements of mathematics, he stayed in Paris. What spare time he had from this employment he spent in writing the book which is now extremely well-known, not only in England but among the neighbouring peoples, under the title Leviathan.'[42] And in his Latin verse autobiography, also written in the 1670s, he said:

> The heir to the kingdom himself, Charles . . . came to Paris . . . At that time I had decided to write the book about body [De corpore], of which all the material was ready. But I was forced to postpone it, being unwilling to allow so many foul crimes, of such magnitude, to be attributed to the commands of God. I decided to absolve the divine laws as soon as possible. And I did so little by little, being distracted by cares for a long time. For while I attended to the Prince in his studies of mathematics, I could not always attend to my own studies. Then I lay sick for six months, ready for death, which was near at hand; but it was death, not I, that departed. Nevertheless I completed the work, and in my native language, so that it might be read, beneficially, by very many of my English countrymen. From the printing-press in London the book flew forth into the neighbouring regions, known by the title Leviathan.[43]

It would be reasonable to hesitate before taking these statements at face value. The first account was, self-evidently, a piece of excuse-making. The [40] Hobbes, Questions concerning Liberty, p. 20 (EW v, p. 26). See below, at n. 162.

[41] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, p. 7 (EW iv, p. 415). See below, at n. 329.

[42] Hobbes, Thomae Hobbes angli vita, pp. 6–7 (OL i, p. xv): 'sed commendatus Principi, ut Elementa Mathematicae illi praelegeret, substitit Parisiis. Quod ab hoc munere temporis habuit vacui, consumpsit in scribendo librum, qui nunc non solùm in Anglia, sed in vicinis gentibus, notissimus est nomine Leviathan.'

[43] Chatsworth, MS Hobbes A. 6, ll. 189–206 (printed in Hobbes, Thomae Hobbesii malmesburiensis vita, p. 8; altered version in OL i, p. xcii): 'Ipse haeres regni Carolus . . . | Lutetiam venit . . . | Tunc ego decreram de Corpore [>scribere] librum | Cujus materies tota parata fuit. | Sed cogor differre; pati tot tantaque foeda | Apponi jussis crimina nolo Dei. | Diuinas statuo quam primùm absoluere Leges; | Idque ago paulatim sollicitusque diu. | Namque Mathematicae studiis dum Principi adessem, | Non potui studiis semper adesse meis. | Dein per sex menses morbo decumbo, propinquae | Accinctus Morti; nec fugio; illa fugit. | Perfeci tamen, et patrio sermone; vt ab Anglis | Posset permultis utiliterque legi. | Londinoque typis [scriptis*? del.*] Liber euolat in regiones | Vicinas, notus nomine Leuiathan.' The 'foul crimes' referred to here were, presumably, rebellion and all the acts of killing, etc., that flowed from it.

second gives a very rough account of the chronology, stating that it was upon this 'occasion' that Hobbes not only wrote but also published the book.[44] The two later statements were made a very long time after the event; and it is clear that in all Hobbes's autobiographical accounts written after the Restoration, his dominant motive was to show that he had always been a consistent and passionately loyal defender of the Stuart monarchy. The suggestion, in the verse autobiography, that his concern to refute the claims of the rebels was somehow linked to the arrival of the Prince in Paris is thus open to some doubt. In any case, these autobiographical texts are not always very reliable in matters of chronology: in the prose life, a few sentences earlier, he gives the date of publication of De cive as 1646, and a little before that he dates to 1637 a journey to England from the Continent which is known to have taken place in October 1636.[45]

Nevertheless, if we read these passages in the light of the evidence presented above about Hobbes's working methods, it does seem possible to reconcile the claims made in the autobiographies with what is otherwise known about his activities from 1646 onwards. The concentrated writing-up of Leviathan, which perhaps began only in the second half of 1649, may well have been preceded by quite a long period during which Hobbes gathered thoughts and materials in a more scrappy and unsystematic way.[46] During the period of his tuition of the Prince, the hours he spent sitting in antechambers, or indeed walking to and from his own lodgings, would indeed have been better suited to this sort of mental activity; perhaps he devoted entire days, when he had them free, to wrestling with De corpore, maintaining that as his primary intellectual concern, but also used the interstices of his employment to gather ideas and arguments for his next political treatise. (The statement that he worked 'little by little, being distracted by cares' is significant here; it has the character of a substantive recollection of experience, something less likely to be mistaken than any mere claim about dating.) Hobbes's work as a princely tutor, together with his connections to the Cavendish brothers, must have brought him into much more frequent contact with royalist political exiles, among whom politics would have been a constant subject of conversation; this would have made quite a contrast with the period from December 1640 to April 1645, when, so far as we can tell, Hobbes's day-to-day contacts were mostly with French intellectuals. And of course there is one person in particular whose conversations with Hobbes may sometimes have turned to political matters, and who may have asked him to explicate some of the principles which he had set out in his Latin book: the recipient of Hobbes's daily tuition, Prince Charles.

[44] See below, at n. 239.
[45] Hobbes, Thomae Hobbes angli vita, pp. 5–6 (OL i, pp. xiv–xv).
[46] Cf. the comments in Terrel, Hobbes: vies, pp. 28–31.

To suggest that Hobbes had begun, as early as 1646–7, to compile some of the notes and materials that were later put to use in Leviathan, is not necessarily to say that he had already decided at that stage to write the sort of book that Leviathan eventually became. Still less does it imply that he was already planning to have it printed and published in London. The only obvious implication of this dating is that he did intend to write something significantly different from De cive—otherwise an enlarged or amended version of that text, and/or a translation of it, would have sufficed for his purposes. Inevitably, beyond a certain point in the argument, any hypothesis about the date at which Hobbes began to prepare Leviathan must engage with, or turn into, a hypothesis about his reasons or motives for preparing it. At first glance, there appears to be a rather simple correlation between date and motive. The more 'royalist' one takes the political purpose of Leviathan to have been, the earlier one may place its original conception (as Hobbes's autobiographical statements help to show); whereas the more strongly one feels that the political purpose of Leviathan was to justify submission to the new régime in England, the later one will tend to locate its genesis. But the problem may not be as simple as that, for the obvious reason that Hobbes's purposes may have changed over time. The whole question of the motives or reasons for the writing of Leviathan is without doubt the most vexed issue surrounding the work, and it seems very unlikely that any treatment of this problem—which must involve the interpretation of evidence both textual and biographical—will ever be definitive. What follows here is little more than a sketch of some of the factors involved.

Changes and Developments in Hobbes's Argument

Textually, Leviathan stands in a very close relation to De cive. It is clear that Hobbes had one of the 1647 editions of De cive on his desk as he wrote Leviathan, and in places he was simply translating his own Latin into English, with only minor omissions, additions, or divergences.[47] Perhaps the most striking example of this is Chapter 31, where, with the exception only of its last two paragraphs, the entire chapter consists of a fairly close translation of Chapter XV of De cive. And this is particularly striking in view of the fact that the opening sentences of Chapter 31 summarize, in terms almost identical to those used in De cive, XV.1, the political theory of the whole work up to that point:

[47] Rogers and Schuhmann present (i, p. 46) a piece of textual evidence which suggests that it was the earlier of the two 1647 edns. that Hobbes used.

> That the condition of meer Nature, that is to say, of absolute Liberty, such as is theirs, that neither are Soveraigns, nor Subjects, is Anarchy, and the condition of Warre: That the Praecepts, by which men are guided to avoyd that condition, are the Lawes of Nature: That a Common-wealth, without Soveraign Power, is but a word, without substance, and cannot stand: That Subjects owe to Soveraigns, simple Obedience, in all things, wherein their obedience is not repugnant to the Lawes of God, I have sufficiently proved, in that which I have already written.[48]

From this it might be concluded that Leviathan is merely a reworking or re-statement of De cive; and, where the essential lineaments of the political theory are concerned, such a description is quite justified. But Leviathan does also differ in many ways from its predecessor. Structurally, there are three major differences.[49] The first is that Leviathan restores the entire treatment of human psychology (perception, language, the passions, etc.) that was present in The Elements of Law. This was omitted from De cive because Hobbes's tripartite scheme required that it be handled in De homine, the second section of his 'Elements of Philosophy'; the original printed text of De cive contained references to things explained or demonstrated in that as yet unpublished section, but for the commercial edition Hobbes felt obliged to replace the phrase 'It has been shown in the preceding section' with 'It is self-evident'.[50] It is understandable that, freed from the constraints of his tripartite system, he should have wished to reinforce the scientific or demonstrative claims of his political theory by showing how it was derived from, or at least built on, his mechanistic account of human nature. Or, to make this point another way: if he wished to produce a statement of his political theory that presented his whole range of reasons for regarding it as demonstrably true, merely to issue another enlarged edition of De cive would not have sufficed.

The second major change is the addition of a series of chapters in Part 2 of Leviathan, nos. 21–5 and 27–8, covering topics which were not treated in any detail in De cive (or The Elements of Law): the liberty of subjects, 'systems' (corporate bodies) within the state, public ministers, the economy and commerce, counsellors, crimes, and punishments. Those last two chapters, on crimes and punishments, follow naturally enough from the chapter on civil laws (Chapter 26), which does have its counterpart in De cive (Chapter XIV); and the chapter on the liberty of subjects (Chapter 21) deals with issues that arise from the presentation of the central theory about the relation between the individual and the sovereign power.[51] But Chapters 22–5 have a different character, being introduced by Hobbes as follows: 'Having spoken of the Generation, Forme, and Power of a Common-wealth, I am in order to speak next of the parts thereof.'[52] At this point, it becomes clear that the 'order' Hobbes is following here is rather different from the ordering principle of De cive or The Elements of Law. Those earlier works were primarily concerned with demonstrating a set of conclusions about political rights and duties, showing why human beings must submit to a sovereign power and how extensive its rights must be. A few chapters went further, discussing the comparative advantages of different forms of government, or the 'duties' of the sovereign in matters such as taxation, or the causes of rebellion; but the overall purpose was evidently to set out just the essential 'elements' of a science of political rights and duties. Leviathan does that too, but it also offers something of a different kind: a functional-descriptive account of some of the key 'parts' of the state (both of the organized community as a whole, and of the machinery of government). It is in these chapters that Hobbes makes extended use of his comparison of the state to a human body. In the Introduction, summarizing the account he will give of this 'Artificiall man' in Part 2 of the book, he says that he will consider 'How, and by what Covenants it is made; what are the Rights and just Power or Authority of a Soveraigne; and what it is that preserveth and dissolveth it'; but it could be argued that Chapters 22–5 go some way beyond merely describing what 'preserves' the artificial man, offering elements of a description of what it is and how it operates.[53] In this way, although Hobbes had previously insisted that he was setting political science on a radically new basis, when he came to write Leviathan he shifted a little, in his choice of subject-matter, towards a more traditional type of political treatise—something with functional-descriptive components as well as normative ones.

[48] p. 554. Cf. De cive XV.1: 'Qvod status naturae, hoc est, libertatis absolutae, qualis est eorum qui neque Regnant neque Regnantur, Anarchia sit & status hostilis; Quod praecepta quibus talis status euitatur, sint leges naturae; Quod ciuitas existere sine summo imperio non possit; Quod iis qui summum imperium obtinent, obediendum sit simpliciter, id est, in omnibus quae mandatis Dei non repugnant, in antecedentibus, & ratione, & sacrae scripturae testimoniis comprobatum est.' The only significant difference is the omission of the reference to biblical testimony: in Leviathan, the confirmatory evidence of Scripture is mostly confined to the third part of the book.

[49] For useful comparative tabulations of the contents of The Elements of Law, De cive, and Leviathan, see Baumgold, 'Difficulties of Hobbes Interpretation', pp. 848–50.

[50] Correspondence, i, pp. 131–2 (De cive V.1; cf. also I.1).

The third major change made in Leviathan was, of course, the hugely expanded treatment given to ecclesiology and theology. The Elements of Law [51] Some brief discussions in De cive can be connected with these chapters, esp. XIII.15, on the liberty of subjects; XIII.16, on punishments; and parts of XIV.16–23, on sin, crime, and punishments. XIV.1 also contains in nucleus some points made in the opening paragraphs of Ch. 25 of Leviathan.

[52] p. 348. [53] p. 18.

had included one rather general chapter on religion in its account of human psychology (I.xi), one chapter offering biblical confirmation of Hobbes's account of the Laws of Nature (I.xviii), and two arguing, on mainly theological and biblical grounds, that 'decision of controversies in religion dependeth on the sovereign power' (II.vi, vii).[54] Of these four chapters, the first (part of which formed the nucleus of a longer chapter in Leviathan) was in the psychological section omitted from the argument of De cive; the second recurred, in expanded form, in De cive (Chapter IV); and the last two were also reworked in three chapters of De cive, undergoing various changes: the earlier one, demonstrating the minimal nature of essential Christian doctrine, was adapted and expanded (Chapter XVIII), while the later one, tackling the issue of spiritual authority and discussing in particular the examples of Moses and Jesus, was thoroughly and expansively rewritten in the form of two long chapters on the Kingdom of God under the old and new covenants respectively (Chapters XVI, XVII). Some of this material recurs in the third part of Leviathan, especially in Chapters 40–43; but it is accompanied there by much new argumentation, and other chapters present new discussions of such issues as the canon of Scripture, the meaning of 'spirit' and 'angel' in the Bible, the significance of miracles, and the nature of hell. Finally, the fourth part of Leviathan adds four polemical chapters on false doctrines and philosophical beliefs, and on the interested parties (mostly religious—and among them mostly, but not only, Roman Catholic) that have promoted those falsehoods. These chapters too are entirely new. Altogether, therefore, the second half of Leviathan, although it uses some material from De cive here and there, can be regarded as substantially new work.

To these three major differences between De cive and Leviathan can be added a large number of changes to specific arguments. Some of these have important implications for Hobbes's political theory; others have rather the nature of technical adjustments; but all can be seen as responding to problems, actual or potential, in the argumentation of De cive. A full survey of these changes would go far beyond the scope of this Introduction; only a few indicative examples will be discussed here.

The most significant new development in the political theory of Leviathan is Hobbes's use of the concepts of authorization and representation. In The Elements of Law and De cive he had struggled to express what exactly was involved in the creation by many individuals of one sovereign power. In the former text he said that a sovereign monarch was created when many individuals allowed 'the will of some one man, to involve and be taken for the wills of every man'; in the latter, he said that each person must 'subject his will to the will of one other . . . in such a way that whatever that person willed . . . should be taken to be the will of them all and of each severally'.[55] But what did it mean to subject one's will to someone in such a way? In De cive, Hobbes's answer was that each individual contracted with the other individuals to behave towards the sovereign in two ways: (a) not to resist him, and (b) to assist him, as required, against others.[56] This structure of argument seemed adequate for most of Hobbes's purposes, but it left something important unaccounted for: the sense in which the sovereign acted on behalf of the people and in their name, with his will being 'taken for' and 'involving' each of theirs. Thus the reason why subjects could not punish their sovereign for his actions, according to De cive, was merely that they had undertaken not to resist him; this did not adequately express the sense that the sovereign's actions had been undertaken in the name of the subjects, 'involving' their wills too.[57] All such problems are solved in Leviathan with the introduction of the concept of authorization. To authorize someone's actions is to 'own' them, in the sense of taking jural responsibility for them; at the founding of political rule, individuals covenant with one another to authorize the actions of the sovereign.[58] Now it can be explained that the reason why the sovereign can do no injury to his subjects is that they are themselves the authors of all his actions; and similarly, subjects cannot punish the sovereign, because in doing so they would be penalizing actions which were in some sense also their own.[59]

[54] Elements of Law, p. [xiv].

Significantly, Hobbes combines this notion of authorization with an account of how the sovereign 'represents' or 'bears the person of' the commonwealth. In De cive he made use of the idea of a 'civil person', but the use was distinctly limited. At first, he declared that when many individuals were united under one will, the resulting unity, to which that will was attributed, was 'one person'; and he defined the commonwealth or state (the 'civitas') as a 'person'.[60] Then he argued that when a democracy transferred its power to a monarch, it ceased to be a person, and reverted to being a mere 'multitude'; and later still he claimed that in a monarchy, while the subjects are a multitude, the king himself is the 'people'—using the term 'people' for a body of individuals that can act as one.[61] This last formulation, once again, was apparently an attempt to express the way that a monarchical sovereign acted for and in the name of the united wills of his subjects; but Hobbes was still reluctant to grant the subjects of a monarch any unity, even by virtue of the unifying nature of the monarchy, no doubt for fear that they might then claim to act as a unit vis-à-vis the monarch himself. Introducing the concept of authorization made possible a much richer use of the concept of the civil 'person': the sovereign acts on behalf of his subjects as their authorized representative, and to say that he represents them is to say that he bears their collective 'person'. The subjects of a monarch (or, indeed, of any type of sovereign—this theory is applicable to the nature of sovereignty as such) are not a mere multitude; they do have a collective identity, but they have it only by virtue of having their person borne by the sovereign—in other words, having him as their representative.[62]

[55] Ibid. II.i.3; De cive, V.6 ('voluntatem suam, alterius vnius . . . voluntati, ita subiiciat, vt pro voluntate omnium & singulorum, habendum sit, quicquid . . . ille voluerit').
[56] De cive, V.7. [57] Ibid., VI.12. [58] pp. 260–61. [59] p. 270.
[60] De cive, V.9 ('persona ciuilis'; 'pro vnâ personâ'; 'persona'). [61] Ibid., VII.11–12; XII.8.

Linked to this last development was another important change in Hobbes's account of the institution of a sovereign. In De cive, the original meeting of people to set up a sovereign power is itself a democracy, because the act of coming together implies a kind of proto-covenant to treat the will of the majority as sovereign: 'those who have come together to set up a commonwealth, almost by the very fact that they have come together, are a democracy.'[63] It thus follows that, in the quasi-historical story Hobbes tells, democracy comes first, and monarchy is instituted only when a democracy decides to create one.[64] In Leviathan, this explicit claim about the priority of democracy is entirely abandoned, and the majoritarian principle which applies to the original assembly is treated merely as a necessary procedural assumption.[65]

Another significant development is in Hobbes's handling of the concept of liberty. When he wrote De cive, he defined liberty as the absence of impediments to motion, but he distinguished two kinds of impediment, physical and psychological.[66] In the latter sense, someone who was prevented by fear from taking a particular course of action did not have the liberty to take it; and, apparently, someone who was driven by hope to act in a certain way was not acting freely either, as that hope was an impediment to acting in any other way. Given the motive force of the passions in Hobbes's psychological theory, and his causal-mechanistic assumptions more generally, this line of argument might have led to the conclusion that no human actions were free at all. In his dispute with John Bramhall in 1645, Hobbes presented a new solution to this problem, declaring that while no actions were free from necessitation, certain human actions could still be properly distinguished as voluntary; they were the products of deliberation, and a person was 'free'

[62] pp. 264–6.
[63] De cive, VII.5: 'Qui coïerunt ad ciuitatem erigendam, pene eo ipso quod coïerunt, Democratia sunt.'
[64] Ibid., VII.11. [65] p. 264. [66] De cive, IX.9; XV.7.

while he deliberated. Once the choice was made, and a course of action embarked on, that action itself enjoyed 'liberty' so long as the person was not prevented from doing what he willed to do by an external impediment. This was the line he maintained in Leviathan, with the implication that the original act of covenanting to create sovereign power was not rendered unfree by the mere fact that it had been dictated by fear.[67]

Hobbes's account of the causes of conflict in the 'state of nature' also underwent some significant changes. In his earlier treatises, the main emphasis was on the passion of 'glory'. In The Elements of Law, all non-sensual pleasures were described in a way that made them, in effect, sub-species of glory, which Hobbes defined in terms of a belief that one's own power is greater than that of other people; power itself, indeed, was conceived in relative terms, as a person's power was understood 'simply' as the degree to which it exceeded the power of another person. An essentially competitive force was thus built into his account of human psychology, as his famous comparison of life to a race vividly showed. When considering the causes of natural conflict, he did also observe that men would have competing appetites for the same things, but his emphasis was mostly on glory: 'the greatest part of men . . . through vanity, or comparison, or appetite, provoke the rest.'[68] In De cive, similarly, the comment was briefly made that competition for goods was the most frequent cause of conflict, and it was also briefly noted that even moderate people would need to use defensive force, but the bulk of Hobbes's account of human nature was still devoted to glory and the desire for superiority.[69] In Leviathan, glory is mentioned as one of the causes of conflict, but the whole tenor of the argument has changed. The 'race' is omitted, and the account of power is framed in absolute, not relative, terms. Where the explanation of conflict is concerned, there is, so to speak, a de-psychologizing of the argument, which ceases to depend on claims about the particular passions that drive 'the greatest part of men'. Instead, the argument rests primarily on a structural assumption about interpersonal behaviour, regardless of the contents of particular passions: since it is always possible that different individuals will desire the same things, 'diffidence' (i.e., mistrust) is a necessary aspect of behaviour in the state of nature, and pre-emptive actions (including acts of violence) become reasonable ones.[70]

[67] See Hobbes, Libertie and Necessitie, pp. 65–73 (EW iv, pp. 272–5); for a full discussion of these issues see Skinner, Hobbes and Republican Liberty, esp. pp. 124–38.

[68] Elements of Law, I.viii.4–5, 8; I.ix.1, 21; I.xiv.3–4, 5 (quotation).

[69] De cive, I.2–6.

[70] pp. 190–92. Here, 'Glory' plays only a supplementary role; whereas in Elements of Law 'diffidence', although described as 'general' in mankind, was itself merely a reaction to the aggressive behaviour of the 'vainly glorious' (I.xiv.3). On this whole issue see the classic discussion in McNeilly, Anatomy of Leviathan, pp. 137–55.

Another change might also be described as involving a de-psychologizing of Hobbes's argument. In The Elements of Law and De cive, the way in which a subject can be exempted from the duty of obedience is described in strictly psychological terms. The right to resist imminent wounding or death, even at the hands of the sovereign, is derived from the fact that non-resistance in these circumstances is psychologically impossible: 'For there is in each person a certain ultimate level of fearfulness, in which he regards the evil which threatens him as the greatest evil, and therefore flees from it, so far as he can, by natural necessity, and is understood to be unable to do otherwise.'[71] Hobbes thus defended a right of ultimate resistance, but his defence was grounded on a psychological claim (that people would always automatically fear death as the greater of two evils) which was not obviously true.[72] In Leviathan the right of resistance is placed on a different basis. There Hobbes explains that 'of the voluntary acts of every man, the object is some Good to himselfe. And therefore there be some Rights, which no man can be understood by any words, or other signes, to have abandoned, or transferred. As first a man cannot lay down the right of resisting them, that assault him by force, to take away his life; because he cannot be understood to ayme thereby, at any Good to himselfe.'[73] This change has been aptly described as a shift from an argument based on psychological impossibility to one based on 'rationality of purpose'.[74] And it is a change with potentially far-reaching consequences, as some of the later argumentation in Leviathan suggests: 'When therefore our refusall to obey, frustrates the End for which the Soveraignty was ordained; then there is no Liberty to refuse: otherwise there is.'[75]

Why did Hobbes make these various changes to his political and philosophical theory? The most obvious answer is that he was doing what philosophers normally do when they re-state their views: trying to render them more consistent, more compelling, and less vulnerable to objections. Such reasons would seem to be relevant in each of these cases—most obviously, those involving the de-psychologizing of the argument. The change in the account of liberty was, in any case, the product of some further thinking on that topic which Hobbes had engaged in during his dispute with Bramhall in 1645; this could not easily have been incorporated into the revised version of De cive, but it naturally took its place in a newly written work. But it is probably also

[71] De cive, II.18: 'Est enim in vnoquoque gradus quidam timiditatis summus, per quem, malum quod infertur apprehendit vt maximum, ideoque necessitate naturali quantum potest fugit, intelligiturque aliter facere non posse.'

[72] Cf. Hobbes's own remark, in ibid., III.12, that most men would rather die than suffer an insult.

[73] p. 202.

[74] Dix, Lebensgefährdung und Verpflichtung, p. 51. Dix's book is a valuable study of this whole issue.

[75] p. 338.

true to say that several of these changes had practical or political implications; insofar as Hobbes's writing about politics was an intervention in a political debate or a political situation, they can be regarded as expressing a shift or a hardening of attitude. Of course, since the basic nature of Hobbes's theory was a defence of absolute sovereign power, any strengthening of the theory, even if undertaken for purely philosophical reasons, could probably also be interpreted as a hardening of Hobbes's political stance. But there are some aspects of these changes that do suggest that political motives were at work.

The 'authorization' theory is employed, as we have seen, to demonstrate that the sovereign can do no injury to his subjects, and cannot be punished by them; it is also quickly put to use to show that 'if he that attempteth to depose his Soveraign, be killed, or punished by him for such attempt, he is author of his own punishment, as being by the Institution, Author of all his Soveraign shall do.'[76] The theory of representation is also used, as we shall see below, to counter the claim that Parliament is the representative of the people in any full or absolute sense. The removal of democracy's privileged status as the primary form of government may have few practical consequences (the story of the original covenant was only quasi-historical, being in essence a heuristic device); but for that very reason it seems reasonable to suppose that this change was motivated by an animus against democratic pretensions. The change in the strict or 'proper' definition of liberty does not in itself have an obvious political character; when Hobbes develops his political argument about the liberty of the subject, he uses the term quite differently. (First he applies it to the area of actions that are not forbidden or required by the laws, and secondly he calls 'the true Liberty of a Subject' those rights which the subject retains and may exercise even in the face of commands by the sovereign; as we have seen, the shift towards an analysis based on 'rationality of purpose' may actually make Hobbes's theory more liberal at this point.) But it is also true that, having narrowed the strict definition of liberty, Hobbes feels entitled to write even more scathingly about those who 'clamor as they doe, for the Liberty they so manifestly enjoy'.[77]

There are many features of the text of Leviathan, however, that do have a more specific political charge. In De cive Hobbes strongly argued that monarchy was the best form of government; the case is made no less vehemently in Leviathan, and the disadvantages of democracy are given greater emphasis. De cive split its discussion of the three forms (monarchy, aristocracy, democracy) between two chapters (VII and X), devoting the first of them to a coolly analytic discussion of such matters as the question of continuity of régime, and presenting the case in favour of monarchy only in the second—a case which, Hobbes admitted in the Preface to the revised edition, 'is the one thing in this book which I confess to have been not demonstrated, but put in a probable way'.[78] In Leviathan the discussion of the three forms is presented in a single chapter (19), dominated by a list of the advantages of monarchy—to which no qualification is made about the merely 'probable' status of the argument.[79] And it is preceded by a passionate attack on those who fail to see that the monarch—as opposed to a parliament under him—is the absolute 'representative' of his people: 'I know not how this so manifest a truth, should of late be so little observed; that in a Monarchy, he that had the Soveraignty from a descent of 600 years, was alone called Soveraign, had the title of Majesty from every one of his Subjects, and was unquestionably taken by them for their King, was notwithstanding never considered as their Representative.'[80] In De cive, when Hobbes discussed the inefficiency of involving large numbers of people in decision-making in a democracy, he made a remarkable concession: if a democracy were content to transfer the actual business of legislation, and of declaring war and peace, to just one person (or a very small number), retaining the authority without the exercise of power, it would be just as good as monarchy in this respect.[81] No such concession is made in Leviathan, where such an arrangement is simply ruled out: these are key features of sovereignty, which cannot be transferred to another without transferring the sovereignty itself. Hobbes now strongly insists that policy-making in a democracy is inherently and inevitably discordant and corrupt: 'And therefore no great Popular Common-wealth was ever kept up; but either by a forraign Enemy that united them; or by the reputation of some one eminent Man amongst them; or by the secret Counsell of a few; or by the mutuall feare of equall factions; and not by the open Consultations of the Assembly.'[82]

[76] pp. 264–6. [77] pp. 328, 336–40 (quotations: 336, 328).

[78] Hobbes, De cive, ed. Warrender, p. 83: 'quam rem unam in hoc libro non demonstratam sed probabiliter positam esse confiteor'. 'Probable' here may have its pre-modern sense, in which something is 'probable' if some valid reason or reasons can be given for approving it.

[79] Jeffrey Collins has argued that the defence of monarchy in Leviathan is less strong: 'De Cive flatly pronounced monarchy "the best of the listed kinds of commonwealth", whereas Leviathan compared merely their "difference[s] of Convenience"' (Allegiance of Thomas Hobbes, p. 149). But De cive's conclusion that they are best 'is to be shown by a comparison of the advantages and disadvantages inhering in each of them' (X.3: 'ex comparatione commodorum & incommodorum in singulis ostendendum est'); this point about 'advantages and disadvantages' is the same as Leviathan's point about 'difference of Convenience' (and The Elements of Law's about 'inconveniences': II.v.3). Collins correctly notes that the number of arguments for monarchy is greater in De cive, X, than in Leviathan, Ch. 19; but some of the extra arguments in De cive appear there merely because Hobbes is rebutting anti-monarchical claims. Leviathan does omit De cive's claim (X.17) that the superiority of monarchy is shown by the fact that even democracies and aristocracies give absolute power in war to a single man, presumably because it argues that such power simply cannot be transferred, without a transfer of sovereignty (see below).

[80] p. 286. [81] De cive, X.15. [82] p. 412.

Throughout the political chapters of Leviathan, Hobbes goes out of his way to defend not just sovereignty in general, but monarchy in particular, against the whole range of arguments or assumptions that could be used against them. In De cive, the chapter on the rights of sovereignty (VI) presented a cool, step-by-step deduction of those rights—which inhered in sovereignty as such, regardless of the form—from the essential requirement of peace and defence: first the sword of justice, then the sword of war, then judicature, legislation, and so on. The corresponding chapter of Leviathan does eventually present a version of this list; but before it gets round to doing so, it makes a number of emphatic declarations, some of them referring specifically to monarchy, and all of them having an obvious topical relevance. The subjects of a monarch cannot 'cast off' monarchy or change their ruler to 'another Man, or other Assembly of men'; the duty of obedience cannot be overruled by a covenant with God (Hobbes writes that 'some men have pretended for their disobedience to their Soveraign, a new Covenant, made, not with men, but with God'—a reference to the Scottish National Covenant, and/or the Solemn League and Covenant); the idea that a monarch receives his power conditionally is false; the instituted sovereign is the sovereign, and no subject is entitled to claim that his particular will was or would have been for some other ruler or form of rule; the sovereign can do no injury to his subjects; and 'no man that hath Soveraigne power can iustly be put to death, or otherwise in any manner by his Subjects punished'.[83] In adding all of these points, Hobbes is evidently writing as a defender of Charles I against the English and Scottish rebels. And elsewhere in Leviathan he goes out of his way to argue that rebels may be punished with a degree of severity that far exceeds the scale of normal punishments under the law: against rebels, 'the vengeance is lawfully extended, not onely to the Fathers, but also to the third and fourth generation not yet in being'.[84]

In places, Hobbes gives the impression that he is writing with the current situation very much in view—the viewpoint being that of a supporter of Charles I or Charles II at a time when the rebels had secured some power, but before the final outcome was decided. It is natural that, in a chapter on public ministers, he should include a short discussion of ambassadors and envoys. But a general political treatise might hardly find it necessary to specify that 'such as are sent by Authoritie only of some private partie of a troubled State, though they be received, are neither Publique, nor Private [83] pp. 264–70. Both The Elements of Law (I.xv.11) and De cive (II.12) had said that a covenant with God was impossible, but they had done so merely in the course of their abstract accounts of the nature of covenants (the corresponding passage is Leviathan, p. 210); they did not make the topical point which is made so polemically here. [84] p. 494.

Ministers of the Common-wealth; because none of their actions have the Common-wealth for Author'.[85] This seems to have been written with an eye to the parliamentarian régime's diplomatic initiatives, as it sent envoys to various European countries.[86]

In the course of Leviathan, many of the key points made in parliamentarian propaganda during the 1640s are controverted. As we have seen, Hobbes insists that the king, not Parliament, is the true 'representative' of the people.[87] We have also seen him deny that the monarch receives his power conditionally. And he rejects 'the opinion of them, that say of Soveraign Kings, though they be singulis majores, of greater Power than every one of their Subjects, yet they be Universis minores, of lesse power than them all together.'[88] These three claims formed the central arguments of Henry Parker's Observations of 1642, the most influential of all the works published to defend the parliamentarian cause.[89] Hobbes also strongly rejected the idea that there was more liberty in a democratic régime than under a monarchy; he had made the same point briefly in De cive, but the issue became a more politically charged one after the execution of Charles I in January 1649, when publicists in England began to promote the idea of a 'free state'.[90] In the first official presentation of that idea, the Declaration issued by Parliament in March 1649 giving the reasons for 'setling the present government in the way of a free state', special emphasis was put on the economic benefits that flowed from republican status: Venice and Switzerland were flourishing and rich, and 'Our Neighbors in the United-Provinces, since their change of Government, have wonderfully increased in Wealth, Freedom, Trade, and Strength.'[91] In Chapter 30 of Leviathan Hobbes wrote that the people must be taught 'that they ought not to be in love with any forme of Government they see in their neighbour Nations, more than with their own, nor (whatsoever present prosperity they behold in Nations that are otherwise governed than they,) to desire change'. Prosperity, he insisted, came from 'the Obedience, and

[85] p. 382.

[86] The parliamentarian authorities appointed an agent in Paris in 1644, and sent envoys to Sweden and Denmark in 1643–4, to Denmark again in 1646, to the Netherlands in 1648 and 1649, to Portugal in 1650, and to Spain in 1650 (Bell, Handlist, pp. 35, 112, 200–201, 217, 261, 275). It is possible that Hobbes also had in mind the sending of commissioners from the Scots to treat with Charles II in 1649 and 1650.

[87] The point is also strongly made on pp. 350, 368.

[88] p. 280.

[89] Parker declared that the King was 'singulis Major' but 'universis minor' (a point strongly contested by all his royalist opponents: see Mendle, Henry Parker, pp. 100–109), and that kingly rule was fiduciary and conditional: 'at the founding of authorities, when the consent of societies convayes rule into such and such hands, it may ordaine what conditions, and prefix what bounds it pleases' (Observations, p. 2). He also argued that in Parliament, 'the Lords and Commons represent the whole Kingdome' (again, a point much contested by royalists: see, e.g., Anon. [Spelman], View of a Printed Book, sig. D2r).

[90] p. 332; De cive, X.8; Skinner, Hobbes and Republican Liberty, pp. 143–6.

[91] Anon., Declaration of the Parliament, p. 16.

Concord of the Subjects', not from Aristocracy or Democracy as such.[92]

In De cive, the chapter on laws (XIV) followed a definitional-classificatory scheme, distinguishing between sacred and secular laws, distributive and penal, and so on. The equivalent chapter in Leviathan begins, instead, with a series of more or less polemical points: only the sovereign can make or abrogate laws; the sovereign is not subject to civil laws; custom does not make law; natural law cannot override civil law, and so on. Included in this series is a refutation of the 'foolish opinion' that only Parliament can check or alter the Common Law. Later in the chapter Hobbes makes a number of other points directed against practitioners of law and jurisprudence: all interpretation depends on the sovereign; moral philosophy has no legal authority; the judge's decision is authentic only because it is authorized by the sovereign; and precedent is easily defeasible.[93] Taken together, the polemical points made in this chapter amount to a wide-ranging assault on the assumptions of those lawyers on the parliamentarian side who had claimed to be defending a legal order in general (and, in particular, Parliament's place in that order) against the king; indeed, Hobbes's larger argument is that in a monarchy every normative element of the legal system is derived from, and subject to, royal authority. And, finally, Leviathan also contains a fierce attack on the notion of 'mixed monarchy'. This idea had been invoked by both sides during the political debates of the 1640s: parliamentarian writers such as Charles Herle and Philip Hunton had argued that the two Houses of Parliament shared in the sovereignty of the kingdom, and therefore had a right to act on behalf of the people when the king abandoned his place or overstepped his powers, while royalists argued that the parliamentarians were violating a mixed and balanced constitution by their unilateral actions.[94] In Hobbes's eyes, however, the idea that in a monarchy any entity other than the king could also be a representative of the people was contradictory and destructive; he compared it to a monstrous deformity.[95]

Royalist Political Debate

Clearly, when Hobbes penned the political chapters of Leviathan, he wrote as a royalist who was deeply hostile to the actions of the English and Scottish [92] p. 524. Cf. also his comment on the 'imitation of the Low Countries' on p. 506.

[93] pp. 416–22, 428–34.

[94] See Anon. [Herle], A Fuller Answer to a Treatise; Anon. [Hunton], A Treatise of Monarchie; the classic royalist text was 'Charles I' [Falkland and Colepeper], Answer to the XIX Propositions. See Weston and Greenberg, Subjects and Sovereigns, esp. pp. 52–67; Mendle, Dangerous Positions; Fukuda, Sovereignty and the Sword, pp. 29–33.

[95] pp. 512–14.

rebels, and wished to show that his own political theory was better equipped than any other to explain exactly why it was that their actions, and the arguments they made in defence of them, were wrong.[96] There is good evidence here that he was not merely writing in defence of sovereignty in the abstract, but writing on the royalist side. But there is also evidence of a more specific kind, which suggests that he was taking up a particular position in a debate that was conducted among the royalists themselves.

One of the fundamental features of Hobbes's argument is that while the sovereign has an almost unlimited range of possible powers, there are certain essential powers which the sovereign must exercise. The list of these powers is taken over, as mentioned above, from De cive. In their order of appearance in Leviathan, they are: the power to judge what doctrines are taught; the power to make laws (which includes power to determine all the subjects' property rights); the right of 'Judicature'; the right of making war and peace (which includes the right to command armed forces, and the right to raise taxes for war); the power to appoint all public ministers, officers, and counsellors; and the power to reward and punish (to which is added the power to award 'titles of Honour'). Having described these as 'the Rights, which make the Essence of Soveraignty', Hobbes immediately goes on to emphasize that if any one of them is given away, the sovereignty itself becomes liable to collapse: 'if he transferre the Militia, he retains the Judicature in vain, for want of execution of the Lawes: Or if he grant away the Power of raising Mony; the Militia is in vain', and so on. All the essential rights are indispensable, but it seems that the power over the militia has a special importance: 'the command of the Militia, without other Institution, maketh him that hath it Soveraign.'[97]

Having set out these principles, Hobbes immediately adds an important corollary: 'it follows necessarily, that in whatsoever words any of them seem to be granted away, yet if the Soveraign Power it selfe be not in direct termes renounced, and the name of Soveraign no more given by the Grantees to him that Grants them, the Grant is voyd.'[98] This point about the nullity of any apparent grant of essential powers by a sovereign was made in De cive; but it was not a prominent part of the argument there, being made in general terms once, and applied just once thereafter to a particular case.[99] In Leviathan Hobbes makes it emphatically and repeatedly. In his chapter on the liberty of subjects, he insists on it again in general terms: 'If a Monarch, [96] The term 'royalist' is used here in its simplest sense, denoting supporters of the royal side in the English Civil Wars. It does not allude to 'royalism' as a type of political theory (claiming royal rights to rule that are inherent, indefeasible, etc.); nor does it imply support for all the policies of the pre-war royal government.

[97] pp. 272–8. [98] p. 280. [99] De cive, VII.17; XVII.27.

or Soveraign Assembly, grant a Liberty to all, or any of his Subjects, which Grant standing, he is disabled to provide for their safety, the Grant is voyd.'[100] Discussing political bodies, he emphasizes that 'to give leave to a Body Politique of Subjects, to have an absolute Representative . . . were to abandon the government . . . which the Sovereign cannot be understood to doe, by any Grant, that does not plainly, and directly discharge them of their subjection'.[101] When he writes about the sovereign's distribution of land among his subjects, he argues that all property comes under the 'Dominion' of the sovereign, and declares: 'consequently, whatsoever Distribution he shall make in prejudice thereof . . . is to be reputed voyd.'[102] Discussing cases where the subject can be relieved of the duty to obey the law, he says that this cannot apply in cases where the sovereign has disclaimed 'any Right essentiall to the Soveraignty'; in those cases, the subject has a duty to ignore the disclaimer.[103] On the first page of his chapter on the duties of the sovereign, he recapitulates his entire argument about the essential powers of sovereignty, and insists that 'it is the Office of the Soveraign, to maintain those Rights entire; and consequently against his duty . . . to transferre to another, or lay from himselfe any of them'.[104] And later in the same chapter he argues that the sovereign should take notice of the complaints and requests of his subjects, so long as they demand 'nothing in derogation of the essentiall Rights of Soveraignty', and adds: 'For without those Essentiall Rights, (as I have often before said,) the Common-wealth cannot at all subsist.'[105] It seems that Hobbes was conscious of having been positively repetitious on this subject.

Why should Hobbes have emphasized this point so strongly and so repeatedly? The basic issue here was of course familiar; everyone would have been aware that the dispute over the Militia Ordinance in 1642 (when Parliament had tried to persuade the King to hand over control of all the county militias) had, more than any other dispute, precipitated the outbreak of the war.[106] But on that occasion Charles I had indeed refused to hand over such an essential power; that is why the Ordinance was only an 'Ordinance' and not an Act. Hobbes's preoccupation with the danger of granting away such powers may rather reflect his concern about later negotiations, in which concessions of this kind were contemplated, and even agreed, by the royal

[100] p. 342. [101] p. 350.

[102] p. 390. This passage is, however, obscurely constructed, and may have undergone some textual corruption: the reference of 'thereof' is not grammatically clear, though the overall sense of the passage is clear enough. Rogers and Schuhmann suggest (i, pp. 16–17) moving the problematic sentence to a place in the previous paragraph; but this seems very forced, as it requires 'he' to have a counter-intuitive reference, and a following 'his' to have a different one. It also misses the point of the 'reputed voyd' reasoning, which is characteristic of the argument discussed here. [103] p. 470.

[104] p. 520. There is nothing corresponding to this passage in the equivalent chapter of De cive (XIII).

[105] p. 548. [106] See Woolrych, Britain in Revolution, pp. 215–19.

side. The relevant sequence of events here began in the summer of 1646, when Charles I was in the custody of the Scots at Newcastle. He came under intense pressure to make far-reaching concessions, the most important of which would have involved giving up power over the militia, and abolishing episcopacy. From Paris, his wife and her closest advisers (Lord Jermyn and Lord Colepeper) wrote to him repeatedly, emphasizing the importance of retaining power over the militia, and arguing that for that purpose episcopacy should be sacrificed. Those advisers' long-term strategy, which had itself guided the King towards the Scots, was to form an alliance with the Scottish Covenanters, dividing them from their parliamentarian allies and making possible a re-conquest of England; their argument was one of sheer pragmatism ('the Question in short', Jermyn and Colepeper wrote, 'is whether you will chuse to be a King of Presbitery or no King'), bolstered with the reflection that episcopacy was not the sole form of 'jure divino' Church government, since it was possible for a Christian Church to exist without bishops.[107] The most important adviser who would have resisted their approach was Edward Hyde; but he was isolated on the island of Jersey, and was well aware that his views were dismissed in Paris as absurdly unrealistic.[108] Nevertheless, Charles himself was strongly motivated to resist. In his letters to Paris he insisted that defending the Anglican Church was a divine duty ('how can we expect Gods blessing if we relinquishe his Church?'), and that under presbyterianism 'we should haue nether lawfull Priests nor Sacraments duly adminestred'. But to these theological reasons he also added a political one: 'it is by that pretext to take away the dependancy of the Church from the Crowne, w^{ch}, lett me tell you, I hould to be of equall consequence to that of the Militia, for People ar gouerned by Pulpits more then the sword, in tymes of Peace.'[109]

[107] Bodl., MS Clarendon 91, fo. 35v, Jermyn and Colepeper to Charles I, from Saint-Germain, 18 /28 Sept. 1646: quotation; 'if by Conscience is intended to assert that Episcopacy is Jure Diuino exclusiue wherby no Protestant (or rather Christian) Church can be acknowledged for such without a Bishop, we must therin craue leaue wholy to differ.' On the strategy, see Scott, 'Counsel and Cabal', pp. 126–7. On the bishops, the Queen blithely assured her husband: 'if you can put yourself at the head of an army, we shall restore them . . . Keep the militia, and never give [it] up, and by that means, everything will return' (Bodl., MS Clarendon 91, fo. 49r, 9 /19 Oct. 1646: 'si vous vous pouues encore metre a la test dune Arme nous les remetrons . . . Conserue vous la Militia et ne abandones jamais et par cela tout reuindra'). She implored him not to take the Covenant, but for reasons unrelated to Church government: 'all those who take it swear that they will punish all those who are delinquents, and that means everyone who belongs to your side, and me first of all' (de Baillon, Henriette-Marie, p. 550, 13 /23 Nov. 1646: 'tous ceux qui le prendront jurent de punir tous ceux qui sont délinquants, et cela est tous ceux de vostre party, et moy la première'). [108] Ollard, Clarendon, p. 110.

[109] Bodl., MS Clarendon 91, fos. 23v, Charles I to Jermyn, Colepeper, and Ashburnham, 22 July [/1 Aug.] 1646 (2nd and 3rd quotations); 28r, Charles I to Jermyn, Colepeper, and Ashburnham, 19 [/29] Aug. 1646 (1st quotation) (printed in Petrie, ed., Letters of Charles I, pp. 200, 204).

The demands of the English Parliament, set out in the 'Propositions of Newcastle' in June 1646, were for the surrender of a wider range of powers: not only accepting presbyterianism and giving control over the militia to Parliament for 20 years, but also allowing Parliament to raise taxes without royal assent, and giving Parliament control over all appointments in the legal system.[110] In late 1646 Charles's resolve began to weaken; but the most he was willing to offer at this stage (up to the early summer of 1647) was a ten-year period of parliamentary control of the militia, and a shorter trial period (three or, at most, five years) of presbyterianism, after which a final Church settlement would be decided.[111] In November 1647, at Carisbrooke Castle, he put forward another proposal: a three-year period of presbyterianism, and the surrender of control over the militia for his lifetime. The following month, in his secret agreement with the Scots, he conceded the three-year period of presbyterianism, but retained the right to the militia. And in October and November 1648, in his negotiations with the parliamentary commissioners, agreement was reached on three years of presbyterianism and twenty years of parliamentary control of the militia.[112] But by then it was too late: this agreement was overtaken first by the intervention of the army and then by the execution of the King.

The little that is known about Hobbes's friends and contacts in the English exile community at this time tends to connect him with the circle around Jermyn. Indeed, according to Sir Charles Cavendish, Jermyn was probably the person responsible for Hobbes's employment as mathematics tutor to Prince Charles: 'My Lord Jerman did (I beleeue) doe him that fauoure & honor; for his friends here I am confident had no hand in it.'[113] This statement must rule out any direct role for Sir Charles's brother in the appointment, though an indirect connection between Newcastle and Jermyn is easily established, via Sir William Davenant, Newcastle's friend and former artillery general.[114] Jermyn's secretary, the young poet Abraham Cowley, who would later write a magnificent Pindaric ode in praise of Hobbes, appears to have got to know Hobbes during this period.[115] During the many hours Hobbes spent lingering in antechambers at the court-in-exile, the most burning [110] Gardiner, ed., Constitutional Documents, pp. 290–306.

[111] Ibid., pp. 309–16; Carlton, Charles I, pp. 312–14; Kelsey, '"A No-King"', pp. 195–200. Henrietta Maria was shocked by the 10-year concession which, she pointed out, would guarantee the continuation of Parliament for that period (Green, ed., Letters of Henrietta Maria, p. 335).

[112] Carlton, Charles I, pp. 324, 326, 337.

[113] Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, p. 495. The term 'here' probably means Paris as opposed to Saint-Germain-en-Laye, where the court-in-exile was established.

[114] See Edmond, Rare Sir William, pp. 93–5, and the comments in Jackson, Hobbes, Bramhall, pp. 147–8.

[115] Aubrey's note on Cowley's friendship with Hobbes is introduced with the phrase: '(At Paris.)': 'Brief Lives', i, p. 368.

policy issue—whether the King should concede powers, and if so, which—must have been a frequent topic of debate. And if Hobbes's friendship with Davenant was already well established by the autumn of 1646, he would have had access to a very well-placed source of information about the King's dilemmas, since Davenant himself was sent on a personal mission by Henrietta Maria in September of that year to persuade the King to accept presbyterianism, for the sake of a deal with the Scots.[116]

It is clear that Hobbes would have agreed with Jermyn, Colepeper, and the Queen that the power over the militia should on no account be surrendered: 'the command of the Militia, without other Institution, maketh him that hath it Soveraign.'[117] More generally, he would surely have shared their view that the sword was, as they told Charles I, 'the only engine able to doe your busines', and that a full restoration of his power would best be accomplished by military means.[118] Hobbes would certainly have dismissed the religious scruples which made Hyde and the King so reluctant to allow the dismantling of Anglicanism; on this point, too, he would have followed the Jermyn line. But if he was aware (as he may well have been, through Davenant or other sources) of the nature of the King's political argument on this point—namely, that the monarch must control the Church, because the people are 'governed by the pulpit'—he would surely have agreed with that too. When compiling his list of the essential powers of the sovereign in Leviathan, he promoted to first place the power to judge opinions and doctrines; the words 'religion' and 'Church' were not used, but when he wrote that the sovereign must decide 'on what occasions, how farre, and what, men are to be trusted withall, in speaking to Multitudes of people', he clearly had the pulpit in mind.[119] So Hobbes's position might have been somewhat conflicted here. On the one hand, he thought that the sovereign had the absolute right to switch from one system of Church government to another, at will. On the other hand, if he believed that a presbyterian system threatened to take the power to control the pulpit entirely out of the sovereign's hands, he must have been hostile to this concession; in which case, he could not have enthusiastically supported Jermyn's policy, even though he partly disagreed with the King's reasons for opposing it.

[116] Edmond, Rare Sir William, p. 99.

[117] p. 274; cf. above, n. 107.

[118] Bodl., MS Clarendon 91, fo. 35r, Jermyn and Colepeper to Charles I, from Saint-Germain, 18 /28 Sept. 1646. Scott comments valuably on the Hobbesian nature of the Jermyn–Colepeper strategy, though his suggestion that they were influenced by Hobbes at this stage may perhaps overstate the case: 'Counsel and Cabal', pp. 131–2.

[119] p. 272.

But what if some concessions of essential powers were made? The Queen's attitude seems to have been that they could simply be reversed by force. Others, such as Hyde, required a moral justification for any such breach of promise, and found it in the principle that promises granted under extreme duress were not binding.[120] Hobbes's general political philosophy would not permit this, as his whole theory was based on the idea that promises made from fear are nevertheless valid. But he had a neater solution of his own: any promise by a sovereign to give up one of his essential powers simply could not mean what it said. It was void, unless it was accompanied by an explicit abandonment of sovereignty altogether. (This argument, it should be stressed, was not a mere contrivance to make it easier for such concessions to be made: Hobbes's substantive point was that the powers mattered in practice, so that any yielding of them would be extremely perilous.)

These issues returned with a vengeance in 1649–50, after the execution of Charles I. In March 1649 Scottish commissioners arrived in The Hague to negotiate there with Charles II. Their main demands were that he should endorse the various changes that had taken place in Scotland since 1641, sign both the Scottish National Covenant and the Solemn League and Covenant, and, in accordance with the latter, undertake to impose Scottish-style presbyterianism on England and Ireland. Charles was reluctant to do any of these things; the advice he received from the Marquess of Montrose was that the Solemn League and Covenant posed conditions so restrictive that it would turn Charles's rule into a conditional, elected monarchy. The commissioners went away, having achieved little, in June.[121] Nevertheless, care was taken not to eliminate the Scottish option; the preferred policy was to launch a new campaign in Ireland, but the prospect of being formally accepted as King in Scotland was not to be dismissed lightly. In August 1649 Charles II returned briefly to Paris, before moving to Jersey, a staging-post for Ireland; Edward Hyde spent August and September in Paris, and at the end of September he wrote a long policy paper for the King, warning him against presbyterianism, urging him never to accept the Solemn League and Covenant, and rebutting the Scots' suggestion that Charles was obliged to maintain 'y^e concessions formerly made by his father'.[122] During this stay in Paris, Hyde also had at least one meeting with Hobbes.[123] Whether Hobbes mentioned his plan to write a new political treatise or not is not known; but this is precisely the period when, according to the limited evidence considered above, Hob-

[120] Warner, ed., Nicholas Papers, i, p. 141.
[121] Stevenson, Revolution and Counter-revolution, pp. 125–6.
[122] Ollard, Clarendon, pp. 126–8; Warner, ed., Nicholas Papers, i, pp. 138–47 (quotation: p. 145).
[123] Hyde, Brief View and Survey, p. 7.

bes transferred his energies from the completion of De corpore to the writing of Leviathan. Charles and his key advisers had been absent from Paris for more than a year; this return visit, although quite brief, must have revitalized political debate among the English community there. It is quite conceivable, then, that it was as a result of some discussions and arguments, at just this time, about the future direction of Charles's policies—and, more importantly, the fundamental principles on which any such policy-making should be based—that Hobbes resolved to turn what had hitherto been a leisurely, long-term, second-priority project into his primary concern.

While Charles and his advisers focused on the situation of Ireland in the late summer and autumn of 1649, the issue of the Scottish demands had not gone away. A new Scottish envoy was sent in October, travelling first to Holland but eventually reaching Charles on Jersey. The military collapse of the royalists in Ireland was closing off Charles's options; and some of his advisers, including Lord Colepeper, Lord Percy, and Robert Long (who was described by one hostile observer as 'Lord Jermyns spy'), were in favour of the presbyterian solution.[124] In January 1650 Charles agreed to renew negotiations with the Scots; these took place in Breda, between mid-March and mid-May. The Scottish requirements were even stricter this time: not only must Charles sign both Covenants and declare that he would work to impose them on all three of his kingdoms, but he must also agree that all civil matters in Scotland must be settled in Parliament, and all ecclesiastical matters in the General Assembly. Reluctantly, Charles accepted all these conditions, and travelled to his Scottish kingdom in June.[125]

There is one intriguing piece of textual evidence in Leviathan to suggest that Hobbes was particularly concerned with Charles II's policy options during this period. In Chapter 29, 'Of those things that Weaken, or tend to the DISSOLUTION of a Common-wealth' (which, if Chapter 37 was completed by May 1650, was presumably written in the early months of that year), the very first item on his list is expressed as follows: 'That a man to obtain a Kingdome, is sometimes content with lesse Power, than to the Peace, and defence of the Common-wealth is necessarily required.' The use of the verb 'obtain' is, at first sight, striking. Hobbes is clearly not referring to adventurous commoners who set out to gain a kingdom; a few sentences later, he writes that 'when Kings deny themselves some such necessary Power, it is not alwayes (though sometimes) out of ignorance of what is necessary to the office they [124] Warner, ed., Nicholas Papers, i, pp. 149 (Lord Hatton to Nicholas, 9/19 Oct. 1649: quotation), 151 (Hatton(?) to Nicholas, 1/11 Nov. 1649: 'The persons held as chiefe saints in the Presbyterian Kalender and devotion are Lo. Percy, Lo. Culpeper, Mr. Long. . .').

[125] Stevenson, Revolution and Counter-revolution, pp. 131–41.

undertake; but many times out of a hope to recover the same again at their pleasure'.[126] However, although Hobbes normally uses the verb 'obtain' to mean 'gain' or 'acquire', he does sometimes use it in the sense of 'maintain', 'sustain', 'hold', or 'possess'; so this particular piece of evidence is not quite as compelling as it seems.[127] There is another passage, however, which does appear to relate directly to discussions about Charles II's policy options during this period. In Chapter 30, Hobbes briefly considers the question of whether a popular military commander may supplant the sovereign himself in the affections of the soldiers. Hobbes argues that this is not a problem if the sovereign himself is popular, and if the soldiers love 'not onely his Person, but also his Cause'. He continues:

> And therefore those, who by violence have at any time suppressed the Power of their lawfull Soveraign, before they could settle themselves in his place, have been alwayes put to the trouble of contriving their Titles, to save the People from the shame of receiving them. To have a known Right to Soveraign Power, is so popular a quality, as he that has it needs no more, for his own part, to turn the hearts of his Subjects to him, but that they see him able absolutely to govern his own Family: Nor, on the part of his enemies, but a disbanding of their Armies. For the greatest and most active part of Mankind, has never hetherto been well contented with the present.[128]

Here Hobbes propounds the sort of argument that would have been put to Charles II by the more optimistic of his advisers—while at the same time, characteristically, linking it to a pessimistic observation about the fickleness of most of mankind.

None of Charles's advisers, however, would have thought that his return to English soil would be accompanied simply by a 'disbanding' of his enemies' armies. While all hoped that there would be large-scale risings in his support, the strategy was essentially one of military conquest—by means of either an Irish army or, when that option was eliminated, a Scottish one. For some advisers, the notion of conquest was itself problematic. Hyde's policy paper of September 1649 urged Charles to emphasize that he was 'farre from intending or thinking upon a conquest of his Naturall Subjects'; if necessity required him to employ non-English forces, he should make it clear that 'he desires y^{e} reduccion, not y^{e} conquest, of his people, and to restore the suppressed lawes of y^{e} land, not to impose any new'.[129]

[126] pp. 498–500.

[127] Cf. pp. 370 ('where every one may obtain his right'), 558 ('because this Right could not be obtained by force').

[128] p. 550.

[129] Warner, ed., Nicholas Papers, i, p. 140.

Here again was a problem to which Hobbes's theory supplied a very definite solution. Indeed, the whole treatment of the theme of conquest is a major feature of Leviathan, and one that differentiates it significantly from The Elements of Law and De cive. It is a remarkable fact that only in Leviathan does Hobbes speak explicitly of sovereignty being directly acquired as a result of the military conquest of entire populations: he refers there, for example, to a 'Conquered Nation', and this is the model for his account of the basic alternative to a 'Common-wealth by Institution', namely, 'A Common-wealth by Acquisition . . . where the Soveraign Power is acquired by Force'.[130] In both of his previous texts, the contrast was between a commonwealth by institution and a 'patrimonial kingdom', which was a state that had developed out of the expansion of a large family. In those accounts he did indeed discuss a master's authority over a servant who was originally captured in war, but he did so not to show that sovereignty over an entire population could arise directly from military conquest, but merely to explain how a kind of personal dominion could be acquired, even in the state of nature. The elementary dominion of parents over their children also occurred, he said, in the state of nature, and on a similar basis; and it was from this kind of parental dominion, supplemented by the acquisition of servants 'by generation, conquest, or voluntary submission' that a 'patrimonial kingdom' could arise.[131] The primary emphasis on conquest in the equivalent chapter of Leviathan makes for a significant difference in the presentation of Hobbes's theory. Indeed, the family-based 'patrimonial kingdom' virtually disappears from the argument (it is retained only as a theoretical, but practically dubious, possibility).[132] One consequence of Hobbes's embrace of large-scale conquest here is that he can now admit (as his previous accounts, awkwardly, could not) that a state based on sovereignty by acquisition need not be monarchical: aristocracies and democracies too can conquer populations in war. This, in itself, might be taken to suggest that Hobbes was contemplating a final parliamentarian victory when he wrote this chapter. But another consequence was that Hobbes could now respond directly to the worry, felt by people such as Hyde, that sovereignty over a conquered nation would be somehow more oppressive than sovereignty of the 'instituted' kind.[133] This point may have been prompted partly by arguments about the Norman Conquest in the anti-monarchical publications of the 1640s;

[130] pp. 306, 314.

[131] Elements of Law, II.ii; II.iv (quotation: II.iv.10); De cive, VIII; IX.

[132] See the paragraph summarized as 'Difference between a Family and a Kingdom' on p. 314.

[133] The earlier accounts had made the same point of principle, viz. that 'whatsoever rights be in the one, the same also be in the other' (Elements of Law, II.iv.10); but the 'one' there was not a conquered nation as such.

but it does also seem relevant to the concerns of royalists contemplating the possible re-conquest of England by Charles II.

Exactly what line Hobbes would have advised Charles to take, when considering in late 1649 or early 1650 the prospect of renewed negotiations with the Scots, cannot now be known. We do know that several of the people who favoured an agreement with the Scots had Hobbesian connections. Jermyn and Percy had long been pressing for it.[134] Abraham Cowley, Jermyn's secretary and Hobbes's friend, wrote from Paris to Robert Long at Breda in April 1650, pleading for an agreement with the Scots as the royalists' last hope.[135] The Marquess of Newcastle, Hobbes's friend and patron, who was now a key adviser to Charles II, had reached a similar conclusion.[136] And Henry Bennet, whom Hobbes had probably got to know in Saint-Germain and Paris in the late 1640s, was also in favour of this policy.'[137] Very possibly Hobbes would have gone along with this; we know, from Payne's correspondence, that in the winter of 1649–50 Hobbes was sharpening his argument against those who claimed that to preserve episcopacy was a divinely ordained duty. Hobbes might have accepted the need for lip-service to the Covenants, so long as Charles understood that he could and should repudiate them as soon as he had the power to do so. Yet, on the other hand, Hobbes was quite capable of disagreeing with his friends. In any case, so far as a study of the origins and nature of Leviathan is concerned, what matters is not the particular advice that Hobbes might have given, but the general nature of his engagement with these problems: his argument that, on the one hand, any yielding of essential powers risked turning into an abandonment of sover-

[134] On Percy's (and Jermyn's) support for the presbyterian solution, see Warner, ed., Nicholas Papers, i, pp. 135, 151, 172. For a useful summary of the evidence of Percy's connections with Hobbes, see Jackson, Hobbes, Bramhall, pp. 148–9(n.), 172. See also the letter from William Joyner to Anthony Wood of 23 Nov. [/3 Dec.] 1694, describing Percy as, in later years, 'a continual reader of M^{r} Hob's Leuiathan, & his Philosophical Course in English, w^{ch} he had of me': Bodl., MS Wood F. 43, fo. 209r.

[135] [29 Mar./] 8 Apr. 1650: 'y^{t} w^{ch} concernes us more then any thing else now in the world, w^{ch} is the Scotch Treaty; if y^{t} happen not to succeed wee shall have leysure enough for curiosity in the affaires of other Countries, for wee are not likely to have any thing more to doe in our own' (Vincent, 'Three Unpublished Letters', pp. 455–6; cf. similar comments in Cowley's letter to Long of [3/] 13 Mar. (Simmons, 'Unpublished Letter', p. 195) and in his letter to Bennet of [20/] 30 Apr. (T. Brown, ed., Miscellanea aulica, p. 130)).

[136] As his wife later put it: he 'could perceive no other and better way at that present for His Majesty, but to make an Agreement with His Subjects of Scotland, upon any Condition, and to go into Scotland in Person Himself, that he might but be sure of an Army, there being no probability or appearance then of getting an Army any where else' (Cavendish, Life of Cavendishe, p. 68).

[137] Metzger, Hobbes und die Englische Revolution, p. 100. Bennet came to Saint-Germain in Sept. 1647, was appointed secretary to the Duke of York in 1648, and was generally regarded as a 'creature' of Jermyn (Marshall, 'Bennet'); he would be a patron of Hobbes in the 1660s (see Correspondence, ii, pp. 692–3). Metzger also lists the Duke of Buckingham and Sir Charles Berkeley as Hobbes-connected supporters of the Scottish alliance; but there is no evidence of continuing contacts between Hobbes and Buckingham after the mathematics lessons of 1645–6, and although a connection with Berkeley is plausible (he was the brother-in-law of Hobbes's friend Sidney Godolphin), there is no direct evidence of it.

eignty itself, and, on the other hand, any apparent granting away of such powers was inherently void, and could therefore be revoked as soon as it was practicable to do so.

Religious Issues

It was suggested above that 'if Hobbes believed that a presbyterian system threatened to take such a power [sc. the power to decide who would preach to the people] entirely out of the sovereign's hands, then he must have been hostile to this concession'. In other words, a key point would have been the fact not merely that the form of ecclesiastical government was being dictated to the sovereign (which was in itself injurious to sovereignty), but that the new form was inherently opposed to the exercise of sovereign power over the Church.[138] The 'if' there is, however, an important condition: whether Hobbes thought this about presbyterianism as early as 1646, when this issue arose in the King's negotiations with the Scots, is not actually known. The presbyterian Church with which Hobbes was most familiar was the French Reformed Church, to which several of his friends in France belonged; and, for obvious reasons, that Church proclaimed its loyalty and obedience to the French crown, outdoing even the Gallican Catholic Church in its insistence that all its rights of action depended on the King. But in 1649 information suggesting that presbyterianism (at least in its Scottish form) was directly opposed to civil sovereignty became much more easily available, thanks to the efforts of those Anglicans who were determined to dissuade Charles from taking the Solemn League and Covenant. Foremost among them was Hobbes's old sparring-partner John Bramhall, whose scathingly polemical pamphlet was printed in Delft in April 1649 (for maximum impact on the nearby discussions with the Scottish commissioners at The Hague) under the title A Faire Warning to Take Heed of the Scotish Discipline: As being of All Others most Injurious to the Civill Magistrate, most Oppressive to the Subject, most Pernicious to Both. Bramhall paraded, with much textual evidence drawn from Scottish writings and ecclesiastical documents, all the most extreme claims made by the Kirk (often pointing out that they were more extreme than those made by the Reformed Church in Geneva), and repeatedly compared their pretensions to those of the Papacy. A passage summarizing his argument merits quotation at length.

[138] The harm done by the fact that the change was dictated to the sovereign could in theory be remedied by the polite fiction that this change was made purely by the sovereign's own authority; but the wording of the two Covenants would have made such a fiction impossible to sustain.

We have seen how pernicious this Discipline (as it is maintained in Scotland, and endeavoured to be introduced into England by the Covenant) is to the supreme magistrate; how it robs him of supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs, and of the last appeals of his own subjects; that it exempts the presbyters from the power of the magistrate, and subjects the magistrate to the presbyters; that it restrains his dispensative power of pardoning, deprives him of the dependence of his subjects; that it doth challenge and usurp a power paramount, both of the Word and of the sword, both of peace and war, over all courts and estates, over all laws civil and ecclesiastical, in order to the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ, whereof the presbyters alone are constituted rulers by God; and all this by a pretended Divine right . . . in a word, that it is the top-branch of Popery, and a greater tyranny than ever Rome was guilty of.[139]

Hobbes may well have read this text.[140] By the time he wrote the second half of Leviathan he certainly agreed with Bramhall's view of presbyterianism in general, and of its comparability to Roman Catholicism in particular. In Chapter 44 he observed that 'the Presbytery hath challenged the power to Excommunicate their owne Kings, and to bee the Supreme Moderators in Religion, in the places where they have that form of Church government, no lesse then the Pope challengeth it universally'.[141] In Chapter 47 he wrote that while the presbyterians had rejected many Roman Catholic doctrines, they had retained the essential claim that the 'Kingdom of Christ' was already in being: 'The Authors therefore of this Darknesse in Religion, are the Romane, and the Presbyterian Clergy.'[142] Indeed, although most of the religious polemics in the last part of Leviathan are directed explicitly against the Roman Catholic Church, the final paragraph warns that in Protestant countries something similar to the 'Spirit of Rome', but more pernicious—'rather, an Assembly of Spirits worse than he'—may enter, with even more deadly consequences. 'For it is not the Romane Clergy onely, that pretends the Kingdome of God to be of this World, and thereby to have a Power therein, distinct from that of the Civill State.'[143]

But while Hobbes would have agreed with Bramhall about presbyterianism, he would also have argued that Bramhall's own view, for all its insistence on the King's rights as supreme governor of the Church, was nevertheless just a milder version of the same fundamentally pernicious approach: to say that episcopacy existed jure divino, by divine right, was to claim a right in-

[139] Bramhall, Works, iii, pp. 271–2.

[140] Nicholas Jackson has suggested that a phrase in the final sentence of this text, 'they spring out of the ruins of the civil magistrate; they "sit upon the Temple of God"' (ibid., iii, p. 287), anticipates Hobbes's description of the Papacy as 'the Ghost of the deceased Romane Empire, sitting crowned upon the grave thereof: For so did the Papacy start up on a Sudden out of the Ruines of that Heathen Power' (Hobbes, Bramhall, pp. 136–7, citing p. 1118).

[141] p. 978. [142] p. 1106. [143] p. 1124.

dependent of, and potentially superior to, the rights of the sovereign. As we have seen, Hobbes was arguing this point against his old friend Robert Payne in the winter of 1649–50. Payne continued to defend episcopacy in subsequent letters to Hobbes; his fear, as he explained to Sheldon in August 1650, was that Hobbes's view that the sovereign 'may settle w[ha]^{t} kinde of ch[urch] governmt he shall think fitt' would be taken to 'justify those who haue cassiered B[isho]^{ps} allready'—which indeed it would, so long as one accepted that the new régime in England had sovereign authority. In the end, Payne was reduced to imploring Hobbes to be lenient, reminding him that 'All Trueths are not fitt to be told at all times'.[144] Elements of Hobbes's critique of Anglican episcopacy, as developed in his correspondence with Payne, are clearly present in the second half of Leviathan.[145] Yet, perhaps as a result of Payne's pleadings, the treatment of the English bishops is notably mild. Hobbes seems to be letting them off lightly, as one of his more unguarded comments in a later polemical work admits: in Leviathan, he wrote, he had 'suffered the Clergy of the Church of England to escape'.[146] In Chapter 42 he does allow himself one barbed comment on their use of the title 'by divine providence', saying that by its means they 'sliely slip off the Collar of their Civill Subjection'.[147] But his historical account of their position after the English Reformation does significantly modify this criticism. One might expect, he writes, that civil sovereigns would have recovered all their powers at the Reformation; in England they did, except that the bishops 'by maintaining their imployment to be in Gods Right, seemed to usurp, if not a Supremacy, yet an Independency'. Nevertheless, Hobbes adds, 'they but seemed to usurpe it, in as much as they acknowledged a Right in the King, to deprive them of the Exercise of their Functions at his pleasure.'[148] Such qualifying clauses would not be sufficient, however, to allay the anger of many of Hobbes's Anglican readers (including his old friend Edward Hyde), who perfectly well understood that many of Hobbes's more general criticisms of the Roman Catholic Church—such as his rejection of jure divino tithes, or indeed his attack on the very idea of a distinct 'clergy'—must at the same time count as criticisms of the Church of England.[149]

[144] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 130 (19 [/29] Aug. 1650). Here and in subsequent quotations from manuscript material, unambiguous contractions are expanded, but potentially ambiguous ones are expanded within square brackets.

[145] See above, nn. 34, 35.

[146] Hobbes, Six Lessons, p. 63 (EW vii, p. 354). The full comment, addressed in 1656 to the presbyterian John Wallis and the Anglican Seth Ward, makes an implied threat in a darkly humorous way: 'Fifthly, when I had in my Leviathan suffered the Clergy of the Church of England to escape, you did imprudently in bringing any of them in again. An Ulysses upon so light an occasion would not have ventured to return again into the Cave of Polyphemus.'

[147] p. 854. [148] p. 1106; 'in Gods Right' here means jure divino. [149] pp. 962–4.

In the royalist exile community in Paris, Hobbes certainly had critics and enemies among the Anglican clergy. Early in 1650, some of the Anglican clergymen in Paris seem to have scored some sort of tactical victory against Hobbes, the exact nature of which is, however, hard to determine. Payne reported to Sheldon the news that in a recent letter to the Earl of Devonshire Hobbes had written 'That he had lost y^e^ reward of his labors w^th^ ye Pr[ince] by ye sinister suggestions of some of the Clergy', and commented: 'I am very sorry to heare, any of our coat haue had the ill fortune to provoke so great a witt agaynst y^e^ Church.'[150] Another glancing reference to this occurs in a letter from Henry Hammond to Sheldon, written in November [/December] 1651, where Hammond briefly discusses Hobbes and then refers to Charles II as 'him y^t^ he expected reward fro^m^, for read[in]^g^ to him'.[151] The nature of this expected 'reward' is far from clear. A modern reader might suppose that something monetary, such as the payment of a pension, was meant, but the term 'reward of his labours' was almost always used in this period not for monetary payment but for something intangible, such as gratitude, honour, glory, or status; a formal rebuff by Charles might have sufficed to merit the description in Payne's report.[152] Perhaps Hobbes had been promised some kind of privileged access to him, which was now summarily withdrawn on clerical advice. Only one thing is clear: Hobbes did feel that his interests had been harmed by clerical machinations.

In a letter to Sheldon of August 1650 Payne returned to this topic, commenting: 'if o[u]^r^ Tribe [sc. the order of bishops, or episcopalians generally] haue gott so sharp an adversary, you may guess, who^m^ we may thank for it.'[153] At this distance in time, it is not so easy to guess the identity of the culprit or culprits; there were many Anglican clergymen attached to Charles's court-in-exile, or resident for some time in Paris, during the latter part of the 1640s.[154] Among the few who are known to have had personal contacts with Hobbes, John Earles can probably be eliminated, on grounds of character.[155] John Cosin, who ministered to Hobbes during his sickness in 1647, is also an [150] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 127, 7 [/17] Mar. 1649, reporting information from a friend whose knowledge was derived from the interception of the letter in London.

[151] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 70, 25 Nov. [/5 Dec.] 1651. Hammond had probably acquired this information (and, therefore, the use of the word 'reward') from Sheldon in their earlier correspondence.

[152] For such usage see, e.g., Field, Learned Sermon, p. 4; Wilson, English Martyrologie, p. 248; Carleton, Astrologomania, p. 1; Rutherford, Lex, rex, p. 105.

[153] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 130.

[154] They included Charles's chaplains Richard Steward, Andrew Clare, John Earles, William Stamp, and John Lloyd, as well as John Cosin, John Bramhall, Isaac Basire, Richard Watson, Robert Creighton, George Morley, and Edward Wolley.

[155] Edward Hyde described him as 'of a conversation so pleasant and delightful, so very innocent, and so very facetious, that no man's company was more desired and more loved . . . He was amongst the few excellent men who never had, nor ever could have an enemy' (Life, i, pp. 57–8).

unlikely candidate; despite his earlier record as a high Laudian, he did not in fact believe in jure divino episcopacy, writing to a friend in February 1650: 'I conceive that the power of Ordination was restrained to Bishops, rather by Apostolical practice, and the perpetual custom and canons of the Church, than by any absolute precept, that either Christ or His Apostles gave about it.'[156] There are two figures, however, whose active hostility towards Hobbes on these matters can be assumed. One is Richard Steward, who had been a chaplain to Charles I and Clerk of his Closet. At some time in the second half of 1646 he had moved to Saint-Germain, where he became Dean of the Chapel Royal, and thus the senior cleric in attendance on Prince Charles; he came with a letter to the Prince from Charles I which recommended him and required that 'you will take his aduice & giue verry much reuerence to his opinion in euery thing w^{ch} concernes Conscience or Church Affaires'.[157] Steward was such a fierce upholder of jure divino episcopacy, and of the rights of the Anglican Church more generally, that even his friend and ally Edward Hyde admitted that he could be rather monomaniacal on this issue.[158] As one of the ecclesiastical commissioners sent to negotiate with the parliamentarian side at Uxbridge in early 1645, Steward had resolutely resisted proposals to abolish episcopacy and alienate the Church estates; in 1647 he published a pamphlet defending the position he had taken, and emphatically declaring that episcopacy was 'of divine right'.[159]

The other combative Anglican who may well have provoked Hobbes during this period is Bishop John Bramhall, whose disagreements with him extended far beyond the philosophical issue of free will versus necessity. In the spring or early summer of 1645 Bramhall had given Hobbes a lengthy set of objections to De cive: 'about sixty exceptions, the one half of them political, the other half theological . . . and every exception justified by a number of reasons'.[160] Hobbes had expressed a desire to answer these 'exceptions', but in the event his response was never written.[161] Taunted over this [156] Cosin, Works, iv, p. 402. This was part of an argument explaining Cosin's reasons for thinking that the (presbyterian) ordination of Huguenot ministers was essentially valid. On his ministering to Hobbes see Hobbes, Problemata physica, sig. A7r (OL iv, p. 303); Thomae Hobbes angli vita, p. 9 (OL i, p. xvi); and Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, p. 353.

[157] Bodl., MS Clarendon 91, fo. 30r, from Newcastle, 26 Aug. [/5 Sept.] 1646. Steward was in Paris by 5/15 Dec. 1646, when he wrote to a friend: 'I am here at y^{e} Louure in Paris, a domestique wth y^{e} Prince' (Eton College, MS Coll/P14/406/5).

[158] Hyde, Life, i., p. 288: 'most conversant in that learning which vindicated the dignity and authority of the church; upon which his heart was most entirely set; not without some prejudice to those who thought there was any other object to be more carefully pursued'. For more sympathetic portraits see Pocock, Life of Steward; Browell, 'Steward'; Franklin, 'Steward'.

[159] Steward, Answer to a Letter, esp. p. 13.

[160] Bramhall, Works, iv, p. 20.

[161] Hobbes, Libertie and Necessitie, p. 1 (EW iv, p. 239); cf. Jackson, Hobbes, Bramhall, pp. 86–7, 103.

failure by Bramhall many years later, Hobbes responded in 1656 as follows: 'I did indeed intend to have answered those Exceptions . . . But shortly after intending to write in English, and publish my thoughts concerning Civil Doctrine, in that Book which I intitled Leviathan, I thought his objections would by the clearness of my method fall off without an answer.'[162] This retrospective claim seems (as was suggested above) rather too conveniently self-exculpatory; not much weight can be given to it, therefore, as evidence for the chronology of the early planning of Leviathan. There is, in any case, some reason to think that when Hobbes prepared his revised edition of De cive in early 1646 (commenting in his new Preface that he had been bitterly criticized by 'ecclesiastics' for making the civil power 'unrestrained' or 'excessive'), he did respond in some of his annotations to criticisms made by Bramhall: many of the bishop's objections to De cive were, it seems, later put to use in Bramhall's work The Catching of Leviathan, and some correlation can be made between points raised there and ones handled in the revised De cive.[163] In that later work Bramhall attacked several of the ecclesiological arguments put forward in the 1642 De cive, including Hobbes's denial that there is a universal Church and his claim that a Church and a Christian commonwealth are one and the same thing. As for Hobbes's account of the authority of 'pastors', Bramhall complained that it was self-contradictory: on the one hand Hobbes seemed to endorse the validity of priestly ordination as something instituted by Christ, but on the other hand he portrayed the civil sovereign as the supreme pastor, from whom all ecclesiastical rights were derived.[164] Here Bramhall's criticism was well founded. It is true that at the end of Chapter XVII of De cive Hobbes wrote that Jesus had promised infallibility to his Apostles and their successors, and that 'the holder of civil sovereignty is obliged, insofar as he is a Christian, to interpret the Holy Scriptures, where the question is about the mysteries of faith, by means of properly ordained ecclesiastics'; but this statement was highly anomalous, as it went against the whole drift of Hobbes's argument up to that point, which had emphasized that the sovereign was the supreme interpreter, and that those who received ordination must first be selected by the authority of the Church, which meant the authority of the Christian commonwealth.[165] Some modern scholars have argued, largely on the basis of this anomalous [162] Hobbes, Questions concerning Liberty, p. 20 (EW v, p. 26).

[163] Hobbes, De cive, ed. Warrender, p. 84: 'Acerrimè vero reprehensa haec reperi, quod potentiam civilem immodicam fecerim, sed ab Ecclesiasticis.' The case for Bramhall's later use of his 1645 objections is persuasively made in Parkin, Taming the Leviathan, pp. 41–3; cf. also Jackson, Hobbes, Bramhall, p. 123.

[164] Bramhall, Works, iv, pp. 533–4.

[165] De cive XVII.28: 'Obligatur ergo quatenus Christianus, is qui habet ciuitatis imperium, scripturas sacras, vbi quaestio est de mysteriis fidei, per Ecclesiasticos ritè ordinatos'; cf. XVI.16; XVII.14–27.

passage, that De cive was generally compatible with Anglican doctrine (with the consequence that Anglicans found it acceptable), and that the break with orthodox Anglicanism took place only when Hobbes wrote Leviathan; but Hobbes's radical denial of human spiritual authority was already present in De cive, as Anglicans such as the bitterly hostile Bramhall were well aware.[166]

It is true, nevertheless, that Hobbes's arguments about religion in Leviathan are more polemical, more wide-ranging, and, when they handle theological matters not treated in his previous works, more radical and extreme. The basic framework of argument set out in the three chapters on 'Religion' in De cive is largely adhered to: authority in the 'kingdom' of God in the Old Testament was essentially political; Christ's kingdom, as announced in the New Testament, belongs to the future, though one can become a prospective member of it by being a Christian in the present; and being a Christian involves holding some simple core beliefs, and following requirements which cannot conflict with obeying the laws of the civil sovereign. But the treatment of these matters becomes hugely more extensive and intensive (the topics covered in one chapter of De cive, Chapter XVII, become the subject-matter of Chapters 36, 39, 40, 41, and 42 of Leviathan—a total of 84 folio pages). On some key points, the argument acquires a truly radical cutting edge: one example is the treatment of Moses, whose power to hand down divine commandments to the Israelites is explicitly derived in Leviathan from the fact that they had previously consented to obey him as their civil sovereign.[167] And, as mentioned above, many biblical and theological topics are now explored for the first time in detail, such as the meaning of 'spirit' or the nature of Hell—often with arguments seriously at odds with traditional theology. While the main target of Hobbes's explicit criticisms in the second half of Leviathan is the Roman Catholic Church (other confessions are, as we have seen, also criticized, but there is nothing comparable to the 20 folio pages devoted to confuting Cardinal Bellarmine), he makes plain his opposition to all forms of Christianity that have claimed any kind of 'spiritual government': 'Temporall and Spirituall Government, are but two words brought into the world, to make men see double, and mistake their Lawfull Soveraign.'[168]

Why this huge change—or, at least, development—of emphasis? Clearly the opposition of exiled Anglican clergymen was not the only stimulus to which Hobbes was responding. The Roman Catholic and presbyterian targets he attacked were not straw men; their defences of spiritual and ecclesiastical authority were major bodies of doctrine, supported by huge quantities of theological argument and scriptural citation, that needed to be opposed. But there were other threats as well. One major problem that concerned Hobbes was the growth in England of religious 'enthusiasm' (a term which Hobbes was one of the first to use in the English language)—of sectarians who claimed special knowledge of God's designs, and an indefeasible divine warrant for their own actions. When Christian men 'take not their Christian Soveraign, for Gods Prophet', he writes, one possible consequence is that they 'take their owne Dreames, for the Prophecy they mean to bee governed by, and the tumour of their own hearts for the Spirit of God'; but if we make judges of good and evil 'such private men as pretend to be supernaturally Inspired', this will cause 'the Dissolution of all Civill Government'.[169]

[166] See the valuable discussions of this issue in Nauta, 'Hobbes on Religion', and Collins, Allegiance of Thomas Hobbes, pp. 67–9.

[167] p. 740. [168] pp. 732–4 (quotation), 866–926 (against Bellarmine).

That Hobbes places most of his emphasis on the Roman Catholic Church, however, does call for some further explanation—not least because, in one small but striking way, the argument of Leviathan is in fact more friendly to Roman Catholicism than that of De cive. In the earlier work, Hobbes wrote that the power to determine what doctrines and actions were necessary for salvation was inseparably attached to sovereignty: therefore, a sovereign simply could not concede or transfer this power to an external authority. Moreover, he added, it would be absurd for a sovereign to commit the governance of the consciences of his subjects to an enemy.[170] For all the studious abstraction of the wording, this was a transparent reference to the Papacy; and it seemed to rule out permitting any exercise of religious authority by the Pope outside his own temporal dominions. In Leviathan, on the other hand, Hobbes does accept that a civil sovereign may 'commit the Authority of Ordaining Pastors in his Dominions to another King, (as divers Christian Kings allow that power to the Pope;)', so long as this does not involve acknowledging that the Pope possesses a higher authority; and he also notes that the Pope can exercise authority over bishops 'in the Dominions of any other Prince that hath given him that Power.'[171] It might be tempting to connect this change of opinion by Hobbes with the 'Blackloist' movement, a group of English Catholics, based in Paris in the late 1640s, who hoped to make a deal with the authorities in England, offering to renounce their allegiance to the Pope in return for the toleration of Roman Catholicism. Hobbes certainly knew some of these people (above all, Thomas White and Sir [169] pp. 502, 678–80 ('tumour' here means inflated pride or conceit).

[170] XVII.27. This was the one case (mentioned above, at n. 99) where Hobbes invoked his principle that such a transfer of an essential power would be void.

[171] pp. 854, 906. The arguments of De cive and Leviathan can perhaps be reconciled, on the basis of the distinction between transferring a right and delegating the exercise of it; but the fact remains that the possibility of delegation in this case is not even hinted at in the discussion in De cive.

Kenelm Digby), and would no doubt have preferred the Blackloist version of Roman Catholicism to the orthodox variety.[172] But their project was, in the end, rather different from the arrangement that he specifies in Leviathan: they were proposing that Roman Catholic priests in England should act entirely as subjects of the English sovereign power, whereas Hobbes envisages priests who are still in the service of the Pope, and may even be described as his 'subjects'.[173] One reason for Hobbes's concession in Leviathan may be merely that he was acknowledging reality; many powerful European sovereigns did allow the Roman Catholic Church to operate in their dominions, and it was a weakness of De cive that it declared such a state of affairs simply incompatible with the maintenance of sovereignty. But another possible reason should also be considered, which is that the restoration of kingly rule in Ireland would obviously have depended on the acquiescence and cooperation of the King's Catholic subjects.[174]

Hobbes's French Roman Catholic friends included Marin Mersenne, who was a friar, and Pierre Gassendi, who was a priest. It is a sign of those two men's regard and affection for Hobbes that they openly encouraged the commercial printing of De cive, even though the last few pages of that work included some corrosive comments on specifically Roman Catholic practices such as clerical celibacy, the canonization of saints, and indulgences.[175] Other French readers may have been less complaisant. Some of the Roman Catholic intellectuals who had received copies from Mersenne were scandalized by it: one wrote to him in September of that year that 'It is a rhapsody of heresies. Its basic principles are pernicious and absurd . . . The only sort of correction this book deserves is that made by fire.'[176] In the Preface to the revised edition, Hobbes referred to criticisms by 'ecclesiastics', without mentioning Roman Catholics in particular; but his boast there that he had answered merely by tying his knots even tighter does probably express the attitude with which he would have responded to complaints from the Roman [172] The fullest study is Lewis, 'Hobbes and the Blackloists'; see also Collins, 'Hobbes and the Blackloist Conspiracy'.

[173] Thus Hobbes writes (pp. 852–4) that the priests in this case will be 'Ministers' of the civil sovereign, 'not because they that Teach, but because they that are to Learn, are his Subjects'. The sort of analogy he has in mind would involve the English authorities agreeing that the King of France could send French schoolmasters to teach in English schools.

[174] Potential concessions to Roman Catholicism went further than that: in Apr. 1650 one report of a meeting of Charles II's Privy Council said that 'As for the Catholics, all care will be taken to give them ease and liberty' (CSPD 1650, p. 89: 8 [/18] Apr.).

[175] De cive, XVIII.14; these passages form the germ of parts of Ch. 47 of Leviathan.

[176] Mersenne, Correspondance, xi, pp. 264–5, Baptiste Masoyer-Deshommeaux to Mersenne, [31 Aug./] 10 Sept. 1642: 'C'est une rhapsodie d'heresies. Les fondements sont pernicieux et absurdes . . . Cela ne merite correction que du feu').

Catholic side.[177] This may also form part of the background to his renewed assault on the Roman Catholic Church in his next political treatise.

There are some other factors that may help to explain the scale, and fierceness, of Hobbes's attack on Roman Catholicism in Leviathan. One is the situation among the English exiles in Paris, where intense pressures were put on Anglicans to convert to the Roman Church. As John Cosin later recalled,

> At my first coming into France, I found many of the Roman profession (both priests and others) very busy and industrious in persuading them of our religion that attended at the English court to turn papists; for which purpose the chief arguments that they used were such as these: 'You have lived a long while in heresy, which hath brought God's anger and indignation upon you: your kingdom of England is ruined: your Church is lost: your Bishops and Priests are put out of their places, and are never likely to be restored . . .'[178]

The Roman Catholic priests around Henrietta Maria were central to this campaign, and they made some notable converts, including Hobbes's friend Sir William Davenant. The leading Anglican clergymen, such as Cosin and Bramhall, devoted much energy during the late 1640s and the 1650s to writing anti-Catholic treatises, defending the Church of England from the charge of schism and attacking key doctrines such as that of transubstantiation.[179] Whether Hobbes himself came under any sustained pressure to convert is not known; an anecdote recorded by Aubrey has it that 'When Mr. T. Hobbes was sick in France, the divines came to him, and tormented him (both Roman Catholic, Church of England, and Geneva)' to which he responded: 'Let me alone, or els I will detect all your cheates from Aaron to yourselves'.[180] Aubrey added that 'I thinke I have heard him speake something to this purpose'; all that Hobbes mentioned in his own autobiography, however, was that during his serious illness (in 1647), when he appeared to be dying, Mersenne had briefly attempted to convert him, but had relented when Hobbes asked him to change the subject.[181] Nevertheless, others may have tried harder—for example, the Roman Catholic priest Miles Pinkney, who was active in Henrietta Maria's circle, and whom Hobbes seems to have

[177] Hobbes, De cive, ed. Warrender, p. 84: 'ab Ecclesiasticis'; 'ut eos nodos fortiùs astringerem'.

[178] Cosin, Works, iv, p. 242.

[179] For a useful account of these pressures and controversies see Bosher, Making of the Restoration Settlement, pp. 60–66.

[180] Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, pp. 357–8. The source was Elizabeth Villiers, Viscountess Purbeck, who was not apparently in Paris at the time.

[181] Hobbes, Thomae Hobbes angli vita, pp. 8–9 (OL i, p. xvi). A more pointed version of this story was related by Hobbes's friend Jean-Baptiste Lantin, who wrote that when Hobbes was told, during his sickness, that Mersenne intended to visit him to convert him, he replied 'asking that he should not come there; "I would make fun of him; and perhaps he himself would be converted by me"' (BN, MS fr. 23253, fo. 89r: 'quil ny uienne pas; ie me moquerois de luy; et peutestre le conuertiroisie luy-meme').

known personally.[182] What matters most, in any case, is not Hobbes's particular experience in this respect, but the fact that the English community more generally was a hotbed of Catholic–Anglican controversy.

One particular product of that phenomenon in Paris during this period deserves special notice: the treatise Exomologesis by Hugh Cressy, which was published there in 1647. Cressy was a royalist and former Anglican priest who, as a young man, had been closely involved in Viscount Falkland's so-called 'Great Tew' circle of wits, scholars, and theologians.[183] In this book, Cressy explained that when faced with the destruction of the Church of England in the mid-1640s he had not at first thought of converting to Roman Catholicism, because he assumed that its claims had been decisively refuted by William Chillingworth's The Religion of Protestants and Falkland's Discourse of Infallibility—the two fundamental anti-Catholic texts produced by the Great Tew circle. However, he had been persuaded (partly by conversations with Henry Holden, an English Catholic theologian in Paris who was close to Thomas White and Sir Kenelm Digby) to change his mind; and so his book reopened a range of issues debated in those earlier works, such as the sufficiency and authority of the Bible, and the awkward question—awkward for biblicist Protestants, at least—of how the canon of Holy Scripture was determined. It is possible that Hobbes, who also had some connection with Great Tew, may have known Cressy personally, and that reading his book may have had some effect in encouraging Hobbes to revisit many of the issues discussed in Falkland and Chillingworth's anti-Catholic writings. This may form part of the background to Hobbes's exploration of these issues in Leviathan, and in particular to his comment in Chapter 33 of Leviathan that 'It is a question much disputed between the divers sects of Christian Religion, From whence the Scriptures derive their Authority; which question is also propounded sometimes in other terms, as, How wee know them to be the Word of God, or, Why we beleeve them to be so'—a question which, he argued, could be resolved only by recognizing that it was improperly put, and that 'The question truly stated is, By what Authority they are made Law.'[184]

Another factor in Hobbes's writing against the Roman Catholic Church in Leviathan seems to have been his knowledge of a body of controversy which he had probably explored long before his connection with the Great Tew circle. The first quarter of the seventeenth century had seen a great efflorescence of Anglican 'controversial theology', directed against the doctrines, and the claims to direct or indirect political authority, of the Roman Church. Much of this was stimulated by the argumentation over the Oath of Allegiance of 1606; in the following years, James I himself was drawn into an open controversy with Roberto Bellarmino (Cardinal Bellarmine), and many other theologians joined the fray.[185] In the catalogue which Hobbes himself compiled of the Hardwick Hall library in the late 1620s, this literature is very fully represented, with works by Robert Abbot, Lancelot Andrewes, Robert Burhill, George Carleton, Isaac Casaubon, Marc'Antonio de Dominis, Joseph Hall, King James, Francis Mason, Thomas Morton, Pierre du Moulin, Richard Thomson, Francis White, John White, and Anthony Wotton, as well as other anti-Catholic works by writers such as Philippe du Plessis Mornay, William Perkins, John Rainolds, Matthew Sutcliffe, and Andrew Willet. On the Roman Catholic side the main author represented is Roberto Bellarmino, with no fewer than eight titles, including an edition of his Controversiae in three folio volumes.[186] The theologico-political quarrel generated by King James had been the burning intellectual issue of the day when the young Hobbes came to work as a tutor (and librarian) at Hardwick; as a bright young Oxford graduate, he may well have been expected not only to choose and buy many of these books, but also to know what they said. Indeed, it would be odd to suppose that he had presided over this storehouse of argumentation for so many years without ever exploring it. Certainly he had made some study of Bellarmino's work before he moved to Paris, as he showed when he cited one of the most important of Bellarmino's 'controversies', De summo pontifice, in The Elements of Law.[187] For a modern reader, it is a doubly difficult task to identify particular traces of this whole literature in the text of Leviathan, first because—with the major exception of Bellarmino's Controversiae—Hobbes is always reluctant to cite his sources, and secondly because so many of the arguments which he may have picked up from early seventeenth-century writings belonged to a common stock of debating points which circulated from one text to another. Just occasionally (for example, in the case of his list of historical instances of popes deposing kings, which may have been derived from Carleton's book On Jurisdiction), a plausible suggestion can be made.[188] But overall the treatment of such topics in Leviathan does give the impression that somewhere in Hobbes's capacious memory there was a large body of material of this kind, on which he found it easy to draw.

[182] See Correspondence, i, pp. 245–7.

[183] See Brückmann, 'Cressy'. For early reactions to Exomologesis see Sir George Radcliffe's letters to Isaac Basire of Nov. 1647 and Feb. 1648 in Basire, Correspondence, pp. 66–9.

[184] p. 604.

As was mentioned above, many of Hobbes's attacks on the Roman Catholic Church were also aimed, explicitly or implicitly, at other targets. Sometimes he openly linked that Church with presbyterianism, in a way that was already a familiar tactic among Anglican writers. Sometimes he made criticisms of specific practices, such as the payment of tithes, which took place in the Church of England too. Sometimes he cast his net more widely: his frequent jibes against the notion that faith or virtue can be 'infused' may have been primarily directed at post-Tridentine Roman Catholic theology (in which people were justified by infused righteousness), but they also hit at mainstream Anglican theology (in which people who were justified by imputed righteousness were then sanctified by infused righteousness), while at the same time aiming at those radical preachers who claimed to speak by direct inspiration.[189] Overall, it seems, Roman Catholicism functioned in Hobbes's argument as a stand-in for clerical pretensions and practices of all kinds, and it was convenient for him that fervency against Roman Catholicism was, for almost all non-Catholic English readers, not merely culturally acceptable, but admirable and positively dangerous to criticize. He took special pains to stigmatize scholastic philosophy as a product of the Roman Church, knowing full well that this was something which, while it played a special role in Roman Catholic theology, was also taken as fundamental by most of the Anglican clerics who wrote treatises in defence of their own faith. Hobbes may have concentrated his fire on such things as the Roman Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation (which depended on an Aristotelian understanding of the distinction between substance and accidents); but his radical anti-scholasticism was hostile to the entire mental framework that Anglican theologians such as Bramhall inhabited. The passion with which Hobbes declaims against scholastic thought, not merely as something mistaken in itself but as something with pernicious consequences ('For who will endeavour to obey the Laws, if he expect Obedience to be Powred or Blown into him?'), is one of the most distinctive things about Leviathan; it sets that work strongly apart, in tone and content, from his earlier political treatises, where there were at most occasional by-blows at Aristotelian ethics or the ideas of 'Grecian sophisters'.

[185] For valuable surveys see Milward, Religious Controversies, and Milton, Catholic and Reformed.
[186] Chatsworth, MS Hobbes E. 1. A. [187] Elements of Law, II.vii.10. [188] See pp. 186, 912.

The first signs of Hobbes's preoccupation with this issue may perhaps be glimpsed in his Anti-White of 1642–3, where he repeatedly contrasted the absurdity and inflated language of metaphysicians and philosophers with the plain understanding of ordinary people.[190] In 1645, replying to Bramhall's thoroughly scholastic defence of the concept of free will, he allowed himself an unusually fierce outburst, which may indicate the direction in which his thoughts and feelings were now moving:

[189] See pp. 36, 60, 70, 632, 1082; and cf. p. 1088. On the Roman Catholic and Anglican doctrines in this period, see Allison, Rise of Moralism. The connection with radical Protestant preachers is most clearly made in De cive, XII.6.

[190] Hobbes, Anti-White, e.g., pp. 120, 140, 366, 372 (fos. 17r, 38r–v, 357r–v, 364v).

> You may by this again see the vanitie of distinctions used in the Schools, and I do not doubt but that the imposing of them, by Authoritie of Doctors in the Church, hath been a great cause that men have labored, though by Sedition and evil courses, to shake them off, for nothing is more apt to beget hatred, than the tyrannizing over mens reason and understanding, especially when it is done, not by the Scriptures, but by the pretence of Learning, and more judgement than that of other men.[191]

But by the time he wrote Leviathan, his main concern was not that sedition arose from a reaction against the scholastic 'Doctors', but rather that many of its seeds were implanted and nourished by their teachings.

Perhaps the most significant development here was Hobbes's growing conviction that there was a sinister kind of strategic alliance between the philosophical errors of the scholarly world and certain simple and deep-rooted errors of ordinary human experience: misunderstandings of the nature of dreams or optical illusions, which generated beliefs in supernatural visions and ghosts, and failures to understand the effects of excessive passions, which generated belief in inspiration and demonic possession. The connections between philosophical error and elementary delusion were, it seemed, multifarious and tentacular. When the early nineteenth-century radical writer William Cobbett thought about the many forms of economic and political injustice and manipulation that surrounded him, he became convinced that they were all somehow connected as parts of one great, shadowy system of oppression, which he called 'the Thing'. It may be said that one of the reasons for writing Leviathan was the fact that during the late 1640s Thomas Hobbes also became obsessed with a 'Thing' of his own—a complex mass of errors and absurdities, embracing false metaphysics, primitive delusions, popular superstitions, bogus clerical pretensions, and seditious political theories—all in some way connected, and all tending directly or indirectly towards the destruction of civil government.

If we compare the early chapters of Leviathan with the equivalent chapters of The Elements of Law, we may be struck by how often, while following the same general scheme of exposition, Hobbes adds passages about errors, illusions, and false beliefs, frequently linking them to scholastic doctrine. The chapter on sensation in The Elements of Law contains half a sentence dismissing the scholastic notion of 'species': 'the introduction of species visible and intelligible . . . passing to and fro from the object, is worse than any paradox, as being a plain impossibility.' In the corresponding chapter of Leviathan, the same point swells into a substantial paragraph: 'But the Philosophy-schooles, through all the Universities of Christendome, grounded upon certain Texts of Aristotle, teach another doctrine; and say, For the cause of Vision, that the thing seen, sendeth forth on every side a visible species (in English) a visible shew, apparition, or aspect, or a being seen. . .', and so on.[192] Introducing his discussion of motion in Chapter 2 of Leviathan, Hobbes goes out of his way to add an attack on scholasticism: 'From hence it is, that the Schooles say, Heavy bodies fall downwards, out of an appetite to rest. . .'.[193] The equivalent chapter in The Elements of Law makes one passing reference to illusory images in the dark which appear to 'timorous or superstitious people', and briefly explains why it is that some people confuse dreams, in retrospect, with real experiences. In Leviathan, the corresponding passage is expanded into three long paragraphs (covering one and a half folio pages) on 'Apparitions or Visions', where Hobbes's central point is that 'If this superstitious fear of Spirits were taken away . . . men would be much more fitted than they are for civill Obedience. And this ought to be the work of the Schooles: but they rather nourish such doctrine.'[194] In the following chapter of Leviathan, Hobbes adds at the end a paragraph which argues that we cannot have an idea of God, and ends with a jibe against 'deceived Philosophers, and deceived, or deceiving Schoolemen'; this has no equivalent in the corresponding chapter of The Elements of Law (though the point it makes does crop up briefly in a later chapter on religion).[195] In Chapter 5 of Leviathan Hobbes adds a list of seven 'Causes of absurditie'; this passage, which has no equivalent in The Elements of Law, is adapted from a similar listing in De corpore.[196] Part I, Chapter x of The Elements of Law has three paragraphs on madness, filling just over a page in the modern edition; in Leviathan these are expanded into more than four folio pages, with a lengthy discussion of demonic possession in the Bible, and a further attack on the 'Insignificant Speech' of the scholastics, which is now classified as a form of madness.[197] And in Chapter 11 of Leviathan (which has no close equivalent in The Elements of Law, but takes up some points from that work's Part I, Chapter ix), Hobbes introduces a long discussion of types of behaviour based on ignorance and misunderstanding—above all, the sort of behaviour that involves following those apparently authoritative figures who instigate rebellion.[198]

[191] Hobbes, Libertie and Necessitie, pp. 49–50 (EW iv, p. 264).

[192] Elements of Law, I.ii.4; Leviathan, p. 24. [193] p. 26.
[194] Elements of Law, I.iii.5, 10; Leviathan, pp. 32–6.
[195] Elements of Law, I.xi.3; Leviathan, p. 46.
[196] Hobbes, De corpore, I.v.3–9; Leviathan, pp. 70–72.
[197] Elements of Law, I.x.9–11; Leviathan, pp. 112–22.
[198] pp. 156–60.

This obsession with error, illusion, and false doctrine, and with their damaging effects, runs all through the text of Leviathan, and is given its most concentrated exposition in the final part of the book, on the 'Kingdome of Darknesse'. But Hobbes's analysis of that 'kingdom' is comparatively simple: his principle of 'cui bono?' suggests that, where the errors implanted by the Roman Catholic Church are concerned, the propagating of error has been a perfectly rational enterprise, consciously undertaken for the sake of power. Whereas Hobbes's general concerns with error go much further than that, taking in not only the deliberate deceivers and their dupes, but also the spontaneously deluded and the sincerely self-deceived. All these categories, for Hobbes, were to be found on the religious side of human life; and it may be that he was less troubled by what he saw as the transparently motivated claims of papalist political theorists than by what he felt to be the equally false, but well-meaning, claims of all those Anglican royalists whose defence of the King—and, indeed, of sovereign authority in the abstract—was grounded on theology.[199]

When Hobbes discussed the duties of the sovereign in The Elements of Law and De cive, he produced a list of practical recommendations: the task of 'rooting out' false doctrines appeared near the end of the list in the earlier work, and roughly halfway through it in the later one. In Leviathan it leaps to the earliest part of the list, where it is preceded only by the duty to avoid relinquishing any essential right of sovereignty.[200] But that change in priority is not the only difference here. The general attitude of the earlier two texts is that the doctrines people have in their heads become a subject of concern if and when they are false and pernicious; otherwise things proceed normally, on a basis of self-interest, and it is hardly necessary to talk about 'doctrines' to describe the correctly functioning state of affairs.[201] Only once, in each text, does Hobbes propose teaching the people the 'true doctrine' of a proper civil science: he does so in the passages just mentioned, where, having complained that the universities are inculcating false doctrines, he says how much better it would be if they taught the true ones instead. The [199] The standard claim, argued strongly by writers such as John Bramhall and Henry Ferne, was that although the consent of the people might play a role in designating the holder of sovereign authority, that authority itself must descend from God: it included rights (above all, the right to inflict capital punishment) which could not be transferred upwards by individuals, as individuals did not possess them in the first place.

[200] Elements of Law, II.ix.8; De cive, XIII.9; Leviathan, p. 520.

[201] One apparently contrary passage, Elements of Law, I.xii.6 ('our wills follow our opinions, as our actions follow our wills. In which sense they say truly and properly that say the world is governed by opinion'), is itself, as the earlier part of the same paragraph makes clear, just a description of the functioning of self-interest, the 'opinions' in question being merely opinions about the beneficial or harmful consequences of our actions.

proposal seems, in this context, largely a remedial one, and hardly an expression of something fundamental to Hobbes's theory. But in Leviathan the need to teach true doctrine is shown to be fundamental, thanks to Hobbes's new insistence on the role of people's beliefs as the foundation of rule. The grounds of the sovereign's essential rights, he says, 'have the rather need to be diligently, and truly taught; because they cannot be maintained by any Civill Law, or terrour of legal punishment'. Punishments will seem like mere acts of hostility unless people believe that they are under an obligation to obey the civil authority; and civil laws oblige on the basis of the Law of Nature, so it is necessary that people believe in the validity of that law.[202] There then follows Hobbes's summary of the true doctrines that must be taught, modelled directly (and with remarkable boldness) on the Ten Commandments. Then, at last, Hobbes returns to the point about the universities which he had made in the two earlier treatises. Anticipating that some of his readers might dismissively ask 'is it you will undertake to teach the Universities?', he replies: 'it is not fit, nor needfull for me to say either I, or No: for any man that sees what I am doing, may easily perceive what I think.' And whatever element of coyness is present in that passage is eliminated in the 'Review, and Conclusion' at the end of the book, where Hobbes commends his entire 'Discourse' and simply states: 'I think it may be profitably printed, and more profitably taught in the Universities, in case they also think so, to whom the judgment of the same belongeth.'[203]

Intended Readership

Hobbes's remarks about the use of his text in the universities raise some larger questions about the nature of his intended readership, questions which also have some bearing on the issue of when and why he wrote the book. By the time he penned the 'Review, and Conclusion' he was very probably planning to have the work commercially printed in England, in which case he no doubt hoped for many readers, both within the universities and outside them. But it cannot simply be assumed that he must have had such a plan from the outset. Publication, albeit on a much more limited scale, was also possible in manuscript (as the early distribution of The Elements of Law had shown). And it was also possible to write for an individual reader, producing a work in a single manuscript copy for an important patron. During his eleven years in Paris, Hobbes is known to have produced a total of three other English-language works, of which two were short pieces (the 'Mathematical Demonstration of the Sword' and the letter on liberty and necessity) and one was a substantial treatise (the 'Minute or Short Draught of the Optiques'). All three were written for the benefit of a single patron, the Marquess of Newcastle, and in the last case we know from Newcastle's brother that it was written in English at Newcastle's special request; we also know that when Hobbes contemplated publishing it in print, the plan involved translating it into Latin.[204]

[202] p. 522. [203] pp. 532–4 (where 'I' means 'Aye'), 1140.

The point of these observations is not to suggest that Leviathan was also undertaken, originally, at Newcastle's behest, or for Newcastle's benefit. That would seem highly unlikely, given that, as mentioned above, Sir Charles Cavendish appears to have had no knowledge of Hobbes's work on this text. The point is merely that Hobbes is known to have written works in English in Paris for the benefit of a patron who preferred to read in that language, and that he was quite capable of writing a lengthy work on such a basis; this, then, is a pattern into which his initial work on Leviathan might plausibly be fitted. And there is just one obvious candidate for that patron: the young Prince Charles. It was with the arrival of the Prince in Paris that Hobbes connected the genesis of Leviathan in his autobiographies; and it was (as will be discussed below) to Charles that he eventually gave the luxurious presentation manuscript of the work.

Hobbes's job, in 1646–8, was to teach the Prince mathematics, not political theory. He emphasized this in a letter to Sorbière in [September/] October 1646, replying to his French friend's remark that England would be lucky to receive a king 'imbued with your teachings'. Hobbes replied that he was teaching 'mathematics, not politics. I would not be able to teach him the political doctrines contained in the book which is being printed [De cive], both because he is too young, and because my doing so will always be forbidden by those whose counsels, justly, govern him.'[205] Charles was indeed young (he had just turned 16 when Hobbes began to teach him in August), but he seems to have remained under Hobbes's tuition until the age of 18. It may be noted that the literal meaning of the phrase translated here as 'he is too young' is 'his age does not yet permit it'; some significance might be accorded to the expression 'not yet'. In any case, the discussion of mathematical matters could have gone quite a long way beyond arithmetic and geometry. In a letter to Mersenne in 1648 Hobbes mentioned the possibility of demonstrating to him the operation of a 'glass' (meaning, probably, a telescope) which belonged to the Prince; if, as this suggests, Hobbes talked about optics to Charles, he may also have enlarged on his own optical theories, which would have led the discussion into the areas of epistemology, psychology, and the principles of the 'new science' more generally.[206] But Hobbes's public reputation, such as it was, rested on De cive; the aura that surrounded him would have been that of someone who had put forward a powerful, original, and to some people rather scandalous theory of political power and political subjection. It would be surprising if, in his frequent meetings with Hobbes, the Prince had never asked him to explain his opinions on such matters; and if Charles had done so, it is doubtful whether Hobbes would have felt that such a request must be overruled by the prohibitions of 'those whose counsels, justly, govern him'. Certainly others assumed that Hobbes's influence on the Prince's thinking would extend into areas beyond mathematics; and we may assume that this was not just because of what they knew about Hobbes, but rather because of the whole nature of early modern courts, where access and proximity to a king or prince were highly prized for the influence they conferred at many levels, from personal patronage to policy formation.[207]

[204] See above, at nn. 15–18.

[205] Correspondence, i, pp. 136 ('praeceptis tuis imbutum'), 137; 139 ('Doceo enim Mathematicam, non Politicam. Nam praeceptis Politicis quae habentur in libro qui imprimitur, imbui illum, ipsius aetas nondum sinit, et judicia eorum quorum consilijs aequum est regi illum, semper prohibebunt'), 141.

When the Scottish presbyterian Robert Baillie wrote in August 1646 that 'the placing of Hopes (a professed Atheist, as they speak) about the Prince as his teacher, is ill taken', he was relaying news from an agent in Paris about the attitude of members of the royalist exile community there, who feared that Hobbes would influence Charles's thinking on religion and morality—and probably, therefore, politics too.[208] Sir Edward Hyde was one of the people who had such fears. Writing to Edward Nicholas about the Prince's tuition by Earles and Hobbes in January 1647, he commented that 'what progresse hee makes I knowe not, but w.thout doubt hee hath a sweatnesse [sic] of nature, not easy to be corrupted'; it was certainly not John Earles that he regarded as a likely agent of corruption.[209] Writing on the same day to Earles himself, Hyde requested that he ask Hobbes to send Hyde a copy of De cive (which Hyde had not read) so that he could see how closely it corresponded to The Elements of Law (which he had); his desire to check up on Hobbes's thinking seems to have been closely associated with his solicitude for Prince Charles.[210]

Two months later, in mid-March 1647, Hobbes received from Sorbière a copy of the initial sheet of the Elzevier edition of De cive; it included an [206] Ibid., i, pp. 174–5 (p. 174: 'sa lunette').

[207] See the comments in Cuddy, 'Revival of the Entourage'; Sharpe, 'Image of Virtue'; Scott, 'Counsel and Cabal', esp. pp. 118–21; Weiser, Charles II, pp. 13–18.
[208] Baillie, Letters and Journals, ii, p. 388.
[209] Bodl., MS Clarendon 29, fo. 40v, 1 [/11] Jan. 1647.
[210] Ibid., fo. 45r, 1 [/11] Jan. 1647.

engraved portrait of Hobbes with the caption, 'Academic Tutor to His Serene Highness the Prince of Wales'.[211] The panic-stricken letter which Hobbes immediately sent to Sorbière set out a number of reasons why it was important to have the caption removed. One was that since Hobbes's political theory 'offends almost everyone', the authorities in England would use this to discredit Prince Charles: they would accuse the Prince of 'revealing', by his employment of Hobbes as his tutor, 'what sort of sovereignty he expects, and intends to demand'. The resulting damage to the Prince's reputation would then be blamed on Hobbes 'by those people at the Prince's court who are ready to aggravate my every fault with their own interpretations and glosses'. Another reason was that 'this title will prevent me from returning to my own country, if the desire to return ever overcomes me'. And a third was that Hobbes was not a full employee of the Prince, but 'just like one of those teachers who are hired on a monthly basis'; the caption might give the impression that Hobbes had exaggerated the status of his position.[212] In this letter, Hobbes could have written that he was not in any way imparting his political theories to the Prince, that he was teaching him only mathematics, that De cive had no connection with mathematics, and that it was therefore both irrelevant and misleading to describe his tuition in such general terms. But, significantly perhaps, he did not make any of those points.

Could Hobbes have envisaged himself as some sort of political adviser to the Prince? The evidence of Leviathan itself suggests that he could. In Chapter 30, on the duties of the sovereign, he includes a discussion of the choice of counsellors, a task which, as he points out, is peculiar to a monarchical sovereign, as members of democratic and aristocratic assemblies counsel one another. The best counsellor, he writes, is the person who on the one hand has least hope of 'benefit' from giving evil counsel (a few pages earlier, Hobbes has said that whether or not his principles are taken up by 'those that have Power to make use of them' is something that 'concerneth my particular interest, at this day, very little'), and on the other has 'most knowledge of those things that conduce to the Peace, and Defence of the Common-wealth'. That phrase might seem to suggest the kind of prudential knowledge that is acquired from much experience of public affairs. But Hobbes continues:

> Good Counsell comes not by Lot, nor by Inheritance; and therefore there is no more reason to expect good Advice from the rich, or noble, in matter of State, than in de-

[211] De cive, plate 4: 'Ser[enissimo] Principi Walliae a studiis praep[ositus].'

[212] Correspondence, i, pp. 155–8. Curiously, Hobbes omitted to mention another hostage to ill-will, which was that the caption described him as 'Nobilis'.

lineating the dimensions of a fortresse; unlesse we shall think there needs no method in the study of the Politiques, (as there does in the study of Geometry,) but onely to be lookers on; which is not so. For the Politiques is the harder study of the two.[213]

Here the comparison with geometry and the emphasis on 'method' are both significant. Earlier in the book Hobbes has declared that 'The skill of making, and maintaining Common-wealths, consisteth in certain Rules, as doth Arithmetique and Geometry; not (as Tennis-play) on Practise onely: which Rules, neither poor men have the leisure, nor men that have had the leisure, have hitherto had the curiosity, or the method to find out'—with the word 'hitherto' gently but unmistakably implying that Hobbes has now developed the correct method for the first time.[214] When discussing 'the Ability of Counselling' in Chapter 25, Hobbes does allow that experiential knowledge is important, but he makes it second-best, declaring that 'When for the doing of any thing, there be Infallible rules, (as in Engines, and Edifices, the rules of Geometry,) all the experience of the world cannot equall his Counsell, that has learnt, or found out the Rule'; here too, the words 'or found out' are surely a delicate reference to Hobbes's own pioneering work in the field of civil science.[215] The insistence in Chapter 30 that riches and nobility are no qualifications for the role of counsellor (a point Hobbes goes on to make at greater length, with a criticism of those noblemen who claim 'to have place in the highest Councell of State by Inheritance') seems calculated to defend and reinforce Hobbes's own right to offer such counsel.[216] And it may be significant that although Hobbes did hold that his own civil science was comparable to Euclidean geometry, on the basis that both generated certain knowledge from definitional starting-points, here the purpose of the comparison is slightly different. 'Delineating the dimensions of a fortresse' is a practical application of geometry (like its use in the design of 'Engines, and Edifices'); the point of the comparison here is not that a true civil science can generate its own abstract certainties, but rather that someone who possesses those certainties can apply them usefully to concrete situations. When a young nobleman was taught mathematics, much of the emphasis was on practical applications in areas such as military engineering: the mathematics tuition of the young Duke of Buckingham, which Hobbes seems to have shared with Roberval in 1645–6, had taken in such topics as the measurement of distances and the design of fortresses.[217] If Prince Charles asked, as so many pupils struggling with geometry do, what was the point, Hobbes's answer would probably have referred to 'delineating the dimensions of a fortresse', and other applications of that kind. The passage quoted above might imply that, similarly, the point of his abstract political theory was to generate counsel on how sovereign power might best be maintained—counsel which the author of that theory was best qualified to give.

[213] pp. 522, 546. [214] p. 322.

[215] p. 406; cf. Hobbes's boast, in the dedicatory epistle to De corpore (sigs. A2v–A3r; OL i, p. [cv]), that civil philosophy began with De cive. [216] p. 548.

[217] See the treatises, prepared for Buckingham's use, in Bibliothèque Sainte-Geneviève, Paris, MS 1060, and the comments in Malcolm, Aspects, p. 161.

Elements of advice-giving are scattered here and there in the first half of the book. Discussing the disastrous failure of Charles I to make his people understand that he was their absolute 'Representative', Hobbes says: 'Which may serve as an admonition, for those that are the true, and absolute Representative of a People, to instruct men in the nature of that Office.'[218] Writing about duels, he comments that if sovereigns show disdain towards those who refuse to fight, but at the same time punish people for duelling, they should impose only light punishments: 'which I say, not as wishing liberty of private revenges, or any other kind of disobedience; but a care in Governours, not to countenance any thing obliquely, which directly they forbid.'[219] Denouncing classical writings in praise of tyrannicide, he advises that monarchs should not allow such books to be publicly read, 'without present applying such correctives of discreet Masters, as are fit to take away their Venime'.[220] (This is not the only case where Hobbes's advice is aimed specifically at monarchs.) And his chapter on the duties of sovereigns contains much practical advice: for example, the recommendation that laws be short but clearly expressed, or the warning that buying off a 'Popular ambitious Subject' with riches or promotion is a strategy to be avoided.[221] Overall, the first half of Leviathan contains significantly more material that might be placed under the heading 'advice to princes' than either of its predecessor texts. The very first chapter of the book gives a notable foretaste of this approach, when Hobbes concludes his criticism of scholastic theories of perception with the words, 'I say not this, as disapproving the use of Universities: but because I am to speak hereafter of their office in a Common-wealth, I must let you see on all occasions by the way, what things would be amended in them.'[222] That use of 'you' is rather distinctive; in the rest of the book Hobbes very rarely uses 'you' to address the reader.[223] It seems possible that in this first chapter of the book, before he had fully settled on his stylistic conventions, Hobbes was using the second person to address not readers in general but one special reader, who might one day have the power to 'amend' the universities.

[218] p. 286. [219] p. 476. [220] p. 508.

[221] pp. 542, 544. The latter argument uses the illustration of Hercules' attempts to decapitate the Hydra; the same illustration was later used in Behemoth (ed. Seaward, p. 201 (fo. 35v)) in a discussion of Charles I's promotion of Strafford.

[222] p. 24. [223] For an example see p. 946.

And the identity of that reader was intimated just two pages earlier, in the concluding sentences of the Introduction:

> He that is to govern a whole Nation, must read in himself, not this, or that particular man; but Man-kind: which though it be hard to do, harder than to learn any Language, or Science; yet, when I shall have set down my own reading orderly, and perspicuously, the pains left another, will be onely to consider, if he also find not the same in himself.[224]

Hobbes's emphasis on the teaching of his doctrine, in the universities and more generally, also deserves close attention, as it is not quite the same as a recommendation that students and members of the public read his book. When Hobbes sets out, in the concluding paragraph of Chapter 31 (the last chapter of the first half of the book), his claim that he is the first person to have demonstrated 'all the Theoremes of Morall doctrine, that men may learn thereby, both how to govern, and how to obey', this may sound as if his work is aimed symmetrically and equally at the rulers and the ruled.[225] But although he is confident that his book does contain the things that people need to know in order to be good subjects, he makes it clear that its primary purpose, as a book, is to be used by the sovereign. That use is twofold: the book contains what the sovereign needs to know, and it also contains what the sovereign needs to command to be taught to the people. Thus Hobbes concludes the entire presentation of his secular political theory with the words:

> I recover some hope, that one time or other, this writing of mine, may fall into the hands of a Soveraign, who will consider it himselfe, (for it is short, and I think clear,) . . . and by the exercise of entire Soveraignty, in protecting the Publique teaching of it, convert this Truth of Speculation, into the Utility of Practice.[226]

In conclusion, a rather speculative account may be offered of the origins of Hobbes's text. (The degree to which it is speculative will, it is hoped, be fully apparent from the fragmentary and indirect nature of most of the evidence that has been put forward.) At some point during the first year of Hobbes's tuition of Prince Charles, after various conversations in which the Prince had asked him to express his opinions about psychological and political matters, Hobbes conceived the idea of writing an English-language text for the Prince's benefit, setting out his theories of human nature and political authority in an accessible way. With this purpose in mind, Hobbes also decided to add new material about various aspects of the workings of government and the state, on such topics as public ministers, counsellors, and trading bodies. (It is noteworthy that those chapters are the ones that most systematically use Hobbes's extended comparison of the commonwealth to a human body. The analogy was of course commonplace, but it was not Hobbes's habit to structure large-scale arguments on analogies; his normal practice was to use a single set-piece comparison to make a single point—as, for example, with his favourite analogy involving the dismemberment of Pelias.[227] His use of the extended comparison in Leviathan is more easily explained as an expository device designed to capture the interest of, and at the same time to entertain, the lively but non-philosophical reader for whom he was writing.)

[224] p. 20. [225] p. 574. [226] Ibid.

At first, it seems, Hobbes merely made plans for writing this work, devising a scheme of chapters (which may have included only a handful of chapters on religion at the end of the book, as in De cive), and accumulating notes of ideas and drafts of materials that would be incorporated in them. The lack of urgency was due partly to the fact that he was concentrating his energies on finishing De corpore, and partly to the status of the Prince of Wales, who, even if the conflict ended with some sort of royal victory and restoration, could not be expected to become King for many years thereafter. But with the execution of Charles I in January 1649, that status changed. And during Charles II's negotiations with the Scots in the spring of that year, debate among the royalist exiles became even more sharply polarized than before on a number of questions to which Hobbes's theory supplied very definite answers: whether a sovereign could give away certain powers, whether an apparent giving away of them should be regarded as valid and binding, whether a sovereign had the right to settle Church government as he pleased, and whether some forms of Church government were inimical to sovereign power. In the late summer of 1649, when Charles returned briefly to Paris and others from his entourage, such as Hyde, spent longer there, Hobbes was drawn into arguments on these matters which convinced him that he should put aside De corpore and write up his political treatise instead.

At what point Hobbes decided that this treatise should be made available not merely to Charles and to sympathetic members of his immediate circle (Jermyn and his friends) but to a wider public, it is hard to guess. It is possible to suppose that the decision was made when Hobbes first began to write up his work in 1649; but as the discussion above has suggested, some features of the text, especially in the first half of the book, would then become more difficult to account for. Nor does the reference in Payne's letter of May 1650 to a 'learned french man' who translated Hobbes's chapters into [227] Elements of Law, II.viii.15; De cive, XII.13; Leviathan, p. 526.

French 'as fast as he finishes them' necessarily imply that there had been any plan from the outset to print a French version; this translation may have been only a manuscript translation for private use, and indeed it is hard to imagine that any French version that included the second half of the book could possibly have been licensed for publication.[228] Again, it might be argued that Hobbes's use of Davenant to check and improve his English style (if that is what his comment in the 'Answer' implies) matches his much earlier use of Ben Jonson and Sir Robert Ayton as stylistic advisers when he was planning to publish his translation of Thucydides; but the desire to remove infelicities can be just as strong, surely, when the work is aimed at a very select readership.[229] By August 1650, however, Payne clearly understood that a wider readership was intended: when he asked Hobbes to remember that 'All Trueths are not fitt to be told at all times', he begged him to deal leniently with episcopacy even 'if the argum^t^ he had vndertaken did necessarily require yt he should publishe it'.[230] If the scenario sketched here is correct, the decision to aim for print-publication thus took place some time between August–September 1649 and August 1650. That decision may have been formed as Hobbes embarked on the third part of the book, which enters into an in-depth presentation of theological and biblical-critical issues that goes far beyond the scope of any normal treatise of advice and political instruction. If Hobbes finished 37 chapters by May, he might have reached Chapter 32 (the first in Part 3 of the book) by March; and this date falls quite close to the mysterious episode in which Hobbes 'lost y^e^ reward of his labours with the Pr[ince] by y^e^ sinister suggestions of some of the Clergy'.[231] Perhaps he had sent a letter of advice to Charles, on the basis of some privilege he had been granted to communicate directly with him, and then learned that his right of access to Charles had been withdrawn, at Richard Steward's insistence; and perhaps this motivated him not only to aim at publication in print, but also to intensify his arguments against clerical power. But any such scenario is necessarily very speculative; the solid evidence is lacking.

Once the decision to go for print-publication was taken, some choice had to be made about where the printing should take place. As several major publications (including Digby's Two Treatises in 1644 and Cressy's Exomologesis in 1647) had shown, there were printers in Paris who were quite [228] See above, n. 4. When Hobbes's disciple du Verdus published a French translation of De cive in 1660 (Les Elemens de la politique de Monsieur Hobbes), he was obliged to omit the final chapters on religion. On the contemporaneous translation of Leviathan see below, pp. 87–91.

[229] On the earlier use of Jonson and Ayton see Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, pp. 25–6, 365 (but note that in the former passage, Aubrey specifies that they performed this service in relation to the Epistle Dedicatory).

[230] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 130.

[231] That episode may have occurred in Feb.; see above, n. 150.

capable of handling English-language works. The problems with publication in Paris would have concerned licensing (both those books were licensed by the authorities) and cost; the former problem could have been evaded by a small-scale private operation of the kind that Mersenne had undertaken for De cive, but the cost of printing a text such as Leviathan, even in small quantities, would have been considerable, and borne by the author. Publication in England, for such a strongly royalist work, might have seemed problematic too; the system of regulation there, introduced in 1643 and strengthened by an Act of Parliament in September 1649, required all books to be licensed by the authorities.[232] For much of this period the publication of royalist works, or of texts strongly critical of the new régime, had in fact continued; the many printings of the Eikon basilike in 1649 are testimony to that.[233] In the wake of the 1649 Act the policing of the system was strengthened, and publishers, who were obliged to place caution-money of £300 with the authorities, did become much more reluctant to print unlicensed works.[234] But the extent to which the attitudes of London publishers had changed may not have been appreciated fully (or at all) in Paris until quite a long time afterwards. So it is conceivable that, when Hobbes first thought of having his book printed in London, he would not have felt that this would require any significant modification of its argument. This is to assume, however, that he was content to have it produced more or less as an underground publication there. Such an assumption can be made if one also supposes that he intended to remain in France, but it becomes much harder to accept if one thinks that he was planning to return to England—unless he believed, as he may have done in early 1650, that there was a real chance of a final royalist victory. Some evidence of his nervousness about how he might be viewed in England has already been cited; he would hardly have wished to find himself, on arrival there, the object of suspicion and hostility on the part of the new authorities.[235]

The final version of Hobbes's text, as printed in 1651, does contain two elements that look as if they have been designed to make it more acceptable in the eyes of the English authorities: a rather indulgent handling of the Independents, and some comments at the end of the work indicating that Hobbes's theory positively tended towards the strengthening of the new régime. These passages, and Hobbes's motives for writing them, now need to be considered.

[232] See Clyde, Struggle for Freedom of the Press, pp. 66–7, 187–8; Siebert, Freedom of the Press, pp. 186–8, 222–4.

[233] See Madan, New Bibliography of Eikon Basilike.

[234] See Clyde, Struggle for Freedom of the Press, p. 196: 'by the end of the year printers were showing a quite unusual unwillingness to print unlicensed books.'

[235] See above, at n. 212.

Late Adjustments: (i) Independency

In the last numbered chapter of Leviathan, Chapter 47, there is a remarkable passage describing how a series of 'knots' were tied, by clerical interests, on the 'Christian liberty' of the people, and how they were eventually untied. In the earliest period of the Church, Hobbes writes, people obeyed the Apostles 'out of Reverence, not by Obligation: Their Consciences were free, and their Words and Actions subject to none but the Civill Power.' Then presbyters fixed an official doctrine, and punished those who refused to accept it with excommunication, 'not as being Infidels, but as being disobedient: And this was the first knot upon their Liberty.' Then, with the expansion of the Church, 'Presbyters of the chief City of a Province, got themselves an authority over the Parochiall Presbyters, and appropriated to themselves the names of Bishops: And this was a second knot on Christian Liberty.' Finally the Pope claimed authority over all the bishops, 'Which was the third and last knot.' In England, Hobbes continues, these knots have now been unravelled one by one. The power of the Pope was dismantled at the Reformation; that was the untying of the first knot, and it left the bishops exercising their power not by the right of the Pope but by the right of the sovereign ('though by retaining the phrase of Iure Divino, they were thought to demand it by immediate Right from God'). The second knot was untied when the presbyterians abolished episcopacy. As for the undoing of the third:

> And almost at the same time, the Power was taken also from the Presbyterians: And so we are reduced to the Independency of the Primitive Christians to follow Paul, or Cephas, or Apollos, every man as he liketh best: Which, if it be without contention, and without measuring the Doctrine of Christ, by our affection to the Person of his Minister . . . is perhaps the best: First, because there ought to be no Power over the Consciences of men, but of the Word it selfe, working Faith in every one, not alwayes according to the purpose of them that Plant and Water, but of God himself, that giveth the Increase: and secondly, because it is unreasonable in them, who teach there is such danger in every little Errour, to require of a man endued with Reason of his own, to follow the Reason of any other man, or of the most voices of many other men.[236]

The statement that power has been taken from the presbyterians may just reflect the general political situation, after the triumph of the army and the purging of Parliament; but, given the fact that this passage comes close to the end of Leviathan, it is chronologically possible that it refers to the Act of Parliament of September[/October] 1650, which eliminated the enforcement of any kind of national presbyterian system in England. Whatever the nature of the change Hobbes has in mind, the fact that he refers to 'Independency', compares it to the state of the primitive Church, and declares it 'perhaps the best', is remarkable. So remarkable, indeed, that it must make the reader wonder how sincere or whole-hearted Hobbes was when he wrote those words.

[236] pp. 1114–16.

Certainly the two reasons he puts forward give some grounds for suspicion. Here he argues that people who claim that 'there is such danger in every little Errour' should therefore allow Christians the right to examine every small detail of their faith and make their own decisions. This may work as a debating-point against theologians who make that claim, but it does not work as part of Hobbes's own argument: he has already explained that there is no danger in every little error, as only the fundamentals matter, and the fundamentals of Christian belief are very simple.[237] Here he writes that 'there ought to be no Power over the Consciences of men'; previously, however, he has argued both that there cannot be any power over men's beliefs, and that where the action of stating one's beliefs is concerned, private conscience must submit to the public conscience, which is the judgement of the sovereign.[238]

Hobbes's account of the three 'knots' in Chapter 47 of Leviathan is also at variance with the argument he has previously put forward about the three forms of Church government. Here he places them in an ascending scale, apparently implying that episcopacy is more threatening or oppressive than presbyterianism, and Roman Catholicism even more so than episcopacy. But, as we have seen, his general argument is that presbyterianism and Roman Catholicism are the most harmful forms of Christianity ('the Presbytery hath challenged the power to Excommunicate their owne Kings, and to bee the Supreme Moderators in Religion . . . no lesse then the Pope challengeth it universally'), whereas Anglican episcopacy is fairly harmless, since the English bishops have accepted the authority of the sovereign, retaining only a token claim to 'divine right'.[239] It might be said that those previous arguments were about the Church's threat to the sovereign, whereas this passage is about the effects on the 'Christian liberty' of the people. But if this is a significant difference, it furnishes another ground for suspicion, since 'Christian liberty' is not a typical Hobbesian term, and appears nowhere else in Leviathan.

[237] See Ch. 43, esp. pp. 938–48.

[238] p. 696: 'we are not every one, to make our own private Reason, or Conscience, but the Publique Reason, that is, the reason of Gods Supreme Lieutenant, Judge . . . A private man has alwaies the liberty, (because thought is free,) to beleeve, or not beleeve in his heart . . . But when it comes to confession of that faith, the Private Reason must submit to the Publique.' Cf. also the comment on p. 952, which combines the argument about the public conscience with that about the unimportance of beliefs concerning non-fundamentals: 'But suppose that a Christian King should from this Foundation Iesus is the Christ, draw some false consequences . . . much more shall he be saved, that teacheth them by his command; and much more yet, he that teaches not, but onely beleeves his lawfull Teacher.'

[239] p. 978; and see above, p. 37.

Another reason for suspecting this passage is that it conflicts with what Hobbes has previously written about the need for uniformity of worship. One of his basic principles is that every single Christian commonwealth is at the same time a single Church. In Chapter 31 he declares: 'But seeing a Common-wealth is but one Person, it ought also to exhibite to God but one Worship; which then it doth, when it commandeth it to be exhibited by Private men, Publiquely. And this is Publique Worship; the property whereof, is to be Uniforme.' It follows, he says, that 'where many sorts of Worship be allowed, proceeding from the different Religions of Private men, it cannot be said there is any Publique Worship, nor that the Common-wealth is of any Religion at all'.[240] What Hobbes says in Chapter 47 about 'Independency' seems to rule out uniformity of doctrine; that point may be specifically about doctrine, but Hobbes's term 'worship' here does include the action of expressing one's doctrines in creeds, prayers, and homilies. One radical interpretation of Hobbes might be that he would actually have preferred a state that was, in the fullest sense of the term, not 'of any Religion at all', other than the idiosyncratic civil religion sketched in Chapter 30. Whether or not this interpretation is correct, it would be hard to maintain that promoting the religion of the Independents in England—a set of fervent biblicist Puritan Protestants—was the way to produce such an end-result. In just one essential way, Hobbes's general theoretical position could look favourably on the Independents: their leading thinkers had, on the whole, given up claims to jurisdiction by divine right over the people, and most of them were content to put all such jurisdictional power, including the power to regulate the Church, in the hands of the civil sovereign. In this respect, Hobbes was indeed their natural ally.[241] Otherwise, he could feel little sympathy for their religious beliefs and practices—still less for their role as preachers of rebellion, as active rebels, and as regicides.[242]

One modern scholar has suggested that in earlier chapters of Leviathan Hobbes showed that he had moved towards a Congregationalist model of the Church, both by giving the original meaning of 'ecclesia' as a gathering of people, and by saying that in the Apostolic period authority in each Church 'resided in the congregation itself'.[243] Yet these points had already been made in De cive, where the original meaning of 'ecclesia' was given as 'a gathering of citizens', and it was emphasized that a 'particular Church' such as the Church of Antioch had the right not only to ordain ministers but also to decide whether an Apostle's claim that a particular candidate had been chosen by the Holy Spirit should be accepted or not.[244] This was part of Hobbes's argument that the right of appointing ministers of the Church belonged to the community of Christians, and was therefore entirely transferred to a Christian sovereign. In Leviathan Hobbes merely strengthens his existing case by arguing that the so-called laying on of hands was in fact a raising of hands, as practised by voters in a Greek municipal election.[245] Hobbes certainly did not regard the practice of the primitive Church as authoritative for, or binding on, later ages; but since many of his ecclesiological opponents did, it was useful for his purposes to undermine their account of early practice. He did not need Congregationalist impulses of his own in order to do so.

[240] p. 570. [241] This point is strongly made in Collins, Allegiance of Thomas Hobbes.
[242] This point is strongly made in Sommerville, 'Hobbes and Independency'.
[243] Collins, Allegiance of Thomas Hobbes, pp. 125–6.

Altogether, then, Hobbes's praise of Independency in the final pages of Leviathan is an anomaly; it does have the air of a last-minute adjustment, designed to align his theory a little more closely with the religious preferences of the prevailing power in England. Two other last-minute adjustments of a similar kind have also been noticed by Hobbes scholars. In the manuscript of Leviathan there are two slightly disparaging references to Independents, both of which are missing from the printed text. Thus in Chapter 18 Hobbes wrote that if people had not been persuaded that the essential rights of sovereignty could be divided, they would never have fallen into a civil war, 'first between the temporall factions of parlamentarians and royalists, by the name of Roundheads and Caualiers, and since betweene the doctrinall factions of presbyterians and Independants'. In the printed edition this became: 'first between those that disagreed in Politiques; and after between the Dissenters about the liberty of Religion'. Similarly, in Chapter 22, where the printed edition refers to 'Factions for Government of Religion, as of Papists, Protestants, &c.', the '&c.' has replaced the word 'Independents', which is what we find in the manuscript.[246] These also look like late changes made to avoid giving offence to those Independents who were in power. It is of course conceivable that they were made not by Hobbes but by someone in the printing-house; but the curiously euphemistic phrase 'Dissenters about the liberty of Religion' may bear some relation to the noteworthy phrase [244] De cive, XVII.19 ('conuentus ciuium'); XVII.24 ('Ecclesia particularis'); cf. the claims about the Church of Antioch in XVII.24 with Leviathan, p. 832. [245] pp. 836–8.

[246] pp. 278, 372; discussed by Tuck, 'Introduction' to Hobbes, Leviathan, ed. Tuck, p. liv; Collins, Allegiance of Thomas Hobbes, pp. 145–6.

'Christian Liberty' cited above, so it seems reasonable to assume that these two small changes were also Hobbes's work.

Late Adjustments: (ii) Obedience to the New Régime

The other area in which Hobbes seems to have made some ideological adjustments at a late stage is his presentation of the practical political implications of his theory. At the very end of Leviathan he added a supplementary chapter entitled 'A Review, and Conclusion', setting out a number of additional arguments and explanatory points.[247] In the very last paragraph of this chapter, Hobbes declared that his entire book had been written 'without other designe, than to set before mens eyes the mutuall Relation between Protection and Obedience'.[248] And a few pages earlier he emphasized that an ordinary subject was entitled to submit to a new ruler when he ceased to have 'Protection' from the old one.[249] These statements seem to have aligned Hobbes with the general tendency of what has become known as 'de facto-ist' theory, a current of argument which developed among supporters of the new régime in England in the late 1640s and early 1650s. The fundamental assumption here was that it was irrelevant to ask whether a new ruler had acquired power 'de jure' (by right); what mattered was the sheer fact that the ruler now had power—the power to protect the subject, and indeed to punish any disobedience.[250] Once Leviathan is looked at against the background of this type of theory, its purpose seems to be to persuade people (especially reluctant defeated royalists) that they must obey the new power which now protects them.

As will be suggested below, there are certain elements of Hobbes's 'Review, and Conclusion' which do indicate that he had that special purpose when he wrote it, and which therefore make it possible to distinguish the aims of that final chapter from the royalist concerns which are present elsewhere in the book. However, the fact that Hobbes argued for 'the mutuall Relation between Protection and Obedience' is not one of those elements; that argument can be found, explicitly or implicitly stated, in several earlier [247] Possibly Hobbes's model here was either Selden's Historie of Tithes, which ended with a lengthy 'Review' of the whole work (pp. 449–91), or the first edition of George Hakewill's Apologie, where the final pages (sigs. Oo01r–Oo02v) contained an unnumbered chapter entitled 'Revise', offering corrections and supplementary material.

[248] p. 1141. [249] p. 1134.

[250] For classic analyses of this type of theory, relating it to Hobbes's theory in Leviathan, see Skinner, 'History and Ideology', 'Ideological Context', 'Conquest and Consent'; revised versions of these are printed in Skinner, Visions, iii, pp. 238–307.

chapters of the book, and indeed in Hobbes's earlier political writings. Perhaps the most direct statement is in Chapter 21: 'The Obligation of Subjects to the Soveraign, is understood to last as long, and no longer, than the power lasteth, by which he is able to protect them.'[251] In itself, of course, such a statement is neither for nor against royal power; it is a statement about sovereignty and subjection as such, and it expresses one of the fundamental claims of Hobbes's political theory. Similar statements occur elsewhere in Leviathan.[252] They were previously made in De cive, which attributed special significance to 'protection', arguing that a person who enjoyed a ruler's protection must be taken to consent to that ruler: implicit consent existed when citizens 'use the benefit of someone's rule and laws for their protection against, and preservation from, others'.[253] The basic argument of De cive was that subjection took place for the sake of security, and that 'if it [sc. security] is not obtained, no one is understood to have subjected himself to others, or to have abandoned his right of defending himself according to his own judgement'.[254] And the same basic argument was previously presented in The Elements of Law.[255]

After the parliamentarian side had secured its rule over England by military victory, first in 1646 and then again in 1648, and after the execution of the King and the proclamation of a new 'free state' with neither monarch nor House of Lords, supporters of the new régime had to persuade the general public that it was right to obey it. This was not an easy task. Some had supported the parliamentarian cause because they thought that Charles I had subverted the constitution and needed to be restrained by force; but the new régime had gone much further, abolishing that constitution. Those who had taken the Solemn League and Covenant had thereby sworn loyalty to the King; many, besides, regarded the killing of any anointed king as a crime; and the right of their new rulers seemed to be founded only on the fact of conquest. One influential writer, Francis Rous, found a way of bypassing these objections. In a pamphlet published in the spring of 1649 he argued that even if a ruler had acquired sovereign power illegitimately, that ruler should be obeyed, since he (or it) had been placed over the people by God: it was right, therefore, to obey a ruling power that did not rule de jure. Another writer, Anthony Ascham, arrived at the same conclusion, but by a slightly different route: the reason why it was right to obey a non-rightful ruler was to be found not only in divine providence but also in the nature of people's overriding needs and rights, which made such obedience both licit and necessary. And a third, Marchamont Nedham, found another way of solving the problem. On his view, it did not matter if power was acquired non-rightfully; once a ruler held power over the people, that gave him a sufficient 'title' to rule them, so what was de facto became de jure.[256]

[251] p. 344. [252] See Hoekstra, 'De facto Turn', p. 38.

[253] De cive XIV.12: 'vtuntur beneficio imperij, & legum alicuius, ad protectionem & conseruationem sui aduersus alios'.

[254] De cive, VI.3: 'si non habeatur, nemo intelligitur se aliis subiecisse, aut ius se arbitrio suo defendendi amisisse.' [255] Elements of Law, II.i.5.

These three writers were among the most important to tackle this issue in the period 1649–50; but there were many others. In October 1649 the Rump Parliament announced that certain people (including officials, schoolmasters, and ministers) would be required to subscribe to an 'Engagement' declaring that they would be 'true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England, as it is now Established, without a King or House of Lords'; and in January 1650 it was decided that the requirement should be extended to all adult male citizens.[257] This gave rise to the so-called 'Engagement controversy', with a flood of publications for and against.[258] Given the deliberately modest way in which the Engagement had been framed (it required no statement of belief in the justice of the cause against the King), some of its defenders did find it easiest to adopt a de factoist position; but some had positive religious arguments, claiming that the new régime was doing the Lord's work. Much of the literature, in any case, was about other, more specific issues that arose in the course of these arguments: about the interpretation of the phrase 'powers that be' in Romans 13; about how, if at all, oaths might cease to bind (the Engagement, though not technically an oath itself, seemed to conflict with previous oaths, including the Solemn League and Covenant); about historical examples, such as that of the succession of various Norman kings; about whether conquest in a civil war was equivalent to conquest in an international war; and so on. If Hobbes had taken a broad interest in this literature, he might have felt inclined to give his opinions on some of these issues when composing his own political treatise; but there is almost no trace of any such interest in Leviathan.[259] Even on the central issues of conquest, consent, and obedience, there are not many textual links that can be strongly established between Leviathan and the Engagement tracts. It might be thought that, even if Hobbes's basic argument about 'the mutuall Relation between Protection and Obedience' long pre-dated these disputes, his choice of that particular phrase was a deliberate attempt to chime with the pro-Engagement writings of 1649–50, in which similar phrases were sometimes used. This is possible, but the evidence is not conclusive, as the general notion of a rela-

[256] See the detailed analysis of these several positions in Hoekstra, 'De facto Turn'.

[257] See Worden, Rump Parliament, pp. 219–20, 226–8.

[258] On this literature see Wallace, 'Engagement Controversy', and Destiny His Choice, pp. 43–64; the articles by Skinner cited above (n. 250); Burgess, 'Usurpation, Obligation'; Vallance, 'Oaths, Casuistry'.

[259] For one possible (but uncertain, and in any case very slight) trace see below, at n. 286.

tion between protection and subjection can be found in a variety of other sources (including a much-quoted legal judgment of 1608).[260] And, on the other hand, that general notion, both in the earlier expressions of it and in the pro-Engagement tracts, was usually based on the reciprocal moral duties or 'offices' of ruler and ruled—which failed to capture the Hobbesian point that the relation between protection and obedience lay at the foundation of rule itself.[261] So the chiming, if such it was, might have been largely verbal.

Nevertheless, a more specific and substantive connection can be made with at least one writer: Anthony Ascham. At the height of the second Civil War, in the summer of 1648, he had published a short book with the title, A Discourse wherein is Examined, what is Particularly Lawfull during the Confusions and Revolutions of Government, or, How farre a Man may Lawfully Conforme to the Powers and Commands of those who with Various Successes hold Kingdomes Divided by Civill or Forreigne Warres. In this work Ascham set out what would become the basic idea of the de factoist writers: there was no point in debating whether the ruler had come to power justly, and the only question to ask was whether, and when, obedience was just. On that point, Ascham declared that 'for a justifiable obedience, it is best, and enough for us to consider, Whether the invading party have us and the meanes of our subsistence in his possession or no?' If the answer was 'yes', then obedience became justified, on the basis of 'the transcendent right which wee naturally have in the preservation of our selves'.[262] One of the questions to which Ascham gave special attention was 'When may a man rightly judge the invadour to be in a full possession of his conquest?' His answer listed several criteria, including 'When there is no probable hopes of recovering it' and 'when the party overcome doth by some acts acknowledge the Invador for the supreme'.[263] While some of Ascham's views thus seem quite close to Hobbes's, there is no evidence that he had read either The Elements of Law or De cive at this time; rather, it appears to have been his study of Grotius that had led him to a position which resembled Hobbes's in some important respects (though not in all).[264]

[260] See Sommerville, Thomas Hobbes, pp. 68–9; the legal judgment was in Calvin's Case. Cf. also Hyde, Speech at a Conference, pp. 11–12: 'the sweet harmony betweene the Kings protection, and the Subjects obedience'.

[261] See, e.g., Dallison, Royalist's Defence (1648), pp. 81–2: 'this duty is reciprocall. The King ex Officio, as King is obliged to protect the people: And the Subject in duty is bound to obey their Soveraign, for protectio trahit subjectionem, & subjectio protectionem [protection draws with it subjection, and subjection protection]'; and the pro-Engagement text by N. W., Discourse concerning the Engagement (1650), p. 11: 'The mutual relation of Protection and Allegiance (every benefit requiring some duty) presseth us to a cheerful owning the Parliament.'

[262] Ascham, Discourse, pp. 25, 36–7. [263] Ibid., pp. 88–9.

[264] For a significant difference, see Ascham's account of the primitive state of nature in this work (p. 96: 'ambition not having place in a time of such simplicity, they liv'd in a Community free from all Alarms,

By the summer of 1649, however, Ascham had read De cive.[265] That year, in a new edition of his Discourse, entitled Of the Confusions and Revolutions of Goverments, he referred to Hobbes several times, agreeing with him on one basic point (he now believed in an original 'state of warre') and disagreeing on others.[266] His new material included a discussion of 'the time for Legitimating new Obedience after Confusions', where he distinguished between the 'over-running' and the 'conquering' of a country.

> The first like a Torrent changes no property nor right, the other doth, if (as Grotius and Mr. Hobbes say) there [be] a dereliction of command in the person of whom we speak, or if the country be so subdu'd that the Conquerours can no longer be resisted, and after the subjects have us'd all their endeavours to oppose such a new power; likewise when subordinate Magistrates are created by the Conquerours, and that Courts of Justice actually dispence Law under them, for the meum and tuum of the whole Land, and permit publique meetings for the worship of God.[267]

He also argued that it was necessary to distinguish 'conquest' from 'victory': the former followed from a war 'undertaken both for Dominion, and for possession of the whole', whereas the latter arose from a war 'undertaken onely for Dominion, and the possession of the former power, as it resided in the person or party governing'—the difference in effect being that in conquest 'every private man loses his estate'.[268] And having argued that in a situation of 'victory' people retained their previous rights, he went on to criticize Hobbes (and Grotius) for saying that people had originally yielded all their rights, perpetually, to the sovereign: 'such a totall resignation of all right and reason, as Mr. Hobbes supposes, is one of our morall impossibilities, and directly opposite to that antient Ius zelotarum among the Jewes'.[269] This was a reference to the alleged 'right of zealots', under which every individual in ancient Israel retained (even under a sovereign ruler) the power to inflict the death penalty, when necessary, for serious violations of divine law.[270]

In his 'Review, and Conclusion' Hobbes wrote: 'I find by divers English Books lately printed, that the Civill warres have not yet sufficiently taught save of the Beasts of the field'). On the extent of his debt to Grotius see Wallace, Destiny His Choice, pp. 31–3, 37–8.

[265] See the unmistakably Hobbesian passage in Anon. [Ascham], Bounds & Bonds of Publique Obedience (Thomason's copy is dated 27 Aug. [/6 Sept.]: BL, pressmark E.571 (26)), p. 33.

[266] Confusions and Revolutions, p. 108 (cf. also p. 25: 'They who would live thus brutishly in meere Nature . . . must live in perpetuall war').

[267] Ibid., pp. 119–20 ('meum and tuum' = 'mine and thine', i.e., private property).

[268] Ibid., p. 120.

[269] Ibid., p. 121.

[270] The classic discussions of the 'ius zelotarum' were Selden, De iure naturali, IV.4 (pp. 487–91), and Hammond, Of Resisting the Lawful Magistrate, pp. 34–41.

men, in what point of time it is, that a Subject becomes obliged to the Conquerour; nor what is Conquest; nor how it comes about, that it obliges men to obey his Laws.'[271] There can be very little doubt that the main work Hobbes had in mind here was Ascham's Confusions and Revolutions, which had paid more attention to this issue of the 'point of time' than any other book or pamphlet. In the further explanation of these matters which Hobbes went on to give, he not only recapitulated the account he had given in Chapter 21 of Leviathan, but also added a specific distinction between 'conquest' and 'victory' (differing from Ascham's).[272] And a little later in the 'Review, and Conclusion' he developed a lengthy argument about punishments in ancient Israel, designed to refute 'that pretence of Ius Zelotarum'.[273]

Hobbes's reference to 'divers English Books' may have been a rather airily expansionary phrase. No other relevant work can be identified quite as confidently as Ascham's; but there is one other very plausible candidate, Marchamont Nedham's The Case of the Common-wealth of England, Stated. The first edition of this book appeared in May 1650; a second, preserving the original text but adding an appendix, was published in late June or early July of that year.[274] Nedham, as mentioned above, was also a de factoist, unconcerned with the justice of the conqueror's cause. In this book he argued that 'protection' required 'a Return of obedience and Friendship, from the persons protected', and that if they failed to obey they could be hunted down as 'Publique Enemyes'; his argument here was drawn, however, from Grotius on 'the Law of Nations', and was thus not quite the same as Hobbes's.[275] Nedham's main concern was to show that it was right to obey a power which had won victory in a civil war. He rejected the idea that any formal consent on the part of the population was needed, and declared that 'ipso facto the Sword creates a title for him, or those that bear it, and installs them with a new Majesty of Empire, abolishing the old'; he also cited Grotius's opinion that the right to govern the people was simply acquired, like other rights, by the conqueror in war. The tacit consent of the people could simply be assumed to follow thereafter.[276] In the appendix to the second edition, Nedham printed material (which, he said, reinforced his own argument) drawn from two works, Salmasius's Defensio regia and Hobbes's De corpore politico (the unauthorized printing of the second half of The Elements of Law). He did so, he explained, 'Not that I esteem their Authorities any whit more Authentick than those which I have already alledged; but onely in regard of the great [271] p. 1133. [272] pp. 1133–5. [273] pp. 1136–8.

[274] Thomason's copy of the 1st edn. is dated 8 [/18] May (BL, pressmark E.600 (7)); the 2nd edn. was advertised in Mercurius politicus, no. 4 (27 June [/7 July]–4 [/14] July 1650), p. [64].

[275] Nedham, Case of the Common-wealth, 2nd edn., p. 17.

[276] Ibid., p. 23.

reputation allowed unto those Books by the two Parties, Presbyterian, and Royall.'[277] The passages he quoted from Hobbes, drawn especially from Part II, Chapter i of The Elements of Law, set out the fundamentals of Hobbesian political theory, from which Nedham correctly concluded that it would be unreasonable for anyone in England to 'put himself out of the Protection' of the present power in England, by maintaining allegiance to Charles, 'it being clear that neither he, nor any other, can now protect us'.[278]

Hobbes's comment in the 'Review, and Conclusion' that recent English books had not adequately explained 'what is Conquest; nor how it comes about, that it obliges men to obey his [sc. the conqueror's] Laws' might also have been aimed at Nedham's text, with its blithe assurance that military victory ipso facto conferred the right to govern. In the explanation which followed, Hobbes insisted that the obligation to obey arose from the consent of the defeated; he did distinguish here between express and tacit consent (which may also suggest that he had paused to consider Nedham's comments on different kinds of consent), but his main point was that only the consent of the conquered, not the victory of the conqueror, could confer the duty to obey.[279] In addition, there are two other passages in the 'Review, and Conclusion' which, as we shall see, may have been prompted by Nedham's work.[280]

These two works by Ascham and Nedham are the only obvious candidates for Hobbes's 'divers English Books lately printed'. It may not be a coincidence, then, that they both contain substantial references to Hobbes himself; for they are the only books published during 1649–50 that make such substantial and acknowledged use of his writings.[281] What this suggests is that we need not assume that Hobbes had selected these two as the most stimulating out of a whole mass of such works that he had read (even though they are certainly of higher quality than most of the rest); it may be that a friend in England had just sent him these two, because he was quoted and discussed in them. Ascham had cited Hobbes mostly to criticize him for his absolutist tendencies; Nedham had cited him in order to make positive use of his arguments, but the use he wished to make was to persuade royalists, with whose cause he identified Hobbes, just as he used Salmasius (the French Calvinist scholar who had written a work denouncing the regicide, and was regarded by the régime in London as a dangerous enemy) to persuade presbyterians. And if Hobbes knew the other pro-régime works of this period

[277] Ibid., p. 103. [278] Ibid., p. 109.

[279] pp. 1133–5. See Hoekstra, 'De facto Turn', pp. 58–9.

[280] See below, pp. 73 (n. 286), 75.

[281] Brief quotations from Hobbes appear also in John Hall's Grounds & Reasons. pp. 49–50, and in two works by 'Eutactus Philodemius': Original and End of Civil Powers, p. 15; Answer to the Vindication, p. 16.

that mentioned him, he would have been aware that they too identified him as a writer on the royalist side of the argument.[282] By the time Hobbes wrote his 'Review, and Conclusion', however, it was his clear intention to show that his own political theory could indeed serve to persuade people to submit to the new régime.

The signs of this conscious intention in the 'Review, and Conclusion' are several. Hobbes begins by saying that he wishes to add another law of nature to the list given in Chapter 15: 'That every man is bound by Nature, as much as in him lieth, to protect in Warre, the Authority, by which he is himself protected in time of Peace.' This principle seems to follow so automatically from Hobbes's other natural laws that it hardly needs to be stated separately; and Hobbes immediately admits that it 'may bee drawn by consequence, from some of those that are there already mentioned'. But he adds: 'yet the Times require to have it inculcated, and remembred.'[283] And what exactly were those 'Times'? In the latter part of 1650, when Hobbes wrote these words, people had been living in conditions of peace in England for two years—and in parts of the country untouched by the second Civil War, for four. In the last paragraph of the 'Review, and Conclusion' Hobbes writes that he cannot imagine that his work will be condemned 'by any that desires the continuance of Publique Peace'; the word 'continuance' there is significant.[284] Hobbes's extra law of nature, abstractly stated, would of course also imply that those who rebelled originally against Charles I had been in breach of natural law. But his point in stating it in the present 'Times' is to show that the people of England should defend their present government—the Rump Parliament and the Council of State—in war. This is remarkable, given that Charles II was, at that time, gathering an army in Scotland to take back his father's English kingdom.

Hobbes goes on to discuss the conditions under which people should submit to a new régime, observing that 'for him that hath no obligation to his former Soveraign but that of an ordinary Subject, it is then, when the means of his life is within the Guards and Garrisons of the Enemy; for it is then, that he hath no longer Protection from him.' This, in 1650, would apply to all the inhabitants of England. The only special case is that of a soldier who is still under the protection of the 'former Soveraign': 'if a man, besides the obligation of a Subject, hath taken upon him a new obligation of a Souldier, then he hath not the liberty to submit to a new Power, as long as the old one keeps the field, and giveth him means of subsistence.' But, Hobbes adds, 'when that also failes, a Souldier also may seek his Protection wheresoever he has most hope to have it; and may lawfully submit himself to his new Master.'[285] This gave a justification for those soldiers who were currently serving Charles II in Scotland to continue to do so, so long as they were protected and fed, but it did not give any reason for Englishmen to join his army; importantly, it also countered the idea that once a soldier had pledged his service, he was bound by that pledge ever after. (This point was relevant to the case of many former royalist soldiers living peacefully in England, who might have felt that their former pledges of loyal service would be reactivated if Charles's army entered the country.)

[282] Hall referred to De cive as 'principally' a defence of monarchy (Grounds & Reasons, p. 50); 'Eutactus Philodemius' called Hobbes 'one of this Doctors [sc. Hammond's] party', and 'a man of dangerous, and unsound principles' (Answer to the Vindication, p. 16).

[283] p. 1133. [284] p. 1141.

That Hobbes's aim was now to support the new régime in England is indicated by other passages in the 'Review, and Conclusion'. Commenting on his account in Chapter 29 of the things that weaken and destroy a commonwealth, he adds another potentially fatal error: 'That they will all of them justifie the War, by which their Power was at first gotten, and whereon (as they think) their Right dependeth, and not on the Possession.' (There is a significant contrast between this comment and the remark in Chapter 30, cited above, that usurpers who have taken power from a lawful sovereign by violence 'have been alwayes put to the trouble of contriving their Titles, to save the People from the shame of receiving themselves in his place': in that passage, the point about 'shame' provided a positive justification for their proceeding in such a way.) Here, in a delicate piece of manoeuvring, the example Hobbes immediately gives is that of people who suppose that 'the Right of the Kings of England did depend on the goodnesse of the cause of William the Conquerour, and upon their lineall, and directest Descent from him'; this momentarily makes it seem as if he is giving helpful advice to royalists, though the implication is that the historical foundations of royal power are no different from those of the Rump's power over England.[286] He concludes: 'Therefore I put down for one of the most effectuall seeds of the Death of any State, that the Conquerors require not onely a Submission of mens actions to them for the future, but also an Approbation of all their actions past.'[287] This is advice to the new 'conquerors' of England—advice which, importantly, also implies that they should not be troubled by the evidence elsewhere in Hobbes's book that he strongly disapproves of their past actions. The fact that Hobbes gives this advice does align him quite closely with the de factoist writers. But on the other hand, his worry that England's new rulers were requiring 'an Approbation of all their actions past' suggests that he was rather out of touch with the current debate.[288] Apparently he failed to appreciate that the de factoist approach, as expressed by publicists such as Nedham, was already the dominant line of pro-government propaganda.

[285] p. 1134.

[286] The rights of succession of William the Conqueror and several later Norman kings had been disputed by Rous (Anon. [Rous], Lawfulnes of Obeying the Present Government, pp. 4–5) and had become the subject of much subsequent debate. Hobbes may have had some knowledge of this; but he may simply have noticed the discussion of this issue in Nedham, Case of the Common-wealth, 2nd edn., pp. 14–15, where it was emphasized both that William's claim to the throne was weak and that several later kings were not in the direct line of succession.

[287] p. 1135.

In the final pages of the 'Review, and Conclusion' Hobbes's aim is made even clearer. He observes that his argument will meet with objections, 'Of which, in a time wherein the interests of men are changed (seeing much of that Doctrine, which serveth to the establishing of a new Government, must needs be contrary to that which conduced to the dissolution of the old,) there cannot choose but be very many'.[289] This is perhaps the closest Hobbes comes to a direct statement that his work should be taken as assisting 'the establishing of a new Government'; only the word 'serveth' has a slight distancing effect, since an argument can 'serve' a purpose without necessarily being intended for that purpose by the person who makes it. What is in any case unmistakable in this passage is Hobbes's desire to deflect the hostility of those defenders of the new régime who might react against his criticisms of the original claims and actions of the rebels. And his sense of the awkwardness of his position is expressed again in the final paragraph of the entire work, where he writes that the sort of truths he tells will be in the position of 'having an angry aspect from the dissolvers of an old Government, and seeing but the backs of them that erect a new'; the latter phrase, while somewhat obscure, seems to imply that the new régime will turn its back on help from such a quarter.[290] Nevertheless, Hobbes concludes, 'I cannot think it will be condemned at this time, either by the Publique Judge of Doctrine, or by any that desires the continuance of Publique Peace.'

In these passages, although Hobbes uses various devices—involving ambiguity, distancing, the substitution of a historical example for the current situation, and the statement of his extra law of nature in purely abstract terms—to prevent his argument from appearing as a direct and blatant statement of support for the new régime, the general direction of that argument is clear. It must of course be emphasized that in making this argument about the current political situation in England, Hobbes was indeed applying the theory which he had set out in the first half of Leviathan; there is no fundamental change here in the theory itself. Only the fact that he took the trouble to make this application is significant, as it did run counter, in practical terms, to the support for the royalist side which his previous writing represented.[291]

[288] It should be emphasized that the Engagement itself made no such requirement. Hobbes seems to have been concerned with the general lines of argument in pro-régime propaganda—and, as suggested here, with defending his own expressions of disapprobation. [289] p. 1139.

[290] p. 1141. The normal meaning of 'to see the back of' someone was to drive someone away; but Hobbes cannot have meant that. In the light of Hobbes's discussion on p. 1138 of the way in which God spoke to Moses, it also seems possible that he was thinking of God's instruction to Moses in Exod. 33: 23, 'thou shalt see my back parts; but my face shall not be seen.'

There are just two ways in which the 'Review, and Conclusion' does express or accommodate, to a certain extent, a royalist point of view. The first arises in a paragraph where Hobbes complains about those who inveigh against 'tyrants': Hobbes points out that this sort of 'Reproach of the Cause of the Conquered' is not necessary in order to establish 'the Obligation of the Conquered', and urges the authorities to suppress this behaviour, since 'the toleration of a professed hatred of Tyranny, is a Toleration of hatred to Common-wealth in generall'.[292] Here it seems likely that he was thinking of the several passages in Marchamont Nedham's book that declaimed against royal 'tyrants' and identified all kingly rule with 'tyranny'.[293] While the ostensible reason for making this point was to strengthen the long-term stability of the new régime, it may also be assumed that Hobbes was irked by anti-monarchical rhetoric of this kind.

The second concerns Hobbes's use of an argument to persuade defeated royalists to compound for their estates. From 1644 onwards, the parliamentary authorities had developed a system under which a 'delinquent' (i.e., royalist) could make his peace with them by taking the Covenant and the so-called Negative Oath (pledging to submit to Parliament, and not to assist the King in war), and by 'compounding' for his estates—which meant that, instead of having most of the estate confiscated by the authorities, he would pay a proportion of it, and be allowed peaceful possession of the rest. The proportion was, at least to begin with, typically two-fifteenths, but could rise to one-third for serious 'malignants'. There was a large wave of compositions in the period 1646–7, and another after the regicide in 1649.[294] Many émigré royalists felt it necessary, sooner or later, to compound for their estates, since they desperately needed an income, and feared that the estates would otherwise be entirely confiscated. Diehard royalists such as Edward Hyde fulminated against this tendency; in one letter of January 1647, for example, Hyde argued both that it could not be right to compound even if the [291] The interpretation offered here concurs broadly with the arguments of Burgess, 'Contexts for the Writing of Leviathan' and Sommerville, 'Lofty Science', while differing on some points. [292] p. 1136.

[293] Nedham, Case of the Common-wealth, 2nd edn., pp. 49–51, [95] (misprinted '47')–97, 101.

[294] See Calendar of the Committee for Compounding, i, pp. v–xviii, and Hardacre, Royalists during the Revolution, pp. 20–23. From Jan. 1650 onwards, compounders were usually required to take the Engagement.

King gave his personal permission to do so, and that it was 'not reasonable whatever is pretended, to suspect future actiuity or assistance from those, who by their very compounding haue soe much changed their condicon, y.t they cannot w.th the same hazard bee honest againe as other men'.[295] Charles I did indeed direct some royalists to compound, and so too did Charles II—who, for example, encouraged the Marquess of Newcastle in 1649 to attempt to preserve some part of his family's estates in this way.[296] But it is Hyde's other comment that is more significant here, opposing those who 'pretend' that a person who compounded would thereby become better able to provide 'future actiuity or assistance' to the royalist cause. The underlying argument to which he was responding was that it was better for a royalist to preserve most of his wealth, which might later be put to the service of the Crown, than to allow the entirety of it to pass to the parliamentary authorities.[297]

That this was a powerful argument was recognized by pro-parliamentarian writers too: Anthony Ascham pointed out, in the work which Hobbes almost certainly read, that if one side in a civil war ordered those who had fallen under the power of the other side to refuse to make any contribution to them, this would be counter-productive, 'Because at that time [sc. a case of total refusal] they will take all, whereas in case of submission they aske but a part'.[298] When Hobbes discussed a person's submission to a conquering power in the 'Review, and Conclusion', he first set out his argument that this was necessary and right 'when the means of his life is within the Guards and Garrisons of the Enemy', and then added: 'Besides, if a man consider that they who submit, assist the Enemy but with part of their estates, whereas they that refuse, assist him with the whole, there is no reason to call their Submission, or Composition an Assistance; but rather a Detriment to the Enemy.'[299] Hobbes's use of this point is rather striking, since, although it might well have had some persuasive effect on reluctant royalists, it was scarcely compatible with his own larger argument, which was that the conquered must consent to be governed by the power that was now in a position to protect them: that power could ipso facto no longer be regarded as an [295] Bodl., MS Clarendon 29, fo. 61r, Hyde to Joseph Jane, 10 [/20] Jan. 1647.

[296] Hardacre, Royalists during the Revolution, p. 32 (Charles I); HMC, Report on the Pepys Manuscripts, p. 307 (Charles II); cf. also de Baillon, Henriette-Marie, p. 556 (letter to Newcastle from Henrietta Maria, [6/] 16 Apr. 1650, to the same effect). Newcastle was barred from compounding himself, but his brother, Sir Charles Cavendish, was able to compound for his own estate, and Newcastle's wife was able to claim one-fifth of Newcastle's estate, which would otherwise have been entirely sequestered (see Trease, Portrait of a Cavalier, p. 169). Very unusually, Hyde relaxed his opposition to compounding in Sir Charles's case (see Hyde, Life, i, pp. 293–6, and the comments in Ollard, Clarendon, p. 116).

[297] This argument was endorsed by Charles II in 1650, when he allowed royalists to take the Engagement 'to preserve themselves for the King's service': CSPD 1650, p. 89.

[298] Ascham, Confusions and Revolutions, p. 46. [299] p. 1134.

'Enemy', so the desire to cause it some 'Detriment' could no longer be regarded as justified. But in order to explain this surprising twist in Hobbes's argument, it is not necessary to suppose that it reveals residual royalist urges in his own psychology. Inducing royalists to submit was a central part of the purpose of the 'Review, and Conclusion', and deploying this argument was just an additional way of doing so.

Can the new direction taken in the 'Review, and Conclusion' be linked to any changes in Hobbes's personal circumstances or motivation? Hobbes did have a small estate of his own, a manor in Yorkshire which had been settled on him by the third Earl of Devonshire, and which yielded an income of roughly £80 per annum; but although Hyde thought that Hobbes might be classified as a 'delinquent', there is no evidence either that the estate was sequestered or that Hobbes compounded for it.[300] Unlike many of the royalist exiles in Paris, Hobbes was probably not in severe financial straits; in addition to the income from his English estate, he also seems to have done some paid work, including tutoring, for other Englishmen there.[301] Indeed, when the debt-encumbered Marquess of Newcastle hurriedly left Paris in the summer of 1648, it was Hobbes who lent him the sum of 100 pistoles (roughly £74), taking his collection of telescopes as a surety.[302] And by 1651 Hobbes had also received one half of the legacy of £200 bequeathed to him by Sidney Godolphin.[303]

Hobbes's reasons for wanting to return to England may not have been financial; but there is at least some evidence that he did wish to return. The most pointed piece of evidence is that given by Edward Hyde in the book he wrote in the 1670s attacking Leviathan. Hyde recalled that when he saw Hobbes in Paris in April 1651, Hobbes told him about the printing of Leviathan and summarized some of its 'Conclusions', adding that he knew [300] For Hyde's comment see below, at n. 367. Hobbes was granted four messuages, yielding £80 p.a., in the manor of Cleisby by the 2nd Earl in 1628, on payment of rent of £20 and other costs of approx. £10 p.a.; in 1639 the 3rd Earl granted him the entire manor on a peppercorn lease for 100 years (Chatsworth, MSS Indenture H/301/15; Indenture H/301/16). This was presumably the estate from which, according to Jean-Baptiste Lantin, Hobbes had an income of 1,000 livres (approx. £83) while he was in Paris (BN, MS fr. 23253, fo. 141r; Bibliothèque Municipale de Dijon, MS 962, fo. 203r; printed in Joly, Remarques critiques, ii, p. 434). A 'Thomas Hobbs' appealed against the sequestration of his estate in Apr.–June 1649 (TNA, SP 20/8, fos. 3r, 115r); but this was probably the 'Thomas Hobbs of Westerleigh in y^e^ County of Gloucester yeoman' whose case was finally settled in Dec. 1650 (TNA, SP 23/36, fo. 25v; Calendar of the Committee for Compounding, iii, p. 2350).

[301] Cf. the case of Endymion Porter, who was reduced to extreme poverty in Paris, and returned to London to compound in 1649 (Huxley, Endymion Porter, pp. 292–3, 302); or that of Sir Kenelm Digby, who returned in 1649 for fear of dying of starvation in France (Gabrieli, Sir Kenelm Digby, pp. 223–4). For the evidence of Hobbes's work (in addition to his tutoring of the Duke of Buckingham and Prince Charles) see Correspondence, i, pp. 124, 170.

[302] Nottingham University Library, MS Pw. 1. 406 (Cav. Misc. 43).

[303] Hyde, Brief View and Survey, p. 7; see below, pp. 93–5.

that Hyde would not like the book: 'upon which I asked him, why he would publish such doctrine: to which, after a discourse between jest and earnest upon the Subject, he said, The truth is, I have a mind to go home.'[304] This information could not be said to come from an unbiased source; but it should be noted that the other biographical details Hyde gave about his dealings with Hobbes in this period are verifiably accurate.[305] As we have seen, when Hobbes begged Sorbière to remove the engraving describing him as academic tutor to the Prince of Wales in 1647, one of his reasons was the fear that it would prevent him from returning to England: 'and I do not see why I should not wish to return, if it is permitted, when England has somehow or other been pacified.'[306] Two things, however, are unclear in this statement: what exactly Hobbes meant by 'if it is permitted' ('si liceat'), and whether he used 'return' to mean returning for good, or simply going back for a visit.[307] In May 1648, replying to a letter from the third Earl of Devonshire which had requested Hobbes's help in finding a tutor for the Earl's son and had also, apparently, asked whether Hobbes wished to come back to England, he wrote that 'I haue no inclinations to the place where there is so little security, but I haue such inclinations to your Lo^{p} as I will come to any place (if I may haue a passe) where your Lo^{p} shall be', and added that he would even be willing to become the boy's tutor—which does suggest that a long-term return was envisaged.[308]

In April 1649 Payne summarized a recent letter from Hobbes as follows: 'He tells me, y^{e} French, especially y^{e} men of y^{e} sword, take ye death of o^{r} King very much to heart. & is of opinion y^{e} warre here will be reducd to an equality very suddainly; els he had come over to visitt his friends. but now he deferres yt designe till he see more hopes of peace.'[309] This seems to imply that Hobbes was intending only a visit, not a final return; and it also suggests that Hobbes expected a speedy revival of the military fortunes of the royalist side—because of either the hoped-for alliance with the Scots, or an upsurge of royalist feeling in England after the regicide, or both. Five months later Hobbes made a more guarded comment in a letter to Pierre Gassendi: 'I am certainly looking after myself, preserving myself for my return to England, should it happen by any chance.'[310] But in April [/May] 1650, instead of [306] Correspondence, i, pp. 156 ('nec cur redire [>non] velim si liceat quomodocunque pacatâ Angliâ non video'), 158; see above, p. 54.

[304] Ibid., pp. 7–8. [305] See below, pp. 93–5.

[307] On 'if it is permitted' cf. the phrase 'w^{h}out blame' in his letter to Waller of [29 July/] 8 Aug. 1645: 'I beleeue you passe much of yours [sc. your time] in meditating how you may to your Contentment [>and w^{h}out blame] passe the seas' (Correspondence, i, p. 124). [308] Ibid., p. 170.

[309] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 134, 25 Apr. [/5 May] 1649.

[310] Correspondence, i, pp. 178 ('mihi nimirum indulgo, seruans me, si forte contingat, reditui in Angliam'), 179, [12/] 22 Sept. 1649.

planning his own visit to England, Hobbes was suggesting that Payne should visit him in France: as Payne reported to Sheldon, 'He much desires my company wth him there, for y^e^ good Company he assures me he shall bring me acquainted wth there, & in particular wth Gassendi.'[311] By August 1651, three months after the publication of Leviathan, Hobbes was certainly planning to cross the Channel: thanking the physician Gui Patin for treating him, he expressed a wish to send him a fine present 'when he was in England'.[312] Yet, as we shall see, it was not until the very end of that year that Hobbes finally left Paris.

The evidence of Hobbes's intentions is thus not as clear as it might be; we know that he harboured a desire to return to England, but we cannot be sure that he always intended his return to be permanent. Much seems to have depended on his calculations about when England would be reduced to complete peace and security; his invitation to Payne in the spring of 1650, for example, may have been prompted by an expectation that the alliance with the Scots would lead to a new round of warfare in England. If so, the main influence on Hobbes's plans during the final period of work on Leviathan would have been his assessment of the strategic situation after the battle of Dunbar on 3 [/13] September 1650, when Cromwell defeated the Scottish Covenanters' army, capturing most of its soldiers, and then moved quickly to take the city of Edinburgh. Charles II's position was greatly weakened by this development. When news of the defeat reached Paris on 13/23 September, Hobbes may have become convinced that parliamentary rule was now assured for the long term in England; and if that did not convince him, the sudden death of William of Orange (Charles II's brother-in-law, and his most important supporter) on 27 October/6 November may well have made him despair of the King's prospects more generally.[313] It is true that hopes were revived a little among the exiled royalists in the following month: on [25 November/] 5 December Abraham Cowley wrote to Henry Bennet from Paris that the latest news, of forces rising for the King in the north of Scotland, 'puts us again into a way of hope'.[314] But by then the final pages of Leviathan had probably been written.

The distinct change of approach in the 'Review, and Conclusion', noted above, is the clearest evidence that Hobbes's expectations did change during [311] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 126, 29 Apr. [/9 May] 1650.

[312] Patin, Lettres, i, p. 594 ('quand il seroit en Angleterre); Patin to André Falconet, [12/] 22 Sept. 1651, referring to a meeting with Hobbes on [7/] 17 Aug.

[313] See Warner, ed., Nicholas Papers, i, p. 196, Lord Hatton to Nicholas, 13/23 Sept. 1650: 'Wee have this day receaved the newes from England of the victory of the English over the Scotch, of whom they have killed some thousands, taken many thousands more, 32 peece of cannon, 200 ensignes, 12000 armes; and were still in pursute.'

[314] T. Brown, ed., Miscellanea aulica, p. 155.

the final period of the composition of Leviathan—say, between September and November 1650. Once again, it must be emphasized that the fundamental theory of the book did not change; Hobbes merely made a point of showing how it must apply to a new situation. Similarly, his theory certainly permitted (though it did not positively require) his return to England and his submission to the new régime. Whether or not his motives for returning were largely personal (homesickness, etc.), they were fully compatible with his beliefs. But in one important sense, his beliefs themselves had surely become a motivating force. The aim of Leviathan, from its first inception, had been to instruct a ruler—not merely giving advice on the ruler's own actions, but setting out an entire doctrine, about the nature of subjection and authority, which the ruler was expected to impart to the people. As Hobbes had developed his thoughts on ecclesiastical claims to power and jurisdiction, he had become more and more passionate about the dangers these posed to all government. No doubt his starting-point was the hope that he could persuade a future absolute king to deal with religion in the way he recommended; but the most important thing, for the future of any stable rule in England, was that religion be thoroughly dealt with. The reform of public teaching, along Hobbesian lines, was one part of a larger programme here: both philosophical and institutional reform would be needed in order to eradicate the 'Thing'—that mass of error, deception, and malign interest—that threatened all stability and sovereign rule. The blocking of all plans for a compulsory presbyterian national Church by the Independent-dominated government in September [/October] 1650 must have seemed a positive sign to Hobbes; and it may well be that he knew just enough about the Erastian tendencies of some of the leading Independents to feel that they might be receptive to his doctrine. While a sovereign protecting power was now definitely in place in England, much remained indefinite in the settlement of both Church and State, and a Hobbesian reform of religion might actually have seemed more likely to take place under the Rump and the Council of State than under a restored Charles II surrounded by triumphalist Anglican chaplains.

To sum up: if Hobbes did tell Hyde that he had a mind to go home, it seems that this would have been a true statement, but only one part of a larger pattern of motives and reasons. His desire to go was presumably contingent on his belief that England was now fully pacified, and securely held, by the parliamentary authorities. The belief that a new political situation had been established made it right, in turn, to apply the general theory of the book to that new situation, as Hobbes did in the 'Review, and Conclusion'. But the general theory of the book was not just a theory about protection and obedience; it was also a theory about the nature of sovereignty, about the actions and doctrines that could destroy it, and about what must be taught to the people in order to inoculate them against those destructive doctrines. And thus the desire to impart that theory to the new sovereign rulers, so that sovereignty would not be undermined once again, would itself have become a powerful motive.

It may be wondered why, at this late stage, Hobbes did not go back through his text and weed out all the passages that so clearly proclaimed his previous allegiance to the royalist cause. The most general answer must surely be that his own theory had justified—indeed, required—such allegiance in the earlier stages of the conflict. (Quite what the theory required on the part of an Englishman resident in France, however, is not so clear; possibly it implied that he should remain loyal to the Stuart kings until the French sovereign recognized the new régime in England.)[315] And, as Hobbes took pains to emphasize in the 'Review, and Conclusion', his support for submission to the successful rebels was entirely compatible with his denunciation of their original rebellion. In any case, the presentation of his general theory of sovereignty throughout the book made it clear that it was just that, a general theory: Hobbes frequently referred to the sovereign as a man or an assembly, just as he had done in De cive. Nor was this reference to assemblies a case of Hobbes hedging his bets; the imperative force of the theory derived from its claim to have demonstrated, universally and necessarily, the nature of sovereignty as such, and it was obviously true that some sovereign states were ruled by assemblies. Conversely, it is not necessary to suppose that the specifically pro-monarchical elements in Leviathan are to be explained as prospective references to Cromwell. It may be true that, from 1649 onwards, some allusions to Cromwell as a future monarchical ruler did appear in pamphlets and private correspondence; but these were, for the most part, hostile or satirical comments by royalists, not serious predictions of an impending constitutional change.[316] Hobbes had become known—through The Elements of Law and De cive—as a monarchist long before Cromwell had risen to any special position of power. One other factor must have played a significant part here: Hobbes must surely have understood, from his reading of Nedham's book, that his own propaganda value to the régime would derive partly [315] This suggestion is based on the passage in Ch. 21 (p. 346) which says that a person who has 'leave to travell' in a foreign state remains a subject of his own sovereign 'by Contract between Soveraigns'; that contract, in Hobbes's case, was with Charles I. If it continued with his heir, it would be rendered void only by French recognition of a new sovereign in England. But an alternative interpretation might be that with the loss of power by Charles I (and his heir) the contract lapsed, and Hobbes became a subject of the French king.

[316] See the examples given in Collins, Allegiance of Thomas Hobbes, pp. 149–51.

from the fact that he was regarded as a royalist with a particularly strong enthusiasm for purely monarchical rule. This did indeed make him more of a prize catch for the parliamentarian side.

But such considerations, like all the tactical political considerations mentioned above, are of secondary importance. The primary fact is that Hobbes was setting out a theory about the need for sovereign rule, the nature of that rule, and the threats to it. The basic features of this theory were first presented in 1640, long before the political events referred to in this Introduction. And the theory itself rested on a set of philosophical assumptions about the nature of human knowledge and human action, and about the origins and nature of rights and duties. Investigating the political and biographical context of Leviathan may help to explain the timing of its composition, and may also elucidate some of its particular features. At most, then, it may go some way towards explaining why Hobbes wrote in the way that he did, and when he did; but it is very far from exhausting the meaning of his work, or from explaining why Hobbes believed that what he wrote was true.

Hobbes's Retrospective Accounts

Hobbes's later accounts of his reasons for writing Leviathan have not been accorded much evidential value in the discussion above; they are the products of later polemics, and/or attempts at self-exculpation. Nevertheless, they deserve some notice here.

Hobbes's first published statements about the writing of his book appeared in 1656. At the end of his The Questions concerning Liberty, Necessity and Chance (a response to Bramhall's 'Animadversions' on Hobbes's short treatise on liberty and necessity), he added a brief account of the nature and purpose of Leviathan.[317] Here he described it simply as a continuation of the project undertaken in The Elements of Law and De cive, an attempt to oppose rebellion by proving 'both by reason and Scripture, That they who have once submitted themselves to any Soveraign Governour . . . are obliged to be true and faithful to him, and to acknowledge no other supreme power but him in any matter, or question whatsoever, either civill or Ecclesiasticall'. The whole argument was conducted, he claimed, 'without any word tending to the disgrace either of Episcopacy or of Presbytery'.[318] This last claim was, on the face of it, hard to square with Hobbes's comment in Leviathan that [317] This book was published by Mar. 1656: the exemplum in the library of All Souls College is dated 3 [/13] Mar. 1656. Philip Tanny quoted from it in mid-May: Correspondence, i, p. 277.

[318] Hobbes, Questions concerning Liberty, p. 347 (EW v, pp. 453–4).

the Anglican bishops 'sliely slip off the Collar of their Civill Subjection', or his statement that 'The Authors therefore of this Darknesse in religion, are the Romane, and the Presbyterian Clergy.'[319] But, as his subsequent defences of Leviathan help to show, what he probably meant was that he had not criticized episcopacy or presbytery as such—that is, as mere ways of organizing a Church. He allowed both as systems of Church government, so long as it was accepted that the clergy's rights of action were not jure divino, but entirely derived from the civil sovereign.

This point emerged more clearly in Hobbes's next defence of his book, in his Six Lessons to the Professors of the Mathematiques, a polemical work addressed to John Wallis and Seth Ward, published in June 1656.[320] Here Hobbes declared that the book had arisen from his 'consideration of what the Ministers before, and in the beginning of the Civill War, by their preaching and writing did contribute thereunto'. He had observed that those ministers' doctrines were taught in the universities, and had wished that the true 'civil doctrine'—his own—were taught there instead. Indeed, he boasted, he believed that his own doctrine had 'framed the minds of a thousand Gentlemen to a consciencious obedience to present Government, which otherwise would have wavered in that Point'.[321] As for forms of Church government, Hobbes responded here to criticisms of Leviathan with one of the pithiest statements of his own position:

> You that take so hainously that I would have the Rules of Gods Worship [i]n a Christian Common-wealth taken from the Laws, tell me, from whom would you have them taken? . . . From the Bishops? Right, if the Supreme Power of the Common-wealth will have it so; If not, why from them rather then from me? From a Consistory of Presbyters by themselves, or joyned with Lay-Elders, whom they may sway as they please? Good, If the Supreme Governour of the Common-wealth will have it so. If not, why from them, rather then from me, or from any man else? . . . Is there any man so very a fool as to subject himself to the Rules of other men in those things which so neerly concern himself, for the Title they assume of being wise and learned, unless they also have the sword which must protect them[?][322]

But in his next comments it might be said that Hobbes overplayed his hand: 'What luck have I, when this, of the Laws being the Rules of Gods publique worship, was by me said and applied to the Vindication of the Church of England from the Power of the Roman Clergy, it should be followed with such a storm from the Ministers Presbyterian and Episcopall of

[319] See above, at nn. 142, 147.
[320] For the dating see Correspondence, i, p. 296.
[321] Hobbes, Six Lessons, pp. 56–7 (EW vii, pp. 335–6).
[322] Hobbes, Six Lessons, p. 62 (EW vii, pp. 350–51).

the Church of England?'[323] That he had praised the English Reformation as at least a step in the right direction was true, and that he had written much more fiercely against the Roman Church (while, however, also accepting that a sovereign could appoint it to run his own Church) was also self-evident. But it seems that Hobbes had now gone further, persuading himself (or imagining that he could persuade others) that Leviathan was in some sense a positive defence of the English episcopalian settlement.

The next phase of Hobbes's defence of Leviathan came in 1662. On completing a book about natural philosophy, Problemata physica, in the spring of that year, he added to it a short dedicatory epistle to the King, in which he included what he called an 'Apologia' for Leviathan.[324] Here Hobbes wrote that the work originated 'at a time when the Kingdom of Christ was made a pretext for the most extreme crimes. So, rightfully indignant at the hypocrisy of those wicked men, I decided to examine as thoroughly as I could what the Holy Scriptures said about the Kingdom of God.'[325] Once again, he insisted that 'I wrote nothing against episcopacy, nor against any Protestant bishop.' But in several ways he indicated his awareness that the book was vulnerable to the charge that it had given support to the parliamentarian side. Twice he referred to the King's 'amnesty' (i.e., the Act of Oblivion); and he ended by saying that he hoped his readers would not to blame him 'if, fighting against your enemies, and seizing whatever weapons I could, I used one sword that had a double edge'.[326]

Hobbes's fullest account of the origins of Leviathan was written in the same year in a short book, Mr. Hobbes Considered, which he published in response to an attack on his personal record by John Wallis.[327] According to Wallis, Hobbes was guilty of 'deserting his Royal Master in distresse' in Paris, and of writing Leviathan 'in defense of Oliver's Title . . . Absolving all his Majesties Subjects from their Allegiance, when ever he is not in a present capacity to force Obedience'.[328] In reply, Hobbes wrote that he had

[323] Hobbes, Six Lessons, p. 62 (EW vii, p. 351).

[324] The dedicatory epistle was read at a meeting of the Royal Society on 19 [/29] Mar. 1662: Birch, ed., History of Royal Society, i, p. 78.

[325] Hobbes, Problemata physica, sig. A6v, 'illo tempore . . . quo Regnum Christi summis sceleribus praetendebatur. Jure ergo hypocrisim sceleratorum hominum indignatus, Scripturae Sacrae de Regno Dei quid dicerent, quantum potui penitissimè scrutari statui' (OL iv, p. 301). An English version of this work was published in 1682 (Seven Philosophical Problems), but the translation is rather free; William Crooke's statement that it was by Hobbes (EW vi, p. 164) is open to some doubt.

[326] Hobbes, Problemata physica, sig. A8r, 'si contra hostes tuos pugnans & quaecunque potui tela corripiens, gladio uno usus sum ancipite' (OL iv, p. 303).

[327] Wallis's book, Hobbius heauton-timorumenos, was written in the form of a letter, dated (p. 160) 20 Feb. [/2 Mar.] 1661/1662. Part of it was already printed by 30 Dec. 1661 [/9 Jan. 1662] (see Wallis, Correspondence, ii, pp. 47–8), so the completion of the printing probably took place very soon after 20 Feb. [/2 Mar.]. Hobbes's reply was written some time after 3 [/13] Mar. 1662: see Hobbes, Correspondence, ii, p. 526.

[328] Wallis, Hobbius heauton-timorumenos, p. 5.

taught Charles mathematics, and that (referring to himself in the third person) 'While upon this occasion he staid about Paris, and had neither encouragement nor desire to return into England, he wrote and published his Leviathan, far from the intention either of disadvantage to His Majesty, or to flatter Oliver, (who was not made Protector till three or four years after) or purpose to make way for his return.'[329] But Hobbes was clearly stung by the last part of Wallis's criticism, which apparently referred either to the statement in the 'Review, and Conclusion' that a subject ceases to be obliged to his former sovereign when 'he hath no longer Protection from him', or to the comment, at the end of that chapter, about 'the mutuall Relation between Protection and Obedience'.[330] Here Hobbes accused Wallis of taking him 'by the throat for a word in his Leviathan, made a fault by malicious or overhasty construction'. In defence of his argument about protection and obedience, Hobbes connected his work closely with the predicament of royalists under pressure to compound:

> For it was written in the behalf of those many and faithful Servants and Subjects of His Majesty, that had taken His part in the War, or otherwise done their utmost endeavour to defend His Majesties Right and Person against the Rebels; whereby, having no other means of Protection, nor (for the most part) of subsistence, were forced to compound with your Masters, and to promise Obedience for the saving of their Lives and Fortunes, which in his Book he hath affirmed they might lawfully do, and consequently not bear Arms against the Victors.[331]

Returning to this point a few pages later, Hobbes wrote that 'those words were put into his last Chapter, which he calls the Review' for the sake of those 'many Honourable Persons' whose estates were sequestered. 'They that Compounded, though they help'd the Parliament less by their Composition, than they should have done (if they had stood out) by their Confiscation', were nevertheless criticized at the time; so Hobbes wrote in their defence, saying that 'if they would compound, they were to do it bona fide, without intention of Treachery, Wherein he justified their Submission by their former Obedience, and present Necessity; but condemned Treachery.'[332]

There is an element of special pleading in these remarks. The original argument was not merely that they should 'not bear Arms against the Victors', but that they should actively 'protect in Warre' the authority that now protected them in peace; their submission was not justified there by reference [329] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, pp. 7–8 (EW iv, p. 415). Cromwell became Lord Protector in Dec. 1653, 2 years and 7 months after the publication of Leviathan.

[330] pp. 1134, 1141. Hobbes's response focused on the additional Law of Nature set out on p. 1133: see Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, pp. 21–2 (EW iv, pp. 421–2).

[331] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, pp. 18, 19–20 (EW iv, pp. 420–21).

[332] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, pp. 26–7 (EW iv, pp. 423–4).

to 'former Obedience'; the 'treachery' to which Hobbes now referred was treachery against their new ruler, not their old one.[333] And the revisionism of Hobbes's 1662 account became even more obvious when he added that his argument about the mutual relation of protection and obedience applied exclusively to those who had been obedient to their previous sovereign; only they, he now suggested, could qualify for protection by the new one.[334] These were the arguments Hobbes had now come up with to explain those awkward features of his work for which he had apologized to the King in his dedicatory epistle. It comes as no surprise, then, to find that in this book he also declared that 'he never wrote against Episcopacy; and it is his private opinion, That such an Episcopacy as is now in England, is the most commodious that a Christian King can use'.[335]

In 1668 Hobbes wrote a brief text, An Historical Narration concerning Heresie, in which he repeated his claim that Leviathan had been written as a royalist and pro-episcopalian (or, at least, not anti-episcopalian) work: 'And in this time it was, that a Book called Leviathan, was written in defence of the Kings Power, Temporal and Spiritual, without any word against Episcopacy, or against any Bishop, or against the publick Doctrine of the Church.'[336]

Finally, there are Hobbes's comments on the writing of Leviathan in the autobiographies he composed in the 1670s. Parts of these were cited above. The verse autobiography, as quoted there, implied that Hobbes wrote the book to oppose the theological justifications used by the rebels for their actions: 'being unwilling to allow so many foul crimes, of such magnitude, to be attributed to the commands of God'.[337] The prose autobiography, on the other hand, reverted to a general statement of Hobbes's political purposes:

> in that work he demonstrated, both from reasons and from the authority of the Holy Scripture, the right of kings, both spiritual and temporal, in such a way as to make it clear that there could never be a lasting peace in the Christian world unless either that doctrine of his was accepted, or a rather large army compelled the citizens to live in concord.

And, he added, 'he hoped that this work would not be unpleasing to his fellow citizens, especially, indeed, to those who supported bishops'.[338] Once again,

[333] p. 1133.

[334] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, pp. 24–5 (EW iv, pp. 421–2). A Hobbesian argument could be constructed along these lines, by analogy with the argument against the 'Foole' in Ch. 15 (p. 224); but there is no sign of Hobbes making it in the 'Review, and Conclusion'.

[335] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, pp. 43–4 (EW iv, p. 432).

[336] Hobbes, Historical Narration, p. 17 (EW iv, p. 407).

[337] See above, at n. 43.

[338] Hobbes, Thomae Hobbes angli vita, p. 7, 'In eo Opere Jus Regium, tum Spirituale, tum Temporale, ita demonstravit, tum Rationibus, tum Authoritate Scripturae Sacrae, ut perspicuum fecerit, Pacem in Orbe Christiano nusquam diuturnam esse posse, nisi vel doctrina illa sua recepta fuerit, vel satis magnus

there was more than a whiff of revisionism here: to say that he had not attacked episcopacy as such was one thing, but to suggest that he had written something especially congenial to supporters of the bishops was quite another.

Overall, then, these later comments tell us more about the neuralgic points on which Hobbes had suffered from attacks by his critics than about his original reasons for writing the book. Where the political argument was concerned, the 'Review, and Conclusion' was the main source of his difficulties. Here he made what use he could of the case of the compounding royalists, but he also felt obliged to construct a new argument in his defence; his simplest and truest response, however, was that his argument about protection and obedience was necessarily a double-edged sword. His desire to realign himself with episcopacy is understandable enough, especially after a Restoration which had brought many high Anglicans back to power. But there is perhaps one significant point that arises from these various accounts: the fact that in so many of them, Hobbes emphasized that he wrote to oppose 'ministers', or theological claims, and to defend the rights of the sovereign over the Church. This may of course be partly a reflection of the fact that so many of Hobbes's critics attacked his theology and his ecclesiology—and the fact that some of them were clerics themselves. But it probably does at the same time express a basic truth about the reasons for writing Leviathan. Hobbes's opposition to the 'Thing'—including pretences of inspiration, claims of divine right, and concealments of clerical interest—was clearly a fundamental motive force, and its presence is visible from the earliest chapters of the work onwards.

The Contemporaneous French Translation

Payne's report to Sheldon about the writing of Leviathan in May 1650 included one notable and puzzling detail: the statement that Hobbes's chapters 'are translated into French, by a learned french man, of good quality, as fast as he finishes them'.[339] No trace of this translation has survived, and no other reference to it is known. It might be tempting to suppose that Payne had misunderstood some reference that Hobbes had made to the fact that each chapter was being copied out by a learned Frenchman; for there is, as we shall see, strong evidence to suggest that the scribe who prepared the fair-copy manuscript of Leviathan was French (and, indeed, ignorant of English). But it is hard to think of the sort of phrasing that could have given rise to such a mistake; and Payne's statement, as it stands, is quite definite.

exercitus Cives ad concordiam compulerit; Opus, ut ille sperabat, concivibus suis, praesertim verò illis, qui ab Episcopis steterant, non ingratum' (OL i, pp. 15–16).

[339] See above, at n. 4.

It has already been suggested that a translation of the entire work would have been a risky thing to publish in France, as it could not have been licensed by the authorities. There was certainly some demand for Hobbes's work in France: Sorbière's French translation of De cive, published in 1649 in Amsterdam, had soon afterwards been issued in a pirated edition by a French printer.[340] A French version of the first two parts of Leviathan might have been a realistic publishing proposition (despite the comments on religion in Chapter 12); but Payne's report shows that the translation was proceeding well into Part 3 of the book. So it is more reasonable to suppose that Hobbes's learned Frenchman was producing a French version for manuscript circulation only—perhaps to be confined within a select circle of libertins érudits.[341]

Of Hobbes's French friends, only two are known to have had a good command of English. The strongest candidate is Charles du Bosc, who had lived in the second Earl of Devonshire's household for several years, gaining fluency in the English language and also becoming one of Hobbes's closest friends. A protégé of Mazarin and of the Queen (Anne of Austria, widow of Louis XIII), he performed services at Court which included translating English documents: in 1651, indeed, he was formally described as 'interpreter-secrétaire to the King [Louis XIV] in the English language'.[342] He was thus well placed, and well qualified, to translate Leviathan. However, in a letter to Hobbes in 1659 he would write that 'All y^{e} learned men I know desire that Leuiathan were in french or Latine', without making any reference to an existing translation of his own; so this identification must remain quite uncertain.[343]

The other candidate is Jean-Baptiste Lantin, a scholarly young littérateur from Dijon, who would go on to become a famous figure in the intellectual life of his native town.[344] His acquaintance with Hobbes in Paris is attested to in the collection of his remarks, 'Lantiniana', gathered by a friend at the end of Lantin's life, which includes the following: 'I saw much of Mr Hobbes, when he was in Paris; he had a profound knowledge of politics'; and 'Mr Hobbes composed his Leviathan in Paris. I saw him there in the old days;

[340] See Malcolm, Aspects, p. 463.

[341] Richard Tuck has suggested that the translation was made 'partly to contribute to the debates around the queen [sc. Henrietta Maria]' (Philosophy and Government, p. 332). But it is hard to imagine the Queen herself, a fairly devout Roman Catholic, reading much of the second half of the book.

[342] On du Bosc (d. 1659) see Correspondence, ii, pp. 795–7 (here p. 796). [343] Ibid., i, p. 504.

[344] On Lantin (1620–95) see Papillon, Bibliothèque, i, pp. 382–4; Bouchard, De l'humanisme, pp. 186–92 and passim.

he had lodgings on the pont Saint-Michel.'[345] After extensive travels as a young man, Lantin spent some time living in Paris making many contacts with writers and philosophers; he returned to Dijon during the course of 1650 (the precise date is not known) to pursue a career as a lawyer, first as a conseiller des requêtes at the Palais de Justice and then as a conseiller at the Parlement.[346] It is thus chronologically possible that he had been visiting Hobbes in the months preceding Payne's report. There is also a tantalizing letter from Lantin to Nicolas Perrot d'Ablancourt, in which, discussing translations of Thucydides, Lantin writes:

> There is an English one, by the famous Hobbes; I am translating a work by him at the moment, as I wrote to you earlier. I shall take steps to obtain this translation [sc. Hobbes's Thucydides], which, according to my opinion, must be better than all the others that have been seen up until now; for he is a very clever man. I understand English well enough to read it with pleasure.[347]

This is tantalizing because the original letter is no longer extant, and the eighteenth-century editor who printed it omitted the date. There are, however, reasons for thinking that it was written not in 1650 but in 1655 or later. It refers to Perrot d'Ablancourt's nephew as finding pleasant ways of occupying himself 'on his frontier'; the person in question had an official position on the Ardennes frontier from 1655 to 1663.[348] And according to Lantin's early biographer, Lantin learned English in the space of a single Lent, studying each day only in the late morning 'after his return from the Palais [de Justice]'—which implies that this occurred after he had started working in Dijon in 1650.[349]

[345] BN, MS fr. 23253, fos. 89r ('iay fort uu monsieur hobbes, lorsquil estoit a paris, il auoit une profonde conoissance de la politique'), 141r ('m.r Hobbes a composé son Leuiatan a paris. ie ly ay uu autrefois. il logeoit sur le pont S. michel'); Bibliothèque Municipale de Dijon, MS 962, fos. 189v, 203r. A slightly altered version of this text is printed in Joly, Remarques critiques, ii, p. 434. On the compilation of the text, by Pierre Legouz or Legoux, see Papillon, Bibliothèque, i, p. 406.

[346] Papillon lists his friends in Paris (including Roberval), and states that he returned to Dijon in 1650 and entered the Parlement in 1652 (Bibliothèque, i, p. 382). Pintard notes that he also frequented the cabinet of the brothers Dupuy in Paris (Libertinage érudit, p. 94), and Bouchard says that he very often went back to Paris (De l'humanisme, p. 189).

[347] Michault, Mélanges, i, p. 359: 'Il y en a une Angloise, qui est de cet illustre Hobbès dont je traduis maintenant un ouvrage, ainsi que je vous ai écrit. Je ferai ensorte d'avoir cette Traduction qui, suivant ce que je pense, doit être meilleure que toutes les autres qu'on a vûes jusqu'à présent: car il est très-habile homme. J'entens assés l'Anglois pour la lire avec plaisir.' Perrot d'Ablancourt's own translation of Thucydides was published in 1662.

[348] Ibid.: 'J'apprens avec joie que M. de Fremont trouve en sa frontière de quoi s'occuper à son gré.' This was Jean Jacobé de Frémont d'Ablancourt (1621–96), the nephew and heir of Perrot d'Ablancourt; he later served in Portugal. See de Frémont d'Ablancourt (attrib.), Mémoires, p. 127, and Balteau, 'Ablancourt', col. 148.

[349] Papillon, Bibliothèque, i, p. 382: 'après son retour du Palais'. Given Lantin's strong interests in mathematics and natural philosophy, it may be that when he wrote this letter he was translating De corpore. However, the possibility of an attempt to translate Leviathan cannot be excluded: we know that in 1659 Charles du Bosc sent a copy of that book to Lantin (see Hobbes, Correspondence, i, p. 504).

If the person making the contemporaneous translation of Leviathan in 1650 was Charles du Bosc, there is no doubt that both he and the circles in which he moved would have had some interest in an English analysis of what caused the 'dissolution of a commonwealth'. For while Hobbes was preparing and writing his text, France underwent its own political convulsions, first with the 'revolt of the judges' in Paris in 1648, then with the siege of Paris by the royal army in January 1649, and then, one year later, with noble revolts in several parts of France following the coup d'état carried out by Mazarin and the Queen against their own military commander, the prince de Condé. Mazarin and other members of the French administration were keenly aware that what had happened in England in the early 1640s might form a pattern which events in France would follow; the Parisian judges also considered English precedents, and in February 1649, after the execution of Charles I, they strove to demonstrate that they were not like the English republicans by granting a pension to Henrietta Maria (who was still with them in the besieged city).[350] Yet if the French had political reasons to be interested in Hobbes's book, one of the remarkable things about that book—a political treatise written in France—is the lack of interest it shows in French politics. One might expect, for example, that the discussion in Chapter 19 of the problems that may arise during the minority of a king would show some signs that Hobbes was thinking about the regency of Anne of Austria during the minority of Louis XIV. But the discussion there concentrates mainly on the question of the appointment of a child-king's 'tutor' or guardian, containing, at most, just one general statement that might be taken to reflect Hobbes's view of the Fronde: 'So that sufficient provision being taken, against all just quarrell, about the Government under a Child, if any contention arise to the disturbance of the publique Peace, it is not to be attributed to the forme of Monarchy, but to the ambition of Subjects, and ignorance of their Duty.'[351] One other very glancing reference to the Frondeurs may perhaps be found in Chapter 26, where Hobbes comments on the idea of 'verifying' the sovereign's laws; it was a central argument of the hard-liners among the Parisian parlementaires in 1649–50 that royal laws had to be 'verified' by the Parlement in order to take effect, and Hobbes's dismissive remarks about the difference between authorizing and verifying (in his own very limited sense of the term) seem to be directed against such a claim.[352] There are, in any case, no signs that Hobbes's arguments were influenced by the anti-[350] See Knachel, England and the Fronde; Moote, Revolt of the Judges, pp. 168, 184, 194–5.

[351] p. 292. This hardly goes beyond the points previously made in De cive X.16.

[352] See p. 426; cf. Hurt, Louis XIV and the Parlements, pp. 2–11, 16 (n. 33). One other passage in Ch. 26 may perhaps have a French origin: when (on p. 420) Hobbes criticizes the claim 'that the two arms of a Common-wealth, are Force, and Justice; the first whereof is in the King; the other deposited in the hands of the Fronde publications of 1649–50; but these were little more than occasional pamphlets, deploying moral and religious commonplaces (against civil war, for obedience as a religious duty, and so on).[353] Exploring Hobbes's treatise would indeed have been a refreshing experience for a French reader, as it differed so fundamentally from these.

The Year of Publication

An entry in the Stationers' Register for 20 [/30] January 1651, against the name 'M^r^ Crooke', records: 'Entred for his Copy vnder the hands of m^r^ Downam & m^r^ Stephens warden A tract called Leviathan or the matter forme generation & power of a Common wealth Ciuill & Christian. By Tho: Hobbes of malmesbury. reseruing euery mans right.'[354] This entry had two quite different functions: recording that the book was officially licensed, and registering with the Stationers' Company the copyright of the work. The first name in this entry was that of the licenser, John Downham or Downame, a celebrated godly preacher and theologian, who had been one of the twelve men appointed as official licensers of divinity books by the Ordinance for the Regulating of Printing of 1643. (Whether Leviathan could be straightforwardly categorized as a divinity book might be wondered at; but the categories set out in the 1643 Ordinance did not include 'politics' or 'civil science', and licensers of divinity books did in practice deal with books on many other subjects.)[355] Downham was now in his 80th year, and had already retired, apparently on the grounds that he was incapacitated by old age, from his prominent lectureship in London.[356] Possibly the book had been passed to him by the publisher on the grounds that he was the licenser least likely to give it a critical scrutiny; and the fact that he had passed the English translation of De cive just six weeks earlier might also have seemed a good omen.[357] However the business was managed, it may be doubted whether John Down-Parlament', it is possible that his target was a radical claim about the Paris Parlement. But the text he was attacking has not been identified.

[353] See the list in Doolin, Fronde, pp. 170–72. (Here and there, these works do of course express some views that connect with larger theoretical arguments, even though systematic statements of those arguments are not given; see the valuable study by Hubert Carrier, Le Labyrinthe de l'état.) The comment made here is based on a fruitless study of many of these works.

[354] SC, Liber E, Register book, 1645–57 (reel 4), p. 205; printed in Eyre, ed., Transcript, i, p. 358.

[355] See Seaver, 'Downham'; Firth and Rait, eds., Acts and Ordinances, i, pp. 186–7. In the previous six months Downham had licensed books on Latin grammar, trade, the rebellion in Barbados, distilling, and architecture (Eyre, ed., Transcript, i, pp. 350–55).

[356] Whitney, 'London Puritanism', pp. 310–11.

[357] Eyre, ed., Transcript, i, p. 354.

ham had read more than a very small sample of the text.[358] He appears, in any case, to have been a remarkably lax licenser, who paid little attention to the contents of the works he licensed: over the years he had given his permission for the publication of such things as Milton's second divorce tract, a translation of a Socinian theological text, a translation of the Koran (for which he was called before the Council of State), and the collection of royal letters The Papers which passed at New-castle betwixt His Sacred Majesty and Mr Alexander Henderson concerning the Change of Church-Government (which the Council of State also investigated).[359]

The second name in the entry was that of Philemon Stephens, the Warden of the Stationers' Company. An experienced bookseller, he had been a freeman of the Company since 1620; his own publications consisted mostly of sermons, commentaries, theological treatises, and homiletic works by mainstream Puritan divines.[360] His role was not to read the book and approve its contents (though the registering of a work with the Stationers' Company could sometimes—for example, in the case of a seditious book—have consequences for the Company), but merely to allow the copyright, which was unproblematic when the work was a new composition that had never been registered before. As for the publisher, Andrew Crooke, he was also an experienced bookseller, and had been a freeman of the Company since 1629; his own list of publications included many sermons and religious texts, as well as dictionaries, works of literature and belles-lettres (he published the first, pirated edition of Sir Thomas Browne's Religio medici, as well as John Earles's Microcosmographie), and plays. Hobbes's Briefe of the Art of Rhetorique had been printed by Crooke in 1637, so it seems very likely that Hobbes had enjoyed personal contacts with the bookseller before leaving England in 1640.[361] But his dealings with Crooke over the publication of Leviathan have left no documentary trace.

Officially, the complete manuscript of a work had to be submitted in order for it to be entered in the Register; in practice, that rule may not always have been observed. But we can assume that by this stage Crooke was in posses-

[358] Cf. the comments on the 'strategy by which one could obtain a license for a questionable book' in Johns, Nature of the Book, pp. 238–9.

[359] Masson, Life of Milton, iii, pp. 255, 272; iv, pp. 88, 149; 'G. M.' [Crellius, tr. attrib. Lushington; but cf. Huntley, 'Lushington', pp. 19–22], Expiation of a Sinner (1646); Alcoran of Mahomet (1649); CSPD 1649–50, p. 59; Charles I and Henderson, Papers (1649). On the last of these see Madan, New Bibliography of Eikon Basilike, p. 97.

[360] On Stephens (d. 1670) see Plomer, Dictionary, 1641 to 1667, p. 172; McKenzie and Bell, Chronology, i, p. 295. For a catalogue of 90 works sold at his shop in 1654 see Trapp, Commentary, sig. a2r–v.

[361] When Hobbes referred, in a letter to Sorbière in Mar. 1647, to 'a certain London bookseller, who is a friend of mine' ('Bibliopolam quemdam Londiniensem Amicum meum'), this was presumably a reference to Crooke (Correspondence, i, pp. 156, 158).

sion of the complete manuscript of the work, given the speed with which it was subsequently printed. (It also seems that, as will be explained in the Textual Introduction, he employed two printers concurrently; it would have been difficult to plan this efficiently if he had still been waiting for some of the copy to come in.) By mid-April 1651 the work was almost finished, and only the very last sheets (including, in accordance with normal practice, the first quire of the book, sig. A), remained to be printed.

It was at this point that Sir Edward Hyde returned to Paris from Spain, and had the conversation with Hobbes in which, as he later recalled, the latter expressed his desire to 'go home'. Hyde arrived in Paris on [12/] 22 April, in great pain from an attack of gout; he forced himself to his feet on [14/] 24 April to visit Henrietta Maria, but then returned to bed in his lodgings, where he remained for the rest of the month.[362] It was there that, as he later recalled, Hobbes 'frequently came to me, and told me his Book (which he would call Leviathan) was then Printing in England, and that he receiv'd every week a Sheet to correct, of which he shewed me one or two Sheets, and thought it would be finished within little more then a moneth'. Hobbes also showed Hyde 'the Epistle to Mr. Godolphin which he meant to set before it', and read it to him.[363] The fruit of Hobbes's work correcting the sheets would be the list of errata printed in the initial quire of the book; and the letter to Godolphin was the dedicatory epistle, also printed there, and dated 15/25 April.

Hyde had in fact played a key role in the chain of events that led to this choice of dedicatee on Hobbes's part. In the 1630s Hobbes had been a close friend of Sidney Godolphin, whom he had probably got to know through two interconnected groups: the 'Great Tew' circle, and the friends and followers of Ben Jonson. Born in 1610, the son of a rich Cornish landowner (Sir William Godolphin of Godolphin), Sidney Godolphin was a poet and courtier, an MP—of unwavering royalist principles—and finally a soldier in the Civil War; he was killed in an ambush in 1643.[364] In his will he named his elder brother Francis executor, and made him his main beneficiary; he also specified a bequest of 'two hundred pounds to my worthie freind M^r^ Thomas Hobbs'. Probate was first obtained in royalist Oxford in March 1643; but the process had to be repeated at the hands of the parliamentary authorities after the end of the first Civil War, in January [/February] 1647.[365] Hyde, [362] Bodl., MS Clarendon 42, fos. 52r (Hyde to Nicholas, [19/] 29 Apr. 1651); 56r (Hyde to Nicholas, 2/12 May 1651, expressing the hope that he would be able to leave for Brussels 'within a weeke').

[363] Hyde, Brief View and Survey, p. 7.

[364] See Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, p. 365; ii, p. 275; Coate, Cornwall in the Great Civil War, pp. 32, 47–8, 52; Duffin, Faction and Faith, pp. 168–9, 180, 183–4; Duffin, 'Godolphin'.

[365] Duffin, 'Godolphin'; TNA, PROB 11/199, fo. 42v (probate: 29 Jan. [/8 Feb.] 1647).

who had already been informed about the legacy by Francis Godolphin himself, wrote from his safe haven in Jersey to John Earles in Paris on 1 [/11] January 1647: 'I pray remember my seruice to M^r^. Hobbs by y^e^ same token y^t^ Syd. Godolphin hath left to him by his Will a Legacy of 200.^li^ and desire him for old acquaintance sake, and for your intercession, to bestow one of his Bookes upon mee.'[366] (The information was perhaps offered as a sweetener; Hobbes would have suspected, rightly, that Hyde wanted to see a copy of De cive only for critical and hostile purposes.) Hobbes evidently responded, via Earles, by asking if Hyde were sure of his facts; for a later letter from Hyde to Earles, dated 12 [/22] February, contained the following reassurance and advice:

> Assure M^r^. Hobbs y^t^. the grounds I haue for y^e^ Intelligence I sent him concerning his Legacy, are such as hee may build upon, hee not being surer y^t^. I haue sent him such Intelligence, then I am y^t^. it is true. but aduise him to haue a little patience before hee attempts by any way to procure it, hee being I presume not soe free from y^e^ reputacon of a delinquent, as to bee sure it may not bee asked by [any del.] an Informer as a forfeiture, and I being not yet soe well satisfyed in Franck Godolphins Conscience and Hono^r^. but y^t^ hee may chuse rather to pay 2. parts of it to the Parliam^t^. then y^e^ whole to him, as soone as the last is cleare, I shall bee able possibly to doe him as much seruice as any man: I pray returne my seruice and thankes to him for his Booke, w^ch^. I will read as soone as I receiue it.[367]

And in a further letter to Earles, written on 16 [/26] March, Hyde added the comment: 'I doe not remember I sayd anything to you amisse positiuely of Fr: Godolphin . . . yet I cannot but suspend y^t^. confidence I had in M.^r^ Godolphins integrity, till I heare more, and soe long M^r^. Hobbs shall doe well to suspend the exspectation of his Legacy.'[368]

If Francis Godolphin had denounced Hobbes to the authorities as a 'delinquent', he could indeed have retained the legacy, on payment of 'two parts' (tenths, or fifteenths) as a fine. Hyde may have distrusted Sidney's brother because he was aware that he had been a much less fervent royalist than Sidney himself.[369] Or this may have been just a personal judgement, based on recent experience of his character and behaviour: Francis Godolphin had been civil governor of the Scilly Isles, where Hyde had spent six weeks with Prince Charles in March–April 1646, and he had travelled with Hyde and the Prince to Jersey at the end of that period. At some point thereafter Godolphin returned to Cornwall; he was arrested and imprisoned in [366] Bodl., MS Clarendon 29, fo. 45r; Hyde, Brief View and Survey, p. 7: 'Francis Godolphin (who in truth had told me of it)'.

[367] Bodl., MS Clarendon 29, fo. 101r. [368] Ibid., fo. 148r.

[369] Duffin, Faction and Faith, pp. 168, 182, 199–200.

May 1650, despite having promised to do 'nothing preiudiciall to the State', but was released in late December of that year.[370]

In his later book Hyde gave a detailed and accurate description of his correspondence with Hobbes about the legacy, and added that when he saw Hobbes in the late summer of 1649 (before his departure for Spain), Hobbes 'told me that Mr. Godolphin confessed the Legacy, and had paid him one hundred pounds, and promised to pay the other in a short time; for all which he thank'd me, and said he owed it to me, for he had never otherwise known of it'.[371] Hence—as a delicate and honorific reminder—the dedicatory epistle of Leviathan, with its coded reference to the bequest ('Your most worthy Brother M^r^ Sidney Godolphin, when he lived, was pleas'd to think my studies something, and otherwise to oblige me, as you know, with reall testimonies of his good opinion'), and, at the same time, its admission that Hobbes was personally unknown to the dedicatee ('I . . . have presum'd . . . to assume the Title (without your knowledge) of being . . . Your most humble, and most obedient servant').[372] The evidence suggests that Hobbes's decision to dedicate the work to Francis Godolphin was made at a very late stage, after the writing of the 'Review, and Conclusion' (which seems partly to duplicate the work of the dedicatory epistle, with its own eulogy of Sidney Godolphin). The fact that Hobbes read the epistle to Hyde also suggests that he was making some final stylistic adjustments to it; so it was probably sent to London on or very soon after 15/25 April, the date which it bears. On receipt of it, and of the errata, Crooke was at last able to print the initial quire of the book; he then began to distribute the work to other booksellers. On 6 [/16] May Robert Payne wrote to Sheldon: 'I am advertised from Oxf. y^t^ M^r^ Hobbes's booke is printed & come thither. he calls it Leviathan.'[373]

With the work now published in England, there was, on the face of it, no reason why Hobbes should not fulfil his desire to 'go home'. And yet he did not do so until the very end of the year. The reasons for this delay are not clear. It was suggested above that his plans had always been conditional on the establishment of complete peace and security; perhaps the fact that Charles had not accepted defeat after Dunbar, but was continuing to re-[370] Coate, Cornwall in the Great Civil War, pp. 214, 254; Marsh, Godolphins, p. 8; Folger Shakespeare Library, MSS X.d.483 (75) (Godolphin to Col. Robert Bennet, 17 [/27] Dec. 1650; quotation) and X.d.483 (78) (Godolphin to Bennet, 24 Dec. 1650 [/3 Jan. 1651], expressing thanks for his release).

[371] Hyde, Brief View and Survey, p. 7.

[372] pp. 4–6. Whether the second half of the legacy was ever paid is, however, uncertain. Aubrey, who knew Hobbes well in later years, twice recorded Hobbes's statement to him that he had received a legacy of 'an hundred poundes': 'Brief Lives', i, pp. 365, 371. But Hobbes's verse autobiography says that he received two hundred: Chatsworth, MS Hobbes A. 6, l. 253 ('ducentae'); Hobbes, Thomae Hobbesii malmesburiensis vita, p. 14 (OL i, p. xcviii).

[373] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 132.

cruit an army in Scotland (despite all his mounting political difficulties with the Covenanters), made Hobbes pause. And once news came of Charles's march southwards in July/August, and of the subsequent campaign on English soil, he would certainly not have wanted to move to England until the conflict had been brought to an end. Gui Patin's letter, briefly quoted above, shows that in August Hobbes was in the grip of a serious illness (the symptoms included 'a hard [i.e., distended] belly, colic, vomiting, and pains so severe that he wanted to kill himself'); but, as we have seen, it also demonstrates that he was intending to return to England.[374] When news reached Paris of Charles's crushing defeat at Worcester on 3/13 September 1651, Hobbes may still have been recuperating from his illness—though he had recovered sufficiently to receive John Evelyn as a guest in his lodgings on [28 August/] 7 September.[375] For a month after the battle there was no information whatsoever about Charles's fate; that he could survive as a solitary fugitive and make his own way back to France, as he did, would have seemed highly unlikely. So his return (on 20/30 October) must have surprised Hobbes as much as it surprised everyone else.[376]

Hobbes now found himself in an awkward situation. The Anglican clergy in Paris had not ceased criticizing the pragmatic political principles that underlay the Scottish alliance, acceptance of the Engagement, or indeed the practice of compounding: as John Cosin had exclaimed in a sermon in March 1651, 'I ask, first, what evil may not this produce; if any evil may be done or permitted, that any good may come of it . . . For was it lawful for them in the wilderness to run back again into the bondage of Egypt that they might keep themselves from starving? It was one of the devil's suggestions.'[377] Once copies of Leviathan were available, with its explicit statement of such principles and its many other objectionable (and, to the clergy, deeply offensive) features, Hobbes must have become even more of a target. A first taste of this sort of reaction came from Sir Edward Hyde, who read the book within a month of its publication and sent word, via Sir Charles Cavendish, that Hobbes deserved to be 'punish'd in the highest degree, and with the most severe penalties'.[378] In early September Richard Steward preached a sermon on Matt. 5: 10 ('Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake') in which he praised those who 'haue forsaken all for a Loyall and a laudable cause', and then added what looks very much like an attack on Hobbes:

[374] Patin, Lettres, ii, pp. 593–4: 'ventre dur, tranchées, vomissements, avec de telles douleurs qu'il avoit voulu se tuer'; and see above, at n. 312. [375] Evelyn, Diary, iii, p. 41.

[376] News of his escape preceded him by only one day: ibid., p. 47.

[377] Cosin, Works, i, p. 245 ([16/] 26 Mar. 1651). Cosin alludes to Rom. 3: 8, where St Paul denounces those who say 'Let us do evil, that good may come'—a key text used by opponents of the Engagement.

[378] Hyde, Brief View and Survey, p. 8.

There are some ready to reproach all this yet but as a meere peevishnesse of ours: but those are such onely who defend all their late, and new designes with that doctrine of Deuill, That a Princ is no longer to be obeyed, then he is able to protect his people, and that the duty being reciprocal, when the one is interrupted or dissabled, the other doth (ipso facto) cease: But what euer they say, sure we are that the spirit of God himselfe more then once calleth Dauid King of Israel; when he had as little to shew for it, as any that haue lately bin beaten out of theirs . . . Sure it is, Dauid was at that tyme so far from being able to afford protection to others, that he was forced to seeke it for himselfe, and that in a strang Kingdom as we doe at this day . . . The same persons tell us and give it out, That Oathes are no longer obligatorie then they conduce to selfe preservation: but the same King likewise says . . . That he who doth not keepe his oath, shall neuer come to see the Hill of the Lord[379]

Despite the overwhelming defeat in England, Charles's return to Paris put a new spring in the step of the Anglican clergy there, who knew that the whole policy of the alliance with the Covenanters was now at an end. Within days, Hyde was able to report to Nicholas that Richard Steward had had 'a prety discourse . . . with the Kinge, which pleased me very well, so that whatsoeuer your Politique frends at the Hague haue designed, I suppose ther is no more daunger of Presbytery', and on [26 October/] 5 November Steward preached a sermon 'shewing the extraordinary care which God has of his Church'.[380] Richard Steward himself was suffering, however, from a terminal illness, and eleven days later he was dead.[381] It was suggested above that in early 1649 Steward had played a role in setting Charles against Hobbes, perhaps by refusing him the privilege of direct communication with him. If that is the case, Steward now had a further, posthumous, victory: at some time during the next five weeks, Hobbes was formally banned from Charles's court. Exactly what happened here is not clear, but it seems that what moved Hobbes's enemies to persuade the King to do this was the fact that Hobbes had just sent the fair-copy manuscript of Leviathan to Charles himself.[382]

This was, in the circumstances, a bold move on Hobbes's part. It testified both to his desire to pay honour to his former pupil (giving a special manuscript copy, made on vellum, of a printed book was an old-fashioned and quite extravagant way of making a presentation of a work), and to his willingness to stand by what he had written—which, in the manuscript, [379] BL, MS Add. 78364, fo. 22r ([31 Aug./] 10 Sept. 1651). This is from a set of notes on sermons compiled by John Evelyn: see the valuable account in Raylor, 'Anglican Attack on Hobbes'. Steward had returned to Paris by late Aug. 1651 (Eton College, MS Coll/P14/406/8, letter of [20/] 30 Aug., from Paris).

[380] Bodl., MS Clarendon 42, fo. 190r, [29 Oct./] 8 Nov. 1651; Evelyn, Diary, iii, p. 47.

[381] Evelyn, Diary, iii, p. 48.

[382] Hyde, Brief View and Survey, p. 8: 'which he had presented, engross'd in Vellam in a marvellous fair hand, to the King'. This suggests that Hobbes did so in person; but the detailed report in Mercurius politicus (cited below) implies otherwise.

did include the full text of the 'Review, and Conclusion'. If the argument sketched above is correct, Hobbes had originally intended to present the work to Charles; but it may be doubted whether he had still had that intention by late 1650, when he was planning to have the book published in London, and when he wrote the 'Review, and Conclusion'. At that stage, it has been suggested, after the crushing defeat at Dunbar, Hobbes had written off Charles's chances of regaining his English throne.[383] There would seem to be three possibilities here. Either the fair-copy manuscript had been begun at a much earlier stage, with sections of the work being copied as they were completed; or the manuscript was made in late 1650, but not with Charles as its intended recipient; or the manuscript was made at that late stage and Charles was still the person aimed at, but with the idea that the manuscript would be given to him only in the unlikely event that there was a revival of his fortunes. The last of these scenarios seems the least plausible. The second could be combined with the fact that Hobbes had had a similar vellum manuscript made of De cive, for presentation to the Earl of Devonshire, to suggest that the Earl was also, originally, the intended recipient of the vellum Leviathan.[384] But the first remains a distinct possibility, and the many small differences between the manuscript and the printed text do tend to suggest that a final revision of the version sent off to the printers took place some time after the presentation manuscript had been completed.[385] Tantalizingly, the manuscript has only a stub where the leaf containing the dedicatory epistle should be.[386] Whether it originally contained an epistle to Charles (which Hobbes had had removed once he came to the conclusion that Charles would not regain his throne, and which he did not have time to reinstate before presenting him with the manuscript), or whether it contained an epistle to someone else (added perhaps at quite a late stage, and removed just before the presentation of the manuscript to Charles) can only be guessed at.

The link between the gift of the manuscript and the banning of Hobbes from court is supplied by a detailed account, apparently from a well-informed source in Paris, printed in Marchamont Nedham's newsbook Mercurius politicus in January 1652:

[383] This point calls for some qualification of the thesis of Sarasohn, 'Was Leviathan a Patronage Artifact?', which argues that the manuscript was always intended for Charles, and that the work was not dedicated to him only to avoid causing him embarrassment.

[384] The vellum manuscript of De cive (made by the same scribe as the fair-copy Leviathan) is Chatsworth, MS Hobbes A. 3.

[385] On the differences see the comments below, pp. 202–5; this last point is not conclusive, but it seems likely that if, on completing the work, Hobbes knew that he was going to go through it again and make changes, he would have done that before commissioning the copyist of the fair copy, if that fair copy had not already been undertaken. But on the other hand he might have been reluctant to incur any delay at that stage.

[386] See below, p. 198.

M. Hobbs (he that wrote the Book of Common-wealth) sent one of his Books as a Present to the King of Scots, which he accepted, in regard he had formerly been his Tutor in the Mathematicks; but being afterward informed by some of his Priests, that the Book did not only contain many Principles of Atheism and grosse Imp[ie]ty . . . but also such as were prejudicial to the Church, and reflected dangerously upon the Majesty of Soveraign Princes, therefore when M. Hobbs came to make a tender of his service to him in person, he was rejected, and word brought him by the Marquiss of Ormond, that the King would not admit him.[387]

Describing this episode in his prose autobiography, Hobbes put all the emphasis on the clergy: 'In 1651 a number of copies of that book, recently published in London, were sent into France, where certain English theologians denounced some of the doctrines contained in that book as both heretical and hostile to the royal side; and, indeed, those calumnies prevailed for some time—so much so, that he was banned from the royal household.'[388] The identity of the clergymen who finally prevailed on Charles II (presumably, after Steward's death) is not clear, though it is noteworthy that John Bramhall had returned to Paris by December 1651.[389] Hobbes actually gave a copy of Leviathan to John Cosin; but whether that should be taken as proof of mutual good feelings, or whether it was a misjudgement that may have proved painfully counterproductive, is not known.[390] Corresponding with Hyde in January 1652, Edward Nicholas (who was at The Hague) wrote that he had heard that 'you and other episcopal men' were the main cause of the ban, but that he had also been told that 'Wat. Montagu and other Papists' were responsible.[391] In reply, Hyde assured him that 'I had indeede some hand in the discountenancing my old freind M.r Hobbs', and that the Catholics around the Queen had played no part in it.[392] Nicholas had probably confused two separate developments: the banning of Hobbes from Charles's presence, [387] Mercurius politicus, no. 84 (8 [/18]–15 [/25] Jan. 1651), p. 1344.

[388] Hobbes, Thomae Hobbes angli vita, pp. 9–10, 'Anno 1651 Exemplaria aliquot illius Libri, Londini recens editi, in Galliam transmissa sunt; ubi Theologi quidam Angli Doctrinas quasdam in illo Libro contentas, tum ut Haereticas, tum ut partibus Regiis adversas criminati sunt; & valuere quidem aliquandiu calumniae illae, in tantum, ut domo Regiâ prohibitus fuerit' (OL i, pp. xvi–xvii). The verse autobiography gives a similar account, saying that he was accused by clerics ('Scholaribus') of approving the wicked deeds of Cromwell and justifying wrongdoing ('si facta probarem | Impia Crumwelli, Jus scelerique darem'): Chatsworth, MS Hobbes A. 6, ll. 221, 223–4; Hobbes, Thomae Hobbesii malmesburiensis vita, p. 9 (OL i, p. xciii).

[389] Jackson, Hobbes, Bramhall, pp. 175–6.

[390] Cosin's large-paper copy is in Durham University Library, pressmark Cosin T.1.12. That this was a gift from Hobbes may be assumed (see below, p. 224); that the gift was made during 1651 is uncertain, though there is some evidence to suggest that Hobbes discussed the theology of Leviathan with Cosin in Paris (see below, p. 157). In his sermon on Christmas Day 1651, shortly after Hobbes's departure, Cosin commented on the inadequacy of natural reason, which is admired by the gullible (Works, i, pp. 287–9).

[391] Warner, ed., Nicholas Papers, i, 285 (8/18 Jan. 1652).

[392] Bodl., MS Clarendon 42, fo. 316v (17/27 Jan. 1652).

and a denunciation of him by Roman Catholics to the French ecclesiastical authorities, which generated the fear that he was about to be arrested. In the account he published in 1662 Hobbes wrote that he left Paris 'because he would not trust his safety with the French Clergy'; and in his prose autobiography he explained that 'deprived of royal protection, and fearing that he would be ill-treated by the Roman Catholic clergy, whom he had particularly offended, he was forced to take refuge in England'.[393] Edward Hyde, who arrived in the French capital on [15/] 25 December, learned that Hobbes had left 'a few daies before', having been 'compell'd secretly to fly out of Paris, the Justice having endeavour'd to apprehend him'.[394]

On his arrival in London Hobbes made a formal submission to the authorities; unfortunately no records of this meeting have survived, so it cannot be stated with certainty that he took the Engagement. Hobbes's own statement, in his verse autobiography, was simply that 'When I came to London it was necessary that I be reconciled to the Council of State, so that I should not seem to have come secretly.'[395] For, as he had explained in the 'Review, and Conclusion', someone who lived 'secretly' in a country could be treated as 'a Spie, and Enemy of the State', and an act of submission was required on the part of someone in Hobbes's position: 'if a man, when his Country is conquered, be out of it, he is not Conquered, nor Subject: but if at his return, he submit to the Government, he is bound to obey it.'[396] It seems that Hobbes's submission was not only accepted, but positively welcomed. One month later, Edward Nicholas wrote from The Hague to his friend Lord Hatton in Paris that 'Mr. Hobbes is at London much caressed, as one that hath by his writings justified the reasonableness and righteousness of their arms and actions.'[397] Nicholas's comment was quite unfair: the 'arms and actions' of the rebels were precisely not what Hobbes's theory had justified. But he had provided a justification for submitting to their rule; and that, in the circumstances, was enough.

[393] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, p. 8 (EW iv, p. 415); Hobbes, Thomae Hobbes angli vita, p. 10, 'ut protectione Regiâ destitutus, metuénsque ne à Clericis Romanis, quos praecipuè laeserat, malè tractaretur, in Angliam coactus sit refugere' (OL i, p. xvii).

[394] Bodl., MS Clarendon 42, fo. 264r, Hyde to Nicholas, [20/] 30 Dec.; Hyde, Brief View and Survey, pp. 8–9. When Lodewijk Huygens visited Hobbes in London in Feb. 1652 he described him in his diary as having been 'dismissed from [or: 'denied permission to stay in'] France on account of his strange theses in his book, which he calls Leviathan' (Huygens, English Journal, p. 218: 'dewelcke Vranckrijck ontseijt sijnde na sijne wonderlijcke soustenuen in sijn boeck dat hij Leviathan naemt').

[395] Chatsworth, MS A. 6, ll. 235–6, 'Londinum veniens, ne clam venisse viderer | Concilio Statûs conciliandus eram'; Hobbes, Thomas Hobbesii malmesburiensis vita, p. 9 (OL i, p. xciii).

[396] p. 1135. That Hobbes took the trouble to specify this in the 'Review, and Conclusion' may also be taken as an indication of his personal intentions at that time.

[397] Warner, ed., Nicholas Papers, i, pp. 286–7, 12/22 Feb. 1652.

2

SOME FEATURES OF THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN

Materials used in the Composition of Leviathan

This section of the Introduction is concerned with some features of the book (that is, the English Leviathan) itself: Hobbes's use of other materials while writing it; his choice of the term 'Leviathan' for the title; the design of the famous engraved title page; and the table, representing the division of the sciences, which forms part of Chapter 9.

The extensive use Hobbes made of De cive while composing Leviathan has already been discussed; this text bears a closer relation to Leviathan than any other, and was clearly present on his desk.[1] The case of The Elements of Law is, however, much more problematic. On the one hand, the overall development of the argument in Chapters 1–10 of Leviathan does match quite definitely that of Part I, Chapters i–xi of The Elements of Law: most of the same topics are covered, and many of the same philosophical claims are repeated. (Even at this level of comparison, though, there are some significant differences, with jumps and switches in the sequence.)[2] On the other hand, a comparison of Hobbes's handlings of any particular topic will show many divergences in phrasing, ordering, and argumentation. Thus, for example, when Elements I.iv considers 'discourse of the mind', to which it gives the technical name 'discursion', it discusses a type of systematic searching which it calls 'ranging' (examples being 'a man's casting his eye upon the ground, to look about for some small thing lost; the hounds casting about at a fault in hunting; and the ranging of spaniels'); then it discusses 'sagacity'; then 'reminiscence'; and then 'experiment', 'experience', 'presumption of the future', 'conjecture of the past', and 'signs'. The equivalent part of Chapter 3 of Leviathan uses the terms 'Mentall Discourse' and 'Trayne of Thoughts' instead of 'discourse of the mind' and 'discursion'; it discusses 'Seeking, or that faculty of Invention, which the Latines call Sagacitas'; then it refers to 'Remembrance, or Calling to mind: the Latines call it Reminiscen- tia'; then it considers what was previously called 'ranging', but without using that special term (the examples here being 'as one would sweep a room, to find a jewell; or as a Spaniel ranges the field, till he find a sent; or as a man should run over the Alphabet, to start a rime'); then it discusses 'Prudence' (later defined as 'Praesumtion of the Future'), 'Signes', and 'Praesumtion of things Past' (also described in a marginal note as 'Conjecture of the time past').[3] The argument is basically the same, but the ordering has changed, and many details, including some of the terms used, are different. Here and in other cases where such comparisons can be made, the reader gets the sense that there is a generic relationship between the two texts, but that Hobbes cannot have been working directly from a copy of the Elements when he composed Leviathan.

[1] See above, pp. 12–13; for further details see Schuhmann, 'Leviathan and De Cive'; Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 19–46.

[2] See the tabulation in Baumgold, 'Difficulties of Hobbes Interpretation', p. 848.

Was he working merely from his memory of the earlier treatise, or did he have some sort of Elements-related textual material in front of him? These questions raise some complicated issues concerning the way in which Hobbes wrote the Elements, issues that cannot be properly handled here. But it can be said that one immediately striking aspect of the verbal differences between the Elements and Leviathan is that the terminology of the former is often more closely associated with, or derived from, Latin, whereas the latter work makes more of an effort to—so to speak—think for itself in English. (Thus, for example, where the Elements has 'and this is called REMINISCENCE', Leviathan has 'This we call Remembrance, or Calling to mind: the Latines call it Reminiscentia, as it were a Re-conning of our former actions.') It seems likely that when Hobbes wrote the Elements he was sometimes converting material fairly quickly from some earlier textual basis in Latin—presumably not a complete Latin version of the Elements itself, but perhaps some draft materials for what would later be announced as the forthcoming second part of his tripartite 'Elements of philosophy'. And if such Elements-related draft materials existed in Latin, it seems possible that these, rather than the text of the Elements itself, were what Hobbes had to hand when he wrote Leviathan.[4]

This line of argument is partly confirmed, but also complicated, by the evidence of Hobbes's manuscript refutation (in Latin) of Thomas White, the so-called Anti-White, which he wrote in Paris in 1642–3. Some parts of Chapter XXX of this text overlap in subject-matter with material in the early chapters of the Elements and Leviathan; and, where they do, they sometimes supply details missing from the former but present in the latter. For example, where the Elements refers to a man looking for a small thing,

[3] pp. 42–4.
[4] A similar conclusion is reached in Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 19, 22–9, 45.

hounds casting about, and spaniels, the Anti-White specifies people looking for a small thing, hunting dogs ranging a field for partridges, and 'versifiers seeking to fill up their lines with suitable words'—which corresponds quite closely to Leviathan's man running over the alphabet to find a rhyme.[5] In Part I, Chapter iii of the Elements, Hobbes describes how the mind can 'compose' an imagination of 'divers conceptions that appeared singly in the sense', and gives the example of the perception of gold and the perception of a mountain being combined in an imaginary 'golden mountain'; he then refers briefly to 'castles in the air, chimeras, and other monsters'.[6] In the Anti-White he refers first to golden mountains and then, specifically, to centaurs (explaining that 'we imagine a centaur from the man we have seen and the horse we have seen'); he then says that there is another kind of mixing in the imagination, whereby we vaingloriously combine an idea of ourselves with an idea of the heroic actions of people we have seen or heard about, adding that we can also call such imaginings 'fictions or figments of the mind'.[7] In Chapter 2 of Leviathan golden mountains are not mentioned, but Hobbes refers to what happens 'when from the sight of a man at one time, and of a horse at another, we conceive in our mind a Centaure', and he continues: 'So when a man compoundeth the image of his own person, with the image of the actions of an other man; as when a man imagines himselfe a Hercules, or an Alexander . . . it is a compound imagination, and properly but a Fiction of the mind.'[8] There seems to be a rolling sequence of textual revision at work here, and one likely explanation would be that, over time, Hobbes was tinkering with the Latin draft notes which he had originally intended as materials for the account of human psychology in his tripartite 'Elements of philosophy'. The earliest version of those notes might well have preceded the writing of The Elements of Law; a subsequent version was perhaps con-

[5] Hobbes, Anti-White, XXX.9, p. 352 (fos. 341r–v): 'versificatores quaerentes congruis vocabulis metra sua implere'. Hobbes's use of this example, in conjunction with that of hunting dogs, may have been influenced by two lines in Endymion Porter's prefatory poem to Sir William Davenant's Madagascar (sig. χ3v): 'With the whole Kennell of the Alphabet, | I hunt sometimes an houre, one Rime to get.' General comparison between the imagination and a hunting dog was a Renaissance commonplace (see Höltgen, 'John Drydens "nimble spaniel"'), and was used in one text that Hobbes seems to have known well, Huarte's Examination of Mens Wits (p. 131); but this comparison is more specific.

[6] This passage may have been influenced by Huarte, Examination of Mens Wits, p. 132: 'this imagination hath force not onely to compound a figure possible with another, but doth ioyne also . . . those which are vnpossible, and of them growes to shape mountains of gold, and calues that flie.' But the example of the golden mountain was a traditional one (see, e.g., Aquinas, ST I, qu. 12, art. 9, ad 2); and, as Cees Leijenhorst notes ('Motion, Monks and Golden Mountains', p. 110), it was also used in the discussion of imagination in another text which Hobbes may have known, Campanella's De sensu rerum (II.11, p. 83: 'a golden mountain, or a creature with a hundred hands, or one with no head': 'montem aureum, aut ce[n]timanum, aut Acephalum').

[7] Hobbes, Anti-White, XXX.7, p. 351 (fo. 340v): 'ex visis homine & equo imaginamur centaurum'; 'fictiones sive animi figmenta'. [8] pp. 28–30.

sulted during the writing of the Anti-White; and it seems that the latest version, in this instance, is represented at one remove by the text of Leviathan, since this topic was not, in the end, treated in De homine.[9]

Some similar problems arise in the case of the relationship between Leviathan and De corpore. Here we do know that Hobbes had been working intensively on De corpore until he began the writing up of Leviathan, so we might expect the verbal echoes to be strong and direct. But evidence of a direct and simple relationship between the two is hard to find. The issue is complicated by three factors. First, the overlap in subject-matter between the two texts is very slight. Secondly, the text of De corpore which we have was finalized after the writing of Leviathan (and the earlier notes or drafts that survive are selective or incomplete); so we cannot always be sure what wording existed in the full draft which Hobbes had on his desk in 1649–50, or whether a particular passage was contained in it at all. And thirdly, where that draft borrowed material from Hobbes's pool of notes on matters relating to human psychology (an area of subject-matter that belonged primarily to the projected De homine, not to De corpore, but which was touched on in the latter's comments on the nature of sense-perception), it seems that De corpore had done some of its borrowing at an early stage in the development of those notes (so that, for example, its account of compound imagination refers to 'a chimaera, a golden mountain, and similar things'—phrasing closer to that of The Elements of Law than to that of the Anti-White or Leviathan).[10] There are certainly some points on which De corpore seems to stand in a closer relationship to Leviathan than does the Elements or the Anti-White. This is true, for example, of the discussion of waking dreams or apparitions in De corpore, where Hobbes says that such visions, conjured up by fear, happen 'especially to guilty men, and in the night, and in hallowed places', and that their fear is reinforced by 'stories of such Apparitions'; none of these points is made in the Elements, but they all occur in Leviathan, where Hobbes refers to a person 'whose conscience is much troubled', and specifies those 'possessed with fearfull tales . . . in the dark . . . in Church-yards'.[11] However, in such a case it is quite possible that the passage in Leviathan was written first, and that this material was later added to the draft of De corpore.[12] Only in a small number of cases can we feel confident that the influence was the other way [9] For other examples of possible textual connections with the Anti-White, see Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 23–9, 45.

[10] Hobbes, De corpore, XXV.9 ('Chimaera, mons aureus & similia').

[11] Ibid. ('praesertim vero sceleris consciis, & noctu, & in locis consecratis'; 'talium apparitionum historiis'); Leviathan, pp. 32–4.

[12] This possibility is strengthened in this case by the fact that the passage in De corpore comes at the very end of an 'article' or sub-section—the simplest place at which to add new material.

round. One example is the definition of philosophy given at the beginning of Chapter 46 of the English Leviathan, referring to reasoning which begins or ends with the knowledge of 'Properties'; here, while the equivalent passage in the printed text of De corpore specifies 'effects' or 'phenomena', we learn from the notes made in the mid-1640s by Sir Charles Cavendish and Robert Payne that Hobbes's earlier draft of this passage referred to 'properties', so it seems clear that that draft was the source he was using (or at least reproducing from memory) at this point in his composition of Leviathan.[13] And another example—perhaps the most substantial—concerns the numbered list of 'Causes of Absurditie' given in Chapter 5 of Leviathan, which borrows from a similar numbered list (present both in the printed version, and in the earlier draft seen by Cavendish and Payne) in De corpore.[14] Overall, though, the use Hobbes made of his draft of De corpore was extremely limited.[15]

None of Hobbes's other known writings seems to have exerted any significant direct influence on the composition of Leviathan. His letter Of Libertie and Necessitie (written in 1645, and printed without his consent in 1654) contains a few passages which chime with passages in Leviathan (for example, on how the will follows the last opinion immediately preceding the action, or on the idea that punishment should be aimed only at future benefit); but the chiming is not verbal, and in such cases it can merely be said that Hobbes had an opinion which he stated in somewhat differing ways on two separate occasions.[16] Slightly more significant, perhaps, is the dismissive reference in Libertie and Necessitie to Aquinas's description of eternity as a 'Nunc stans, an ever-abiding now'; the same rejection is made, but with a more general attribution to 'the Schools', in Leviathan.[17] Similarly, the statement in Libertie and Necessitie that water has the 'libertie to descend by the channel [13] The draft is represented by Cavendish's notes (BL, MS Harl. 6083, here fo. 198r) and by Robert Payne's notes (Chatsworth, MS Hobbes A. 10, first page): see Anti-White, p. 463 ('proprietatum'), and cf. with De corpore, I.2 ('Effectuum sive phaenomenωn'). See also the comments on this point in Rogers and Schuhmann, i, p. 43.

[14] See Leviathan, pp. 70–72; Anti-White, p. 470; De corpore V.2; see also the comments on this point in Rogers and Schuhmann, i, p. 25, n. 55. However, it is a little puzzling that Hobbes changed the list in Leviathan (reproducing only 4 out of 7 points) but restored the original list in the 1655 De corpore.

[15] For other examples of possible textual connections with the De corpore, see Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 22–7, 43–4.

[16] Hobbes, Libertie and Necessitie, p. 29, 'The intention of the Law is not to grieve the Delinquent for that which is past . . . but to make him and others just' (EW iv, p. 253), and Leviathan, p. 484, 'all evill which is inflicted without intention . . . of disposing the Delinquent, or (by his example) other men, to obey the Lawes, is not Punishment'; Libertie and Necessitie, p. 58, 'the will follows the last opinion or judgement immediately proceding [sic] the action' (EW iv, p. 268), and Leviathan, p. 92, 'the last Appetite, or Aversion, immediately adhaering to the action . . . is that wee call the WILL.' In this last case, the formulation in Leviathan is closer to that in the Anti-White (XXXVII.4, p. 405 (fo. 411v)): 'the will is the last act of one who deliberates, whether that act be appetite, or flight' ('Voluntas est ultimus actus deliberantis, sive ille actus appetitus sit, sive fuga').

[17] Hobbes, Libertie and Necessitie, p. 63 (EW iv, p. 271); Leviathan, p. 1084.

of the river' evidently prefigures Leviathan's remark that water 'hath not only liberty, but a necessity of descending by the Channel'.[18] But in these cases a textual influence need scarcely be invoked; it is sufficient to suppose that Hobbes had the same idea in his head over a period of time. As for a possible parallelism with Hobbes's 'Answer' to the Preface to Gondibert, involving a passage contrasting a civilized with a savage existence (and referring to, among other things, 'Instruments of motion'): here the verbal resemblances are very slight, and it is in any case likely that the passage in Leviathan was written first.[19]

Recently, it has been suggested that the direct sources of Leviathan also include a substantial Hobbesian manuscript work which has not survived, a Latin refutation of Roberto Bellarmino (Cardinal Bellarmine)—or, at least, an extensive set of notes, in Latin, made for the purposes of writing such a refutation.[20] On the face of it, this hypothesis usefully explains a rather anomalous feature of Leviathan: in a text which otherwise makes very little mention of other writers, Hobbes devotes 20 folio pages in Chapter 42, and a little over six in Chapter 44, to detailed refutations of some of Bellarmino's ecclesiological and theological claims.[21] But no trace of any such manuscript has survived, nor any reference to it; and the arguments put forward in support of this hypothesis are not compelling. In particular, it is suggested that the use of 'doublets' in Hobbes's English prose tends to indicate that he was translating from a Latin original; but only one example is given from the pages devoted to the refutation of Bellarmine ('Lieutenant, or Vicar generall', for which the Latin Leviathan has the single word 'Vicarium'), which seems insufficient to prove the point, given that Hobbes was quite capable of using pairs of words when composing in English.[22] Another suggestion is that when Hobbes turned Leviathan into Latin, he incorporated material from his original Latin anti-Bellarmino manuscript; but this cannot be correct, in view of the fact that in the Latin Leviathan his quotations from Bellarmino are all re-translations from the English versions which he gave in the English Leviathan.[23] It is also suggested that if we suppose that

[18] Hobbes, Libertie and Necessitie, p. 70 (EW iv, p. 274); Leviathan, p. 326.

[19] Hobbes, 'Answer', in Davenant, Preface, p. 132, 'All that is beautifull or defensible in building; or mervellous in Engines and Instruments of motion . . . and whatsoever distinguisheth the civility of Europe, from the Barbarity of the American salvages' (Davenant, Gondibert, ed. Gladish, p. 49); Leviathan, p. 192, 'no commodious Building; no Instruments of moving . . . no Arts; no Letters; no Society'.

[20] Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 21, 32, 40, 42, 43, 239–40.

[21] pp. 866–926, 976–8, 994–1010.

[22] Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 239–40.

[23] Ibid., p. 240; see, e.g., the annotations to the present edn., pp. 905–9. Rogers and Schuhmann also say that this would help to explain why it was that the Latin Leviathan 'gave some of its shrewdest readers the impression of having been written before Leviathan'; on this issue see below, pp. 168–75.

Hobbes worked on his anti-Bellarmino project between 1646 and 1649, this will help us to reconcile his own statements that he began work on Leviathan in 1646 with the evidence that suggests a starting-date of 1649; but this suggestion depends largely on the idea that when he referred to 'the divine laws' in the relevant passage of his verse autobiography, he was using that phrase to mean Leviathan, which seems quite implausible.[24] That Hobbes's concentration on Bellarmino in Chapters 42 and 44 of Leviathan is anomalous can readily be agreed. On the other hand, as was suggested above, it can also readily be understood that it was useful for Hobbes to be able to present himself as a Protestant trouncing one of the champions of Roman Catholic and papalist doctrine. And it should also be remembered that Hobbes is likely to have explored both Bellarmino's works and a whole repertoire of anti-Bellarmino writings many years earlier; it was probably easy for him to become expansive on these topics, since he had much material in his memory on which to draw.[25]

From the fairly accurate quotations which Hobbes gives from Bellarmino's Disputationes, however, and from his precise ordering of the various points made in the original text, it is clear that he had access to a copy of this text in Paris: either it was on his desk as he wrote, or he had taken quite thorough notes from a copy elsewhere. Another text which he cites with reasonable (but not total) accuracy is one of the treatises in Suárez's Varia opuscula theologica, of which he reproduces a chapter heading. (We may assume that he had originally consulted this treatise, which discusses the relationship between God and 'secondary causes', when he was involved in his dispute with Bramhall over free will and necessity in 1645.) It is possible that Hobbes owned copies of these books; but it seems more probable—especially in the case of the work by Suárez, which he found so uncongenial—that he consulted copies owned by others, whether personal friends or institutions. The institutional library he is most likely to have used was that of the Minim convent on the place Royale in Paris, where he was a frequent visitor to the cell of his friend Marin Mersenne; and if, through Mersenne, he got [24] Rogers and Schuhmann, i, p. 240. The lines which I have translated (above, p. 10) as 'But I was forced to postpone it, being unwilling to allow so many foul crimes, of such magnitude, to be attributed to the commands of God. I decided to absolve the divine laws as soon as possible' are presented by Rogers and Schuhmann (i, p. 11) as follows: 'Hobbes saw himself "forced to delay it [De Corpore] . . . I decided to prepare the divine laws [Leviathan] as soon as possible".' This translation of 'absoluere' as 'to prepare', rather than 'to absolve', is lexically possible, but it ignores the connection between this phrase and the one immediately preceding it (omitted by Rogers and Schuhmann). There is no known instance of Hobbes using 'the divine laws', or any similar phrase, to refer to Leviathan. Nor is it clear why he should have thought that in order to counter the claims of the English rebels, his most pressing task was to prepare a detailed refutation of papalist theory and Roman Catholic theology.

[25] See above, pp. 45–6, 47.

to know other Minim friars with intellectual interests there, he might well have continued to have access to the library even after Mersenne's death in September 1648. An early eighteenth-century catalogue of the convent's library shows it to have been a rich collection, especially strong (naturally enough) in Roman Catholic theology; it included the Lyon, 1610, edition of Bellarmino's Disputationes, and the Lyon, 1611, edition of Suárez's Varia opuscula theologica.[26] As for Hobbes's quotations of phrases of consecration and conjuration from the Roman Catholic ritual: this was a text which he would no doubt have found in the Minim convent, but which any of his Roman Catholic friends might also have possessed.[27] One other text is quoted in Leviathan with such accuracy as to make it appear that Hobbes had access to the printed book: Sir Edward Coke's First Part of the Institutes.[28] This work was not held by the Minim library. Possibly Hobbes had a lawyer friend among the English exiles who had brought a copy with him; that Hobbes did have contacts with English lawyers in Paris—though not very amicable ones—is suggested by a comment in a letter to John Evelyn from Hobbes's admirer Samuel Tuke in 1650, who observed that 'the long Robe are allwayes quarrelling his principles'.[29]

Otherwise, Hobbes's references to modern texts in Leviathan are notoriously few and far between. John Selden's Titles of Honor is mentioned in Chapter 10; and a treatise by Philip Cluverius (Clüwer, Klüwer), Germaniae antiquae libri tres, was also referred to in that chapter in the manuscript, though the reference is omitted in the printed version.[30] In these cases he was presumably working from memory; he had had the opportunity to read both books in the library at Hardwick Hall.[31] Memory is quite sufficient to account for Hobbes's occasional uses of material from classical authors such as Vergil, Livy, and Plutarch; and even his rather recondite allusion to a Greek word used by Herodian was also probably the fruit of earlier study, as that text was also contained in the Hardwick library.[32]

There is, however, one text that raises some complicated questions about Hobbes's methods of citation (and, therefore, about the actual texts that he [26] Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, Paris, MS 6203, pp. 394, 442. (This is the fullest catalogue; for other catalogues see also Bibliothèque Mazarine, Paris, MSS 4146, 4147, 4149, 4150.) Accordingly, in the present edn. references are given to the Lyon, 1610, edn. of Bellarmino, and the Lyon, 1600, edn. of Suárez (of which the 1611 edition was a page-by-page reprint).

[27] pp. 970–73. [28] pp. 222, 422, 434.

[29] BL, MS Add. 78306, fo. 89r, Tuke to Evelyn, from The Hague, 25 Oct. [/4 Nov.] 1650. (Tuke had spent some time in Paris in 1649: see Evelyn, Diary, ii, p. 564.) [30] See pp. 146–8.

[31] Chatsworth, MS Hobbes E. 1. A, pp. 69 ('Cluuerij Germania. 2. Vol. fol.'), 111 ('Selden Titles of Honor. 4°.').

[32] See p. 1048; Chatsworth, MS Hobbes E. 1. A, p. 88 ('Herodiani Hist. Grae. lat 8°'; this is one of the entries added to the catalogue by Hobbes after his return to Hardwick in 1630).

had to hand as he composed Leviathan): the Bible. Given his general insistence that he was following the teachings of the Church of England (in particular, on such matters as the canon of Scripture), one might expect Hobbes to have quoted consistently from the Authorized Version—the 1611 translation, officially appointed by King James to be read in churches. That version is indeed the one Hobbes most commonly uses. However, when he quotes from the Authorized Version he sometimes makes small changes; in some cases, his biblical quotations show the influence of a different translation; and sometimes his wording seems not to stand in a close relation to any of the available versions.[33] Hobbes was of course aware that a puzzle over the meaning of a biblical phrase might be resolved by careful study of the original text; he was able to do this where the Greek of the New Testament was concerned, and occasionally developed his own arguments about the meaning of words such as περιούσιος or χειροτονήσαντες.[34] But his own quotations from the New Testament do not give the impression that he was trying to translate afresh from the Greek; and where the Hebrew of the Old Testament was concerned, this was something he was simply unable to do.[35] He relied, instead, on translations, while at the same time departing from them in various ways.

In a few cases, the changes made by Hobbes when quoting from the Authorized Version do seem to be motivated by his own theological or philosophical concerns. For example, in Chapter 44 he quotes a passage from Ecclesiastes in support of his argument that the human soul is not naturally immortal. In the Authorized Version the text, referring to humans and animals, reads as follows: 'All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?' Hobbes's version is: 'All goe to the same place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again; who knoweth that the spirit of Man goeth upward, and that the spirit of the Beast goeth downward to the earth?'[36] Here the difference between 'unto one place' and 'to the same place' is minor, with the latter just conveying the meaning a little more emphatically; but the difference between 'Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward' and 'who knoweth that the spirit of Man goeth upward' is significant, as the former could be interpreted as asserting [33] Hobbes's handling of biblical texts is a very large subject, which can be treated only very briefly here; a full study remains to be written. For a useful starting-point see Jones, 'Hobbes and the Bible'; Jones describes Hobbes's methods as 'wayward and inconsistent', noting in particular the use of indirect speech, and of alterations of the word-order, 'often for reasons that are unclear' (pp. 277–8).

[34] pp. 638, 836–8.

[35] For evidence of Hobbes's ignorance of Hebrew see below, pp. 192–3.

[36] p. 986; Eccles. 3: 20–21.

that human souls do generally ascend to heaven, whereas the latter implies that there can be no certainty about any such thing. Hobbes's change may have been influenced by the Vulgate Latin translation (which has 'quis novit si spiritus filiorum Adam ascendat sursum', 'who knows if the spirit of the sons of Adam rises above'); but his version is not otherwise a translation of the Vulgate, so it does seem that his rendering was a deliberate emendation of the Authorized Version.[37]

In many cases, though, Hobbes's minor divergences from the Authorized Version carry no such theoretical significance. For example, in Chapter 34, quoting the Epistle of Jude, he changes 'unto the judgment of the great day' to 'unto the Iudgment of the last day', and, quoting St Matthew's Gospel, changes 'in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage' to 'In the resurrection men doe neither marry, nor give in marriage'.[38] Sometimes the differences are quite extensive: for instance, where the Authorized Version translates Matthew 21: 3 as 'And if any man say ought unto you, ye shall say, The Lord hath need of them; and straightway he will send them', Hobbes writes 'And if any man ask you, what you mean by it, Say the Lord hath need of them: And they will let them go.'[39] In such cases, the natural explanation would seem to be that Hobbes was quoting from memory, and that his memory was less than perfect. But this could be a matter either of texts permanently stored in his mind, or, in some instances, of things held in his short-term memory, as he read a passage in the Bible and then turned to his draft of Leviathan and incorporated some verses from it. Early modern attitudes towards quotation were not the same as those that prevail in modern scholarship; a paraphrase that preserved the meaning of the quoted phrase was, for most purposes, quite good enough, and this attitude may have been reinforced by the knowledge that all English (or Latin) versions of biblical texts were in any case at one remove from the original. A certain lack of concern about verbal accuracy is indicated by the fact that when Hobbes quotes the same biblical verses more than once in Leviathan, there are sometimes divergences between his own versions: thus the verse from Matthew's Gospel immediately preceding the one just quoted appears once as 'Go into the Village over against you, and you shall find a shee Asse tyed, and her Colt with her, unty them, and bring them to me', and once as 'Go into the Village over against you, and you shall find an Asse tyed, and her Colt; loose her, and bring her to me.'[40] That Hobbes provides chapter and verse numbers for almost all of his biblical citations may of course suggest that he was working with a copy of the Bible in front of him; but, on the other hand, the numbers he gives are sometimes inaccurate, and in a period when writers often referred from memory to classical texts, citing book and chapter numbers as they did so, we should not ignore the possibility that chapter and verse numbers were also memorized for biblical quotations. Moreover, if Hobbes did check a printed Bible in order to supply these numbers, doing so might in some cases have been a subsequent operation, after the text containing the biblical quotation had been written. As we shall see, there is evidence that Hobbes did have a copy of the Authorized Version, and that he sometimes consulted and compared translations quite carefully; so perhaps the only general conclusion that can be drawn is that he worked sometimes from memory and sometimes from the printed text.

[37] The importance of this passage for Hobbes's argument against the notion of the natural immortality of the soul is re-emphasized in the first chapter of the Appendix to the Latin: see pp. 1166–7.

[38] p. 628 (Jude 1: 6; Matt. 22: 30). In both cases, AV correctly translates the Greek.

[39] p. 318. AV follows the Greek closely here; so too does the Vulgate, and there is no warrant for Hobbes's changes in the Geneva Bible, the Bishops' Bible, the French Geneva Bible, or Beza's version (printed with the Junius–Tremellius translation). There may be some contamination here with the equivalent passages in Mark 11: 3 and Luke 19: 31. The former has 'if any man say unto you, Why do ye this?', and the latter has a similar question (which might account for Hobbes's 'if any man ask you, what you mean by it'); but Mark has 'straightway he will send them' (adding 'hither'), while Luke omits that phrase entirely.

In some cases, Hobbes's divergences from the Authorized Version are a matter not of casual or deliberate alterations of it, but rather of dependence on a different translation. Among the other available English versions of the Bible, the Geneva translation seems to have had no direct influence on Leviathan, and the Bishops' Bible appears to have generated only one phrase in the entire text: 'Fourty dayes and Ninivy shall be destroyed.'[41] Possibly this phrase had lodged in Hobbes's mind ever since the readings and sermons of his youth, before the publication of the Authorized Version. Similarly, long-term memory may account for the fact that one of his quotations from the Psalms, 'for I was grieved at the Wicked, when I saw the Ungodly in such Prosperity', follows not the Authorized Version ('For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked') but the older translation of the Psalms (derived from Miles Coverdale's translation) printed in the Book of Common Prayer: 'I was grieved at the wicked: I do also see the ungodly in such prosperitie.'[42]

In a few places, the influence of the French Geneva translation (the standard French Protestant version) is apparent. In Chapter 22, for example, Hobbes cites a passage from the Acts of the Apostles as follows: 'If Demetrius and the other work-men can accuse any man, of any thing, there be Pleas, and Deputies, let them accuse one another. And if you have any other thing to demand, [40] pp. 318, 404; both diverge in minor ways from AV.

[41] p. 598 (Jonah 3: 4). Here AV and the Geneva Bible have 'overthrown', the Vulgate and the Junius–Tremellius translation have 'subvertetur', and the French Geneva Bible has 'renuersée'.

[42] p. 558 (Ps. 73: 3). This differs from the Vulgate, Junius–Tremellius, and the French Geneva Bible.

your case may be judged in an Assembly Lawfully called.' This is quite different from the wording in the Authorized Version: 'Wherefore if Demetrius, and the craftsmen which are with him, have a matter against any man, the law is open, and there are deputies: let them implead one another. But if ye enquire any thing concerning other matters, it shall be determined in a lawful assembly.' Hobbes's version could be a rather loose translation from the Vulgate, or indeed from the original Greek; but the French Geneva version ('Que si Demetrius & les ouuriers qui sont auec lui, ont à l'encontre d'aucun quelque cause, on tient les plaids, & y a des Proconsuls: qu'ils accusent l'vn l'autre. Et si vous demandez quelque chose d'autre cas, cela se pourra conclure en vne assemblee deuëment conuoquee') supplies a couple of details—'plaids' and 'deuëment conuoquee', corresponding to Hobbes's 'Pleas' and 'Lawfully called'—which are not in any of the other versions.[43] Again, when Hobbes refers in Chapter 33 to 'the Vision of Iehdo', he is not using the form of this name given in either the Authorized Version ('Iddo') or the Vulgate ('Iaddo'); his source is presumably either the French Geneva Bible or the Protestant Latin version by Junius and Tremellius.[44] But although Hobbes made, as we shall see, quite extensive use of Junius–Tremellius (and of the Latin translation of the New Testament by Theodore Beza, printed with it) when preparing his Latin version of Leviathan, there is little evidence that he consulted it while writing the English text.[45]

One version that Hobbes certainly made use of while writing Leviathan was the Vulgate—the Latin version translated and/or edited by St Jerome, which, while it always remained an acceptable version for Protestants, became particularly associated with the Roman Catholic Church after the Council of Trent proclaimed it the most authoritative text of all. In some cases Hobbes's use of the Vulgate follows from the fact that he is taking over material from De cive, where that translation was used: thus in the opening pages of Chapter 31 of Leviathan, where the quotations from the Psalms, the Book of Job, St John's Gospel, and the Epistle to the Romans all correspond to those given in the opening pages of De cive's Chapter XV, we can be confident that Hobbes had De cive's quotations from the Vulgate in front of him—and that this explains the fact that the three marginal references to the Psalms give the numbering which is used in that version, and not in any of the Protestant editions of the Bible.[46] Another striking instance of Hobbes's

[43] p. 374 (Acts 19: 38–9). [44] p. 594.

[45] See below, pp. 190–91. A possible instance of its influence is Hobbes's quotation of 1 Kgs 3: 9 (Leviathan, p. 316) as 'Give to thy servant understanding', where AV has 'an understanding heart'; all the other versions discussed here refer to a heart, with the exception of Junius-Tremellius, which has 'animum intelligentem', 'an understanding mind'. But such evidence as this is not compelling.

[46] See pp. 554–60; cf. De cive XV.1–6.

use of the Vulgate comes in Chapter 38, where, in a sequence of quotations from Proverbs, Job, and Isaiah, Hobbes uses the word 'Giants': the Vulgate uses the term 'gigantes', but the Authorized Version (like the Geneva Bible, and the Bishops' Bible) gives it as 'the dead', the Junius–Tremellius translation has 'vitae expertes' ('those without life'), and the French Geneva Bible has 'les trespassés' ('the deceased') or 'les choses qui sont sans ame' ('the things that are without a soul').[47] In his discussion of the Bible in Chapter 33, Hobbes several times uses the forms of Biblical names that occur in the Vulgate rather than the forms in the Authorized Version: 'Addo' instead of 'Iddo' (Junius–Tremellius: 'Hiddo'), 'Sophoniah' (Vulgate: 'Sophonias') instead of 'Zephaniah', 'Abdias' instead of 'Obadiah', and 'Aggeus' instead of 'Haggai'.[48] In a number of cases, Hobbes's divergences from the Authorized Version seem to reflect the influence of the Vulgate. For example, he cites from Genesis 17: 10 the phrase 'This is the Covenant which thou shalt observe', which is closer to the Vulgate's 'hoc est pactum quod observabitis' than to the Authorized Version's 'This is my covenant, which ye shall keep'; quoting Joel 2: 32, he writes 'For in Mount Zion, and in Ierusalem shall be Salvation', which is closer to the Vulgate's 'in monte Sion et in Hierusalem erit salvatio' than to the Authorized Version's 'for in mount Zion and in Jerusalem shall be deliverance'.[49]

While Hobbes's use of the biblical text may often seem somewhat cavalier in matters of detail, he is also capable of making precise comparisons between the wordings of different versions. In Chapter 35 he carefully compares the translations of Exodus 19: 5 given in the Vulgate, the Authorized Version, and the French Geneva Bible (the three versions which, it seems, he had on his desk during the composition of Leviathan) before rejecting all of them and defending his own emended translation—emended, that is, not on the basis of the Hebrew but in the light of a phrase used by St Paul in his Epistle to Titus.[50] And in Chapter 44 he takes a series of phrases from the Book of Genesis, quoting them in Latin from the Vulgate, and comparing the first of them with the translation of it given by 'the English' (the phrase he cites is that of the Authorized Version, and also the Geneva Bible and the Bishops' Bible). But here too there is an oddity: the phrase from Genesis [47] See p. 712. 'Giants' and 'shades of the dead' were alternative interpretations of the Hebrew word 'rephaim'. The 'giants' meaning was also the one chosen by the Septuagint; but although Hobbes referred to the Septuagint in his discussion of the canon (p. 588), there is no other evidence in the English Leviathan of his consulting that translation. [48] pp. 594, 598.

[49] pp. 446 (but note that there is no warrant for Hobbes's change from plural to singular), 724. The four cases (of which these are two) put forward by Jones as evidence that Hobbes was influenced by the Douai–Rheims English version ('Hobbes and the Bible', p. 282) can all be more simply explained on the basis of the Vulgate. [50] pp. 636–8.

8: 21 which he gives as 'omnem animam viventem' (his own translation is 'every Living Creature') is rendered differently in both the Vulgate (which has 'omnem animantem') and the Junius–Tremellius translation (which has 'omnia viventia'), and Hobbes seems merely to have repeated it unthinkingly from his earlier citation of Genesis 1: 21.[51] The combination here of careful analysis and negligent—or, at least, nonchalant—delivery is quite typical.

The Title

Why did Hobbes choose the title Leviathan? On the face of it, the answer is provided in the text itself. In the 'Introduction' Hobbes writes: 'For by Art is created that great LEVIATHAN called a COMMON-WEALTH, or STATE, (in latine CIVITAS) which is but an Artificiall Man; though of greater stature and strength than the Naturall'.[52] In Chapter 17 he declares: 'This is the Generation of that great LEVIATHAN, or rather (to speake more reverently) of that Mortall God, to which wee owe under the Immortal God, our peace and defence.'[53] And in Chapter 28 he quotes directly from the Book of Job:

> Hitherto I have set forth the nature of Man, (whose Pride and other Passions have compelled him to submit himselfe to Government;) together with the great power of his Governour, whom I compared to Leviathan, taking that comparison out of the last two verses of the one and fortieth of Job; where God having set forth the great power of Leviathan, calleth him King of the Proud. There is nothing, saith he, on earth, to be compared with him. He is made so as not to be afraid. Hee seeth every high thing below him; and is King of all the children of pride.[54]

These are the only passages in the text that elucidate the meaning of the term 'leviathan'; but the last passage is also echoed in the biblical quotation which appears at the top of the engraved title page: 'Non est potestas Super Terram quae Comparetur ei ['There is no power on earth that may be compared to him'] Iob. 41. 24.'[55]

Hobbes's general meaning is thus fairly clear. The biblical leviathan stands for the state because it possesses enormous 'stature and strength'; because the Bible says that there is no power on earth that can be compared to it (a point which neatly matches Hobbes's argument that the Church cannot have a power superior to that of the state); and because the Bible describes Leviathan as 'King of all the children of pride' (a phrase which both invokes political rule and fits Hobbes's account of the human passions that make such rule necessary). In some ways, however, the implications of these passages remain difficult to gauge. While the account of leviathan in the Book of Job appears to describe the physical characteristics of a huge marine creature, Hobbes neither alludes to any of those particular features, nor makes any reference to the idea that it is an aquatic animal. His comment that he has 'compared' man's 'Governour' to the biblical leviathan suggests that he has merely seized on a point of resemblance between two different things; but the possibility cannot be excluded that he believes that the biblical description was actually intended as an allegory for the state. Similarly, when he writes that 'This is the Generation of that great LEVIATHAN, or rather (to speake more reverently) of that Mortall God', it is not clear whether the latter formulation is 'more reverent' merely because to attribute any kind of divinity to something is the ultimate in reverence, or because he feels that the term 'leviathan' does in fact carry some negative connotations.[56]

[51] p. 974. [52] p. 16. [53] p. 260. [54] p. 496.

[55] This Latin version is drawn (with a minor alteration of word-order) from the Vulgate, not from the Junius–Tremellius version; the reference is correct for the Vulgate but not for Protestant versions (where the verse is 41: 33).

These uncertainties are not dispelled by the brief references to 'leviathan' made in Hobbes's later works. Writing in the mid-1650s in response to Bishop Bramhall's attack on his works, he commented:

> Now this Leviathan he calleth Monstrum horrendum, informe, Ingens, cui lumen ademptum ['a horrible monster, misshapen, vast, and deprived of sight']. Words not farre fetcht, nor more applicable to my Leviathan, than to any other writing that should offend him. For allowing him the word Monstrum (because it seems he takes it for a monstrous great Fish,) he can neither say it is informe. . .[57]

This appears to imply that the 'monstrous great Fish' interpretation of 'leviathan' is, while not the sense required by Hobbes, nevertheless an admissible one. Later in the same paragraph of his response to Bramhall, Hobbes commented on the news that two members of the Church of England were preparing refutations of Leviathan: 'My answer is, that I desire not, that he or they should so mispend their time; but if they will needs do it, I can give them a fit Title for their Book, Behemoth against Leviathan.'[58] Here Hobbes alluded to the huge terrestrial animal which is described in Job 40, immediately before the description of leviathan. In this particular Hobbesian context, 'behemoth' seems to stand for the Church of England; evidently he wished to emphasize once again that leviathan, the state, was the more powerful of the two. (It is possible that he had in mind some version of the Jewish apocalyptic tradition in which, at the end of the world, there is a fight between behemoth and leviathan.)[59] Behemoth was, of course, the title later given to Hobbes's history of the English civil wars and Interregnum. In the manuscript of that work (which was produced by Hobbes's own amanuensis), the full title is 'Behemoth, or the Long Parliament'; it has been argued that 'behemoth' here is 'a symbol for rebellion and civil war', or a shorthand for all the groups of people (churchmen included) who made that rebellion happen.[60] The issue is further complicated by a later reference to both behemoth and leviathan in Hobbes's Latin poem Historia ecclesiastica, which was completed in 1671: here, discussing the encroachment of the early papacy on temporal power, he wrote that 'leviathan and behemoth received a hook in their nostrils; both the king and the people were enslaved.'[61] This phrasing (which alludes to Job 41: 1–2, 'Canst thou draw out leviathan with an hook? . . . Canst thou put an hook into his nose?') seems to identify leviathan with the king and behemoth with the people.

[56] In the Latin, 'more reverently' is rendered as 'digniùs' ('more becomingly', 'more suitably', 'more properly', or 'more worthily').

[57] Hobbes, Questions, p. 20 (EW v, p. 26). The quotation is from Vergil, Aeneis, III, l. 658 (describing the blinded Cyclops).

[58] Hobbes, Questions, p. 20 (EW v, p. 27).

Whatever the precise meaning he gave to the term 'behemoth', it is thus fairly clear that Hobbes thought of it as something dangerous (whether disobedient rabble, rebellious Parliament, or power-hungry Church). It is true that he placed leviathan in opposition to behemoth; yet at the same time he must surely have been aware that these two biblical beasts had almost always been given parallel treatment by Christian theologians, who had traditionally taken both as allegories for the Devil.[62] The strength of that tradition makes it seem, at first sight, very puzzling that Hobbes should have chosen, for the thing he valued most highly in human existence, a name that was likely to conjure up, in the minds of many readers, at best a monster and at worst Satan himself. But a study of the history of the ways in which the term 'leviathan' was interpreted provides a possible solution to that puzzle.

This term occurs in five passages in the Bible. The most substantial is the description in Job 41, from which Hobbes quotes the last two verses: here an aquatic creature, of formidable strength and covered with impenetrable scales, is described at length.[63] Earlier in Job there is a brief reference to leviathan in Chapter 3, when Job exclaims (v. 8) 'Let them curse it that curse the [59] See Gutmann, 'Leviathan, Behemoth and Ziz', pp. 219–30; Drewer, 'Leviathan, Behemoth and Ziz', pp. 148–56; Forsyth, The Old Enemy, pp. 216–18.

[60] Holmes, 'Introduction' to Hobbes, Behemoth, ed. Tönnies, pp. [vii]–[xl], here pp. [ix] (quotation), [x]. Paul Seaward has pointed out that one of the books Hobbes cited in that work, Philippe de Mornay's Mysterie of Iniquitie, contains references to medieval interpretations of the biblical behemoth as standing for Antichrist and/or the papal Curia: 'General Introduction' to Hobbes, Behemoth, ed. Seaward, p. 62.

[61] Hobbes, Historia ecclesiastica, p. 57, ll. 1231–2 (OL v, p. 381, ll. 1229–30) ('Leviathan naribus, Behemothque receperat hamum; | Et Rex & Populus servus uterque fuit').

[62] See below, at nn. 66–71.

[63] In Protestant versions of the Bible, such as AV, this is Job 41: 1–34. In the Vulgate and in Roman Catholic versions, it is Job 40: 20–28 and 41: 1–25.

day, who are ready to raise up a leviathan.'[64] In Psalm 74: 13–14, the psalmist (addressing God) declares: 'Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength: thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters. Thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness.' And in Psalm 104: 26, describing the 'great and wide sea', he exclaims: 'There go the ships; there is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein.' Finally, the term is also used by Isaiah, who prophesies (27: 1): 'In that day the Lord with his sore and great and strong sword shall punish leviathan the piercing serpent, even leviathan the crooked serpent; and he shall slay the dragon that is in the sea.' Taken on its own, Job 41 seemed to describe a mighty creation of God, in the powers of which God seemed to take some pride; however, some of the other passages (notably Isaiah 27: 1) suggested a monstrous being with which God must eventually engage in apocalyptic combat. Psalm 74, on the other hand, seemed to allude to the passing of the Israelites through the Red Sea and the destruction of Pharaoh and his army; and there were other biblical verses that identified Pharaoh with a dragon (a similar monstrous beast) or used the term 'dragon' for a tyrannical ruler.[65]

Christian exegetes concluded that, since almost everything in the Bible could have an allegorical meaning, rulers such as Pharaoh stood allegorically for the Devil. All references to 'dragons' (both in the Old Testament and in the Book of Revelation) were taken to have a diabolical significance; and Isaiah's reference to 'leviathan the piercing serpent, even leviathan the crooked serpent' was easily connected with the 'serpent' in the Garden of Eden.[66] In his lengthy commentary on Job, Jerome described the leviathan as a dragon, and explained that both it and behemoth stood for the Devil.[67] Other early Fathers, such as Origen and St Augustine, also identified the leviathan with Satan.[68] By far the most influential early Christian writer on this theme was Gregory the Great, whose huge commentary on Job, known as the Magna moralia, became the starting-point for most subsequent exegesis: Gregory identified both behemoth and leviathan with the Devil, making the connection with Revelation 20: 2 ('And he laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, which is the Devil').[69]

[64] In the early edns. of AV the phrase is given in the text as 'who are ready to raise up their mourning', with 'or, a leviathan' given as an alternative in the margin.

[65] Ezek. 29: 3–5; Isa. 51: 9–10; Jer. 51: 34. The Hebrew word for 'dragon', 'tnyn' or 'tannin', was often thought to be related to the word for 'leviathan', 'liwyatan'.

[66] See, e.g., Jerome, 'Commentarius in Esaiam', in his Opera exegetica, ii, pp. 344–5.

[67] Jerome, 'Expositio interlinearis libri Job', in PL xxiii, cols. 1407–70 (and the comments in cols. 1403–4).

[68] See Origen, 'In Leviticum', in PG xii, cols. 405–574, here col. 496; Augustine, De civitate Dei, ii, p. 335 (XI.15).

[69] Gregory the Great, 'Moralium libri, sive expositio in librum B. Job', in PL lxxv, cols. 509–1162;

The basic identification of leviathan with the Devil was accepted by medieval theologians (for Thomas Aquinas, Job 41 offered 'a description of the properties of the Devil . . . under the similitude of the leviathan'), and was maintained by most Roman Catholic writers in the early modern period.[70] Some Protestant writers, such as the Lutheran theologian Johann Brenz or the maverick Huguenot Isaac La Peyrère, followed the same line.[71] However, this interpretation did not go unchallenged. In his commentary on Job, Calvin insisted that the verses about behemoth and leviathan in Chapters 40 and 41 must be understood as literal descriptions of the elephant and the whale: the purpose of this text was to teach man a lesson about his own inadequacy, by making a comparison with other, more powerful creatures in the natural world. He described the 'opinion, that by an allegorie the Diuell is spoken of heere', as 'fantasticall'.[72] Yet Calvin was not against allegorical exegesis as such; commenting on the reference to leviathan in Isaiah 27: 1, he declared: 'For mine owne part I make no question but by way of Allegorie he speakes here of Satan and his whole kingdome, describing it under the figure of some monstrous beast.'[73] His argument was not that all such allegorical interpretations were wrong, but that when they were right they were 'drawen . . . out of a naturall meening'.[74]

This approach was followed by Calvinist commentators such as Jean Mercier, who declared that 'once you have the literal meaning, you may later draw an allegory from it, but you should do so soberly'.[75] And in practice it was not very different from the attitude of many Roman Catholic scholars in the early modern period, who also emphasized the primacy of the literal meaning. Their view was summed up at the end of the sixteenth century by one of the most influential Catholic commentators on Job, Juan de Pineda (Rector of the Jesuit College in Seville). Some commentators, he noted, thought that the account of leviathan directly signified the Devil, while others thought that it literally described a great creature, and that that description might also be used allegorically for the Devil; the latter view lxxvi, cols. 9–782, here lxxv, col. 646.

[70] Thomas Aquinas, In librum B. Iob expositio, p. 427 ('proprietates diaboli . . . in similitudine leuiathan'). Cf. de Vio, 'In librum Iob commentarii' [1st published 1535], in his Opera omnia, ii, pp. 401–557, here p. 548; Ribera, In librum duodecim prophetarum commentarii [1st published 1587], p. 445; Hessels van Est, Annotationes aureae, p. 340 (citing Gregory the Great); Sanchez, In librum Iob commentarii; Cordier, 'In librum Job commentarium' [1st published 1646], xiv, cols. 802–3.

[71] Brenz, Annotationes in Hiob, fo. 278r; Anon. [I. La Peyrère], Praeadamitae, p. 234 (Systema, IV.9).

[72] Calvin, Sermons, pp. 800–801.

[73] Calvin, Commentary, p. 260. As Susan Schreiner has noted, Calvin's refusal to allegorize Job 40–41 is specific to his interpretation of the Book of Job (Where Shall Wisdom be Found?, p. 144).

[74] Calvin, Sermons, pp. 801–2.

[75] Mercier, Commentarii in librum Iob, p. 180 ('Habito sensu literae licebit postea allegoriam consectari, sed sobrie').

was the one he agreed with.[76] Accordingly, as the resources available to early modern Hebrew scholarship grew, writers such as Pineda devoted much effort to establishing exactly what sort of great creature the biblical leviathan was—whether a whale, a dragon, a crocodile, or something else.[77]

The dominant purpose of all scholars of the Old Testament in early modern Europe was, after all, to understand the meaning of the original Hebrew. In pursuit of this aim they could put to use any of the methods available from the fields of philology, comparative linguistics, history, and archaeology. Another possible source of information was the study of Jewish traditions and rabbinical exegesis; some early modern Christian scholars were aware, for example, of the talmudic idea that God had created two leviathans at the beginning of the world, and had killed one and salted it in preparation for an eschatological banquet.[78] Pineda discussed both this idea and the claim that the Jews identified leviathan with a serpent or fish that encircled the world.[79] Very few writers, however, regarded such traditional teachings about leviathan as a source of hidden wisdom; most mentioned such beliefs only in order to ridicule them.[80] Thus Pineda commented on the world-encircling leviathan, 'A huge fish, indeed, and a huge lie', and went on to exclaim: 'But the amazing thing is that the Jews want to eat dried and salted fish for many thousands of years!'[81] The Spanish Jesuit Gaspar Sanchez likewise declared that he would ignore the many Jewish 'fictions and fantasies' on this topic.[82] So although this knowledge was available, it was almost never put to any serious use.

Where Judaic learning was seriously employed, however, was in the study of Hebrew etymology. It is here that we find the most suggestive developments taking place in the interpretation of 'leviathan'—suggestive, that is, not only because they seem to prepare the way for Hobbes's eventual use of the word, but also because they show how a kind of allegorical thinking

[76] de Pineda, Commentariorum in Iob [1st published 1597–1601], ii, p. 1115.

[77] Most (including de Vio, Steuco, Calvin, Zuñiga, Hessels van Est, Fischer [Piscator], Sanchez, Pineda, Menochio, Tirinus, Maucorps, Abbott, and Codurc) thought it was a whale; some (Mercier, Wild [Ferus]) thought it was either a whale or a marine dragon; some (Brenz, Ribera) thought it was a marine dragon; van den Driesche [Drusius] thought it was an unknown type of huge fish; Beza (and, later, Bochart) thought it was a crocodile; Bustamente de la Cámara thought it was a hydra. For detailed references see Malcolm, 'Name and Nature of Leviathan', p. 29.

[78] See the Talmud, Baba bathra, i, pp. 74b–75a.

[79] de Pineda, Commentariorum in Iob, ii, p. 1115.

[80] The Protestant Hebraist Paul Büchlein ['Fagius'] did argue that the apocalyptic feast was not meant to be taken literally, but was merely an allegory about the destruction of Satan (Sententiae vere elegantes, p. 61), and his judgement was later endorsed by the French cabbalist Jacques Gaffarel (Curiositez inouyes, p. 32); but these were exceptions to the general rule.

[81] de Pineda, Commentariorum in Iob, ii, p. 1115 ('Ingens profecto piscis, ingensque mendacium'; 'Sed mirum quod velint Iudaei, pisce, & per multa annorum millia desiccato & salito vesci!').

[82] Sanchez, In librum Iob, p. 492 ('figmenta, & somnia').

reasserted itself, even among those scholars who took a strongly philological approach to biblical exegesis.

Where the analysis of the etymological sense of the word 'leviathan' is concerned, the earliest tradition followed by Western commentators was the one established by Jerome, who explained that 'some people, indeed, say that "leviathan" means "addition"'.[83] The word he used was 'additamentum', which might be translated as 'addition', 'increase', or 'excess'; his explanation was that, through the sin of pride, the Devil had tried to add to his own nature. Isidore of Seville and Gregory the Great repeated the etymology, each giving the explanation a different twist.[84] Others supposed that since leviathans were of exceptional physical size, 'additamentum' was a way of referring to the degree to which they exceeded other creatures; this view was accepted by both Thomas Aquinas and the influential fourteenth-century biblical scholar Nicholas of Lyra.[85]

Although some of these commentators knew Hebrew, none gave any specific account of the basis of this etymology; the 'additamentum' claim seems merely to have been repeated from one writer to another. But in the early fifteenth century an alternative interpretation was offered by a prominent Hebrew scholar: Paul of Burgos, the former rabbi Solomon Ha-Levi, who had converted to Christianity and had become Archbishop of Burgos in 1415. Discussing Job 3: 8 ('Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready to raise up a leviathan'), Paul wrote that according to 'some commentaries of the Jews', the meaning was 'They curse it that curse the day, who are ready to rouse his society'; he explained that 'the word "leviathan" is ambiguous in Hebrew. In one sense it means that great fish. And in another sense it means the same as "his (or their) society".' This verse, therefore, was a reference to professional mourners, who were able 'by their words to rouse his society to wailing and weeping'.[86]

Thanks to Paul of Burgos, this alternative view was frequently discussed from the early sixteenth century onwards. In 1532 the French editor and Hebrew scholar Robert Étienne published a glossary of biblical names in which 'Leuiathan' was explained as 'his joining-together or society [Copu-

[83] See the version of Jerome's commentary in 'Philippus Presbyter', In historiam Iob, p. 199 ('Leuiathan uero additamentum quidam aiunt interpretari').

[84] Ibid., p. 199; Isidore of Seville, Etymologiarum, I.viii.11; Gregory, 'Moralium libri', PL lxxv, col. 645; lxxvi, col. 682.

[85] Thomas Aquinas, In librum Iob, p. 427; de Lyra, Postilla, postil on Job 40.

[86] de Lyra, Postilla, 'additio' to Job 3: 8 ('quosdam hebraeorum expositiones'; 'Maledicunt ei qui maledicunt diei. qui parati sunt suscitare societatem suam'; 'nomen leuiathan equivocum est in hebraeo. Uno modo signat illum magnum piscem. Et alio modo signat idem quod societatem suam su eorum'; 'per verba sua suscitare societatem suam ad lamentationes & fletum').

latio vel societas sua]'.[87] Three years later, Tommaso de Vio [Cardinal Cajetan] specified the Hebrew word on which this interpretation was based: 'The Jews also deny that it means "their addition" [additamentum eorum]; they say, however, that if it is to be taken as having a meaning, it means "their joining together" [copulationem eorum]. For they say it is derived from liv'iah, which means "joining together".'[88] This was a reference to the Hebrew verb 'lwh', meaning 'to join, to accompany'; to modern scholars this must seem a reasonable guess, since it has the same consonantal base as the verb meaning 'to twist, to turn', from which the modern etymology of 'leviathan' is derived.[89] The same verb was also adduced by Agostino Steuco in his commentary (also written in the second quarter of the sixteenth century, though not published until 1577): '"leviathan" can mean "sticking together" and "society" [cohaerentiam, societatemque], from "levia", "he stuck".'[90]

At this stage, however, what was lacking was any explanation of why a large aquatic monster (or allegorical representation of the Devil) should have a name which meant 'society'. The first attempt to supply this was made by the Spanish Jesuit Ribera in 1587. Noting that the word 'behemoth' used the plural form of 'behema' for what he called 'amplifying' purposes, he added: 'I think that the great dragon is called "leviathan"—i.e., "their gathering together"—for the same reason, because many seem to have been gathered into one.'[91] At the end of the following decade, Ribera's suggestion was taken up and developed by Pineda; and it is with Pineda's much richer account that one begins to find some of the conceptual resonances that connect this exegetical tradition with Hobbes's use of the term. According to Pineda, the word 'lwh' (which he gave as 'lavah') was used 'to mean that society, or joining together, or accompaniment, which at a certain time inferiors exhibit to their superiors, either by serving them, or by accompanying them, or by waiting on them, or by giving them some benefit or honour'.[92] So 'leviathan' meant 'addition', or 'society', or 'accompaniment' (Pineda seems to have been the first to realize that the old 'additamentum' theory was based not on

[87] Étienne, 'Hebraica, chaldaica, graecáque & latina nomina', separately foliated, here fo. 23r.

[88] de Vio, Opera omnia, ii, p. 548 ('Negant quoque Hebraei interpretari additamentum eorum: sed si interpretandum est, significare copulationem eorum. aiunt enim deduci à liu'iah, quae significat copulationem').

[89] See Klein, Comprehensive Etymological Dictionary, p. 296.

[90] Steuco, 'In librum Iob, enarrationes', in his Opera omnia, i, fo. 188v ('Leuiathan potest cohaerentiam, societatemque sonare à leuia, adhaesit'). Hebrew verbs are cited in the form of the 3rd person singular aorist, which gives the consonantal base.

[91] Ribera, In librum prophetarum commentarii, p. 445 ('amplificandum'; 'Eadem causa opinor magnum draconem vocari leviathan, id est, congregationem eorum, quod in vno multi videntur esse congregati').

[92] de Pineda, Commentariorum in Iob, ii, p. 1113 ('significare illam societatem, vel copulationem aut comitatum, quem ad certum tempus, minores exhibent maioribus vel servendo, vel comitando, vel adstando, vel aliquid emolumenti, aut honoris tribuendo').

a different etymology, but merely on a different interpretation of the same word); it was composed of 'lavah' and 'thanin' ('serpent' or 'dragon'), and its full meaning was therefore 'a dragon joined to itself, or joined to others, or having a joining together in itself [habens in se copulationem]'.[93] Pineda noted Ribera's explanation, and added, for good measure, two more ways in which the concept of 'joining together' might be relevant. The first concerned the leviathan's scales, which, as the biblical account made clear, were joined very tightly together. And the second related to the way in which the great leviathan was 'joined' by other creatures: 'because the leviathan has the joining together of many, who provide its accompaniment and entourage; this can be taken either actively, because the leviathan joins itself to others, or passively, because others accompany it.'[94] He concluded: 'But it is better to take it at the same time both actively and passively; because the leviathan itself has the addition and joining of all those whose head he is, and whom he unites in one body [concorporat], as if they are his limbs.'[95]

Pineda's book was widely read (not only by Catholics), and almost all biblical commentators in the first half of the seventeenth century seem to have accepted that the meaning of the word 'leviathan' was to be found somewhere in the field of meanings which he had established. Thus, on the Protestant side, we find Johann Fischer [Piscator] and his fellow Calvinist David Pareus both arguing that the term 'leviathan' denoted the 'sticking together' of the scales or body parts of a great marine creature.[96] The Jesuit Gaspar Sanchez also explained that 'leviathan' was derived from 'lava', meaning 'to join together' or 'to stick together', but he preferred the idea of smaller creatures accompanying the leviathan: 'Fishes and shells are said to attach themselves to the whale and stick to it, as if to rocks.'[97] Then, taking a lightly allegorical hint from Pineda, he added: 'The fishes stick to these great aquatic beasts just as other inferiors stick to kings, desiring or hoping to get some advantage from associating with them.'[98] In 1630 the Italian Jesuit Giovanni

[93] Ibid., p. 1114 ('additamentum, aut societatem, vel comitatum'; 'Thanin, id est, serpens aut Draco, quasi dicat, Draco copulans sibi, aut copulatus aliis, aut habens in se copulationem').

[94] Ibid., p. 1114 ('quod Leuiathan copulationem habet multorum, quibus comitatum, & ornatum incedit; quod vel active, quia Leuiathan se adiungat aliis, vel passiue, quod illum alii comitentur, accipi potest').

[95] Ibid., p. 1121 ('Sed praestat vt actiue simul, & passiue interpretemur; quod ipse Leuiathan, habeat additamentum, & accessionem eorum omnium, quorum ipse est caput; & quae tanquam sua membra, sibi concorporat').

[96] Fischer, In librum Jobi, p. 385 ('laváh, adjecit, addidit: à multitudine & cohaesione squamarum, quia in illo squama squamae addita est'); Pareus, Opera, iii, p. 316 ('Additamentum eorum: vel copulatio'; 'Draco, vel serpens, vel Cetus, quia squamae & partes eius valde cohaerent').

[97] Sanchez, In librum Iob commentarii, p. 492 ('laua'; 'copulare . . . aut adhaerere'; 'Balaenae autem pisces, & conchae dicuntur adglutinari; & adhaerere quasi saxis').

[98] Ibid., p. 492 ('Magnis hisce aquatilibus belluis pisces adhaerent, sicut Regibus inferiores alij, qui ex ea societate aliquid captant, aut sperant emolumenti').

Stefano Menochio followed Pineda quite closely when giving the etymology of the word, and then offered a range of explanations, one of which was that 'the lesser fishes accompany the great whales and are associated with them'.[99] And in 1646 the Jesuit Balthasar Cordier, after nodding briefly at the old 'additamentum' theory of Aquinas and Nicholas of Lyra, explained that there were 'other writers who say that the word "leviathan" means "the gathering together of them", that is, of the fishes, as if to describe a mass of fishes, insofar as it is so big that all the other fishes seem to have been heaped together in it'.[100] In a further comment, he observed that the whale 'joins to itself and incorporates into itself' in the most literal sense all the fishes it meets—i.e., it swallows them.[101] In this way the whale stood allegorically for the Devil, who sought to devour mankind. Moreover, the Devil thereby performed a sort of parodic inversion of the role of Christ, who, as head of the body of the Church, 'tries to draw all men into his own body, so that they may be vivified by his spirit, as if they were his own limbs'. The Devil, on the other hand, 'is the head of all the impious: the totality of them constitutes his body, which he rules, governs, and animates with his wicked spirit.' That body is the leviathan described in Job 41, whose scales are joined so tightly together; 'this, therefore, is the Devil's greatest concern: to get all men to associate with him, to draw them into such a body, and to transform them into limbs which cohere with him.'[102]

As the example of Cordier shows, the traditional allegorical identification of the leviathan with the Devil was far from dead in this period. But the exploration of Hebrew etymology had opened up a new way of finding meanings in a biblical text, a way which did not fall within the old exegetical schema (literal, moral, allegorical, anagogical); as Pineda's musings on the significance of 'leviathan' showed, etymology could be used to suggest a range of significances, from the literally descriptive (joined-together scales) to the symbolic (subjects associating with their kings). In this particular case, the symbolism of kingship, subjection, and association was reinforced by three additional factors. One was the description of the leviathan in Job 41: 34 as 'a king over all the children of pride'. The second was the well-established understanding that in some biblical passages the term 'dragon'

[99] Menochio, Brevis explicatio, p. 734 ('quòd minores pisces cete grandia comitentur, & illis associentur').

[100] Cordier, 'In librum Job', col. 800 ('alii auctores, qui dicunt vocem Leviathan significare congregationem eorum, scilicet piscium, quasi dicas acervum piscium, eò quòd tantae sit magnitudinis, ut in illo uno omnes alii coacervati videantur').

[101] Ibid., col. 802 ('sibi copulat et concorporat').

[102] Ibid., col. 803 ('conaturque omnes in corpus suum trajicere, ut tanquàm membra sua suo spiritu vivificentur'; 'impiorum omnium est caput, quorum universitas est ipsius corpus, quod ille regit, gubernat, et spiritu suo iniquo animat'; 'Haec idcircò summa ipsius cura, omnes homines sibi sociare, in tale corpus trajicere, et in membra quae sibi cohaerant transmutare').

was used for human rulers: on that basis the Hebrew lexicographer Valentin Schindler, for example, listed 'leviathan' as 'the name of a sea-dragon' and then added that it was 'thence, metaphorically, a prince or king'.[103] And the third was the idea (expressed by Cordier, among others) that, just as Christ had a mystical body into which humans could be incorporated, so too the Devil had his own body of people 'joined together' as one.[104] However, since the quasi-allegorical interpretations based on etymology were not directly tied to the traditional allegory of the Devil, the idea that the leviathan might symbolize a ruler 'incorporating' his subjects, while it may have been reinforced in some ways by this sort of association with the notion of a Satanic 'body', was not necessarily confined to a negative meaning.

The writer who, after Pineda, did the most to develop this idea of an association or incorporation of subjects with their rulers—and, at the same time, to move it away from any Satanic connotations—was a Parisian Capuchin, Jacques Boulduc or Bolduc ('Bolducius'), whose commentary on Job was published in Paris in 1619 and reprinted in 1637. Boulduc began by giving the fullest account so far of the meaning of the base-verb 'lavah': to lend or borrow, to add or join, to associate, to unite. The word 'liviath', meaning 'crown', was, he argued, derived from it: 'liviath' meant 'joining together' or 'addition' ('copulatio, adiunctio, additamentum'), in reference to the way in which flowers were joined together in a garland. 'Leviathan' was derived from 'liviath' plus 'n' ('nun', the feminine pronoun); it meant 'the joining together and, as it were, union or sticking together of them', with 'of them' in the feminine standing for the neuter, meaning 'of many things'.[105] Boulduc then offered a whole range of explanations of how this etymology could be applied. Leviathan was, he suggested, to be understood in the first place as the totality of fishes. Or it was so called because it was an animal whose scales were closely joined together; or because it was the phenomenon of many fishes coming together in the sea; or because it was an animal which acts like the 'chief and king' of innumerable fishes, and 'brings with it a remarkable entourage and a distinguished accompaniment, for its majesty's dignity'.[106] This last point was developed further. Boulduc cited the reference to the dragon and the fishes sticking to its scales in Ezekiel 29: 3–4, and

[103] Schindler, Lexicon pentaglotton, col. 931 ('nomen draconis marini'; 'Deinde per metaphoram, princeps, rex').

[104] Cf., e.g., Wild, Iobi historiae explicatio, p. 612 ('Nam sicut Christi & qui Christi sunt vnum sunt corpus, ita & sathan & angeli eius, & homines mali vnum constituunt corpus atque haec est ratio cur appelletur Behemot numero multitudinis').

[105] Boulduc, Commentaria in librum Iob, ii, p. 927 ('copulationem & velut vnionem seu adhaesionem earum').

[106] Ibid., p. 928 ('admirabilem secum fert associationem, illustremque comitatum, pro suae maiestatis dignitate').

commented: 'In these words, an allusion is made to what we have said about leviathan, and it is shown that that way in which the fishes and sea-shells stick to him is ordained by God as a sign of royal dignity, as subjects adhere to their king and honour him by accompanying him.'[107] Rejecting the etymology which combined 'lavah' with 'thanin' ('snake', or 'dragon'), he insisted:

'leviathan' is, however, a more general name, which is sometimes used not only for the genus of fishes, but also for men. And it is especially used for him who, placed in a position of dignity, is thus the head of many people, so that he is called by the epithet 'leviathan', meaning the joining together of those people who serve as soldiers under him and who are to be traced back to him, as if to their origin and their head.[108]

By this stage in his argument, Boulduc had left far behind any association with the Devil—even an indirect one, via the Egyptian Pharoah. 'Leviathan' was now simply a general epithet for a king, connoting the way in which he gave unity to a multiplicity of subjects. Boulduc then added a comment which seems strikingly to foreshadow the imagery and the concerns of Hobbes's Leviathan:

Therefore I would think that the name 'leviathan' is also used for kings, not so much allegorically, or by analogy with the whale or the sea-dragon (on the grounds that kings are the greatest of all in their kingdoms in the same way that the whale is the greatest among fishes, as some writers argue quite well), but rather because of the way in which the inhabitants and subjects of the whole kingdom are gathered together in an ordered way and united with their sole head, that is, their king. Kings and rulers . . . are called 'leviathan' insofar as each of them is the head of one mystical and cohering body, composed of many different parts ['limbs', 'members'] joined together—that is, he is the chief part, on which the life and strength of all the others depend.[109]

It would be good to know more of Jacques Boulduc, who was evidently a learned man and an original thinker. Biographical information is, unfortunately, very sparse, but enough is available to connect him, at least indirectly, with Hobbes. He was born in 1559 or 1560, of a Parisian famille de robe, and was trained for a legal career; but in 1582 he joined the Capuchin order.[110] In 1591 he was nominated 'gardien' of the Capuchin convent in Paris (which was situated on the rue Saint-Honoré); he died there in late 1646.[111] Apart from his lengthy commentary on Job, he published only three books: De ecclesia ante legem libri tres (Lyon, 1626; second edition, Paris, 1630); De ecclesia post legem, liber analogicus (Paris, 1630); and De oggio christiano, libri tres (Lyon, 1640). All three formed part of a connected pattern of argument, to which his work on Job was also related.

[107] Ibid. ('Quibus verbis alluditur ad id quod dicimus de Leuiathan, & ostenditur illam eius piscium & ostrearum maris adhaesionem esse à Deo ordinatam in signum Regiae dignitatis, cui subditi adhaerent & exteriori ornant comitatu').

[108] Ibid. ('Leuiathan autem generalius nomen est, quod non solùm de genere piscium, sed etiam de hominibus, aliquando vsurpatur. Et praesertim de illo qui in dignitate positus, ita multorum caput est, vt per antonomasiam, appelletur Leuiathan, hoc est copulatio eorum, qui sub illo militant & ad illum tanquam ad suum genus & caput reducuntur').

[109] Ibid. ('Propterea crediderim nomen Leuiathan dici etiam de Regibus, non tam allegoricè, vel per analogiam ad cetum, vel draconem marinum, quod sicut cetus inter pisces, ita illi in suo regno omnium maximi sint, vt nonnulli non malè exponunt, quàm propter totius regni incolarum & subditorum cum suo vnico capite, id est Rege, ordinatam collectionem & vnionem. Reges & dynastae . . . appellantur Leuiathan, eò quòd vnius mystici ex multis, diuersisque membris compacti & constantis corporis caput sunt, id est, praecipuum, de quo aliorum omnium firmitas, vitaque pendet, membrum').

In De ecclesia ante legem Boulduc analysed the religion of the patriarchs before the 'law' (i.e., before Moses), discussing their system of sacrifices, priesthood, and so on.[112] This theme was developed further in De oggio christiano, where he traced—using some highly questionable etymological methods—the diffusion of those patriarchal sacrifices throughout the pagan world. And in De ecclesia post legem he argued that the sacraments introduced by Jesus were merely versions of the practices of the primeval patriarchal religion, which it was Jesus's mission to restore; he also claimed that Jesus had re-promulgated the ancient natural law which had been set out in the 'praecepta Noachidarum', the seven precepts imparted by God to the sons of Noah (i.e., the whole post-diluvian human race, as opposed to the Jewish people).[113] Boulduc's concern with the Book of Job arose from an ongoing debate in the scholarly literature over the origins and dating of that text. Like some other writers, he believed that the Book of Job derived from the pre-Mosaic age.[114] In De oggio christiano he called the book of Job 'the most ancient of the holy books', and drew attention to the fact that much of its teaching was in the form of parables.[115] So, if the description of behemoth and leviathan was a fable or parable about kings and their relationship with their subjects, it was an expression of the most ancient wisdom known to man—the wisdom of the true patriarchal religion.

Boulduc's work does not seem to have had a large impact. Almost the only major contemporary thinker to have discussed his ideas in print was John

[110] Prevost, 'Bolduc'. (The date of birth is not specified here, but may be inferred from Mersenne's statements that Boulduc was 'nearly 80' ('prez de 80 ans') in 1638 and 80 in 1640: Mersenne, Correspondance, viii, p. 222; x, p. 220.)

[111] Prevost, 'Bolduc' (dating his death [28 Nov./] 8 Dec. 1646); Édouard d'Alençon, 'Boulduc (Boldducius)' (dating it [29 Oct./] 8 Sept. 1646). I discount the statement in Dionigi da Genova, Bibliotheca, p. 166, that he died in 1650, aged 75.

[112] Boulduc, De ecclesia ante legem, esp. pp. 83, 271, 281 ff.

[113] On these precepts, knowledge of which was derived from the Talmud and from rabbinical writers such as Maimonides, see Müller, Tora für die Völker.

[114] Boulduc, Commentaria in librum Iob, i, pp. 2–6 (discussing Pineda's even stronger view, which was that the Book of Job was actually written before the Pentateuch).

[115] Boulduc, De oggio christiano, p. 198 ('liber Iob sacrorum antiquissimus'; 'saltem ad hoc tempus fabularum inuentio referenda videtur').

Selden: in his treatise on natural law among the Jews, published in 1640, he referred four times to the commentary on Job, four times to De ecclesia ante legem, and once to De ecclesia post legem. But his comments were mostly critical—especially where Boulduc's two listings of the seven precepts of the sons of Noah were concerned, which he reproduced in full in order to register his disagreements with them.[116]

However, Boulduc did have one stalwart admirer and champion: Marin Mersenne. When he wrote his own commentary on the book of Genesis, Mersenne drew attention to Boulduc's commentary on Job, praising him as a 'most learned' and 'accurate' interpreter of that text. Although Mersenne's book was printed in 1623, four years after the appearance of Boulduc's work, it referred to it as something 'which he will shortly publish': this indicates not only that Mersenne's own text had been a long time in the making but also, more importantly, that he enjoyed such close personal relations with the Capuchin friar that he had been shown his work on Job in manuscript.[117] (In the brief memoir of Mersenne written by his companion Hilarion Coste, Boulduc does indeed appear in the list of his personal friends.)[118] Mersenne also became an enthusiast for Boulduc's later work. During the period 1638–41, in his correspondence with André Rivet, a Calvinist theologian at Leiden, he repeatedly drew attention to both De ecclesia ante legem and De oggio christiano, urging Rivet to tell his friend Gerardus Vossius that he should study Boulduc's arguments.[119] Evidently, Boulduc's work struck Mersenne as both scholarly and original: he told Rivet that the commentary on Job contained 'a mass of remarkable observations on the Hebrew, which are all his own, and no rabbi has ever made so many'.[120]

It was presumably in Paris that Hobbes made the detailed investigation into the authorship of the Pentateuch and other books of the Bible, the fruits of which are presented in Part 3 of Leviathan. Of all his known friends and contacts in the French capital, Mersenne was the one most closely involved in this field of study. The library catalogue of Mersenne's convent has entries for the general Bible commentaries of Nicholas de Lyra (in the Venice, 1603 edition), de Vio (Lyon, 1639), and Menochio (Cologne, 1630); it also includes the commentaries on the Book of Job by Pineda (Cologne, 1613), Sanchez (Lyon, 1625), Cordier (Antwerp, 1646), and Boulduc (both Paris, [116] Selden, Opera omnia, i, cols. 163, 164 (listings), 228, 345, 349, 351, 375, 570, 747.

[117] Mersenne, Quaestiones celeberrimae, cols. 845 ('doctissimus Iobi interpres'), 916 ('accuratum Iobi interpretem'); p. 1703 ('quem breui daturus est in lucem').

[118] de Coste, 'Vie du R. P. Marin Mersenne', p. 52.

[119] Mersenne, Correspondance, viii, pp. 222, 601; ix, p. 10; x, p. 220.

[120] Ibid., viii, p. 601 ([2/] 12 Nov. 1639: 'quantité de remarques curieuses sur l'Hebrieu, qui sont de luy seul, et jamais Rabbin n'en a feist tant').

1619, and Paris, 1637).[121] But of course it is not necessary to postulate that Hobbes read widely among these works; it is sufficient to suppose that his friend Mersenne had done so, and that, when either the word 'leviathan' or the concept of a ruler incorporating his subjects came up in conversation, Mersenne was able to report what some of those commentators had said, and perhaps also to direct Hobbes to the relevant pages. A further possibility is that some such discussion took place in the presence of Boulduc himself, when the latter was also visiting Mersenne. Perhaps, at some time between the printing of Hobbes's De cive (arranged by Mersenne in the spring of 1642) and the death of Boulduc in late 1646, the elderly Capuchin was present when there was a discussion of Hobbes's distinction between a 'multitude' and a 'people', and commented that the idea of a people being incorporated under a sovereign was taught through the allegory of the leviathan in the Book of Job.

For the decision to use the biblical leviathan as a symbol of the relationship between ruler and people did not obviously grow organically out of other ideas possessed already by Hobbes. This makes it seem plausible that his choice of that particular symbolic figure should be attributed to an extraneous influence. And there is no more likely influence than that of the exegetical tradition of which Boulduc was the exponent par excellence, and to which Hobbes's attention may very well have been drawn, either by his friend Marin Mersenne or by Jacques Boulduc himself.

The Engraved Title Page

The engraved title page of Leviathan furnishes what is perhaps the most famous visual image in the history of political philosophy. In the upper half of the page there is a walled town containing houses, a church, and a fortress; behind it there is a sparsely inhabited landscape (with a stretch of sea on the right-hand horizon); rising above them all is a colossal figure, with a crowned head, holding a sword in his right hand and a crozier in his left; and the body of the colossus is made up of a tightly packed mass of small figures, who either stand or kneel, looking towards the head of the colossus, with their backs to the viewer. It is this image of the sovereign power, as something both composed of and giving form to the mass of people whom it governs, that has enjoyed a lasting influence. Less celebrated, but also significant, are the components of the bottom half of the page, where, on each side of the title [121] Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, Paris, MS 6203, pp. 153–5, 164, 198. This catalogue also has entries for the other works of Boulduc: pp. 192 (De ecclesia ante legem; De ecclesia post legem), 389 (De oggio christiano).

Non est potestas Super Terram quae Comparetur ei Iob 41 24
LEVIATHAN
Or
THE MATTER, FORME and POWER of A COMMON-WEALTH ECCLESIASTICALL and CIVIL
By THOMAS HOBBES of MALMESBVRY
London
Printed for Andrew Crooke
1651

FIGURE 1. Leviathan, Head edition, engraved title page

itself, a series of images is given in framed compartments. On the left (under the sword held by the colossus) the series is concerned with temporal power, containing a battle scene; a trophy display of weapons, banners, and military equipment; a cannon; a coronet; and a castle. On the right (under the crozier) the series represents ecclesiastical power, with a theological disputation; a set of symbolic weapons (a pair of horns labelled 'Dilemma', a trident labelled 'Syllogisme', and three two-pronged forks where the prongs are called 'Spiritual' and 'Temporal', 'Directe' and 'Indirecte', and 'Real' and 'Intentional'); a set of thunderbolts which must represent the so-called 'thunderbolt of excommunication'; a bishop's mitre; and a church.[122] Like the church which is situated just above it in the main picture, this church building has an unusual construction, with double towers or spires flanking the nave; the theme of duality or division is subtly insinuated, by visual means, into most of the elements on the ecclesiastical side, while the temporal iconography plays its own subtle games with the figure of a circle, arguably the most unitary geometrical figure of all. And in the main picture the two sides, civil and ecclesiastical, are brought together, not only insofar as the colossus grasps the symbolic instruments of both, but in a more elementary kind of visual dynamic: the two vertical axes of the lower half of the page become, as it were, realigned and channelled, along the lengths of the sword and crozier, towards a point of implied convergence above the crowned head. A strong visual imagination has been at work in the composition of this design—possibly that of an artist more skilled in such matters than Hobbes himself.[123] But what cannot be doubted is that Hobbes was closely involved in the development of this whole design; no artist, on his own, would have been sufficiently familiar with the contents of the book to come up with such an elaborate, apt, and powerful representation of its argument.

Who was the artist? Before that question can be addressed, it is necessary to note that there is another version of this design, finely drawn on vellum and prefixed to the presentation manuscript which Hobbes gave to Charles II. The drawing differs from the engraving in various tiny matters of detail, and in one large respect: the body of the colossus is composed not of very small full-length figures with their backs to the viewer, but of larger human heads, facing outwards. Also, the quotation from Job which runs along the top of the engraving is absent from the drawing; and in the cartouche at the bottom of the page, where the engraving has 'London | Printed for Andrew Crooke | 1651', the drawing has 'Anno Christi | 1651'. This last date need not imply that the drawing was made in 1651; if we assume that the manuscript was intended to be presented when the book was published, we can also assume that it would have been clear, by any time in the second half of 1650, that that publication was going to take place in 1651. Several interpretations of the relation between the drawing and the engraving are possible. The draughtsman and the engraver might have been two different people, or one and the same; the drawing on vellum might have been the original, used (though adapted) during the making of the engraving; or both might have derived from a common original; or the drawing could have been a subsequent and adapted copy of the engraving. Some details of the evidence do tend to suggest, however, that the drawing preceded the engraving. The drawing appears to be an integral part of the vellum manuscript, and the text of that manuscript derives (as we shall see) from an earlier state of the text than the one sent off to the printers. The quotation from Job appears—on visual grounds—to have been added as an afterthought to the engraving, crammed into the upper edge of the design. And, most importantly, it is easy to suppose—on aesthetic grounds—that the body made of large heads was turned, on second thoughts, into a body made of tiny people, but very difficult to imagine the opposite change being made, as the heads give a peculiarly ugly quality to the body of the colossus (especially where its arms are concerned), turning it into a lumpy mass of protuberances. For all these uncertainties, though, one thing is clear: the drawing is not an amateur sketch, but the work of an accomplished artist.

[122] For a more detailed description (pointing out, e.g., that the participants in the disputation wear doctor's gowns and Roman Catholic birettas), see Corbett and Lightbown, Comely Frontispiece, pp. 219–30. On the 'thunderbolt of excommunication' see Leviathan, p. 806.

[123] See the discussion of this point in K. Brown, 'Artist of the Title-Page', pp. 30–31.

FIGURE 2. Leviathan, fair-copy manuscript (BL, MS Egerton 1910), title page (faint pencil drawing on vellum, by Abraham Bosse)

One tradition has identified that artist as Wenceslaus (Wenzel, Václav) Hollar, the famous etcher from Bohemia. In the nineteenth century the engraving itself, not just the drawing, was confidently attributed to him; but it has since been pointed out that the lettering in the engraving does not correspond to any of Hollar's typical styles, and some other features specific to the engraving have been used to sow further doubts.[124] However, the drawing itself has been seen as characteristic of Hollar, so the suggestion has been made that a second version of this Hollar drawing was sent by Hobbes to England, where the plate was made from it by a local engraver.[125] Hollar had lived in England between 1636 and 1644, enjoying aristocratic patronage, and might perhaps have made Hobbes's acquaintance then; thereafter he lived in Antwerp until 1652, keeping up, apparently, some English royalist connections. Hobbes could have commissioned the drawing through correspondence; or Hollar might even have passed through Paris in 1650, as there is some evidence that has been used to suggest that he visited Jersey (presumably, to see Charles II) in that year.[126] However, that evidence is extremely slight: it consists essentially of the fact that he engraved a view of Jersey in 1650, and there is no reason to think that he drew the view himself.[127] Some other evidence suggests that in Restoration England Hollar had no personal contact with Hobbes and did not know what he looked like.[128] So although some art historians may feel confident in the attribution of the drawing to Hollar, there is very little external evidence to support it.

[124] See ibid., pp. 24–8.

[125] Ibid., pp. 29, 36 (citing authorities in Prague who, on the basis of a photograph, ascribed the drawing to Hollar).

Another tradition attributes the work—certainly the engraving, and probably the drawing too—to the French etcher Abraham Bosse. This tradition goes back to within the lifetimes of both Bosse and Hobbes. The sceptical savant Michel de Marolles, who knew several of Hobbes's French friends and admirers in the 1650s, formed a huge collection of prints which was acquired by Colbert for Louis XIV in 1667 and is now in the Louvre; the engraved title page of Leviathan was included there in the volumes containing 790 prints by Bosse.[129] Subsequent catalogues of Bosse's work have always included the Leviathan title page, though without giving any specific reasons for the attribution.[130] It has also been claimed that the drawing is 'in a French style', and that it 'can be attributed with some confidence to Bosse'.[131] The combination of this rather subjective judgement and the attribution by de Marolles may not have been, in itself, very compelling; but a recent study by Horst Bredekamp has put forward a number of precise and striking similarities between both the drawing and the engraving on the one hand and various known works by Bosse on the other. In the light of Bredekamp's painstaking research, the attribution to Bosse can now be made with reasonable certainty.[132] The most problematic feature of the attribution [126] Ibid., p. 29; Springell, Connoisseur and Diplomat, pp. 151–2; Van Eerde, Wenceslaus Hollar, p. 42.

[127] See Pennington, Descriptive Catalogue, p. xxxiii.

[128] When John Aubrey had commissioned from Hollar an engraving of a portrait of Hobbes by Jan Baptist Jaspers (Gaspars, Caspar), Hollar wrote to Aubrey on 1 [/11] Aug. 1665: 'I haue now doone the Picture of M^r^. Hobbes, and haue shewed it to some of his acquaintance, who say it to be uery like' (Bodl., MS Aubrey 12, fo. 174r).

[129] de Marolles, Catalogue, p. 77 (listing two volumes with 790 items, but not specifying this engraving); Corbett and Lightbown, Comely Frontispiece, pp. 221–2. On de Marolles see Pintard, Libertinage érudit, pp. 278–9. For his acquaintance with Sorbière, François du Verdus, Thomas de Martel, and Abraham du Prat, see Sorbière, Lettres et discours, pp. 396–9; de Marolles, Mémoires, part 1, pp. 199, 276.

[130] See Corbett and Lightbown, Comely Frontispiece, p. 222; Blum, L'Oeuvre gravé, p. 33 (no. 608); Join-Lambert and Préaux, eds., Abraham Bosse, p. 259 (no. 268; attributing the engraving to Bosse definitely, but the original design to him tentatively).

[131] Corbett and Lightbown, Comely Frontispiece, p. 222.

[132] Bredekamp, Thomas Hobbes visuelle Strategien, pp. 39–52. In a previous study ('The Title Page of Leviathan'), published in 1998 before the appearance of Bredekamp's book, I followed Brown's attribution of the drawing to Hollar; when that study was reprinted in 2002 (Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 200–228) I unfortunately failed to correct the attribution in the light of Bredekamp's work. However, while I fully to Hollar—the idea that the close collaboration between author and artist, so evident in the design, most likely took place only by means of correspondence—does not apply in this case, since Bosse's house-cum-workshop was in the rue Harlay, on the Île de la Cité, roughly half-way between the pont Neuf and the pont Saint-Michel; Hobbes had lodgings on the pont Saint-Michel, a few minutes' walk away.[133] And there are other reasons for thinking that Hobbes would have found Bosse a congenial person to work with: he was a Protestant, and he had developed a strong interest in mathematics, studying under the geometer Girard Desargues in the 1630s and publishing several works by him in the 1640s.[134] Bosse also had a special interest in perspective, and published his own treatise on that subject in 1653.[135] His writings show a great concern with both clarity and proper method; it is easy to think that Hobbes would have warmed to someone who, for example, in his preface to Desargues's work on sun-dials, carefully distinguished between theoretical and practical knowledge, and paid special attention to varieties of geometrical nomenclature.[136]

Attributing the drawing to Abraham Bosse also makes it possible to suggest one element of the explanation of its most striking feature, the way in which the body of the colossus is made up of human heads. An earlier print by Bosse supplies, at least to a limited extent, a model for this. Entitled 'l'Homme fourré de malice', it shows a man whose cloak is lined not with animal-fur, but with women's heads—described in the accompanying text as dangerous animals.[137] If Hobbes approached Bosse with the request that he depict some sort of composite human being, it is understandable that the artist should have thought of his own previous attempt to incorporate multiple heads in a single figure. But this raises the larger question of what Hobbes might have had in mind when making such a request. As we have seen, his choice of the title 'Leviathan' was probably dictated by a special interpretation of that term, which saw it as standing for the way in which accept his attribution, I doubt his claim (pp. 52–5) that the drawing was subsequent to the engraving, and am unconvinced by the suggestion (p. 52) that in the drawing Bosse adapted the face of the colossus to make it resemble that of Charles II in the Hollar engraved portrait of Charles of 1650.

[133] See Blum, Abraham Bosse, pp. 7–8, 185; above, Ch. 1, n. 345.

[134] On his Protestantism see Lestringant, 'Abraham Bosse'; on his studies with Desargues see Blum, Abraham Bosse, pp. 41–54. It has been suggested that Bosse frequented Mersenne's circle (Manceau, 'Abraham Bosse', p. 55); but Mersenne's correspondence yields no evidence of this, beyond one reference by Mersenne in 1645 to works published by Bosse (Mersenne, Correspondance, xii, p. 563).

[135] Bosse, Moyen universel.

[136] Desargues, Maniere universelle, pp. 1–6, 14–16.

[137] See Join-Lambert and Préaux, eds., Abraham Bosse, p. 138 (no. 94), where it is dated to c.1634; this dating runs counter to Bredekamp's suggestion that it was designed as a subsequent satirical counterpart to the Leviathan drawing (Thomas Hobbes visuelle Strategien, p. 50). The accompanying text plays on the punning ambiguity of the title, which could mean 'the man stuffed full of malice' or 'the man with a fur lining of malice'.

a ruler incorporated his subjects. Hobbes was certainly not concerned with the physical nature of the biblical leviathan as a whale, crocodile, or dragon. The real meaning of the title of the book could not be conveyed by an image of one of those creatures, as the meaning was essentially abstract. The problem, therefore, was to find a way of presenting visually the abstract notion that a sovereign power incorporates, is composed of, and gives form to the subjects who are ruled by it.

This was not an easy task. For although the iconography of rulers was quite plentifully endowed—they could be depicted as classical deities or heroes, emblematic objects such as suns, and so on—the iconography of the relationship between sovereign, state, and people was extremely meagre. Almost the only standard visual image in this category was the 'Hercules gallicus', which depicted a large figure (Hercules, signifying the ruler, or in some cases the orator) controlling a multitude of smaller ones (the subjects, or the audience) by a skein of fine chains proceeding from his mouth to their ears.[138] This image was popular in France, and Hobbes may well have seen it there; he uses it in Leviathan to describe the 'Artificiall Chains' of civil laws, which proceed from the sovereign's mouth to the ears of every subject.[139] But the symbolism here was too mechanical and too unidirectional to convey Hobbes's more complex general theory about the way in which the sovereign not only controls the people but 'bears the person' of their collective identity.

A clue as to the solution which Hobbes may have found to this problem is given in the final paragraph of his 'Answer' to Davenant's Preface to Gondibert, written at the beginning of 1650:

> I beleeue (Sir) you haue seene a curious kind of perspectiue, where, he that lookes through a short hollow pipe, vpon a picture conteyning diuerse figures, sees none of those that are there paynted, but some one person made vp of their partes, conueighed to the eye by the artificiall cutting of a glasse. I find in my imagination an effect not vnlike it from your Poeme. The vertues you distribute there amongst so many noble Persons, represent (in the reading) the image but of one mans vertue to my fancy, which is your owne; and that so deepely imprinted, as to stay for euer there, and gouerne all the rest of my thoughts, and affections. . .[140]

A few years earlier, the poet Richard Fanshawe had also described this 'curious kind of perspective', in a dedicatory epistle addressed to Prince Charles:

> Your Highnesse may have seen at Paris a Picture (it is in the Cabinet of the great Chancellor there) so admirably design'd, that, presenting to the common beholders a multitude of little faces (the famous Ancestors of that Noble man); at the same time, to him that looks through a Perspective (kept there for that purpose) there appears onely a single portrait in great of the Chancellor himself; the Painter thereby intimating, that in him alone are contracted the Vertues of all his Progenitors; or perchance by a more subtile Philosophy demonstrating, how the Body Politick is composed of many naturall ones; and how each of these, intire in it self, and consisting of head, eyes, hands, and the like, is a head, an eye, or a hand in the other: as also, that mens Privates cannot be preserved, if the Publick be destroyed, no more then those little Pictures could remain in being, if the great one were defaced: which great one likewise was the first and chiefest in the Painters designe, and that for which all the rest were made.[141]

[138] See Skinner, Reason and Rhetoric, pp. 92–3. The image was called 'gallicus' because it derived from a description by Lucian of a picture of Hercules at Marseille.

[139] p. 328. For its use in France see Bardon, Portrait mythologique, p. 49.

[140] Davenant, Preface, p. 159 (Gondibert, ed. Gladish, p. 55).

The fullest description was given by the Minim friar Jean François Niceron in a treatise published in 1638, La Perspective curieuse. This was a treatise specifically devoted to 'curious' perspective, by which was meant the use of anamorphosis. An anamorphic picture is one which uses an exaggerated perspective to produce an image which appears grossly distorted when seen from the normal viewing position, but which, looked at from an unusual viewpoint or with the help of a correcting device, exhibits a 'normal' image.[142] Simple anamorphosis depended merely on a change of viewpoint (the most famous example being the skull in the foreground of Holbein's 'The Ambassadors'); and 'catoptric' anamorphosis used a mirror to perform the correction. But the crowning glory of Niceron's treatise was his account of 'dioptric' anamorphosis, where the correction depended on viewing the picture through a special lens. The method he used involved a polygonal or faceted lens, in an optic tube (like a small and slender telescope), which was placed in a fixed position at a short distance from the painted panel. Each of the various facets of the lens would transmit to the eye the image contained in a precise portion of the picture—a small trapezoid, lozenge, or other segment, depending on the shape of the facet. These portions of the picture were not contiguous on the picture itself, although they joined up and filled the visual field of the person looking through the lens. The trick, then, was in principle quite simple, thought it required precision and some artistic imagination to do it well. First, the contents of those scattered geometrical portions would be painted in on the panel, so that when viewed through the lens they composed a unified image of a person's face; then each of these dispersed fragments of faces on the panel would be completed, so that the picture itself consisted of a number of separate and whole faces. A clever artist could make each of these faces as different as possible from the master-

[141] Sir Richard Fanshawe, Translation of Guarini's Il pasto fido, pp. 3–4.
[142] See Baltrušaitis, Anamorphic Art, and Leeman, Anamorphosen.

FIGURE 3. Niceron, La Perspective curieuse (1638), table 48: the optical device, with polygonal lens (and drawing-stick for marking the lines while viewing through the lens) face whose fragments were dispersed among them; this would intensify the astonishment and delight of those who looked first at the picture as a whole, and then at the hidden image revealed by the lens.

FIGURE 4. Niceron, La Perspective curieuse (1638), table 49: the 'Ottoman sultans' design, showing the segments that form the portrait of Louis XIII when viewed through the lens

The example described by Niceron, and illustrated by him in the plates at the end of his book, was a picture he himself had painted, which was kept in the library of the Minim convent on the place Royale. It depicted fifteen (or, in the published illustration, twelve) Ottoman sultans in Turkish dress; but, on looking through the tube, the viewer saw a portrait of Louis XIII, dressed 'à la Françoise'. In this way, as Niceron explained, 'most of the emperors in this picture pay him homage, in so far as they each contribute a part of themselves to form his image, as if they were despoiling themselves to honour his triumph'.[143] We can be confident that Hobbes was familiar with this particular example of dioptric anamorphosis, as he was a frequent visitor to the Minim convent. In De homine he would refer to Niceron by name when he mentioned a huge anamorphic wall-painting which the Minim friar had made there.[144] John Aubrey included Niceron in his list of Hobbes's personal friends; in view of Niceron's close connection with Mersenne, this is highly plausible.[145] So it is likely that the picture in the Minim convent library was the one best known to Hobbes.

On the other hand, the one mentioned by Fanshawe, kept in the 'cabinet' of the Chancellor of France, Pierre Séguier, was probably made by a scientifically minded Jesuit in Lyon, Charles du Lieu, and there is no particular reason to think that Hobbes had seen it.[146] But although that picture was not itself political in its iconography (unlike the one in the Minim convent), no reader of Hobbes who turns to Fanshawe's text can fail to be struck by the way in which Fanshawe draws a political allegory out of the picture, describing it in terms uncannily reminiscent of the Leviathan title page. It is quite possible that Hobbes had read Fanshawe's dedicatory epistle (addressed to Prince Charles), which was published in 1647; the Prince himself might have asked Hobbes to explain the optical phenomenon described there, or Hobbes might have read Fanshawe's work independently.[147] (It is also possible that he had had personal relations with Fanshawe himself, who had been in Paris in [143] Niceron, Perspective curieuse, p. 115 ('la plus part de ces Empereurs en ce tableau luy rendent hommage, en sort qu'ils tribuent chacun quelque partie de soy pour former son image, comme s'ils se despoüilloient euxmesmes pour honorer son triomphe').

[144] Hobbes, De homine, IV.12.

[145] Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, p. 367. On Mersenne's relations with Niceron, and on the latter's biography more generally, see Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 211–18.

[146] See ibid., pp. 218–21.

[147] For evidence suggesting that optics may have been among the areas of mathematics discussed by Hobbes and the Prince, see above, Ch. 1, at n. 206.

late 1646.)[148] When Hobbes introduces into his reply to Davenant—which is itself a quasi-prefatory work—an elaborate comparison based on the dioptric device, this is itself strikingly reminiscent of the similar comparison in Fanshawe's dedicatory epistle; the most natural conclusion must surely be that Hobbes was prompted here, consciously or subliminally, by his own earlier reading of Fanshawe. And if Fanshawe's text was lodged in Hobbes's mind, the political allegory which it contained must have been lodged there too.

So it would not be surprising if, when Hobbes was trying to devise a visual representation of his theory of the relation between sovereign and people, his thoughts turned to the dioptric device and its ingenious way of combining multiple images in a single image. The correspondence with his political theory was highly suggestive. Each of the individual painted faces or figures really existed, as paint-marks on the canvas, while the master-image itself was only an image, a visual construct: in other words, they were natural bodies, and it was an artificial body. But at the same time they were all subordinate to the single image, and gained their real meaning by being subsumed under it.

This explanation of Hobbes's design for the title page image may help to explain why it is that the earlier version of that image, in the drawing, has faces looking out towards the viewer—an arrangement which accords with the standard examples (by Niceron and others) of paintings made for the dioptric device. Presumably Abraham Bosse's aesthetic sense was responsible for the revision of this in the engraved version. It is true that the drawing has a rather different appearance from Niceron's textbook example: instead of a neat pattern of isolated portraits, it offers a jumble of faces packed closely together, and instead of faces combining to form a single face, we appear to have faces forming a head and body. In practical terms, however, these differences are not very significant. The neatly separated heads shown by Niceron may have been chosen by him for the design's clarity in showing how the trick was done; as he said, the components could be more tightly packed together, and in some ways the trick would be enhanced if the painting were filled up with decoy elements.[149] As for whether faces turned into an image of a face, or of something else, that was entirely up to the ingenuity of the designer.

But in any case the image developed by Hobbes and Bosse was not an actual picture made to be viewed through the dioptric lens; all that is suggested here is that it was a visual conceit inspired by that device. For what Hobbes was trying to do with the figure in the title page was to present simultaneously, in the same picture, both the painting and the master-image that arose out of it. To show such simultaneity in one visual image was simply impossible. To demonstrate it philosophically, where the people and their sovereign were concerned, was, for Hobbes, not only possible, but one of the most fundamental aims of his book.

[148] See H. C. Fanshawe, History of the Fanshawe Family, pp. 143–4; Simeone, 'Sir Richard Fanshawe', p. 59. Fanshawe had been appointed the Prince's secretary for war in 1644, and had subsequently accompanied him as far as Jersey in 1646; thereafter he seems to have acted as a royalist messenger on the Continent (see Davidson, 'Fanshawe').

[149] See, e.g., the much more 'jumbled' designs in du Molinet, Cabinet de la bibliothèque, plate 7.

The Table of the Sciences

Finally, the folding table which forms part of Chapter 9 also calls for some comment. This is a schematic representation of the division of the sciences: it begins by dividing science or philosophy into two categories, natural and civil, and then proceeds by a series of divisions (mostly dichotomous) to break down natural philosophy into a number of individual sciences, listed on the right-hand side of the table, which range from 'first philosophy', geometry, arithmetic, and astronomy to ethics, poetry, rhetoric, logic, and 'The Science of JUST and UNIUST'.

Such tabular presentations, using brackets or braces to present complex sequences of sub-divisions, had become quite common in theoretical and pedagogical works printed during the previous century, especially in northern Europe. The remote origins of this method were to be found in ancient logic and dialectic, where 'division' was presented as a powerful analytic tool; a classic example was the 'tree' of Porphyry, which divided substance into corporeal and incorporeal, corporeal substance into animate and inanimate, and so on.[150] Hobbes himself gave versions of such trees in Chapter II of De corpore, analysing the 'predicaments' of body, quantity, quality, and relation. A more general use of dichotomizing tables became common in late medieval and Renaissance pedagogical texts, particularly in the field of medicine; and an especially influential example appeared in a widely read edition of Rudolph Agricola's treatise on dialectic, published in 1530.[151] But it was above all the educational reformer Petrus Ramus (Pierre de la Ramée, 1515–72) who popularized the use of dichotomizing tables for the systematic presentation of almost any body of knowledge. At a fundamental level of theory, this accorded with Ramus's own principle that there was a single logical method that applied to all subjects; in practice, however, the tables were used not for strict logical analysis but rather for the schematic presentation of any and every subject-matter.[152] The advantages of this schematic method were strongly felt by a later generation of pedagogical systematizers who were influenced by Ramist techniques: writers such as Bartholomäus Keckermann, whose Praecognitorum logicorum tractatus (1599) included no fewer than 25 such tables; Johannes Althusius, whose Politica (1603) contained an elaborate 'table' of the subject-matter of politics; or Clemens Timpler, whose Physicae systema (1605) offered two elaborate tabulations analysing natural philosophy and physics into their component bodies of knowledge.[153] The leading exponent of this technique was Johann Heinrich Alsted (Alstedius), whose massive Encyclopaedia, published in 1630, began with 38 tables analysing the contents of the whole work. Introducing those tables, Alsted emphasized that their value was both expository and mnemonic: using them made it possible 'for an idea of the most ample subject to be understood as easily as possible by the mind, and kept as long as possible in the memory'.[154] The general ordering of a subject-matter, not its logical analysis, was what mattered here; Alsted's first table, therefore, had a set of dichotomous divisions which terminated, on the right-hand side, in a numbered list of the books of his encyclopedia. This way of combining a dichotomous table and a list of contents, in order to explain to the reader, at the outset, the structure of a book, was a technique with which Hobbes was also familiar: the list of contents (entitled 'The Order') in the manuscript copies of his Elements of Law does exactly that, with a series of braced sub-divisions terminating in the titles and numbers of the chapters.[155]

[150] For a valuable summary see Maclean, 'Logical Division', esp. pp. 229–33.

[151] See Höltgen, 'Synoptische Tabellen'; Copenhaver and Schmitt, Renaissance Philosophy, p. 238; Ong, Ramus, Method, pp. 127–8.

The table in Chapter 9 of Leviathan bears some superficial resemblance to a table in an earlier work by Alsted, in which the 'disciplina philosophica' was broken down into its component parts. That table terminates in a list which runs down the page, from metaphysics and the mathematical sciences at the top to rhetoric, logic, and poetry (among others) at the bottom.[156] But although the overall arrangement of that list is similar, the underlying structure of the division is quite different. Alsted divides philosophy into three [152] Ong, Ramus, Method, pp. 199–202, 260 (emphasizing 'classroom practicality'); on the essentially pedagogical nature of Ramism see Hotson, Commonplace Learning (esp. pp. 46–7 on the use of dichotomies). On Ramist tables see also Siegel, Tabula, pp. 64–73.

[153] Althusius, Politica, sigs. (:)8v–2(:)2v; Timpler, Physicae systema, sigs. 2(:)5v–8v. On this generation see Hotson, Commonplace Learning, pp. 114–61.

[154] Alsted, Encyclopaedia, i, p. 1: 'ut rei amplissimae idea possit animo comprehendi quàm facillimè, & quàm diutissimè in memoriâ conservari'. The tables are on pp. 1–26.

[155] See Elements of Law, p. [xiv].

[156] See the table reproduced in Schmidt-Biggemann, Topica universalis, p. 131 (from Alsted, Cursus philosophici encyclopaedia libris XVII complectens (Herborn, 1620)).

branches: theoretical (containing metaphysics, physics, and the mathematical sciences), practical (including ethics, politics, and history), and poetic (which includes rhetoric and logic).[157] For Hobbes, every science other than politics is a branch of natural philosophy; one of the two sub-divisions of natural philosophy, physics, includes ethics, logic, and poetry, because these are concerned with the behaviour or speech of human beings, who are animate bodies. On one fundamental point, at least, Alsted and Hobbes were agreed: the exclusion of theology from the categorization of the philosophical sciences. This set Hobbes apart both from seventeenth-century Puritan writers such as William Ames (for whom ethics and jurisprudence were derivatives of theology) and from the Thomist tradition (derived from Aristotle and Boethius), in which the speculative sciences were divided into philosophical theology (including metaphysics), natural philosophy, and mathematics.[158] It also distinguished Hobbes's view from that of Descartes, for whom the starting-point of the sciences was metaphysics 'which contains the principles of knowledge, among which is the explanation of the main attributes of God'.[159] And although Hobbes's separation of natural and civil histories (as bodies of factual knowledge) from the sciences may seem Baconian in spirit, there is very little correlation between his table and the scheme set out in Bacon's Advancement of Learning, where 'divine philosophie, or naturall theologie' was one form of philosophy, poetry was placed in a separate category, and natural philosophy was contrasted with human philosophy, a category in which medicine (ignored by Hobbes) was an important element.[160]

The most puzzling thing about the table in Chapter 9 of Leviathan, though, is that it does not correlate at all closely with Hobbes's other writings on the same topic. His main discussion of the nature and division of the sciences comes in the first and sixth chapters of De corpore. There, while the exclusions of theology and history are also maintained, we find a much tighter definition of philosophy (in terms of knowledge, acquired by true reasoning, of the effects generated by certain causes, and of the possible causes of certain effects); we also find an account of the sciences which begins with a kind of 'first philosophy', consisting of true definitions derived from the analysis of our own concepts, and which then proceeds, via geometry, to physics, then to moral philosophy, and finally to civil philosophy. In Chapter 9 of [157] This arrangement was revised in Alsted's Encyclopaedia, i, p. 3, where rhetoric, logic, etc., were categorized as philology, and philosophy was divided into the theoretical and the practical.

[158] See Ames, Technometry, pp. 112–14; Thomas Aquinas, Division of the Sciences, pp. xiv–xvi, 52–3.

[159] Descartes, preface to Principes (1647), in his Oeuvres, ix(2), p. 14: 'qui contient les Principes de la connoissance, entre lesquels est l'explication des principaux attributs de Dieu'.

[160] Bacon, Advancement of Learning, pp. 62–107.

Leviathan philosophy or science is defined much more loosely ('Knowledge of the Consequence of one Affirmation to another'); 'first philosophy', although described as the 'first foundation' of all philosophy, is presented as a subdivision of natural philosophy, not as the conceptual grounding for it; and the cumulative structure set out in De corpore is rendered problematic by the fact that while ethics, the science of human behaviour, is indeed presented as a branch of physics, politics is given an entirely separate derivation. These divergences cannot be explained by supposing that Hobbes revised his opinion in De corpore after the writing of Leviathan, since the published De corpore substantially agrees, on these points, with what is known of the drafts of that text from 1645–6. Indeed, the whole cumulative structure set out there was the organizing principle of Hobbes's tripartite 'Elements of philosophy', announced by him as early as 1642. And, just to add to the puzzle, elsewhere in Leviathan Hobbes offers a definition of philosophy which seems closely connected to the earlier drafts of De corpore, and oblivious of the account given in Chapter 9.[161]

At the level of detail, some other features of the table in Chapter 9 are also puzzling. Although the whole point of the tabulation seems to be to arrive at the list of sciences given in capital letters on the right-hand side, some sciences go unnamed (such as knowledge of 'Consequences from the Qualities of Vegetables', for which there was a standard name, 'phytology'). One science which Hobbes does happily name, however, is astrology, which he defines as knowledge of 'Consequences from the Influence of the Starres'; although he had allowed, in his critique of Thomas White, that the stars did exert influences, he had also written there that the effects of those influences were incalculable (thus implying that no science of predictive astrology was possible), and in De corpore he argued that astrology was not a proper science at all.[162] It is noteworthy that when Hobbes thoroughly reworked the text of this chapter in the Latin Leviathan, he omitted any mention of astrology. By omitting the entire table too, he enabled himself to give a progressive description of the sciences which came much closer in spirit to the scheme set out in De corpore; he made politics, once again, the final science arising from the study of man; and, by abbreviating the phrase 'Knowledge of the Consequence of one Affirmation to another' to simply 'knowledge of consequences', he made it possible to revert to an argument about consequences in the sense of effects, the products of physical causes.[163]

[161] p. 1052; and cf. the comments above, at n. 13. Tom Sorell makes some valuable observations on the difference between Chapter 9 and De corpore, but takes the latter as simply expressing a later view: 'Hobbes's Scheme of the Sciences', esp. pp. 50–52.

[162] Hobbes, Anti-White, Ch. XXXVI; De corpore, I.8. See Hoekstra, 'Disarming the Prophets', pp. 117–22.

[163] It might be thought that the omission of the table from the Latin Leviathan had a simple typograph-

The only possible explanation—inadequate though it is—for the inclusion of the anomalous table in Chapter 9 of the English Leviathan is that this was something Hobbes had to hand because he had prepared it for rather different reasons in a rather different context. Perhaps it had arisen from his own pedagogical activities, as tutor to Prince Charles or to some other pupil; or perhaps it was the product of discussions with another interlocutor, such as the Marquess of Newcastle. In this connection one tantalizingly undated document may be relevant: a paper on the division and nature of the sciences in the hand (and the highly erratic spelling) of the Marquess himself, which presents the sciences in an order quite similar to that in which they appear on the right-hand side of Hobbes's table. First come 'Pewre Mathematicks', consisting of geometry and arithmetic; then there is a list of different kinds of 'Mixte Mathematicks', where the ratiocination is true but 'the Principells are butt supotitious': astronomy, geography, architecture, statics, navigation, dialling (i.e., what Hobbes calls sciography), optics, and music; then comes ethics, which 'may bee as sertayne as Mathematicks because the resoninge in themm maye bee good, & the principles takenn frome the knoledge of his owne passions'; then logic and rhetoric; and finally poetry, which 'Consistes In Magnefienge villefienge or representinge with delectationn the Actions of mans Life'. The reference to magnifying and vilifying matches the pairing of those terms in Hobbes's table so precisely that it may suggest that Newcastle had a copy of the printed Leviathan in front of him as he wrote, in which case this document can shed little light on the origins of Hobbes's table; also suggestive is Newcastle's note, in his account of mixed mathematics, that 'Astrologie oughte nott to bee putt Inn because Itt is no Arte, but Juglinge & Gipsie fortune tellinge & Cooseninge—so farr frome Truth'.[164] But it could be supposed that it was an earlier draft of Hobbes's table that the Marquess was looking at, not the printed text; the comment that astrology 'oughte nott to bee putt Inn' might suggest some involvement with work in progress, whether Newcastle's or someone else's. It is true that Newcastle's concern with degrees of certainty also differentiates his paper, in a significant way, from Hobbes's table. Nevertheless, the possibility remains that Newcastle's text did spring from some ongoing discussion about the nature and classification of the sciences—the sort of discussion from which the original version of Hobbes's table might possibly have arisen, independently of his work on the composition of both De corpore and Leviathan.

ical, and indeed physical, explanation. But books such as Timpler's Physicae systema show that printers had no difficulty in spreading and sub-dividing tables over many pages in a smaller format.

[164] Nottingham University Library, MS Pw 1 666.

3
FROM THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN TO THE LATIN

Critical Responses, 1651–1668

A full account of the critical reaction to Leviathan would go far beyond the scope or purpose of this Introduction.[1] Only a brief summary, for the period 1651–68, is offered here, in an attempt to sketch some of the background to the writing of the Latin Leviathan.

The hostile judgement of the Anglican clerics in Paris, and the very negative reaction of Edward Hyde, have already been described.[2] It was clear to many readers that the significance of the 'Review, and Conclusion' went far beyond justifying those royalists who compounded for their estates; the very first recorded judgement on the book (that of an unidentified but probably royalist-inclined friend of Robert Payne in Oxford) was that 'he seemes to favour y^{e} present governm^{t}'.[3] Some royalists at the court in exile may well have regarded the publication of the book as an act of betrayal, and Charles II himself was, as Hobbes later noted, 'displeased'—but not for long. As Hobbes also recorded, in the summer of 1652 'two Honourable Persons of the Court that came over into England, assured him [sc. Hobbes] that His Majesty had a good opinion of him; and others since have told me, that His Majesty said openly, That He thought M^{r} Hobbes never meant Him hurt.'[4]

The first extended critique of the political theory of Leviathan was published anonymously in 1652. Its author, Sir Robert Filmer, was not just a royalist, but an absolutist of an unusually uncompromising kind; his other targets in the book included John Milton, the defender of the regicide, and Philip Hunton, whose views he attacked in a lengthy section entitled 'The Anarchy of a Limited or Mixed Monarchy'. In his Preface he summarized the nature of his disagreement with Hobbes as follows:

[1] The fullest and most valuable survey of the English reception is given in Parkin, Taming the Leviathan; some further details are contained in Mintz, Hunting of Leviathan. For a sketch of the European reception see Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 469–535. [2] Above, pp. 96–7.

[3] Payne to Sheldon, 6 [/16] May 1651: BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 132.

[4] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, p. 28 (EW iv, pp. 424–5).

With no small content I read Mr. Hobs Book De Cive, and his Leviathan, about the Rights of Soveraignty, which no man, that I know, hath so amply and judiciously handled: I consent with him about the Rights of exercising Government, but I cannot agree to his means of acquiring it . . . his Jus naturae [right of nature], and his Regnum Institutivum [kingdom by institution] will not down with me: they appear full of contradiction, and impossibilities.[5]

What Filmer objected to, in other words, was the grounding of Hobbes's theory in the natural rights of individuals, and the idea that sovereign power arose from the covenanting of the subjects. In particular, he argued, Hobbes's admission that subjects retained the right to defend themselves by force against physical harm by their sovereign was 'destructive to all Government whatsoever'.[6] Filmer was also scandalized by a passage in Chapter 21, where Hobbes argued that for rebels to continue in their rebellion was no addition to their original offence: 'There was indeed injustice in the first breach of their duty; Their bearing of Arms subsequent to it, though it be to maintain what they have done, is no new unjust act. And if it be onely to defend their persons, it is not unjust at all.'[7] The idea that Hobbes's theory was essentially a contractarian one, and that it placed sovereign rule in jeopardy by setting up conditions under which resistance would be justified, became a popular one among his royalist critics, who liked to argue that Hobbesian principles, far from settling the new régime in England on a secure basis, were a threat to governments of all kinds. When John Bramhall attacked Hobbes's political theory in his The Catching of Leviathan in 1658, it was on these contractarian and conditionalist elements that he concentrated his assault, describing Hobbes's argument as 'seditious'; he too quoted the passage which had scandalized Filmer, and commented that Leviathan should be renamed 'The Rebells catechism'.[8] Nor was it only royalists who adopted this sort of criticism. As we have seen, John Wallis clambered aboard this bandwagon in 1662 when he accused Hobbes both of acting disloyally to Charles II and of developing, in Leviathan, a theory in defence of disloyalty; as Hobbes recognized, this criticism was aimed at the comments on the reciprocal relationship of protection and obedience in the 'Review, and Conclusion'.[9]

At the same time, of course, it was also possible to complain that Hobbes's absolutist theory gave too much power to the sovereign, justifying tyrannical rule and the enslavement of the subject: this was the line taken by the conservative intellectual Alexander Ross in his Leviathan drawn out with a Hook in 1653.[10] Bramhall found an ingenious way of incorporating this criticism in his own argument, when he wrote that 'he maketh the power of Kings to be so exorbitant . . . to render Monarchy odious to mankind'.[11] But the strongest opposition to the absolutism of Leviathan came from a writer who, unlike Bramhall, did believe that political authority was entrusted to the ruler by the people: the Presbyterian clergyman George Lawson, whose Examination of the Political Part of Mr Hobbs his Leviathan was published in 1657. According to Lawson, a king who had received his authority conditionally could be deposed, and any king could forfeit the sovereign power if he broke fundamental principles of justice.[12] Here at least was a critic who recognized that one of the primary purposes of Hobbes's political theory was to oppose any such theories of conditionality or forfeiture.

[5] Anon. [Filmer], Observations, sig. A2. [6] Ibid., p. 9.
[7] Ibid., citing Leviathan, p. 340.
[8] Bramhall, Catching of Leviathan, pp. 513, 515. [9] See above, pp. 84–5.

Politics was not, however, the main area in which Leviathan stirred up critical debate; theological and religious issues loomed much larger in the reaction to the work during the 1650s and 1660s, and even an ostensibly 'political' critic such as Lawson devoted nearly a third of his book to the refutation of Hobbes's theological and ecclesiological arguments.[13] But although it was obvious to all readers that the third and fourth parts of Leviathan contained some unusual, and unusually bold, claims, it would be wrong to suppose that the work was immediately and universally denounced as irreligious or atheistic. After the print explosion of the 1640s, English readers had become accustomed to seeing all kinds of views—often based on a more or less unmediated reading of Scripture—expressed on religious issues by idiosyncratic seekers after truth. Hobbes's rejection of scholasticism would have appealed to some readers, as would his hostility to priestly jurisdiction, and indeed his strident anti-Catholicism. The radical thinker and Independent William Rand may have had some of Hobbes's religious arguments in mind when he told Samuel Hartlib in July 1651 that Leviathan contained 'a world of fine cleare notions, though some things too paradoxicall'; in the following month he informed another correspondent, with apparent approval, that Chapter 42 of the book offered 'a smart interpretation of the trinity'.[14] When Hobbes presented himself as a defender of traditional Lutheran and Calvinist positions on the freedom of the will during his public dispute with Bramhall in the mid-1650s, he was treated as a sincere Protestant theologian

[10] Ross, Leviathan drawn out, pp. 21–5, 30–32.

[11] Bramhall, Catching of Leviathan, p. 521.

[12] Lawson, Examination, p. 25. On Lawson see Condren, George Lawson's Politica, and Parkin, Taming the Leviathan, pp. 185–91.

[13] Lawson, Examination, pp. 147–214.

[14] Hartlib Papers, Sheffield University Library, 62/30/3B; 62/21/1A; 'paradoxicall' here means 'contrary to accepted beliefs'.

by at least some of his readers.[15] And it was probably his outspoken criticism of ecclesiastical jurisdiction that earned him the praise of the Quaker and radical tolerationist Robert Rich, who in 1667 expressed his admiration for 'Brave Mr. Hobbs' as well as James Nayler, Jakob Böhme, and 'The whole Family of Love'.[16]

Such an attitude towards Hobbes's religious views was at least possible. But it was distinctly uncommon. Many—probably most—readers did find at least some of his theological arguments either disconcerting, or objectionable, or entirely unacceptable. This does not mean, however, that the reasons why people wrote against him on such matters were confined to a simple desire to defend theological verities. Various other motives could be at work. Some writers seem to have attacked him precisely because their own philosophical position, more generally, was close to his: practitioners of the 'new science' could reasonably fear that religious hostility towards Hobbesian mechanistic and anti-scholastic principles might end up targeting their own principles as well. The natural response to this danger was to shift from defence to pre-emptive attack, taking a leading role in the denunciation of Hobbes, especially on the issue of 'materialism'. An early step in this direction was taken by the Oxford scientist Seth Ward (the author, in 1650, of a poem in praise of Hobbes), who published his first criticism of Hobbes in 1652.[17] Two years later, because Hobbes had been cited approvingly by a radical author in a work calling for the total reform of the universities, Seth Ward and another Oxford scientist, John Wilkins, published a stinging personal attack on Hobbes; and during the next few years not only did Ward produce a full-length critique of Hobbes's philosophy and theology, but his colleague John Wallis began his own series of attacks on Hobbes, both as a mathematician and more generally.[18] In Wallis's case there was another motive too: as a leading presbyterian intellectual he was opposed to the Erastian character of the Cromwellian religious settlement, and found the ultra-Erastian Hobbes a useful target at which to aim. It is noteworthy that the most damaging accusation against Hobbes—that he was an atheist—came typically from critics of this sort, people who had other axes of their own to grind.

The first published attack on the theology of Leviathan accused Hobbes not of atheism but of 'blasphemies'. A Beacon set on Fire, a pamphlet produced by a group of presbyterian booksellers in 1652, cited a series of [15] See Correspondence, i, pp. 276–80, 497–8, and the comments in Parkin, Taming the Leviathan, pp. 160–63.

[16] Rich, Love without Dissimulation, p. 6.
[17] Ward, Philosophical Essay, sig. A3r–v.
[18] On these disputes see Jesseph, Squaring the Circle, and Sergio, Contro il Leviatano.

objectionable propositions, including Hobbes's downgrading of the eternal torments of the damned, and his argument that the immortality of the soul would begin only at the resurrection. But the main focus of these presbyterian critics was on Hobbes's Erastianism, and his exalting of the power of the sovereign—including his scandalous claim that 'If our Prince command us to say with our tongue, We beleeve not in Christ*, we must obey the Prince.*'[19] Alexander Ross's book, in the following year, spread its net more widely; Ross accused Hobbes of reviving a large number of ancient heresies, particularly where his eschatology was concerned. He did not, however, accuse him directly of atheism, though his comment on Hobbes's claim that 'that which is not Body, is no part of the Universe: And . . . is Nothing; and consequently no where' seemed to point in that direction: 'He will make God to be nothing, and no where; for I hope he will not make him a part of the universe, nor will he make him corporeal.'[20] Hobbes's materialism, his denial that substances could be incorporeal, and hence too his denial that the soul was immortal by its own nature, offended all of his critics; for example, in 1654 the West Country physician Robert Vilvain began his critique of the theology of Leviathan by contesting Hobbes's denial of the natural immortality of the soul. And yet, after raising many objections to Hobbes's eschatological theories, Vilvain concluded by describing him as 'a singular Scholar of most acut wit; who hath a rare invention, ready pen, concise stile, and elegant elocution'.[21]

It was only with Wallis's book attacking Hobbes's mathematics in 1655 and Ward's extended critique of Hobbes in 1656 that the accusations of irreligion became more pointed. Wallis accused him of admiring the Greek writer Lucian because he was an atheist, and of leaving the civil magistrate to decide whether the Bible was the word of God or not. 'But you do not seem to care much more about God himself, than about the word of God, being, I think, ready to dismiss him just as easily. For while you regard it as ridiculous, and inconceivable by any imagination ever, that anything at all should exist without being body . . . who does not see that you almost explicitly deny the existence not only of angels, and of immortal souls, but also of God himself?'[22] Ward, in turn, described Hobbes as 'certainly not a [19] Fawne et al., Beacon set on Fire, pp. 14–15. On this group of booksellers, and their connections with Richard Baxter and his circle, see Collins, 'Silencing Thomas Hobbes', pp. 483–6.

[20] Ross, Leviathan drawn out, p. 87 (citing Leviathan, p. 1076).

[21] Vilvain, Theoremata theologica, fo. 252v. Vilvain's treatment of Leviathan makes up the last part of his book (fos. 226r–255r), and includes (from fo. 239r) lengthy paraphrase-quotations from Part 4 of Hobbes's text.

[22] Wallis, Elenchus, pp. 89 (Lucian), 90 ('Sed neque de ipso Deo, quam de Verbo Divino, videris multo magis esse solicitus, quem pari, credo, facilitate paratus es ablegare. Dum enim pro ridiculo habes, & quod nullâ unquam imaginatione concipi possit, ut quicquam uspiam exsistat quod corpus non est . . . quis non videt te non modo Angelos, atque immortales Animas, sed & Deum ipsum . . . tantum non ῥητῶς abnegare').

Christian'; he conceded that he might have the religion of a Sadducee or an Epicurean; but ended by saying that 'I do not understand how God can exist, according to Hobbes's opinion.'[23] And in late 1657 John Bramhall, stung by Hobbes's dismissive response to his arguments on freedom of the will, repeated the criticisms of both Ward and Wallis. 'For T. H. his God is not the god of Christians, nor of any rational men', he wrote; quoting Hobbes's remarks about things that are not body being no part of the universe, and consequently nowhere, he exclaimed: 'How? By this doctrine he maketh not onely the Angels, but God himself to be nothing.'[24] In his more personal polemic against Hobbes in 1662, Wallis renewed the charge, saying that Leviathan had been well received only by 'such, as thought it a piece of Wit to pretend to Atheism'.[25] These were the most outspoken extended criticisms of Hobbes published in this period; other writers of anti-Hobbesian books, such as Lawson in his Examination of 1657 and the Anglican bishop William Lucy in his Observations of 1663, may have portrayed his views as absurd, ignorant, arrogant, and heretical, but they neither pressed home the charge of atheism nor described Hobbes as radically non-Christian.[26]

Charges of heresy and blasphemy were, however, quite serious enough. The presbyterian booksellers who denounced Hobbes in 1652 were urging Parliament to have Leviathan 'suppressed'—which meant confiscated and burnt. This was a course of action which had been taken by Parliament in several recent cases. It had ordered the burning of two books by 'Ranters' and a tract by a Seventh-Day Baptist in 1650, two works by a free-thinking Member of Parliament in 1651, and the Racovian Catechism (a classic statement of Socinian doctrine) earlier in 1652; and the booksellers' tract against Hobbes also referred to a book by the English Socinian John Biddle, which Parliament had ordered to be burnt in 1647.[27] But it was perhaps thanks to the obviously factional nature of the booksellers' campaign that Parliament did not take any action about Leviathan in 1652.[28] Two years later, the [23] Ward, In Thomae Hobbii philosophiam, pp. 327 ('certè Christianus ille non est'), 340 ('Quomodo Deus esse possit ex mente Hobbiana, non intelligo').

[24] Bramhall, Catching of Leviathan, pp. 468, 486. This text was appended to Bramhall's Castigations; the pagination and signing are continuous, but whereas the Castigations had a title page (not mentioning the Catching of Leviathan) dated 1657, the Catching of Leviathan had its own title page dated 1658. It thus appears that the second text was written after the first was consigned to the press, at a time close to the end of 1657 when common practice dictated using the following year's date on the title page. (Possibly some separate sales were intended, despite the pagination.) There was later a second issue of the book, with a general title page mentioning the second work and dated 1658; Thomason's copy (E.1757(1)) is dated 'May'.

[25] Wallis, Hobbius heauton-timorumenos, p. 6.

[26] One brief denunciation of Hobbes as an atheist occurs in a sermon preached in Jan. 1658 by the presbyterian Henry Wilkinson, Principal of Magdalen Hall, Oxford: Conciones, p. 188.

[27] Gillett, Burned Books, i, pp. 252–3, 255, 330, 351, 355; Fawne et al., Beacon set on Fire, p. 16.

[28] In 1655, when three of the booksellers who had denounced Leviathan arranged for John Biddle to be prominent presbyterian divine Richard Baxter raised the issue again, urging Members of Parliament to 'Lay a penalty on him that Prints or sels any Books against the Fundamentals or Essentials of Christianity; and that slander or reproach Magistracy, Ministry, or Ordinancyes of Christ. And burn some more of this nature . . . Specially Hobbs his Leviathan'; this exhortation too went unheeded.[29] In January 1657 some Members of Parliament were again urged to take action against Leviathan; but this time the call came from a rather junior figure, William Robertson, a Scottish Hebrew scholar, and was addressed to a parliamentary 'Committee for Bibles'—so, despite the vehemence of Robertson's urgings (he called the book 'a most poisonous piece of atheism'), it is not surprising that the matter was taken no further.[30]

Hobbes thus seems to have benefited from the broadly tolerationist character of the Cromwellian régime. He may well have looked on the Restoration, which brought back his fierce critic Edward Hyde as the King's most powerful minister and reinstated many hard-line Anglican clerics, with some apprehension. The first few months of royal rule saw some promising developments: his friendly personal relations with Charles II were quickly resumed, and the 'Act of Free and General Pardon, Indemnity, and Oblivion' of 29 August 1660 gave him some additional reassurance.[31] In the 'Apologia' addressed to King Charles and prefixed to Problemata physica in early 1662, Hobbes stated that he put his trust not in any apology of his own, but in the King's 'general amnesty'—meaning the provisions of the Act of Oblivion.[32] As we have seen, this 'Apologia' was one of two self-justifying texts published by Hobbes in the first half of 1662; the other was his polemical response to John Wallis entitled Mr. Hobbes Considered, which not only defended Hobbes's own conduct but also reminded readers of Wallis's record as an active servant of the rebels in the 1640s.[33] In the latter work Hobbes did spend a few pages responding to Wallis's accusation of 'atheism'. 'What prosecuted for his blasphemous views on the Trinity, Biddle's defenders thought that the booksellers' real aim was to reassert 'the Presbiterian interest'; and it seems that Cromwell thought so too, as it was partly as a result of his intervention that the prosecution lapsed (see Anon., Spirit of Persecution, pp. 2, 7; Gillett, Burned Books, pp. 336–8; McLachlan, Socinianism, pp. 207–11).

[29] Baxter, Humble Advice, p. 7; this was an expanded version of a sermon preached before the Members of Parliament on 24 Dec. 1654 [/3 Jan. 1655].

[30] See Burton, Diary, i, pp. 348–9. Burton gives the name as 'Robinson', but supplies enough details (calling him a 'Scotchman' and saying that he boasted of his 'skill in the tongues' in relation to translations of the Bible) to make the identification with Robertson highly probable. On Robertson's work as a teacher of Hebrew in London, his Puritan patrons, and his polemical zeal, see Life, 'Robertson'. He was evidently working as a corrector for the stationers Henry Hills and John Field, to whom Cromwell had given the privilege of printing English bibles: see McKenzie and Bell, Chronology, i, pp. 368, 382, 384, 391 (and the description of them on p. 392).

[31] On the resumption of relations with Charles II see Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, pp. 339–40.

[32] Hobbes, Problemata physica, sigs. A4v–A5r: 'Amnestiae generali' (OL iv, p. 301).

[33] See above, pp. 84–5.

kind of Attribute I pray you is immaterial, or incorporeal substance?' he asked; 'Where do you find it in the Scripture?' He concluded:

> There has hitherto appeared in M^r^ Hobbes his Doctrine no signe of Atheism; and whatsoever can be inferr'd from the denying of Incorporeal Substances, makes Tertullian, one of the ancientest of the Fathers, and most of the Doctors of the Greek Church, as much Atheists as he. For Tertullian in his Treatise De Carne Christi says plainly . . . Nothing is Incorporeal, but that which has no Being.[34]

That text, published in the spring or early summer of 1662, was the last book on any controversial matter that Hobbes was allowed to publish in England. The so-called Licensing Act, which came into force on 10/20 June 1662, required works on most subjects to be licensed for publication by the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London; works on history and affairs of state were to be licensed by the principal Secretaries of State, and books on the law by the Lord Chancellor and other senior legal officials.[35] Thereafter, the only new books by Hobbes printed in England in his lifetime were either mathematical and scientific treatises or translations of Homer; other works by him were simply refused licences.[36] For the first few years, this form of state censorship may not have troubled Hobbes unduly. The only major attack on him published during that period was William Lucy's Observations (a greatly expanded version of Lucy's previously published criticisms of Leviathan), and he had already made it clear that he did not think Lucy worthy of a response.[37] But public attitudes changed in 1666, when the Great Fire of London (following the severe plague of the previous year) led to much heart-searching about the reasons for God's wrath against England. On 4 [/14] October the House of Commons set up a committee 'to look into the former Laws against Atheism, Profaneness, Debauchery, and Swearing; and to Examine, whether . . .there be any Neglect in putting the Laws in Execution'.[38] Within a fortnight the committee was given the task of preparing a new 'Bill against Atheism and Profaneness', and was empowered to receive 'Information touching such books as tend to Atheism, Blasphemy, or Profaneness, or against the Essence or Attributes of God; and, in particular . . . the Book of Mr. Hobbs, called The Leviathan'.[39] This was a serious threat. According to a later tradition in the Cavendish family, Hobbes was

[34] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, pp. 32, 37 (EW iv, pp. 426, 429).

[35] For fuller details of the licensing system see Siebert, Freedom of the Press, pp. 241–3.

[36] See Milton, 'Hobbes, Heresy and Arlington', pp. 534–5; Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 348–9.

[37] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, p. 51 (EW iv, p. 435): 'If you had in good earnest despised him [sc. Hobbes], you would have let him alone, as he does D^r^ Ward, M^r^ Baxter, Pike [the pseudonym of Lucy], and others, that have reviled him as you do.'

[38] Journal of the House of Commons, viii, p. 630.

[39] Ibid., p. 636 (17 [/27] Oct.); BL, MS Harl. 7257, p. 220.

'extreamly disturb'd at the News of it'; as Alan Cromartie has shown, this was probably the occasion on which, in Aubrey's words, 'There was a report (and surely true) that in parliament . . . some of the bishops made a motion to have the good old gentleman burn't for a heretique. Which he hearing, feared that his papers might be search't by their order, and he told me he had burn't part of them.'[40] The Bill against Atheism and Profaneness was given its final reading by the House of Commons in January 1667, and then passed to the House of Lords; in October of that year the Lords added to its provisions the creation of a further criminal offence, that of denying the immortality of souls, eternal rewards in Heaven, or eternal punishment in Hell. Progress on the Bill was halted in 1668, but it was never formally voted out, and would later be revived in both 1674 and 1675.[41]

Hobbes responded to this threat in a number of ways. In 1667, as we shall see, he was writing the Latin version of Leviathan; he had completed two thirds of it by November of that year, and expected to finish it by Easter 1668. So it was probably in the spring of 1668 that he wrote the Appendix which appears at the end of the Latin text. One of the Appendix's three chapters was about the nature of heresy and its punishment, according to the Gospel and according to English law; Hobbes argued that the only ecclesiastical penalty for heresy was excommunication, that in the Church of England the only heresies were those explicitly condemned by the first four General Councils of the Church, that secular courts could apply punishments only if the accused failed to renounce his heresy, and that there was no way of knowing whether the renunciation was sincere or not. In several subsequent writings (the Historical Narration concerning Heresie, Behemoth, the Dialogue of the Common Laws, and a brief manuscript text preserved at Chatsworth), Hobbes would repeat or develop these arguments, and attempt to strengthen his somewhat shaky knowledge of English legal history.[42]

The third chapter of the Appendix was entitled 'On some Objections to Leviathan': here, for the first time, Hobbes attempted something like a systematic defence of the theological claims of the work against those criticisms that had been made in the previous seventeen years. Giving references to particular passages in the book, he put forward a total of thirteen claims which had attracted hostile comment. Prominent among them were his denial of [40] Kennet, Sermon, p. 110; Cromartie, 'General Introduction', in Hobbes, Writings on Common Law, pp. l–lii; Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, p. 339. On the burning see also Correspondence, i, p. xxv (citing a letter from James Wheldon, of which the original is BL, MS Add. 78685, no. 90).

[41] See Milton, 'Hobbes, Heresy and Arlington', pp. 517–20.

[42] See Cromartie, 'General Introduction', in Hobbes, Writings on Common Law, pp. liii–lviii; Behemoth, ed. Seaward, pp. 116–19 (fos. 5r–6r). The Chatsworth manuscript (MS Hardwick drawer 145, item 18) is printed in Mintz, 'Hobbes on the Law of Heresy'.

incorporeal substances, his refusal to accept the natural immortality of the soul, his unusual account of the Trinity, and his idiosyncratic eschatology, in which he claimed that the Kingdom of God after the resurrection would be on earth and that the reprobate would have finite lives. For someone living in fear of impending legislation that might lead to his prosecution for heresy, this was an extraordinarily bold performance: on almost every point Hobbes maintained the position he had taken (even adding a robust defence of the view that God could properly be described as corporeal). In only one case did he make a retraction: where his account of the Trinity was concerned, he now wrote that 'the explanation is mistaken. For he [sc. Hobbes] seems to make Moses a person in the Trinity . . . This was gross carelessness.'[43]

Which of the various published criticisms of Leviathan did Hobbes have in mind when he wrote this response? Some points—the denial of incorporeal substance, and the rejection of the natural immortality of the soul—had been denounced by almost all of his theological opponents.[44] Alexander Ross had taken issue with several of the thirteen items on Hobbes's list: the suggestion of a corporeal God, the idea that angels were not real beings, the denial of ghosts, the eschatology, the denial of the natural immortality of the soul, and the 'strange wheemsie concerning the blessed Trinity'.[45] Robert Vilvain had tackled the non-immortality of the soul, the idea that the sovereign might administer sacraments, and the eschatology.[46] Seth Ward had attacked not only the denial of incorporeal substance and the refusal to accept the natural immortality of the soul, but also the claim that a subject could lawfully deny Christ if ordered to do so by the sovereign.[47] George Lawson had rejected Hobbes's claim that angels were not real beings, his account of the Trinity, and his idea that the sovereign could perform ministerial actions such as baptism and ordination; he also complained that, according to Hobbes's theory, the early Church, before it was authorized by the Roman Emperors, was an unlawful assembly.[48]

The work which contains the largest number of items on Hobbes's list, however, is John Bramhall's The Catching of Leviathan. Here we find objections to no fewer than nine of the thirteen points: the derivation of religion from fear, the denial that angels are incorporeal substances, the theory of the Trinity, the implication that there was no proper Church in the first two

[43] pp. 1228–43.

[44] These points were also the main concerns of Henry More when discussing Hobbes's views in his Immortality of the Soul, pp. 55–74.

[45] Ross, Leviathan drawn out, pp. 36, 37, 38, 42–6, 47, 49–50, 53–6, 66–8.

[46] Vilvain, Theoremata theologica, fos. 226v–227r, 227v, 228v–229v.

[47] Ward, In Thomae Hobbii philosophiam, pp. 266, 274–80, 325, 340.

[48] Lawson, Examination, pp. 169, 191, 202, 211.

centuries of Christianity, the claim that the elect will live on earth, the implication that God is corporeal, the denial of the natural immortality of the soul, the claim that the reprobate would receive their punishment on earth during finite lives, and the use of the story of Naaman to show that subjects could deny Christ when commanded to do so by their sovereigns.[49] There is no doubt that Hobbes had read Bramhall's work. In 1668, not long after the completion of the Latin translation of Leviathan, he wrote a lengthy reply to it in English, entitled An Answer to a Book published by Dr. Bramhall . . . called The Catching of the Leviathan, and appended to it his short Historical Narration concerning Heresie. In June [/July] of that year he even made an attempt to get these texts licensed for publication by Joseph Williamson, who handled such matters on behalf of Lord Arlington, the Secretary of State; but the text on heresy would not be published until 1680, and the Answer to a Book would first appear in 1682.[50] Hobbes explained in his Preface to the Reader that he felt obliged to respond to Bramhall's book 'because the words Atheism, Impiety, and the like, are words of the greatest defamation possible. And this I had done sooner, if I had sooner known that such a Book was extant. He wrote it ten years since, and yet I never heard of it till about three Months since; so little talk there was of his Lordship's Writings.'[51] It is somewhat hard to believe that Hobbes had been unaware for a decade of the main text in Bramhall's volume, the Castigations, which continued the long-running dispute over liberty and necessity, though it is understandable that he should have felt no need to respond to it after Bramhall's death in 1663.

Nevertheless, the chronology given here does fit very neatly with that of the Latin Leviathan: if Hobbes wrote this Preface to the Reader in May or June, the implied date of his first reading of The Catching of Leviathan would have been February or March, when the Latin Leviathan was nearing completion. In which case it is not surprising that Bramhall's text had a major influence on the third chapter of the Appendix to that version. Nor is it surprising that some of the same arguments were used by Hobbes, in defence of his theology, in both his Latin Appendix and his English Answer to a Book. But the former, unlike the latter, was not written as a point-by-point reply to Bramhall; in some cases, where Bramhall gave a textual reference to Leviathan for an objectionable claim, Hobbes's defence of the same claim in the Appendix referred to a different passage.[52] So it seems that the objections by [49] Bramhall, Catching of Leviathan, pp. 466–7, 471, 473–4, 481, 485, 486, 487, 490, 491.

[50] Correspondence, ii, p. 699.

[51] Hobbes, Answer to a Book, sig. A1v (EW iv, p. [282]).

[52] For example: on the Trinity Bramhall cites Ch. 42, Hobbes cites Ch. 16; on the immortality of the soul Bramhall cites Ch. 44, Hobbes cites Ch. 38.

Bramhall served merely as a useful reminder of a range of observations made previously by other critics, whether publicly or in private.

This last method of criticism—private communication with the author—should not be left out of the account. In the Answer to a Book Hobbes described how it was that he had come to correct his 'Error' about the Trinity in the Latin Leviathan:

> I had corrected this Error sooner, if I had sooner found it. For though I was told by Dr. Cosins [John Cosin], now Bishop of Duresme, that the place above-cited was not applicable enough to the Doctrine of the Trinity, yet I could not in reviewing the same espy the defect till of late, when being sollicited from beyond Sea to translate the Book into Latin, and fearing some other man might do it not to my liking, I examined this passage and others of the like sence more narrowly.[53]

Since the phrasing implies that Cosin was not Bishop of Durham at the time, this seems to refer to some discussion between Hobbes and Cosin in Paris, either in 1650, when Hobbes was writing Leviathan, or after the publication of the book in 1651.[54] Also remarkable is the fact that the error for which Hobbes apologized in the Appendix to the Latin Leviathan—namely, the apparent elevation of Moses to one of the three persons of the Trinity—was one of which no critic had seriously accused him in print. The theory set out in Leviathan was that God had three persons insofar as he was represented or 'personated' three times, by Moses, Christ, and the Apostles: the three persons were, so to speak, aspects of God, differing insofar as he was represented in different ways. The standard criticism, expressed first by Ross, was that 'there must be then as many persons, as there have been personatings or representations', since God had also been represented by Joshua, Aaron, and all kings.[55] Neither Ross, nor Vilvain (who quoted Hobbes on the Trinity without raising any objections), nor Lucy (who merely argued that God could not be 'personated') ever accused Hobbes of making Moses one of the Trinity.[56] Lawson perhaps came closer to this, but merely summarized Hobbes's argument as being 'That the Trinity is a threefold representation of God, 1. By Moses. 2. By Christ on earth. 3. By the holy Ghost in the Apostles', commenting that 'This deserves no answer but detestation, because it is not onely blasphemous, but also devoid not onely of divine but humane [53] Hobbes, Answer to a Book, p. 45 (EW iv, p. 317); the 'place above-cited' was a passage from the Anglican Catechism (Hobbes, Answer to a Book, p. 44 (EW iv, p. 316)).

[54] Cf. above, Ch. 1, n. 390. Evidence that Hobbes did receive some criticism of at least one of his theological arguments during the final phase of preparation of Leviathan can be found in the 'Review, and Conclusion', p. 1138, where he tries to explain the meaning of a biblical text which apparently disproves a claim made earlier in the book.

[55] Ross, Leviathan drawn out, p. 54.

[56] Vilvain, Theoremata theologica, fo. 255v; Lucy, Observations, pp. 285–90.

learning.'[57] Even Bramhall, who made one glancing remark that might have implied Moses's membership of the Trinity, was mainly concerned to pose the standard objection: 'Upon these grounds every King hath as many persons as there be Justices of Peace, and petty Constables in his kingdom.'[58] It seems that either Hobbes had worked out the more extreme interpretation of his words for himself, or someone else had raised it with him. Similarly, perhaps, his comments in the Latin Appendix on the example of Naaman put forward a counter-argument which had not been raised in print by any of Hobbes's critics. Hobbes had quoted in Leviathan Naaman's request to the prophet Elisha that he be permitted to accompany his heathen master at worship in a heathen temple, and had observed: 'This the Prophet approved, and bid him Goe in peace.'[59] In the Latin Appendix (written in dialogue form), Hobbes now raised the objection: 'These words seem to me to be not a permission, but a way of saying goodbye'—before replying, 'Perhaps so, if he had give him some other answer, either approving or disapproving; but in this passage those words cannot be understood in any way other than as a permission.'[60] That alternative explanation of Elisha's words might just have arisen in Hobbes's mind; but it is possible that it represents the fruit of some discussion with a friend, or opponent, at some time in the period 1651–68. There must have been many such discussions, the contents of which, today, can scarcely even be guessed at.

Some Individual Responses

In addition to published criticisms and private communications, there is another category of responses to Leviathan: notes made by readers, and comments written by them in their copies of the book. For example, the disillusioned parliamentarian Sir William Drake copied some passages from Leviathan into his notebook, with apparent sympathy for the premises of Hobbes's political argument.[61] And the royalist soldier and littérateur Samuel Tuke, who was such a great admirer of De cive that he declared himself, in 1650, a 'disciple' of Hobbes, took quite detailed notes from Leviathan during the mid-1650s.[62] Most of these notes, however, were just extracts (the long-[57] Lawson, Examination, p. 202.

[58] Bramhall, Catching of Leviathan, p. 474.
[59] p. 784. [60] pp. 1238–41.
[61] Sharpe, Reading Revolutions, pp. 107, 170.
[62] BL, MS Add. 78423, fos. 45r–53r (preceding notes from Montaigne dated '19th July 1656'). Tuke's declaration in 1650 was in a letter to his relative John Evelyn: 'I haue spent much time in reading M^{r} Hobbs his politiques. & pretend to haue studied him soe well, y^{t} I may assum y^{e} stile of his disciple; est being from Chapter 18, beginning with the marginal note 'Soveraigne Power cannot be forfeited'). In only a few cases, concerning the discussions of physics and epistemology in the early chapters of the book, Tuke added some brief comments of his own, comparing or contrasting Hobbes's views with those of Descartes.[63]

Rather surprisingly in the case of such a controversial work, there do not appear to be many surviving examples of detailed marginal annotations to Leviathan. One exemplum of the first edition, in Sheffield University Library, contains some marginalia in a seventeenth-century hand, but they merely summarize, mostly using keywords, what is in the text. Here and there, against some of Hobbes's theological claims, the reader has written 'NB'—which may be an expression of either admiration or alarm.[64] In an exemplum in Cambridge University Library the marginalia are confined to Chapter 26, on the civil laws; this annotator was presumably a lawyer who was riled by some of Hobbes's comments. Where Hobbes wrote (against Sir Edward Coke's notion of the Common Law as a cumulative 'Perfection of Reason') that 'it is possible long study may encrease, and confirm erroneous Sentences: and where men build on false grounds, the more they build, the greater is the ruine', the annotation (truncated by a cut-down margin) reads as follows: 'by an infinite number of grave & learned men, & it is highly improbable nay impossible that such men for so long time should be so ignorant as to confirm errors, or so villanous, as to conceal y^{m} if they were so. Ergo nihil video quod despicere possit Antonius [Therefore I see nothing that Antony might despise].'[65] This reader did also mark some of the theological claims in the second half of the book with underlinings and manicules; in this case it seems safe to assume that they were notes of disapproval.

Two more heavily annotated exempla of Leviathan deserve attention. One, belonging to the Pforzheimer Library (now in Texas), has an inscription recording that the book was given by the Earl of Devonshire (the third Earl, Hobbes's pupil and employer) to P. de Cardonnel in 1652.[66] Pierre de Cardonnel was a merchant from Caen with strong English connections who supported the royalist cause and cultivated many of the royalist exiles since hee was translated into french (w^{ch} language Wee laymen better master,) I haue recommended him to manie of my acquaintance. & finde not one that does not reuerence his reason . . . d[ea]^{r} Cosine soe soone as his other Workes are extant I pray make mee Master of them. & I shall receiue them as a greate treasure' (from The Hague, 25 Oct. [/4 Nov.] 1650: BL, MS Add. 78306, fo. 89r).

[63] BL, MS Add. 78423, fos. 45r, 49r. A few other notes seem to have been added much later (e.g., on fo. 47v, commenting on Hobbes's etymology of 'herald' in Ch. 10: 'A mistake see Verstegan').

[64] Sheffield University Library, pressmark Q 320.1 (H).

[65] Cambridge University Library, pressmark Williams 426, p. 140. The tag is from Cicero, Phillipica, II.2 (cited also, as a classic expression of modest self-praise, in Quintilian, Institutio, XI.i.25) in France in the 1640s.[67] He established friendly relations with the Earl of Devonshire, receiving a handsome christening present from him in 1653 and staying at his country house in Buckinghamshire in 1656; so it seems very likely that he also became personally acquainted with Hobbes.[68] De Cardonnel was a well-educated Protestant (he had learned some Hebrew) who maintained strong intellectual interests; his other friends included Hobbes's friend Edmund Waller, Hobbes's admirer Walter Charleton, and Hobbes's fierce critic Alexander Ross. Not surprisingly, then, his copy of Leviathan bears the marks of a close intellectual engagement. There are underlinings, marginal marks, manicules, and annotations in most parts of the book, excluding only the bulk of Part 2 (on government and law). In the first part of the book the marginal marks seem to indicate passages that had earned de Cardonnel's interest and approval, such as Hobbes's comments on the folly of a raging multitude, or his dismissal of the reasoning of the 'Foole'.[69] While many of the comments simply summarize Hobbes's argument, some do so with evident agreement, such as the note (on p. 73), 'The attempt of gaining Soverainty by Rebellion proved against reason.' And in one case de Cardonnel made explicit the anti-Catholicism that was only implicit in Hobbes's argument, when he wrote (at the top of p. 74): 'The Jesuitical tenent y^{t} Faith is not to be kept to Hereticks, refuted.'

[66] Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center, University of Texas at Austin, pressmark Pforz. 491.

In the third part of Leviathan de Cardonnel did register occasional discomfort with Hobbes's handling of scriptural matters, sometimes basing his disagreement on an interpretation of the biblical Hebrew, which he cited. Against Hobbes's idiosyncratic account of the 'eternal torments' of the reprobate (on p. 345), he wrote: 'This is hard to be understood.' And against Hobbes's suggestion (on p. 348) that 'perhaps there may be place left after the Resurrection for the Repentance of some sinners': 'Bold conjecture.' But in other ways Hobbes's treatment of religion earned his approval, as expressed in annotations such as 'Christianity doth not incroach upon civil or kingly power' (p. 295) and 'Evident Examples of Kings Soverainty in Matters of Religion' (p. 254). When Hobbes advised (p. 385) that ecclesiastics should cultivate the virtues of 'Wisdome, Humility, Clearnesse of Doctrine, and sincerity of Conversation', de Cardonnel wrote: 'seasonable & good admonition to the Christian Clergy.' And when Hobbes broke off from his attack on scholastic metaphysics to exclaim (on p. 374), 'these are but a small part of the Incongruities they are forced to, from their disputing [67] On his life see Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 259–316, esp. pp. 275–8 on his relations with royalist exiles. To this it may be added that in late 1646 Sir Edward Nicholas suggested to Sir Edward Hyde that he make use of de Cardonnel's services 'For y^{e} Presse' (referring to the printing press which de Cardonnel had set up in Caen): Bodl., MS Clarendon 29, fo. 39r, Hyde to Nicholas, from Jersey, 1 [/11] Jan. 1647.

[68] See Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 259, 288–9.

[69] See pp. 112–14, 222–4.

Philosophically, in stead of admiring, and adoring of the Divine and Incomprehensible Nature . . .', de Cardonnel noted approvingly: 'Gods incomprehensible Nature not subject to y^e^ termes or apprehension of Philosophy.' It was only at a later stage, it seems, that de Cardonnel decided that Hobbes himself was guilty of attempting to subject divine matters to the apprehensions of human philosophy, and filled in the blank verso side of the engraved title page with admonitory quotations about those who are 'so stubborn and obstinate in their opinions that they leave no place for the Holy Spirit'.[70] Here was a reader who had, at least on his first reading, taken Leviathan as a work that made a serious (though not unflawed) contribution to religious truth; that de Cardonnel then set himself against Hobbes may have been due to the particular turn which his own religious development had taken.[71]

In the case of the other writer of detailed annotations on Leviathan, it can at least be said that the religious hostility was consistent, and present from the start. Thomas Barlow was an Anglican divine with a largely Calvinist theology and a strong intellectual commitment to scholasticism. A Fellow of the Queen's College, Oxford, he was cherished by Independents such as John Owen (whose support helped to gain him the post of Keeper of the Bodleian Library in 1652) but also kept in touch with leading Anglicans such as Henry Hammond. Before the civil war, he had had contacts with Lord Falkland and William Chillingworth at Great Tew; but there is no evidence that he had made Hobbes's acquaintance at that stage. Contact was made in 1656, when Hobbes's admirer Henry Stubbe, who was working under Barlow in the Bodleian, arranged for Hobbes to send Barlow a presentation copy of the English translation of De corpore; and in 1658 Hobbes repeated the gesture, with a copy of De homine.[72] In his letter of thanks for the first of these gifts, Barlow wrote that 'I haue read your bookes constantly as they came out, and . . . haue learn'd much by them, in many particulars', merely adding that 'I confesse . . . I doe not concurre with your judgement in euery thinge.'[73] If the marginalia in Barlow's exemplum of Leviathan (in the library of the Queen's College) were written when he first read the book, they may thus date from not long after its publication.[74]

Barlow added no annotations or marks to the first two parts of the book, but the third and fourth contain many underlinings and marginal lines, with [70] See Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 295–6.

[71] On the Comenian enthusiasm of de Cardonnel's later years, see ibid., pp. 302–7.

[72] Correspondence, i, pp. 420–21; Malcolm and Tolonen, 'Correspondence: Some New Items', p. 483.

[73] Hobbes, Correspondence, i, p. 421.

[74] The Queen's College, Oxford, pressmark FF.g.514. The reference to Thomas Tenison's The Creed of Mr. Hobbes Examined (1670) on the printed title page, and the extract from it on the verso of the engraved title page, were presumably later additions.

significant annotations from p. 255 (in Chapter 40) to p. 366 (in Chapter 45). As that distribution suggests, Barlow was mostly concerned with Hobbes's arguments about spiritual and temporal authority, and about the relations between the two. Against the claim (on p. 309) that 'a Christian King, as a Pastor, and Teacher of his Subjects, makes not thereby his Doctrines Laws. He cannot oblige men to beleeve. . .', Barlow wrote: 'How is he then sent as a Pastor, as the Apostles were? to y^e^ Apostles our sauiour saith, as my father sent me &c. now our sauiour could oblige men to beleiue, and [er]go if y^e^ sup^re^me power Ciuil (w^ch^ this Author affirmes) haue this power delegated to him, he can by vertue of y^t^ power oblige men to beleiue.' Barlow rejected both Hobbes's reduction of ministerial office to teaching and preaching, and his total subordination of that office to temporal authority; on the following page, where Hobbes said that St Paul cannot have meant subjects of the Roman emperors to 'obey' him in any legal sense, as this would have been 'to obey two Masters', Barlow wrote: 'yes vnder 2. maisters', explaining that one was 'quoad a[nim]am' (where the soul was concerned), the other 'in Ciuilibus' (in civil matters). On p. 311, against Hobbes's comment that Christ gave the Apostles 'Power to Preach and Baptize in all parts of the world, supposing they were not by their own lawfull Soveraign forbidden', Barlow wrote: 'If they were forbidden by their lawfull soueraign yet they might, and ought to doe it Act. 5. 29.' Similarly, responding to Hobbes's argument that if subjects are compelled by their ruler to worship an idol on threat of death or severe punishment, 'it is not Idolatry', Barlow insisted: 'If such worship be Idolatry, then you must (with Daniel) venter to dy, rather then doe it. Compulsion will not excuse.' For Barlow, spiritual authority had a quite different nature from temporal, and constituted the Church as a different community: when Hobbes wrote (on p. 312) that Christian monarchs were 'Monarchs of their own people; that is, of their own Church (for the Church is the same thing with a Christian people)', Barlow added a lengthy annotation explaining that it was 'The same thing materially . . . But not formally.' Overall, it is only in a very limited sense that one can say that Barlow was engaging in argument with Hobbes's text; for the nature of that engagement was that of a tutor correcting the simple errors in a student's work, and indicating from time to time the value of elementary scholastic distinctions.

Vernacular Translations

While readers in England grappled with the arguments and implications of Leviathan, news of the book was gradually spreading through Europe. In December 1655, for example, the German polymath Johann Christian von Boineburg wrote from Mainz to his old tutor Hermann Conring that 'Hobbes has published a book, which he has entitled Leviathan; in it, he claims to demonstrate that the authority of the sovereign depends on the opinion of the common people'; and a month later he added that 'Hobbes's Leviathan has come out only in English. A certain Englishman, who is staying in Cologne, will deliver it to me shortly.'[75] The Elzevier editions of De cive, and the French translations of both that text and De corpore politico (the second part of The Elements of Law), had alerted many Continental readers to the fact that Hobbes was a challenging and original thinker, so the demand for any major new work by him was, in principle, already large. But very few of those readers on the Continent had the slightest knowledge of English. A translation of Hobbes's new treatise was, therefore, much to be desired.

As has already been noted, the French translation which Hobbes arranged during his composition of the work has disappeared without trace, and there is no evidence of any attempt to circulate or publish it. The next attempt at a translation into French was made by Hobbes's friend and admirer François du Verdus, who, as he proudly told Hobbes in the summer of 1654, had started to learn English specifically in order to translate Leviathan. He began by preparing an 'interlinear translation' in his copy of the text; in December 1656 he sent Hobbes queries about the meanings of various words (including elementary ones) that he had been unable to understand; and on [22 December 1656/] 1 January 1657 he wrote that he had completed his translation of the entire first part of the book, sending Hobbes a specimen chapter (the fourth, on language) for his approval.[76] Possibly Hobbes, realizing that his friend was not up to the task, now gently dissuaded him from it. But others among the circle of friends and admirers that Hobbes had left behind in France did not cease to remind him of the need for a translation: in 1657 Thomas de Martel urged him to have a translation published very soon, and two years later Charles du Bosc informed him that 'All y^{e} learned men I know desire that Leuiathan were in french or Latine.'[77]

After du Verdus, the next person to think of undertaking such a project was certainly better qualified: François du Prat, son of a French father and an English mother, who served as a travelling companion and tutor to the elder son of the third Earl of Devonshire in the late 1650s. He informed [75] Gruber, ed., Commercii epistolici tomus, i, pp. 141, [5/] 15 Dec. 1655 ('Hobbius edidit librum, cui titulum fecit Leuiathan. Eo ostendere contendit, summarum potestatum authoritatem pendere ab opinione vulgi'; 149, [13/] 23 Jan. 1656 ('HOBBII Leuiathan non nisi Anglice prodiit. Eum mihi breui redditurus est quidam Anglus, qui degit Coloniae').

[76] See Correspondence, i, pp. 187–8, 190–91, 216–17, 223, 345–74, 398–419.

[77] Ibid., pp. 480, 481, 504.

Hobbes of his plan to translate Leviathan in the autumn of 1661, and returned to the same theme in a letter from Paris in September 1663:

> I have this very day spoken to a bookseller about y.e printing of y.e Leviathan here, who did open his eares to y.t proposition. & answered y.t y.r de Cive in French is sold publickly & y.t you were an author so well knowne, as he made no doubt but y.e booke would sell away. For my part, I have such a minde to y.e worke, as y.t I shall never be satisfi'd till I come to an end of it.[78]

From his other comments in this letter it appears that du Prat had started to write a translation while he was with the Cavendish family in England, but that when he showed the draft material to his Parisian friends, they found it full of 'faults in y.e French expressions contracted in England'; he decided that he would need to stay in France for five or six months, to improve and complete the work.[79] This plan, too, apparently came to nothing. No complete translation of Leviathan into French would be published until the twentieth century.

One other project to translate the work into a vernacular language did achieve success, however: a Dutch version of the complete text, entitled Leviathan: of van de stoffe, gedaente, ende magt van de kerckelycke ende wereltlycke regeeringe, was published in Amsterdam in 1667, and reprinted there in 1672. The translator was Abraham van Berkel, a former schoolmaster who had studied medicine in Utrecht and settled in Leiden, where he produced a translation of Sir Thomas Browne's Religio medici in 1665. He was a close friend of the radical free-thinker Adriaen Koerbagh (who had connections with members of Spinoza's circle), and it was probably through Koerbagh that he obtained the services of the publisher Jacobus Wagenaar in Amsterdam, who produced both editions.[80] Van Berkel's version was not an outstanding example of the translator's art; his prose was cumbersome, and his grasp of English less than perfect. (Having evidently made a close study of De cive, he used its Latin as a crutch when translating those passages in Leviathan that corresponded closely to it—in two cases, including in his translation material that was present in De cive but entirely absent from Leviathan.)[81] At the end of the volume van Berkel included first a specimen chapter from his translation of Browne's Pseudodoxia epidemica, and then [78] Ibid., ii, pp. 522–3 (21 Sept./1 Oct. 1661); 559 (quotation: 19/29 Sept. 1663); 881–5 (biography of du Prat). [79] Ibid., p. 559.

[80] See Schoneveld, Intertraffic, pp. 4–9; Gelderblom, 'The Publisher'; Israel, Radical Enlightenment, pp. 185–96. For the identification of van Berkel as the translator see also Brucker, Historia critica, iv(2), p. 157 (n.). On Koerbagh see Meinsma, Spinoza en zijn kring, pp. 296–324; van Moerkerken, Adriaan Koerbagh; Vandenbossche, Koerbagh en Spinoza.

[81] See Schoneveld, Intertraffic, pp. 56–7.

two useful tools for the study of Leviathan: a ten-page register of biblical citations, and a very detailed subject index, extending to 51 pages. And at the beginning of the book he added a Preface of his own, in which he insisted on the importance of a correct understanding of sovereign power, and also dealt with the issue of Hobbes's apparent religious unorthodoxy. He was aware, he wrote, that many priests and ministers in England, France, Italy, and Holland had denounced Hobbes as 'one of the greatest and most wicked heretics'; but this was to be explained simply by the fact that 'their baseless accusations, unfathomable and inscrutable dissimulation, and deceptive hypocrisy have here been all too plainly unmasked'.[82]

Dutch was quite widely read, not only in the Netherlands but also in parts of northern Germany and the Baltic region, and the fact that this edition was reprinted after the printings of the Latin version in 1668 and 1670 suggests that there was a significant demand to satisfy; in the library of Samuel Pufendorf (who, unusually, possessed at least a basic reading knowledge of English), the only edition of Leviathan was this Dutch translation.[83] A French translation would of course have had a much broader appeal. But an even more attractive option, for educated readers throughout Europe, would have been a translation of Leviathan into Latin; and that is what Hobbes himself eventually supplied.

The Latin Translation and the Question of Priority

The first attempt at translating Leviathan into Latin was made by Hobbes's friend and admirer Henry Stubbe in 1656. Stubbe had considerable skill as a Latin scholar—he would later contribute an account of John Wallis's errors in Latin and Greek to one of Hobbes's polemical works against Wallis—and took great care over the translation.[84] A letter from Stubbe to Hobbes in April 1656 enclosed a draft version of the opening pages of the book, marked with asterisks for passages where he was unsure of his translation, and manicules where he had 'omitted a word which I conceiued redundant in y^{e} English'.[85] Not only had Hobbes encouraged him to undertake this task; he had also promised, apparently, that he would supply Stubbe with some additions

[82] Hobbes, Leviathan: of van de stoffe, sigs. *5v ('een van de grootste ende snoodste Ketters'), *6r ('hare loose Aenslagen, ondoorgrondelicjke end' onnaspoorlijcke Geveynstheyt, en bedrieglijcke Schijnheyligheyt worden hier al te bloot ontmaskert').

[83] Palladini, ed., La biblioteca di Pufendorf, pp. 195–6. Palladini notes that he had 11 books in English (p. xviii). On the wide area of Dutch readership see Israel, Radical Enlightenment, pp. 139–40.

[84] On Stubbe see Jacob, Henry Stubbe, and Hobbes, Correspondence, ii, pp. 899–902. For his anti-Wallis contribution see Hobbes, ΣΤΙΓΜΑΙ, pp. 20–30 (EW vii, pp. 401–28).

[85] Correspondence, i, p. 271.

to the text.[86] Further instalments followed in July and October, taking the translation to the end of Chapter 9; but in December Stubbe was questioned about his work on Leviathan by Dr John Owen, the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford University. In January 1657 Stubbe apologized to Hobbes for having been 'slacke' over the translation, and in the following month he promised to 'make it y^e^ whole busynesse of this summer'; in April he resumed work on it (having just been told by Owen not to do so), but at some time thereafter the project seems to have lapsed.[87] No trace of this partial translation has survived, apart from the few words cited by Stubbe in his letters to Hobbes—words which, as they do not appear in the corresponding passages in the Latin Leviathan, show that Stubbe's work was not incorporated into the published translation.

In the end, it seems to have been thanks to the efforts and encouragement of another of Hobbes's admirers, Samuel Sorbière, that a Latin translation of Leviathan was eventually made by Hobbes himself and printed by the Dutch publisher Joan (or Johan) Blaeu. In 1663 Sorbière made a three-month trip to England, where he spent much time in Hobbes's company. When he returned to France in September, he immediately set off for Amsterdam to deliver a bundle of Hobbes's Latin works to Blaeu. As he wrote to Hobbes on 11 [/21] September, 'He will produce a fine edition of them in quarto, and will take great care over correcting the proofs.'[88] Whether Sorbière had himself originated the plan for this Amsterdam edition of Hobbes's Opera philosophica, or whether Hobbes had merely made use of his services as a messenger and intermediary, is not clear. But there can be no doubt of his enthusiasm for the project. He continued to be active as an intermediary until [June/] July 1664, when he learned that Blaeu's son Pieter had visited London and had made direct contact with Hobbes.[89] Sorbière then wrote to Hobbes that 'I shall no longer trouble myself over the printing of your works, except to beg you—and him—to add your Leviathan to them. You should make a Latin translation of it, or at least allow him to have one made by that learned man who has translated many of Lord Chancellor Bacon's

[86] Ibid., pp. 271–2, suggesting that Hobbes keep the drafts as they came in, 'unlesse you would haue any thing altered, & when y^e^ whole is done, & you haue added what you please, I shall . . . reassume y^e^ whole piece, and reade it ouer, & polish it.'

[87] Ibid., pp. 293–4, 311–12, 430, 449, 459. A later letter from Stubbe to Hobbes, in 1659 (pp. 505–6), makes no mention of it.

[88] Ibid., ii, pp. 556–7 ('Il en fera une belle edition en 4^o^, & aura grand soin de la correction'). The 'he' referred to here may have been Pieter Blaeu, who played a central role in the business in this period: see below, pp. 276–7.

[89] Correspondence, ii, pp. 617, 619 (where the 'M. Blaeu' is incorrectly identified as Joan Blaeu: on Pieter's visit see below, p. 274 (n. 7)).

works.'[90] This last suggestion, a reference to the Dutch scholar Isaac Gruter, must have seemed a tempting one to Hobbes; translating Leviathan would be a lengthy and demanding task, and the philosopher was now 76 years old. If Gruter had been unavailable or unwilling, a well-connected publisher such as Blaeu could probably have found another English-reading Latinist to take his place. It is of course possible that Blaeu simply declined to take on this extra expense. But the most likely explanation for Hobbes's decision to undertake the task himself must be that he was planning to make some significant changes to the text as he proceeded.[91]

It is not known when exactly this decision was reached. In December 1667 Pieter Blaeu sent a letter on his father's behalf to Hobbes, responding to Hobbes's previous letter dated 21 November [/1 December], and containing the following comments:

> I am very happy to hear that you have already completed two-thirds of that book (you know which), and that you are working on it for two hours every day, and hoping to finish it, with God's help, by Easter. Otherwise I fully understand that you are having it written down by someone else, because of the weakness of your hand, and that since he does not understand Latin, you are having it reread and corrected afterwards by someone else who understands it well. That is a good way of doing it, and besides, I shall take special care over correcting it when we print it.[92]

Since Easter 1668 was four months away (on 22 March), this would imply that the two-thirds of the work already done had taken roughly eight months, with an approximate starting-point in February 1667. In the same letter, Pieter Blaeu said that one volume of Hobbes's Latin works would be issued first, and the volume containing the unnamed book—which, in this context, must have meant the Latin Leviathan—would be produced later. He also accepted Hobbes's suggestion that the two-thirds of the text already [90] Ibid., pp. 617, 619 ('je ne me mets plus en peine de l'impression de Vos oeuures, si ce n'est pour Vous prier & luy aussi d'y adjouster Vostre Leuiathan, dont Vous deuriès faire une uersion Latine, ou bien permettre qu'il la fit faire a ce scauant homme qui a traduit beaucoup de choses de M. le Chancelier Bacon'). Despite this statement, Sorbière wrote again in Aug. saying that he had continued to write to Blaeu, urging him to be more diligent in the printing of Hobbes's works: ibid., pp. 629, 631.

[91] This explanation is surely a little more plausible than the one Hobbes himself gave: 'fearing some other man might do it not to my liking' (see below, at n. 95). It also accords with the evidence that Hobbes had promised Stubbe some additions to the text in 1656 (see above, at n. 86).

[92] Correspondence, ii, pp. 693, 695 ('Je . . . suis biën aise d'entendre que vous avez desia achevé les deux tiers du livre que vous sçavez, et que vous travaillez tous les Jours deux heures avec esperance de l'achever avec l'aide de Dieu devant Pasque. au reste J'ay bien compris que vous le faictes écrire par vn autre a cause de la foiblesse de vostre main, et puisque celuy là n'entend pas le latin, vous le faictes par aprés relire, et corriger par vn autre qui l'entend bien, voila qui va bien, et de plus J'auray vn soing particulier pour la correction quand nous l'Imprimerons'). This letter was dated 9 Dec., presumably in the Julian calendar (then in force in Holland), not in the Gregorian, as suggested in the Correspondence (where, also, 'redire' is a misprint for 'relire').

completed should be sent straight away, and nominated a Dutch ship's captain who could be used for that purpose; 'as soon as I receive it', he added, 'I shall start printing it in order not to lose any time while waiting for the rest to be done.'[93] The fact that, in the end, Hobbes's Opera philosophica was issued in 1668 as a single work, not in two instalments, might be taken to suggest that Hobbes completed his translation of Leviathan faster than expected; but it is possible that Blaeu's plan for a two-phase publication was stymied by Hobbes himself. This point, together with other aspects of the printing by Blaeu, will be discussed in the Textual Introduction, below.[94]

What Blaeu's letter clearly shows is that Hobbes was himself translating the work into Latin. This is confirmed by Hobbes's own statements in his Answer to a Book, written probably in May or June 1668. As we have seen, when Hobbes commented there on his error about the Trinity, he wrote that 'of late, when being sollicited from beyond Sea to translate the Book into Latin, and fearing some other man might do it not to my liking, I examined this passage'; he also referred to 'my Leviathan converted into Latin, which by this time I think is printed beyond the Seas with this alteration, and also with the omission of some such passages as Strangers are not concerned in.'[95]

Despite these clear statements by Hobbes that the work was translated from English into Latin (and that he performed that translation 'of late'), some modern scholars have suggested that the Latin version of Leviathan was essentially prior to the English text. This proposal was first made by Zbigniew Łubieński in 1932; it was developed further by François Tricaud in 1971, and has been accepted by some other Hobbes scholars.[96] Tricaud was aware (unlike Łubieński) of the letter from Pieter Blaeu, and thus admitted that Hobbes had done considerable work on the Latin version in 1667–8; clearly, Hobbes had not simply taken an old Latin draft out of a drawer and sent it off to Amsterdam with merely superficial corrections. But Tricaud still maintained that an earlier Latin draft existed, and that what Hobbes sent to Blaeu was essentially a modified version of it. His (and Łubieński's) evidence for this hypothesis consisted of certain aspects of the published Latin text itself.

The first of these is the length of the Latin version, which is significantly shorter than the English. It has been suggested that Hobbes's writings on [93] Ibid., i, pp. 694, 695 ('aussytôt que je l'auray receu, J'en commenceray l'Impression pour ne pas perdre du temps en attendant que le reste se fasse').

[94] See below, pp. 283–4.

[95] Hobbes, Answer to a Book, p. 45 (EW iv, p. 317).

[96] Łubieński, Grundlagen, pp. 253–70; Tricaud, 'Introduction', pp. xix–xxix; cf. also Hood, Divine Politics, pp. 55–6, 132–3; Curley, 'Purposes and Features of this Edition', in Hobbes, Leviathan, ed. Curley, p. lxxiii.

politics form a cumulative series, in which each step (Elements of Law, first edition of De cive, second edition of De cive) involved an expansion of the material—with, therefore, the Latin Leviathan as an intermediary step between De cive and the English Leviathan.[97] This argument does not seem very compelling; there was no iron law requiring Hobbes to keep expanding his text, and it is quite understandable that a 79-year-old, suffering from the 'shaking palsy', should have wished to lighten the burden of his work as a translator by means of abridgements and omissions. Similarly, the fact that the Latin has a dry, workaday, utilitarian, and indeed sometimes quite rough character, in contrast to the energy, copiousness, polish, and, in places, delicious sententiousness of the English, is quite easily explained by the difference in circumstances between the writing of the one in 1667–8 and that of the other in 1649–50; it is not necessary to suppose that the Latin was a mere sketch or draft of the English. And when Tricaud correctly notes that sentences or longer passages at the ends of paragraphs in the English often have no equivalent in the Latin, this does not necessarily reflect the fact that additions are most conveniently made at the ends of paragraphs; we may just as well conclude that when Hobbes had translated the essential argument, and then looked ahead and saw only confirmatory or supplementary points in the remainder of the paragraph, he decided that those were most easily omitted.[98]

Another argument concerns the presence, in the Latin text, of anachronistic references to the English Civil Wars.[99] There are indeed several of these. In Chapter 18, where the English has 'there be few now (in England,) that do not see, that these Rights are inseparable, and will be so generally acknowledged, at the next return of Peace', the Latin has a directly equivalent phrase, also referring to the return of peace in the future.[100] At the end of the following chapter, similarly, Hobbes's comment about the attempts by James VI and I to unite Scotland and England, 'Which if he could have obtained, had in all likelihood prevented the Civill warres, which make both those Kingdomes, at this present, miserable', also appears in the Latin.[101] A more ambiguous case involves a passage in Chapter 21 which the English gives as follows: 'For if wee take Liberty in the proper sense, for corporall Liberty; that is to say, freedome from chains, and prison, it were very absurd for men to clamor as they doe, for the Liberty they so manifestly enjoy.' Here the Latin renders the last part of the sentence as '. . .very absurd for our rebels to [97] Łubieński, Grundlagen, p. 261; Tricaud, 'Introduction', pp. xxii–xxiii.

[98] Ibid., p. xxiii.
[99] Łubieński, Grundlagen, p. 263; Tricaud, 'Introduction', pp. xxv–xxvi.
[100] pp. 278–9. [101] pp. 304–5.

complain and demand liberty today, having rebelled at a time when they very manifestly enjoyed it'—where 'our rebels' might mean those who had previously rebelled, or people who were currently rebelling.[102] More strikingly, where Hobbes comments in Chapter 29 of the English that 'many men, have been contented to see the late troubles in England, out of an imitation of the Low Countries', the Latin gives this as 'many men have been contented to see the war which is now being waged in England'.[103]

On the other hand, some references to the war as a contemporary phenomenon which occur in the English have no equivalent in the Latin: for example, the phrase 'our present civill warre' in Chapter 3 is 'our civil war' in the Latin, and Hobbes's description of himself in Chapter 38 as 'attending the end of that dispute of the sword, concerning the Authority, (not yet amongst my Countrey-men decided,) by which all sorts of doctrine are to bee approved, or rejected' forms part of a passage entirely absent from the Latin.[104] More importantly, in two concluding sections, at the end of Part 2 and at the end of Part 4, the Latin version very clearly refers to the Civil Wars as having happened in the past—indeed, in the latter case, there is a specific mention of the Restoration.[105] Likewise, the opening sentences of the third chapter of the Appendix clearly situate the writing of Leviathan in its Civil War context, and specify that it was published in 1651.[106]

The only natural explanation of these facts would seem to be that when Hobbes translated Leviathan into Latin in 1667–8, he had two somewhat incompatible purposes. On the one hand he wished his readers to regard the book very much as a text written in the Civil War period; by eliminating (as we shall see) the more politically awkward statements from the book, he was able to present it as an unambiguous defence of the royal cause at that time, and for this reason it was useful to retain, and even fortify, some references to the Civil Wars in the present tense.[107] In any case, the work was offered to readers as a translation of a book published in 1651, not as a new text. Yet on the other hand Hobbes also wished to push home the lessons of his book, urging that they were still valid and that even after the restoration of royal rule there was still a great need for them to be taught: this was the purpose of the concluding passages of Parts 2 and 4, and indeed of the final sentences of the Latin version's Chapter 46, which ominously warned of the return of [103] pp. 506–7. This was not necessarily a substantive change in the temporal reference; 'late' could refer to the recent past as something coming up to, and continuous with, the present.

[102] pp. 328–9.

[104] pp. 40–41, 708. [105] pp. 574–5, 1129. [106] pp. 1226–7.

[107] The removal of 'present' from the phrase in Ch. 3 might be explained by supposing that by Ch. 3 Hobbes had not yet decided on his policy for such cases; the decision to remove the passage in Ch. 38 may have been made on the basis of the other contents of that passage.

civil war if Hobbes's teachings were not heeded. That Hobbes thus ended up producing a text with (chronologically speaking) two clashing frames of reference is, on this account, odd but understandable. What is not at all understandable is that he should have gone over a previous Latin version with great care (spending two hours a day on it for roughly twelve months) and yet left, as unintended and glaring anachronisms, several present-tense references to the Civil Wars. Of course it might be imagined that he found them in his pre-existing draft and consciously decided to leave them unchanged, for the reasons just given. But in that case their value as special evidence for the Łubieński–Tricaud hypothesis disappears, as the reasons for thinking that he consciously retained those present-tense references from an earlier draft are the same as the reasons for thinking that he consciously preserved (and, even, reinforced) them when translating from the English.

Other elements of the case for the Łubieński–Tricaud hypothesis are more subjective, involving the impression that the argument of the Latin text has a less fully worked-out character, especially where Hobbes's theory of authorization is concerned.[108] This point will be addressed in the discussion of the differences between the English and Latin versions, below. But it is surely not necessary to pursue every minor detail of the case for the pre-existing Latin text, as the case against it has some arguments quite strong enough to overturn it. First, it should be emphasized that where the English Leviathan closely follows the text of De cive—the most notable example being Chapter 31, which is largely a translation of De cive's corresponding chapter—the Latin Leviathan re-translates from the English. If, as Łubieński and Tricaud suppose, Hobbes wrote the Latin version of Leviathan first, at some time between 1646 and 1649, he would surely have copied this material directly from his earlier Latin book, instead of going to all the needless trouble of producing a Latin paraphrase of it. The same point can be made in relation to a whole series of citations from Latin sources in Leviathan: the chapter heading from Suárez in Chapter 8, a citation from Cicero in Chapter 24, the quotations from Bellarmino in Chapter 42, and the fragments of the Roman Catholic liturgy given in Chapter 44. In each case, Hobbes's Latin is a re-translation from his English.[109]

A different point, but with similar implications, arises in Chapter 38, where Hobbes's English text cites a verse from Obadiah (in the wording of the Authorized Version), and adds some further comments: 'Obadiah verse 17. saith the same, Vpon Mount Zion shall be Deliverance; and there shall be holinesse, and the house of Iacob shall possesse their possessions . . . which pos- sessions he expresseth more particularly in the following verses, by the mount of Esau, the Land of the Philistines, the fields of Ephraim, of Samaria, Gilead, and the Cities of the South, and concludes with these words, the Kingdom shall be the Lords.' When writing the Latin, Hobbes looked up the verse itself in the Vulgate translation and quoted its wording; but he translated the rest of his own sentence from the English, supplying Latin versions of words and phrases quoted there from the Authorized Version, not the Latin that appeared in the Vulgate. In doing so, he made nonsense of the phrase 'which possessions', which now had nothing to refer to in the verse as he quoted it.[110] Here it is easy to see how this happened, if one assumes that he was translating from the English, but very difficult to imagine how this hybrid text could have arisen if the Latin had been written first.

[108] Łubieński, Grundlagen, p. 259; Tricaud, 'Introduction', pp. xxvi-xxviii.
[109] pp. 122–3, 388–9, 898–921, 970–71.

There are several places in which the nature of Hobbes's wording strongly indicates that the English was the original version. In Chapter 14, for example, Hobbes discusses two meanings of the English verb 'will', as follows: 'there is a great difference in the signification of these words, Volo hoc tuum esse cras, and Cras dabo; that is, between I will that this be thine to morrow, and, I will give it thee to morrow: For the word I will, in the former manner of speech, signifies an act of the will Present; but in the later, it signifies a promise of an act of the will to Come.' In the Latin, he gives the phrases 'Volo hoc tuum esse cras' and (with a slight increase in accuracy) 'Cras tibi hoc Dabo', but blithely goes on to translate the rest of the sentence after 'For the word', using 'Volo' again for 'I will', even though it does not feature in the second 'manner of speech' at all.[111] Again, in Chapter 4 he observes that 'The Latines called Accounts of mony Rationes, and accounting, Ratiocinatio: and that which we in bills or books of account call Items, they called Nomina; that is, Names'; in the Latin this is rendered very directly, so that the latter part becomes 'id quod nos in rationibus appellamus Item, illi Nomen vocant'—where the word 'Item', itself a Latin word but with a different meaning from the English 'item', is just tossed into the Latin prose, and the meaning of 'nos' as 'we English' is not self-evident.[112] It is easy to see this as the result of a rather mechanical process of translation into Latin, and difficult to imagine that Hobbes would have written such a thing in an original Latin composition. Had he thought a little harder about the awkwardness of this phrase, he might have omitted it altogether from his translation. That is what seems to have happened with a passage in Chapter 36, where Hobbes discussed the description of Jesus Christ as 'the Word' in St John's Gospel: 'They that taking occasion from this place, doe commonly call him the Verbe of God, do but render the text more obscure. They might as well term him the Nown of God: for as by Nown, so also by Verbe, men understand nothing but a part of speech.'[113] Here the point Hobbes was making depended on the particular connotations of 'verb', as opposed to 'word', in English; it would not have worked in Latin (where 'verbum' served for both), and so the passage was simply omitted. Similarly, when Hobbes began his discussion of the authorship of the Pentateuch in Chapter 33 by saying that the phrase 'the five Books of Moses' was ambiguous, as it could mean either books by Moses or books about Moses, this ambiguity could not have survived translation into Latin; in this case too the point was simply passed over, in a much-abridged rendering of the passage.[114]

[110] pp. 724–6. The AV's 'their possessions' is given as 'those who possessed them' ('qui se possederant') in the verse quoted from the Vulgate, rendering meaningless Hobbes's phrase 'which possessions', translated by him as 'quas possessiones'; subsequently, where his English follows the AV's wording (v. 19: 'the fields of Ephraim, and the fields of Samaria'), the Vulgate has 'the region [or: country] of Ephraim and the region of Samaria', but Hobbes's Latin translates his English ('agros Ephraim, & Samariae'); he translates 'the Cities of the South' as 'Vrbes ad Meridiem', not using the Vulgate's phrasing ('civitates austri'); and he translates the AV's 'the Kingdom shall be the Lord's' into Latin, not using the Vulgate's different phrasing ('erit Domino regnum', 'the kingdom shall be for the Lord').

[111] pp. 206–7; Tricaud himself admits the force of this example: 'Introduction', pp. xxi–xxii.

[112] pp. 58–9; see the comments on this in Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 235–6.

English-language connotations, and indeed an English cultural background, are also essential to Hobbes's satirical account of the 'Kingdome of Fairies' in Chapter 47. No one who compares the English and the Latin here can doubt that the latter is a rather simplifying and explanatory rendering of the former. Thus 'their whole Hierarchy, or Kingdome of Darknesse, may be compared not unfitly to the Kingdome of Fairies; that is, to the old wives Fables in England, concerning Ghosts and Spirits, and the feats they play in the night' becomes, in the Latin, 'it became possible to compare the Roman hierarchy, not inappositely, to the popular sayings which circulated in England among old wives, children, and the simpler sort of men of the common people, about ghosts, that is, shades or spectres, and their nocturnal misdeeds'; the phrase 'change them into Naturall Fools, which Common people do therefore call Elves' becomes 'remove boys from their cradles and put others, half-witted, in their place'; and 'they are said to send their Elves, to pinch them' becomes 'they were said to send one of their number to give him a severe beating'.[115]

Other evidence that the Latin was adapted from the English is given by some of the clumsy and negligent constructions which disfigure Hobbes's Latin text; in several cases these are very obviously the results of following the English in a hasty or unthinking way. Thus, for example, we have 'Of Systemes subordinate, some are Politicall' rendered as 'De Systematibus Subordinatis alia Politica sunt', and the phrase 'And that it was by vertue of this act of the Church of Antioch, that they were Apostles. . .' translated as 'Et quod in virtute hujus vocationis fuit, quod Apostoli erant. . .'.[116] Evidence that the Latin was subsequent to the English can be found in the minor corrections it makes: for example, where the English quoted God's words about Abraham in Genesis 18: 18–19 in the second person (in a possible confusion with the covenant given in Genesis 17), as if God were addressing Abraham directly, the Latin gives the correct wording in the third person.[117] Clearly Hobbes quoted from memory in the English, and then turned to a printed Bible (in this case, the Junius–Tremellius version) when writing the Latin translation; the idea that he would have quoted the verses correctly in a prior Latin text, and then introduced this error when translating from the Latin into English, is hard to comprehend.

[113] p. 654.

[114] p. 590. Note too that Hobbes's comment in the English here could not possibly be described as an end-of-paragraph 'addition'; it is the entrée into his discussion of the authorship question.

[115] pp. 1118–19, 1120–21, 1122–3.

Larger considerations weighing against the Łubieński–Tricaud hypothesis must also be derived from the whole account, offered above, of Hobbes's reasons for writing Leviathan.[118] The hypothesis requires us to suppose that, within a short time of the publication of the revised De cive in 1647, Hobbes decided to embark on another complete rewriting of his political theory for essentially the same audience—the learned readers of Europe. Łubieński suggests that this Latin text was written in 1648–9.[119] No reason is given for Hobbes's undertaking and completing such a large task, at a time when, as we know, he was hard at work on De corpore. The account given above, on the other hand, did offer an explanation for his embarking on this task, which at the same time explained how the nature of the task changed and developed, and also why the work was undertaken in English. And finally, we should not forget Hobbes's encouragement of Henry Stubbe's attempt at a Latin translation of Leviathan in 1656–7; this too would become hard to comprehend if we thought that Hobbes already possessed a complete Latin version of the text.

While we are entitled to discount the hypothesis that a full Latin text preceded the English, doing so does not remove the possibility that, at a local level, parts of the text of Leviathan were influenced by draft material in Latin; as we have seen, Hobbes did make some limited use of his manuscript drafts of De corpore. It is not impossible that his writing was influenced here and there by other, similar, draft materials relating to his projected De homine, or by other miscellaneous notes. Direct textual evidence for this is lack-[116] pp. 348–9, 832–3; see the comments in Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 234–5.

[117] pp. 446–7.
[118] See above, pp. 57–8.
[119] Łubieński, Grundlagen, p. 267.

ing, however; there are no strong parallels with the text of De homine as it was eventually published. And indirect evidence that particular phrases or passages in the English were derived from a Latin original may be suggestive, but is unlikely to be compelling in any particular case: if a construction used by Hobbes appears to be calqued on a Latin base, the explanation is always available that he was a habitual reader and writer of Latin whose mind may have worked in Latin-influenced ways. A number of examples have been put forward of oddities in the English text which might derive from a Latin textual original: a sentence without a verb, for instance, or one in which a 'doublet' takes a singular verb ('Admiration and Wonder, is consequent to. . .').[120] But the writing of sentences without verbs, which may indeed have had a Latin stylistic origin in general terms, was something of which Hobbes was quite capable in English; a confusion between singular and plural constructions was one of Hobbes's habitual faults in the English language; and the use of doublets could be a form of 'copiousness', independent of any act of translation.[121] The fact that some doublets in the English Leviathan receive singleton equivalents in the Latin does not necessarily imply that the former were translated from the latter; when he translated 'Admiration and Wonder', Hobbes might well have thought, once he had written 'admiratio', that the search for an additional synonym was simply not necessary. And while an attempt has been made to link these alleged Latinisms (or alleged signs of translation from Latin) to a supposed Latin manuscript refutation of Bellarmino, readers should be reminded that there is no other evidence that such a text existed, and that the handling of quotations from Bellarmino's Latin strongly suggests that no such manuscript was available to Hobbes when he wrote the Latin translation of Leviathan.[122]

Changes in the Latin Translation

The Latin version of Leviathan was, as all the evidence suggests, a new translation made by Hobbes from the English text in 1667–8. The general pattern of changes made during that process may now be considered, beginning with the most substantial ones.

At the end of the text, Hobbes entirely omitted the 'Review, and Conclusion' from his translation; and he added, as has been mentioned already, an [120] Rogers and Schuhmann, i, p. 238.

[121] For verbless sentences see, for example, p. 140: 'To be Honoured of few or none, Dishonourable.' And again: 'Actions, or Words that proceed from Errour, Ignorance, or Folly, Dishonourable.'

[122] Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 239–40, and cf. the comments above, pp. 106–7.

Appendix in three chapters. These were all written in the form of a didactic dialogue between 'A' and 'B'; the first chapter analysed the Nicene Creed, the second gave an account of the nature of heresy, and the third dealt with a number of objections to the theological arguments of the book. Three chapters in the main text were so thoroughly rewritten as to constitute new texts, albeit covering much of the same ground as the old ones: Chapter 9, on the division of the sciences, Chapter 46, on 'vain philosophy', and Chapter 47, on the machinations of the ecclesiastics. An important passage added in the Latin version of Chapter 46 discussed the development of the concept of heresy in the early Church, referring to the creed established at the Council of Nicaea, approving the decisions of the next three General Councils, and regretting the fact that Christian theology was subsequently infiltrated by Aristotelian philosophy.[123] This passage may have been the germ from which there later grew not only the first chapter of the Appendix, but also part of the second—and, insofar as the passage cites Tertullian's rejection of incorporeality, one controversial element of the third chapter as well.

Throughout the book, Hobbes makes contractions and omissions. Sometimes whole passages are left out, for no other apparent reason than the fact that they are illustrative or supplementary to the argument, and therefore dispensable. More often, small cuts are made or passages are summarized; and the skill with which this is done is often impressive. Two cases, both from Chapter 27, may stand for a host of other examples. A short paragraph in the English reads as follows: 'In the like manner, if the Civill Law of a mans own Country, be not so sufficiently declared, as he may know it if he will; nor the Action against the Law of Nature; the Ignorance is a good Excuse: In other cases Ignorance of the Civill Law, Excuseth not.' This is given in the Latin as 'If someone has violated a law of his commonwealth that was not sufficiently declared, and has not done anything against natural law, he shall be excused by his ignorance', eliminating 'In the like manner', reducing 'so sufficiently declared, as he may know it if he will' to 'sufficiently declared', and removing the more or less superfluous corollary that 'In other cases Ignorance of the Civill Law, Excuseth not.'[124] A little later, the English has the following passage:

> For in breaking the Law, which without a fear of penalty to follow, were not a Law, but vain words, he undergoeth the penalty, though he know not what it is; because, whosoever voluntarily doth any action, accepteth all the known consequences of it; but Punishment is a known consequence of the violation of the Lawes, in every Common-wealth; which punishment, if it be determined already by the Law, he is subject to that; if not, then is he subject to Arbitrary punishment.

[123] pp. 1063–71. [124] pp. 456–7.

In the Latin, this is deftly reduced to:

For when the law is known, and when it is known that there must be some penalty (even an unknown one) for the crime, he who commits the crime makes himself liable, willingly, to the penalty (even if it is unknown).[125]

In some cases, however, the cuts in the Latin seem to have been made for a specific reason. Hobbes himself commented, as we have seen, that he had omitted 'some such passages as Strangers are not concerned in'.[126] Thus in Chapter 26 the lengthy criticism of the treatment under English Common Law (as expounded by Coke) of an innocent fugitive is contracted into a very short summary; the passage discussing the role of laymen in English courts (both Lords in Parliament, and jurymen in ordinary trials) is eliminated; and in the listing of Justinian's categories of laws, the English examples ('the Proclamations of the Kings of England', 'the Orders of the House of Commons in England', etc.) are abbreviated or omitted.[127] Other passages similarly omitted include the reference to a medieval English statute in Chapter 21; discussion of 'the excellent constitution of the Courts of Justice, established both for Common, and also for Publique Pleas in England' in Chapter 23; the account of the lands reserved for his own use by William the Conqueror in Chapter 24; and some discussions of phrases in English translations of the Bible in Chapter 35.[128]

Hobbes was evidently conscious of the fact that the Latin Leviathan would have a European readership, and he would have appreciated that, since the work was to be published in Amsterdam, many of his readers would be Dutch. It was probably for this reason that he omitted some passages criticizing the presbyterian Churches. At the end of Chapter 12 his reference to 'unpleasing Priests' in both the Catholic Church and 'that Church that hath presumed most of Reformation' (meaning, most probably, the Genevan Church) was eliminated.[129] And in Chapter 47, where the English had a whole paragraph on the assumption of unlawful power by 'the Presbytery', concluding that 'The Authors therefore of this Darknesse in Religion, are the Romane, and the Presbyterian Clergy', the Latin version omitted all direct mention of 'Presbytery', leaving only the following hint: 'For what benefit do the Roman Church, and some others, publicly teach . . . that the [126] See above, p. 168. On the other hand, it should be noted that Hobbes's final comment in the Latin, at the end of Ch. 47, seemed to be addressed to an English readership, written as it was in the aftermath of the Second Anglo-Dutch War: 'Meanwhile, let us all make an effort to prevent ourselves from being overwhelmed all together, thanks to our internal quarrels, by a foreign enemy' (p. 1131).

[125] pp. 456–7.

[127] pp. 434–5, 438, 440–41. [128] pp. 340, 380–82, 392, 636, 638. [129] p. 186.

Kingdom of God was restored when Christ rose again from the dead?'[130]

Some significant omissions were clearly made with Hobbes's domestic readership in mind. As we have seen, hostile critics such as Filmer and Bramhall—and, most irritatingly, Wallis—had seized on some elements of the text to portray Hobbes as a defender of rebellion: in particular, his argumentation about protection and obedience in the 'Review, and Conclusion', and his comments about the difference between beginning a rebellion and continuing a rebellion, once begun. In the Latin version, the 'Review, and Conclusion' was entirely omitted, and other passages were altered or curtailed. The last paragraph of Chapter 29, in the English text, had presented the argument about a defeated ruler that was developed more pointedly in the 'Review, and Conclusion':

> For though the Right of a Soveraign Monarch cannot be extinguished by the act of another; yet the Obligation of the members may. For he that wants protection, may seek it any where; and when he hath it, is obliged (without fraudulent pretence of having submitted himselfe out of feare,) to protect his Protection as long as he is able.

In the Latin translation Hobbes altered this passage, eliminating the words which might have suggested that he had been urging people to submit in good faith to the parliamentary authorities: 'For though the right of a sovereign monarch cannot be extinguished except by himself; yet the obligation of the citizens is completely removed the dissolution of the commonwealth.'[131] In Chapter 27, arguing that 'when the Soveraign Power ceaseth, Crime also ceaseth . . . and therefore every one may protect himself by his own power', Hobbes's English text added the proviso: 'But this is to be understood onely of those, that have not themselves contributed to the taking away of the Power that protected them: for that was a Crime from the beginning.' In the Latin version, that proviso was significantly strengthened: 'But if the commonwealth has been dissolved by means of sedition, the crime rests on those who dissolved it; because what they did was a crime from the beginning, and when the commonwealth is restored that crime can be judged and punished.'[132] And in Chapter 21 his comments on the actions of those who, having begun a rebellion, continued in it, also underwent a small but significant change: the words 'There was indeed injustice in the first breach of their duty; Their bearing of Arms subsequent to it, though it be to maintain what they have done, is no new unjust act. And if it be onely to defend their persons, it is not unjust at all' became 'There was indeed injustice in the first breach of their duty; their bearing of arms subsequent to it, to defend themselves, is no new unjust act.'[133] Here the idea that the persistent rebels could simply be exculpated on grounds of self-defence was dropped; the point about self-defence was collapsed into the previous point about continued rebellion, and readers were left with the impression that those people's actions, while not a new injustice, were a continuing injustice all the same.

[130] pp. 1006–7. Note also, however, that the comment in Ch. 44 (p. 978) on presbyterians excommunicating kings and assuming supremacy in religion was left more or less unchanged. That Hobbes's own hostility to English and Scottish presbyterianism had not diminished is made very clear in the text of Behemoth, which he may have begun before the writing of the Latin Leviathan and completed after it.

[131] pp. 518–19. [132] pp. 454–5.

No less striking are the changes and omissions Hobbes made in some of the passages setting out his theological views. Foremost among these are the passages dealing with the relation between Moses and the Trinity—the one topic on which he admitted, in the third chapter of the Appendix, that he had made a mistake. His first account of the matter, in Chapter 16, was rewritten: the remark that God was 'personated' by Moses was dropped, and Hobbes now stated merely that God created the world 'in his own person'.[134] The final paragraph of Chapter 41, containing the claim that Jesus 'representeth (as Moses did) the Person of God', was simply omitted; and so too was the lengthy statement of this doctrine in Chapter 42.[135] However, while one of the most objectionable features of Hobbes's previous account of the Trinity was thus removed, it could not be said that he set up in its place any strong statement of orthodox Trinitarian doctrine. His revised phrase about Jesus in Chapter 16, 'In the redemption of the human race, Jesus Christ personated God', would hardly count as such.[136]

Hobbes's unusual eschatology had also been a target of criticism, as we have seen. His theory was that after the general resurrection the elect would be restored to life in the kingdom of Christ on earth, where, clothed in incorruptible bodies, they would live eternally; but the reprobate would be restored to ordinary human life, suffering the pains of hell in a metaphorical sense (i.e., the distress of seeing the contrast between their situation and that of the elect), and finally dying a 'second death', from which they would never be revived. According to Hobbes, the reprobate would undergo 'eternal punishment' only in the sense that they would have children, who would themselves have children, generating an eternal succession of individually finite lives. A typical response to this was that of Bishop Bramhall, who commented sarcastically:

> It is to be presumed, that in those their second lifes, knowing certainly from T.H. that there is no hope of redemption for them from corporal death upon their well doing, nor fear of any torments after death for their ill doing, they will passe their times here as pleasantly as they can. This is all the damnation which T.H. fancieth.[137]

[133] pp. 340–41. [134] pp. 248–9. [135] pp. 772, 774–6. [136] pp. 248–9.

When he translated Leviathan into Latin, Hobbes stuck to his guns on the earthly kingdom of the elect, and on the restoration of the reprobate to finite lives; but he abandoned the claim that the reprobate would 'marry, and be given in marriage; that is . . . generate successively', with its scandalous implication that the damned would have the pleasure of sexual intercourse in the afterlife.[138] Instead, he found a new way of reconciling the notion of eternal punishment with his principle that the damned would live finite lives: 'eternal' in this biblical context signified only 'until the end of the world' or 'until the end of the age', meaning the last age of the world. Despite the awkwardness of this manoeuvre (which seemed to imply that the 'eternal' life of the elect on earth would also be finite), Hobbes clearly felt that he had made a significant improvement to his theory; the relevant passage in Chapter 44 was amended in the Latin accordingly.[139]

Thus far, the significant changes made by Hobbes seem to have consisted mostly of omissions and retractions, with the sole, but major, exception of the addition of the Latin Appendix. But the third chapter of that Appendix did consist, after all, of a defence of almost all the major theological claims on which Hobbes had been criticized. On some points, indeed, he fortified his position, making his radical theology more radical still. The leading example of this is his defence of the idea that God should be described as corporeal. Here Hobbes could have taken refuge in the line of argument set out in his account of natural theology in Chapter 31, where he suggested that by natural reason we can conclude only that God exists, and that when we assign attributes to him, they are essentially honorific in purpose.[140] Yet in the Appendix he went further than that, declaring that a belief in the corporeality of God was part of true Christian belief—a claim which he defended both negatively ('this doctrine was not condemned in any of the first four general councils. Show me the expression "incorporeal" or "immaterial", if you can, in the Scriptures') and positively ('"In God we all move and have our being." These are the words of the Apostle. Now, we all possess quantity. Can that which is quantitative exist in that which is not quantitative? "God is great", but greatness without a body is impossible to understand').[141] In particular, both here and in the Latin version of Chapter 46 (the germinal text from which some of the material in the Appendix grew), he cited the early Church Father Tertullian, who had described God as 'body' (using that term, apparently, to mean something like 'real substance').[142] Hobbes had previously invoked Tertullian in his reply to Wallis in 1662, citing a passage from his treatise De carne Christi and noting that 'There are many other places in him to the same purpose.'[143] Tertullian's views on this topic were well known; Hobbes might have recalled Jean Daillé's description of his attribution of 'a corporeal substance' to God as one of his 'extravagant opinions', or Daniel Toussaint's comment that Tertullian's remarks on the corporeality of God and the soul were 'Curiosities of speech . . . to be avoyded'.[144] Another possible stimulus to Hobbes's thinking was the work of the German theologian Conrad Vorstius, whose notorious Tractatus de Deo had approvingly cited Tertullian on the corporeality of God; James I's intemperate personal campaign against Vorstius in 1612 had been a theological cause célèbre at a time when the young Hobbes seems to have been taking an active interest in the latest works of controversial theology.[145] Hobbes was well aware of the contentious nature of his claim about God's corporeality when he wrote the third chapter of the Appendix. Indeed, in the first chapter of it he had himself drawn attention to the fact that the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England condemned that opinion. One of his speakers there, 'B', quotes the first Article ('God is without body and without parts') and says: 'So it must not be denied. And the penalty decreed for those who do deny it is excommunication.' And 'A' replies: 'It will not be denied. However, in the twentieth Article it says that nothing should be ordered to be believed by the Church that cannot be deduced from the Holy Scriptures. Would that it had been deduced! For I do not yet know in what sense something can be called "greatest", or "great", which is not a body.'[146] Hobbes's boldness here is rather breathtaking.

[137] Bramhall, Catching of Leviathan, p. 490. [138] p. 992. [139] p. 993

[140] pp. 564–6. In his response to Wallis in 1662 he had adapted the argument about honouring God, saying that there was nothing honorific about the use of meaningless terms such as 'incorporeal substance': Mr. Hobbes Considered, p. 32 (EW iv, p. 426). [141] pp. 1228–9.

In that same passage, 'A' asked 'whether the Holy Scripture contains the phrase "incorporeal substance", or "immaterial substance", or "separated essences"', and received the answer that it did not. As we have seen, the third [142] pp. 1063, 1228–9. [143] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, p. 37.

[144] Daillé, Traicté, p. 354 ('vne substance corporelle'; 'opinions extravagantes'); Toussaint, Synopsis, p. 33. Alexander Ross had also associated Hobbes with Tertullian, but only in relation to the claim that Gen. 1: 2 referred to a 'wind', not to God, moving over the face of the waters (Leviathan drawn out, p. 36).

[145] See Vorstius, Tractatus theologicus de Deo, p. 185, and Apologetica exegesis, p. 24. Vorstius himself repudiated the claim that God was corporeal, but did attribute corporeality to angels and the soul: see Matton, Le Discours de Gabriel Poitevin, pp. 111–20. On James I's campaign see Shriver, 'Orthodoxy and Diplomacy'. On Hobbes's early interests, see above, p. 46; the Hardwick Hall library catalogue drawn up by him in the late 1620s included three treatises by Vorstius (Chatsworth, MS Hobbes E. 1. A, p. 49: 'Vorstij tractatus tres'), as well as a folio edition of the works of Tertullian and Arnobius (p. 46).

[146] pp. 1186–7.

chapter of the Appendix made the same challenge: 'Show me the expression "incorporeal" or "immaterial", if you can, in the Scriptures.' On this point too Hobbes seems to have been developing an argument previously set out in his polemical response to Wallis in 1662.[147] The point became something of an idée fixe, expressed repeatedly in the Latin Leviathan. In the English text Hobbes had several times insisted that 'incorporeal substance' was a meaningless phrase. Thus, for example, introducing his analysis of the term 'spirit' in Chapter 34, he declared that 'Substance incorporeall are words, which when they are joined together, destroy one another, as if a man should say, an Incorporeall Body.' But in the Latin he immediately added, after that declaration, 'Neither that expression nor "immaterial" is found anywhere in Holy Scripture.'[148] Later in the same chapter, introducing his discussion of angels, Hobbes added in the Latin text the remark: 'there is absolutely no mention of incorporeal substances in the Jewish Scriptures, but that whole doctrine originated with the Greek philosophers.'[149] In Chapter 45 he inserted the comment: 'if there were some incorporeal or immaterial spirit, the term "incorporeal" or "immaterial" would undoubtedly be found somewhere in the New or Old Testament. But it is not found.'[150]

Similar treatment was given to the idea of the immortality of the soul: in Chapter 38 of the Latin Hobbes wrote that 'this expression "immortal soul" is found nowhere in Holy Scripture', and he made the same point in the Latin version of Chapter 44.[151] In an earlier chapter, where the English text had at least paid lip-service to the standard doctrine, Hobbes now dispensed with false piety: from a phrase about the extinction of the soul of the commonwealth (i.e., sovereignty), saying that 'the Members are governed by it no more, than the Carcasse of a man, by his departed (though Immortall) Soule', the words '(though Immortall)' were omitted.[152] And in the first chapter of the Appendix he went onto the offensive on this issue, arguing that the doctrine of the natural immortality of the soul was just a theory developed by a few philosophers, and quoting Ecclesiastes to show that, according to the Bible, the human soul did not differ in its nature from the soul of a wild beast.[153]

[147] Hobbes, Mr. Hobbes Considered, p. 32 (EW iv, p. 426): 'What kind of Attribute I pray you is immaterial, or incorporeal substance? Where do you find it in the Scripture?'

[148] pp. 610–11. It is striking that, three paragraphs later in the English, when discussing Gen. 1: 2, Hobbes wrote that 'then is Motion attributed to God, and consequently Place, which are intelligible only of Bodies, and not of substances incorporeall; and so the place is above our understanding'; in the Latin he changed 'substances incorporeall' to 'incorporeal things' ('Incorporeis'), omitted the statement that the passage was therefore above human understanding, but kept the overall argument (viz. that the 'spirit of God' here should be understood as a wind, not as God himself). Readers are entitled to wonder about the sincerity of the argument as it originally stood.

[149] pp. 620–21. [150] pp. 1020–21. [151] pp. 706–7, 989. [152] pp. 518–19. [153] pp. 1160-69.

On the doctrine of the Trinity, too, it cannot be said that Hobbes's sole concern was to reduce the heterodoxy of his argument. In the Appendix to the Latin Leviathan his explanation of the eternity of the Word, and of the doctrine that Jesus was 'begotten of God from the beginning', was simply that the begetting of Jesus (by God, with Mary) was promised from eternity.[154] What had been, in Chapter 36 of the English text, just one possible interpretation of the phrase 'Word of God' now became a central feature of Hobbes's Christology—a doctrinal position which, by apparently denying the pre-existence of Christ, came perilously close to the radical anti-Trinitarianism of the Socinians. It may have been for prudential reasons, therefore, that Hobbes added near the end of Chapter 34 the parenthetical phrase '(for Christ was God from eternity)'.[155]

There are a great many specific changes in the Latin Leviathan; some strengthen the argument, some embody minor corrections or retractions, and some seem to express new concerns. One substantial addition was made in Chapter 42, where Hobbes responded to an objection which had no doubt been put to him: his theory that the sovereign must enjoy the right to perform all the ministerial offices of the Church (such as preaching, and administering the sacraments) was in apparent conflict with the Pauline injunction that women should be silent in church. Here Hobbes conceded the Pauline point, but insisted: 'that certainly does not prevent a woman endowed with sovereign power from being able to appoint men who can both speak and administer all other matters in the churches by the authority of the commonwealth—that is, by her authority. For authority is not distinguished as male or female.' And he added, in support of his argument, a somewhat misleading claim about the Injunctions which Queen Elizabeth had issued in 1559 when she had sought to overcome resistance to the imposition of the Oath of Supremacy.[156] Also on the question of the rights of the sovereign over the Church, Hobbes took action at the end of Chapter 40 to withdraw a potentially damaging concession. Discussing the early kings of Israel, he had observed that 'from the practise of those times, there can no argument be drawn, that the Right of Supremacy in Religion was not in the Kings, unlesse we place it in the Prophets; and conclude, that because Hezekiah praying to the Lord before the Cherubins, was not answered from thence, nor then, but afterwards by the Prophet Isaiah, therefore Isaiah was supreme Head of the Church'. He had merely noted that such a claim was 'not the opinion of any Doctor'. It seems that, when composing the Latin Leviathan, Hobbes thought that the alternative theory he had sketched might be a dangerous hostage to fortune; the passage just quoted was replaced by one which declared that 'Therefore, since the right of kings is evident, and since the people, and sometimes even the prophets themselves, do not understand it, it is wrong to attack the rights of kings on the basis of examples drawn from the ignorance of the people or from the teaching of the prophets.'[157]

[154] pp. 1150–53. [155] p. 633. [156] pp. 864–5.

Minor theological corrections or retractions made in the Latin Leviathan include the change in Chapter 11 whereby, in the statement that 'by the visible things of this world, and their admirable order, a man may conceive there is a cause of them, which men call God', 'may conceive' became 'is certain that'.[158] In Chapter 38, commenting on Christ's words, 'My kingdom is not of this world', Hobbes had written: 'For he came onely to teach men the way of Salvation, and to renew the Kingdome of his Father, by his doctrine.' Reviewing this in the Latin, he must have realized that his use of 'onely' there reduced Christ's entire role to a merely homiletic one; so in place of that sentence he wrote: 'For Christ came to renew the old covenant; but he will come to reign at the day of judgement.'[159] But not all of Hobbes's minor changes involved rendering his theory more conventional, or correcting slips in its expression. One small but striking instance of a hardening of his stance comes in Chapter 4, where the English statement that 'The first author of Speech was God himself, that instructed Adam how to name such creatures as he presented to his sight' was changed to 'The first author of speech was Adam, who named such creatures as God presented to his sight'; Hobbes's argument had already been directed, in the English, against the idea of an Adamic language in which all the words had some divinely derived connection with the natures of the things they stood for, but this version of the argument removed the possibility altogether.[160]

Some of the small changes in the Latin are corrections of simple errors, or clarifications of unnecessary ambiguities. Thus where the English declares, 'That Understanding which is peculiar to man, is the Understanding not onely his will; but his conceptions and thoughts, by the sequell and contexture of the names of things', the Latin deals with the misleading 'his . . . his' construction, substituting 'not only other men's wills, but their conceptions'.[161] Similarly, when the English says that 'The Desires, and other Passions of man, are in themselves no Sin. No more are the Actions, that proceed from those Passions, till they know a Law that forbids them', the Latin clarifies the ambiguous 'they', replacing it with 'those who act'.[162] (These two examples may also be noted as further evidence against the Łubieński–Tricaud hypothesis: had Hobbes begun with the Latin phrasings, he would surely not have generated these English versions from them.) Sometimes the clarifications are more than merely grammatical. In Chapter 21 Hobbes had written: 'If a Monarch, or Soveraign Assembly, grant a Liberty to all, or any of his Subjects, which Grant standing, he is disabled to provide for their safety, the Grant is voyd'; here the Latin changed 'their safety' to 'the people's safety'.[163]

[157] pp. 756–7. [158] pp. 160–61. [159] pp. 726–7. [160] pp. 48–9. [161] pp. 36–7. [162] pp. 194–5.

On many points, Hobbes made minor improvements to his argument. For example, where the English text had stated that 'the savage people in many places of America, except the government of small Families, the concord whereof dependeth on naturall lust, have no government at all', the Latin replaced the phrase about depending on natural lust with 'the concord of those families is sustained only by the similarity of their desires'.[164] A little later in the same chapter, commenting on the posture of mutual hostility adopted by all sovereigns, Hobbes had written: 'But because they uphold thereby, the Industry of their Subjects; there does not follow from it, that misery, which accompanies the Liberty of particular men'; in the Latin this became 'But because they cannot otherwise provide for the safety of their subjects; there does not follow from it that misery which accompanies the complete liberty of particular men.'[165] And in the following paragraph, where he had stated that 'Justice, and Injustice . . . are Qualities, that relate to men in Society, not in Solitude', the last phrase was changed to 'that relate to men as citizens, not as men'.[166] One change with potentially large implications was made in Chapter 14, where the second Law of Nature had been stated in the English as follows: 'That a man be willing, when others are so too, as farre-forth, as for Peace, and defence of himselfe he shall think it necessary, to lay down this right to all things'. In the Latin, the phrase 'as farre-forth . . . necessary' became 'whenever provision is being made for peace and his own defence', thus eliminating that aspect of the law that might appear to make its implementation a matter of degree.[167] In the following chapter, the English had given a surprisingly wide-ranging list of the natural rights which people nevertheless retained: these included the right 'to governe their owne bodies; enjoy aire, water, motion, waies to go from place to place; and all things else, without which a man cannot live, or not live well'. When Hobbes turned this into Latin, the last phrase, 'or not live well', was omitted.[168] The rationale for that change is easy to see; but it is hard to understand why Hobbes should have wished to alter his general definition of a law of nature from 'a Precept, or generall Rule, found out by Reason, by which a man is forbidden to do, that, which is destructive of his life, or taketh away the means of preserving the same; and to omit, that, by which he thinketh it may be best preserved' to the abbreviated version in the Latin text, where a man is merely forbidden to do 'that which will seem to him to tend to his disadvantage'.[169] Here one must doubt whether Hobbes was alert to all the implications of what he was writing.

[163] pp. 342–3. [164] pp. 194–5. [165] pp. 196–7. [166] pp. 196–7. [167] pp. 200–201. [168] pp. 234–5.

Generally speaking, the political argument of the book remained unchanged; in this area there was no bold strengthening of the argument comparable to that which took place in the realm of theology. Although the political argument was adjusted and tightened (or inadvertently weakened) on various points of detail, the most substantive changes were, as we have seen, omissions, relating to 'protection and obedience', and to the actions of rebels. (There are other small omissions that may be significant. For example, in Chapter 27 Hobbes eliminated his remark about 'the examples of Princes', where he said that it was the subjects' duty 'to do, not what they do, but what they say'; perhaps he feared that this would now seem like a criticism of the personal behaviour of Charles II.[170] And at the end of Chapter 23 Hobbes cut two passages which could have been taken to imply that if a Council of State—and perhaps, by implication, a parliament—had some authority beyond its role as an adviser to the sovereign, it might claim to speak as a 'public person' not only to other subjects, but also to a monarch.)[171]

Two notable additions, though, are made in Chapter 30. In the first of these, Hobbes not only pens a fierce denunciation of duelling, but also puts forward a constructive suggestion as to how it might be stopped; this topic is hardly central to his political theory, but it does touch on one of the serious problems that arise for that theory—namely, the extent to which social values are in fact independent of sovereign authority.[172] And in the second case, a brief passage in the English criticizing the 'violences, oppressions, and injuries' committed by 'great Persons' against ordinary people is expanded into a passionate peroration, combining a fear of popular unrest, a sense of moral indignation, and an attitude which might best be described as Hobbes's absolutist egalitarianism:

> It belongs to the sovereign to see that the common body of citizens are not oppressed by the great ones, and much more that he himself does not oppress them on the great ones' advice, bearing in mind the example of Rehoboam. For the common people are the strength of the commonwealth . . . If the great citizens, because they are great, demand reverence on account of their power, why should not the common people be revered, because they are many, and much more powerful? The sedition of the so-called 'Beggars' in Holland should be a warning of how dangerous to the commonwealth it is to despise the ordinary people. The superior status of some citizens has arisen not from some real excellence in them, but from the will of the sovereign ruler, that is, from the will of the commonwealth; so much the less should they affect an uncivil disdain. The common people should not be provoked even by kings; much less by fellow-citizens (however powerful they may be), lest the common people, while desiring to take its revenge on them, attack the commonwealth at the same time, because it did not prohibit their behaviour.[173]

[169] pp. 198–9. [170] pp. 476–7. [171] pp. 384–5. [172] pp. 530–31.

It has been claimed, however, that the political argument of the Latin Leviathan does differ in one important and systematic way from that of the English: François Tricaud has argued that the treatment of the theory of authorization is less full, and even less theoretically advanced, showing a closer affinity to the theory set out in De cive.[174] This claim seems to rest on some misunderstandings of the text. Tricaud quotes a passage from the English version of Chapter 16, 'A Multitude of men, are made One Person, when they are by one man, or one Person, Represented', notes that the Latin does not include the phrase 'or one Person', and concludes that the Latin text lacks the idea of the sovereign as the 'person of the commonwealth'. But Hobbes is merely abbreviating here, to make his primary point; a little later he renders the phrase 'And if the Representative consist of many men. . .' in Latin as 'And if the actor or person is not one man, but a group of men. . .'.[175] Tricaud also cites the account, at the beginning of Chapter 18, of how sovereignty is instituted, where Hobbes writes that many people covenant 'that to whatsoever Man, or Assembly of Men, shall be given by the major part, the Right to Present the Person of them all, (that is to say, to be their Representative;) every one, as well he that Voted for it, as he that Voted against it, shall Authorise all the Actions and Judgements, of that Man, or Assembly of men'; in the Latin, this is 'that to whatsoever man or assembly shall be given by the votes of the major part the right to bear the person of them all, they shall all be obedient. Therefore, every one, as well he that voted for it, as he that voted against it, is obliged to obey the man who was elected by the majority, and must be considered author of all his actions.'[176] Tricaud admits that the concepts of 'person' and 'author' are present here, but says that they are 'more than half-eclipsed' by the mention of a promise of obedience, which seems to belong with the simpler theory of De cive.[177] Yet the concept of authorization is not just present in the Latin version; it is strongly expounded there—for example, in a new passage on the very [173] pp. 536–7.

[174] Tricaud, 'Introduction', pp. xxvii–xxviii.
[175] pp. 248–51. [176] pp. 264–5.
[177] Tricaud, 'Introduction', p. xxviii ('plus qu'à demi éclipsées').

next page of the 1668 edition, which declares that the subjects cannot depose their sovereign for governing them badly, because 'since he bears the person of the whole commonwealth, the things he does as actor are done by the commonwealth as author'.[178] The fact that Hobbes turned the English phrase 'every one . . . shall Authorise all the Actions . . . of that Man' into 'every one . . . is obliged to obey the man' has a simpler explanation: unfortunately the Latin language did not supply any verb that could function as a direct equivalent of 'authorize'. Hobbes found various ways of coping with this problem: in Chapter 17, for example, he translated 'I Authorise and give up my Right of Governing my selfe' as 'I grant my authority and right of governing myself', and in Chapter 21 he rendered 'I Authorise, or take upon me, all his actions' as 'I am author of all the actions. . .'.[179] That he should once or twice have used a formulation with the verb 'to obey' does not seem to be of any major theoretical significance.

'Authorize' was not the only word for which Latin offered no direct equivalent. For while there was a standard translation of 'sovereignty', 'summa potestas' (literally, 'the highest power'), there was no simple word for 'sovereign'. Hobbes's initial solution to this problem was to use phrases meaning 'he who has sovereignty'.[180] Where the sense permitted it, he could also turn a statement about the sovereign into a statement about sovereignty: thus the phrase 'to the Soveraign is committed the Power of Rewarding' became 'the same sovereignty has the right to reward' ('Ejusdem [sc. Summae] Potestatis Ius est Praemia . . . tribuendi').[181] However, in the second half of the book—from Chapter 30 onwards—he commonly translated 'sovereign' as 'summus imperans' ('the highest ruler'); and at one point in Chapter 42 he translated 'Civill Soveraign' and 'Spirituall Soveraign' as 'Civitatis Imperator' ('the ruler of the commonwealth') and 'Imperator Spiritualis' ('the spiritual ruler').[182] In one part of Chapter 36 he also translated 'Soveraign Prophets' as 'Prophetae Supremi' ('supreme prophets'); but this came shortly after a distinction between 'supreme' and 'subordinate' prophets in the English.[183]

For the English word 'subject', on the other hand, a Latin equivalent was easily available: 'subditus'. However, Hobbes's general practice, when translating Leviathan, was to substitute 'civis' ('citizen') for 'subditus'; when the term was introduced and defined at the end of Chapter 17 ('he that carryeth this Person, is called SOVERAIGNE . . . and every one besides, his SUBIECT'), he gave both Latin words ('Cæteri omnes Subditi & Cives appellantur'), but thereafter he used 'civis' in the great majority of cases. He may have been partly influenced here by the thought that he would have many readers (in the Netherlands, above all) who were citizens of a republic, not subjects of a monarch. Yet 'civis' was, of course, the term he had employed in De cive; he had sometimes used it alongside 'subditus' there, and indeed there can have been no great theoretical distinction in his mind where these two were concerned, since all citizens of democracies were at the same time subjects of the sovereign people, and all subjects of a monarch were at the same time members of that political community which Hobbes called a 'civitas'.[184] That Latin word remained his standard equivalent to the word 'commonwealth', his normal term for the state as a corporate body of people. From time to time, though, he did also use 'respublica', which is the closest equivalent to 'commonwealth' in terms of its literal meaning as a compound noun.[185]

[178] pp. 266–7. [179] pp. 260–61, 338–9.
[180] E.g., pp. 265, 267: 'qui Summam habet Potestatem'; 'qui habet Summam Potestatem'; 'à Potestatem Summam . . . habente'.
[181] pp. 276–7. [182] pp. 914–15. [183] pp. 668–9.

The general quality of Hobbes's Latin translation has already been commented on; this was a rather sorry performance, in comparison with the crisp elegance of De cive, but the decline is understandable in the light of his great age, the fact that he suffered from the 'shaking palsy', and the fact that he had an amanuensis who, as Pieter Blaeu noted in his letter, did not know Latin. Blaeu's own promise that the work would be carefully corrected before it went to press was evidently not kept: the 1668 edition contains many grammatical errors and infelicities of style. Some impossibly constructed sentences may perhaps have been the fault of the compositor, who omitted or misread a word in the manuscript; but responsibility for characteristic faults, such as the common failure to employ the subjunctive, or the use of 'suus' for 'eius' or 'eorum' (and vice versa), can be attributed only to Hobbes. Yet on the other hand the workaday simplicity of Hobbes's Latin style means that the meaning is seldom in doubt; errors that might have played havoc in Latin of an involved and over-ornate kind could do only limited damage to the sense of Hobbes's utilitarian Latin prose.

One aspect of Hobbes's practice as a translator here deserves special attention: his handling of biblical quotations. As we have seen, he had not felt bound by any requirement to quote precisely from a particular version of the Bible when writing the English text. The same underlying attitude is present in the translation, where Hobbes often diverges in minor ways from the Latin text he is following. In a minority of cases, no Latin text functions as his model, and he appears to be supplying his own Latin version of the English he has previously given. But in most cases he is definitely following a particular text: either the Vulgate, or an edition combining the Junius and [184] For the use of both 'subditus' and 'civis' see, e.g., De cive XII.8.

[185] E.g., pp. 914–17.

Tremellius translation of the Old Testament with the Beza version of the New (an edition which, for simplicity's sake, will here be called 'Junius–Tremellius'). His usage falls into the following pattern. In the early chapters of the book there are very few biblical citations, but the three given in Chapter 8 are in Hobbes's own versions. Those in Chapters 20, 22, and 26 are from Junius–Tremellius. The ones in Chapters 31–41 are from the Vulgate. Chapter 42 falls into a complex pattern of its own: first translations by Hobbes himself (pp. 775–81), then the Vulgate (pp. 781–97), then Hobbes again (pp. 801–33), then Junius–Tremellius (from p. 841 to the end).[186] Thereafter Junius–Tremellius is used up to p. 975, a third of the way through Chapter 44, and the Vulgate takes over again from p. 979 until the end of the main text, with the exception of two short phrases quoted from Junius–Tremellius in Chapter 46.[187] The first chapter of the Appendix cites the second of those phrases from the Vulgate instead, and the third chapter also includes a couple of quotations that seem to have been adapted from the Vulgate; but otherwise Hobbes seems to have made his own Latin versions of biblical texts in the Appendix, translating from material held in his own not very accurate memory. He also quoted in the first chapter of the Appendix from the London Polyglot Bible, edited by Brian Walton and published in 1654–7.[188]

In order to explain this overall pattern, one tempting hypothesis might be that Hobbes had access to different editions of the Bible in different places. We know that the library in Hardwick Hall contained both the Junius–Tremellius translation and the London Polyglot Bible.[189] We do not know, however, what books were available in the other places where Hobbes may have worked on his translation: Chatsworth, Latimers (the Earl of Devonshire's house in Buckinghamshire), and London (where the Earl rented Little Salisbury House in the Strand). From the accounts of the Earl of Devonshire's steward it appears that Hobbes was at Hardwick in the early months of 1667; he travelled to Latimers at the end of March and stayed there for several months (perhaps with a visit or visits to London); he returned from Latimers to Hardwick some time in July; and he probably accompanied the Earl when the latter went to stay in London for the winter of 1667–8.[190] We [186] Noteworthy here is the fact that the same quotation (1 Cor. 5: 11) occurs in two different wordings, the Vulgate on p. 797, and Hobbes's own on p. 801.

[187] For the phrases, see pp. 1057, 1078. [188] pp. 1145, 1167.

[189] Chatsworth, MS Hobbes E. 1. A, p. 3: 'Biblia Junij et Tremellij fol.'; Chatsworth, MS Hobbes, unnumbered, 'Catalogue of Books', fo. 2r: 'Biblia plurium linguarum fol. Vol. 6'; 'Biblia Lat. Jun. et Tremel. fol.' This library also contained the Septuagint, the Hebrew Bible, an edition of Beza's New Testament also containing the Greek, and a quarto edition of the Vulgate.

[190] Chatsworth, MS Hardwick 36 (unpaginated), entries for 1667–8. These accounts record that James Wheldon also travelled with Hobbes to Latimers in late Mar.; he did not travel with him on the return to Hardwick, but the accounts for Hardwick and Chatsworth for July–Oct. are by Wheldon. Blaeu's letter to might therefore speculate that Hobbes's pattern of work was as follows: he began by making his own translations, but then decided that it would be better to follow a published version; he was at Hardwick in early 1667, and so used the Junius–Tremellius edition there, until the end of Chapter 26. The move to Latimers took place at some point between Chapters 26 and 31; there he had access to an edition of the Vulgate, which he used until he reached the end of Chapter 41. While translating the first part of Chapter 42 he mostly did not have the use of any Latin Bible, but was able to consult a copy of the Vulgate for a short time: perhaps he spent some time in London, then returned briefly to Latimers, and then travelled, via Hardwick, to Chatsworth. Roughly one-third of the way through Chapter 42, he returned to Hardwick, where he completed that chapter and proceeded to the middle of Chapter 44. The last part of the main text was finished elsewhere—perhaps in London, Hobbes having taken the Hardwick copy of the Vulgate (a quarto, as opposed to the Junius–Tremellius folio) with him. And the Appendix was written in Hardwick, where the massive London Polyglot Bible was located, after a return from London in early 1668.[191]

It must be emphasized, however, that this scenario is highly speculative. It does not fit very easily with Hobbes's apparent statement in a letter to Blaeu in November that he had by then completed two-thirds of the task: translating two-thirds of the English text would have brought him to the end of Chapter 41, but this scenario implies that by late November he was somewhere beyond the middle of Chapter 44, roughly 75 folio pages further on in the English edition. Possibly Hobbes was already planning a substantial appendix, and modified his statement of the proportion accordingly. Alternatively, we might assume that he did mean two-thirds of the text as it stood in the English edition, but that his comment about what he had 'completed' ('achevé', according to Blaeu) referred specifically to the fair-copy manuscript that was to be sent to Amsterdam (the suggestion he made in his letter was that this two-thirds portion of it be sent off straight away); the actual work of translating may have run some way ahead of the work of preparing the fair copy.[192] Hobbes's usual amanuensis in this period was James Wheldon, the Earl of Devonshire's baker, who wrote in a very neat, rounded, italic hand; Wheldon had travelled to Latimers with Hobbes in March 1667, and was with him again at Hardwick later that year.[193] The personal account-book kept by Wheldon survives, recording payments from Hobbes; but it cannot be used to construct a detailed chronology of the services Wheldon performed for him in this period, as Hobbes usually made his main payments in regular bi-annual instalments. In 1666 these payments were each of £5; in January–February 1667 Hobbes gave Wheldon £6; an extra payment of £1 was made in May–June 1667; then the regular summer payment, in July–August 1667, of £5; and in January–February 1668 the regular winter payment was doubled, to £10. A further payment of £2 was made in March–April 1668, followed by the summer payment of £5 in May–June of that year.[194] The extra payment in May–June 1667, the jump to £10 in early 1668, and the further £2 in the spring of that year may all represent payment for work done by Wheldon on the manuscript of the Latin Leviathan.

Hobbes of 9 [/19] Dec. 1667 was addressed to him in London: Correspondence, ii, p. 694.

[191] That Hobbes otherwise seems mostly to have made his own translations (based on English wordings of biblical quotations in his memory) when writing the Appendix might be attributed to the difference between this work of original composition and the work of translation from Leviathan. It is possible that when he was translating the English Leviathan, his amanuensis looked up the relevant quotations in a Latin Bible for him (perhaps in advance).

[192] Correspondence, ii, p. 693.

Finally, some further comment may be added on the work that went into the composition of the Appendix. As has just been mentioned, Hobbes offered there some of the fruit of his study of the London Polyglot Bible: he quoted several verses of Ecclesiastes from the Latin translation by Sante Pagnino which was printed there as a word-by-word interlinear translation of the Hebrew, and he also cited the wording of the Septuagint, which the Polyglot Bible presented on the same page.[195] Earlier in the same chapter of the Appendix, he used Sante Pagnino's translation of Genesis 2: 17 to fortify his theory about the second and final death of the reprobate.[196] And at the beginning of the chapter he attempted an explanation of the Hebrew wording of Genesis 1: 2, in order to show how Hebrew functioned without an equivalent of the copula-verb 'is'; here his quotation of the Vulgate might be explained by the fact that that text was also prominently printed alongside the Hebrew in the Polyglot edition.[197] These comments by Hobbes on the Hebrew language, although not correct, were an improvement on the remarks he had made on the same issue in the Latin version of Chapter 46; this furnishes further evidence that the Appendix was written after completing the translation of the main text.[198] Hobbes had at least moved some way beyond the total ignorance which he had demonstrated in the original English version of Chapter 46, where, discussing 'the verbe Is', he [193] The accounts in Chatsworth, MS Hardwick 36, record that James Wheldon also travelled with Hobbes to Latimers in late Mar.; he did not travel with him on the return to Hardwick, but the accounts for Hardwick and Chatsworth for July–Oct. are by Wheldon.

[194] Chatsworth, MS Hardwick 19, entries for those dates. There were also some minor payments from Hobbes: 1*s*. 6*d*. in Mar.–Apr. 1667, 6*d*. in May–June, 6*d*. in Sept.–Oct., 6*d*. in Nov.–Dec.

[195] p. 1167. [196] p. 1163.

[197] pp. 1145; Biblia sacra polyglotta, ed. Walton, i, 2nd pagination, p. 2.

[198] That the third chapter of the Appendix was written in early 1668 is also indicated by its relation to Bramhall's book: see above, p. 156.

had declared: 'Whether all other Nations of the world have in their severall languages a word that answereth to it, or not, I cannot tell.'[199] At the end of the catalogue of the Hardwick library drawn up in 1657 by James Wheldon, there is a short supplementary list of 'Bookes put into the Library by M.r Hobbes' which includes 'Robertsons Hebrew Grammer'; the reference is to William Robertson's A Gate or Door to the Holy Tongue, opened in English (London, 1653).[200] This work, whose author was (though Hobbes may not have been aware of this) the angry Scotsman who called on a parliamentary committee to investigate Leviathan in 1657, was not a very accessible guide to the Hebrew language; nor did it contain any proper account of the occasions on which Hebrew dispensed with the copula, though it did say that the word 'Jehovah' was derived from 'havah' or 'hajah', meaning 'He was', and that it might 'be rendred, being, essence, or simple existence and subsistence'.[201] Clearly Hobbes had not got very far either in his understanding of Hebrew or in his reading of Robertson's book. But the fact that he bought it does indicate that, in the period between the publication of the English and Latin texts of Leviathan, he was making efforts to strengthen the biblically based defence of some of his unorthodox ideas. What he did say about the Hebrew language in the Latin text was perhaps derived from conversations with others who had studied it, not from any attempt by Hobbes to wrestle with the language itself.

The use of the Polyglot Bible is not the only indication, in the Appendix to the Latin Leviathan, of Hobbes's engagement in new research. The second chapter displays the first signs of that study of the history of the law of heresy that he would present more thoroughly in his Historical Narration and Dialogue of the Common Laws; as his text here makes clear, Hobbes not only inspected Coke's Institutes on the Elizabethan Church settlement but also hunted through an edition of the Corpus iuris civilis for treatments of heresy in both Roman and medieval laws.[202] The main area in which he seems to have engaged in further study for the writing of the Appendix, though, was patristic theology and the history of the early Church: references to and quotations from the Fathers, and comments on the development of doctrine in the patristic period, are presented in all three chapters. Here there [200] Chatsworth, MS Hobbes, unnumbered, Hardwick library catalogue, fo. 61r. The books were put into the library at some time after 1657; a later entry is inserted for this book, in the alphabetical section for 'R' on fo. 51v.

[199] p. 1078.

[201] Robertson, Gate or Door, p. 46. On the denunciation in 1657 see above, p. 152. In a subsequent publication, The Second Gate, Robertson supplied a word-by-word analysis of Gen. 1, which Hobbes evidently did not make use of when writing his comments on Gen. 1: 2; Robertson explained the verb 'hajetah' there as a feminine preterite 3rd person singular formation from the root 'hajah, he was' (p. 489).

[202] pp. 1211–13, 1219.

are some still unsolved puzzles as to the nature of Hobbes's research. As a competent Latinist and an accomplished scholar of Greek, he was able to read with ease the writings of the Fathers; and the library at Hardwick contained a good collection of them, including Athanasius, Augustine, Cyprian, John Damascene, and Tertullian, as well as the 1562 folio edition of the early Church historians, containing Eusebius, Socrates Scholasticus, and Hermias Sozomenos.[203] No doubt Hobbes consulted some of these texts directly; he may well have read through the historical narratives. But we are entitled to doubt whether this elderly and somewhat infirm author engaged in a general programme of reading entire folio volumes of patristic theology in order to find a handful of statements that would bolster his arguments; it would not be surprising to learn that he had been guided by one or two secondary works that contained the apposite quotations he needed. Certainly his quotation of a passage from Epiphanius, near the end of the first chapter of the Appendix, was not taken from the original source: this passage was in fact from a text by Hilary of Poitiers, and Hobbes must presumably have culled it from a secondary work in which it was mis-attributed.[204] But the Hardwick library catalogues do not yield any obvious candidates, and attempts to identify the secondary source or sources used by Hobbes have so far proved unsuccessful.

The Appendix to Leviathan was not primarily intended, in any case, as a contribution to scholarship. What this text represents is Hobbes's peculiar combination of the didactic and the combative, in both defensive and offensive mode. The dialogue style he adopted was one he had developed in a number of recent works, all of which sought to combine the dismissal of error (sometimes polemically phrased) with the non-technical explanation of Hobbes's own theories: Examinatio et emendatio (1660), Dialogus physicus (1661), and Problemata physica (1662). It was the method adopted in Behemoth (which he may have begun in *c.*1664), in the Dialogue of the Common Laws (written probably after the Appendix), and in the Historia ecclesiastica (completed in 1671). At its worst, this style of exposition merited the characterization which Wallis gave in his reply to Examinatio et emendatio: 'a Dialogue, between A and B (Thomas and Hobs;) Wherein Thomas commends Hobs, and Hobs commends Thomas, and both commend Thomas Hobs as a third Person; without being guilty of self-commendation'.[205] But it could also convey an argument with step-by-step expository clarity as well as polemical vigour; and sometimes, uncharacteristically, it could also allow Hobbes to confess a doubt or an uncertainty. Importantly, too (where the Appendix was concerned), it permitted him to put in the mouths of two fictional speakers opinions which, if pressed by the authorities, he might have wished to disavow in propria persona.

[203] Chatsworth, MS Hobbes E. 1. A; the volume of Church historians (Eusebius et al., Ecclesiasticae historiae autores (Basel, 1562)) is identifiable by its fuller description in Chatsworth, MS Hobbes, unnumbered, Hardwick library catalogue, fo. 7r: 'Euseb. Ruffin. Socratis. Theodorit. Sozomen. Theodori. Evagrij. Dorothei. Ecclesiast. Hist. fol.' [204] p. 1183.

[205] Wallis, Hobbius heauton-timorumenos, p. 8.

For we should not forget that some at least of Hobbes's ideas continued to move in radical directions. The arguments of the Appendix cannot be confined to a damage-limitation exercise where Leviathan was concerned, or to a merely defensive response to the threat of prosecution for heresy; those elements are present to some extent, but the Appendix goes far beyond them. As several of the other works produced in Hobbes's extraordinary ferment of productivity in the late 1660s help to show, his great campaign against the abuse and undermining of temporal power by spiritual or pseudo-spiritual forces was still moving forwards. That war was to be won neither by keeping politics and theology apart, nor by demonstrating that religion must be subject to temporal control for purely political reasons. Rather, Hobbes's aim was to develop a new theology, in which the entire basis of those pseudo-spiritual claims would be eliminated on theological grounds. That was the full-scale campaign which he had begun to wage when he wrote the second half of Leviathan in 1650; and when he returned to the text nearly two decades later, it was clearly one of his aims to drive his forces even further into the territory of the enemy. But this was surely not a merely tactical matter, a manipulation of theological arguments for other purposes. Where Hobbes's unorthodox theology is concerned, it is hard to escape the conclusion that he wrote as he did for one compelling reason above all: he believed that what he wrote was true.

TEXTUAL INTRODUCTION

I

THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN

The Manuscript

The only known manuscript of Leviathan is the fair-copy manuscript on vellum, now in the British Library.[1] There is no reason to doubt that this was the copy referred to by Edward Hyde when he wrote that Hobbes had presented his book, 'engross'd in Vellam in a marvellous fair hand, to the King' in Paris.[2] Its subsequent history is, for the first 120 years, uncertain. In its present form, the manuscript has a fine gold-tooled Turkey leather (red morocco) binding, which resembles work by the best English binders of the 1670s and 1680s.[3] It is evident that giving it this binding was a later operation, as the manuscript was slightly cut down, losing page numbers at the tops of some pages, and having some of the marginalia truncated on the outer edges of others. From the high quality of the binding it seems that the owner valued the work, and from the fact that no name or title was entered on the spine it may be suspected that the owner preferred it not to be instantly recognizable on the shelf; but whether that owner was Charles II, or some friend or courtier to whom he had passed the manuscript, is not known.[4] It appears then to have gone unrecorded until 1771, when it was included in an auction of the library of Philip Carteret Webb, in a section of the catalogue entitled 'Folio Manuscripts on Vellum'.[5] Webb was a lawyer

[1] BL, MS Egerton 1910. Manuscripts of The Elements of Law have occasionally been misdescribed as manuscripts of Leviathan: see, e.g., Todd, 'An Early MS. of "Leviathan"'.

[2] Hyde, Brief View and Survey, p. 8.

[3] The central part of the design uses a fine 'tendril' stamp similar to (but not identical with) stamps used by some of the best English binders of this period: see Davenport, Samuel Mearne, plates 18, 19; Hobson, Bindings in Cambridge Libraries, plate 58, stamp 1; Hobson, English Bindings, plate 57; Foot, Henry Davis Gift, ii, items 120, 121. However, the design does not include the cipher of Charles II, used on Royal Library bindings by Samuel Mearne's workshop (see Nixon, English Restoration Bookbindings, p. 12).

[4] Also unknown is the identity of the early reader who added marginal marks, consisting of 3 ink dots, to Chs. 12 and 13 and 31–5, mostly alongside statements about religious matters. A few pencilled crosses (apparently later) are also present; for details, see Rogers and Schuhmann, i, p. 52.

[5] Baker and Leigh, Catalogue of the Library of Philip Carteret Webb, p. 89, lot 2826: 'Hobbes's Leviathan'. I am very grateful to Mikko Tolonen for bringing this source to my attention.

and Member of Parliament, who is best known today for his role in the government's actions against John Wilkes in the 1760s; but he was also a prominent antiquary (Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries from 1747, and Fellow of the Royal Society from 1749), active as a collector of manuscripts from the 1740s to his death in 1770.[6] The source from which he obtained this manuscript is unknown. Nor is the identity of the purchaser in 1771 known with any certainty; but at some stage—perhaps then, and certainly within the next 35 years—the manuscript passed to George Macartney, the diplomat and colonial governor who became Earl Macartney in 1794 and died in 1806.[7] It was kept at his house in Ireland for some time after his death, and then moved to a bank vault in London (having been valued at £500 in 1807); it was offered for sale in the auction of Macartney's library in 1854, but failed to reach its reserve; seven years later it was sold privately by the Macartney family to the British Museum.[8]

This item is a presentation manuscript of a most luxurious kind. It consists of 249 leaves of fine vellum (of which the first and last are blank), plus a larger leaf for the folding table that accompanies Chapter 9. The standard size of a leaf, as cut down for this binding, is 24.5 cm by 18 cm. Normally, the leaves are in conjugate pairs; that is, a small sheet of vellum has been folded into a bifolium. For much of the manuscript these bifolia are placed one after another; but in some places (most clearly, fos. 115–18 and 119–22) one has been placed inside another, to create a quire of two bifolia. In two places a visible stub shows that one leaf has been excised: there is one stub immediately after the title page drawing, and another between fos. 123 and 124. The first of these excisions is peculiarly tantalizing. The opening sequence of the volume is as follows: blank leaf; leaf bearing the title page drawing (with blank verso); stub; leaf containing the list of contents of the book. The text then follows, on conjugate pairs of leaves. What is missing from that sequence is the dedicatory epistle; and since the leaf with the drawing appears to be conjugate with the first blank leaf, it seems highly likely that a leaf which originally contained a dedicatory epistle has been cut out. Whether that epistle was addressed to Francis Godolphin, or whether to someone else—perhaps the Earl of Devonshire—can only be guessed at.[9] As for the other stub, this too is puzzling, but less dramatically so. It comes at the end

[6] See Treasure, 'Webb'.

[7] See Thorne, 'Macartney'. Macartney also had serious intellectual interests; he was elected FRS in 1792 and FSA in 1795. The manuscript has his bookplate, describing him as 'George Earl of Macartney'; but this may have been added long after its acquisition.

[8] See the article by Pratt (who inspected it in the Macartney library at Lisanoure, Co. Antrim) in The Gentleman's Magazine, 1813; and the notes inscribed and tipped in to the preliminary pages of the manuscript.

[9] See above, p. 98.

of Part 2 of the text, where a quire has text (from Chapter 31) on its first outer leaf, then a stub representing the first inner leaf; the text continues and finishes on the next page (the second inner leaf), and there is then a blank second outer leaf. Perhaps some large error was made, or an accidental blotting, that necessitated this excision. It should also be noted that, as the total number of leaves given above must imply, there is at least one singleton leaf in the volume; this may possibly be identified as fo. 52, but it is impossible to be certain about such matters without disbinding the manuscript.

Reading this manuscript today is not an easy task. The vellum has yellowed on its outer (skin) sides, and, more seriously, the brownish ink has faded badly, so that the reader is often looking for tiny traces of very pale brown on yellow. To decipher some parts of the manuscript one needs a magnifying glass and substantial reserves of time and patience; a greatly enlarged photographic image sometimes helps to resolve issues that cannot be settled by the naked eye. Nevertheless it can well be imagined that the original product, with dark ink on white vellum, was a pleasure to read. Indeed, reading it was intended to be as similar as possible to the experience of reading a printed book, the format of which it followed very closely, with running titles, page numbers, and catchwords. On each page the area containing the block of text was carefully demarcated; the very fine ruled lines that did this are visible in many cases.[10] Within that block, there are 34 lines of text on every page, in a hand which is remarkable for its clarity and regularity, and which even imitates, in some of its letter-forms, the forms of printed characters (such as a 'g' with a hooked loop and a little upper right-hand stalk).

In many ways this manuscript corresponds closely to the presentation manuscript of De cive which Hobbes had made for the Earl of Devonshire in 1641. That too was on vellum, imitating the format of a printed book, with an outline-ruled block of text containing 34 lines per page; what is more, the handwriting is the same in the two texts. Clearly, Hobbes was using a trusted scribe, one whom he had employed nearly a decade earlier. The same scribe was responsible for several manuscripts which are known to have been sent to England by Mersenne: a text on musical notation by Jean Le Maire, sent to Theodore Haak some time after [10/] 20 March 1640; two mathematical extracts from letters to Mersenne by Descartes, of which the first was sent by Mersenne to Haak, for John Pell, on [2/] 12 May 1640; a mathematical text by Jean de Beaugrand, sent to Sir Charles Cavendish at some time in 1640–41; and a digest of Cartesian algebra sent to Sir Charles in March 1641.[11] Not long after his arrival in Paris, Hobbes too was using this scribe to prepare materials to be sent to Sir Charles Cavendish in England: three such manuscripts survive, written very probably in the period 1641–2, in which the text is by this scribe and the mathematical or optical diagrams are in Hobbes's own hand.[12] And in addition to the presentation manuscript of De cive, this scribe also prepared a fair copy of a specimen chapter of De corpore (which Hobbes may have sent to his friend Robert Payne), and a similar fair copy of a fragment of De homine.[13] A few other items by this scribe are also known, the latest of which is a text sent by Sorbière to Hobbes in 1657.[14]

[10] The block so delineated is, typically, 18.8 × 12.5 cm.

[11] Respectively: BL, MSS Harl. 6796, fos. 175–7; Add. 4416, fos. 10–18, and Harl. 6796, fo. 162; Harl.

What this whole pattern of evidence suggests is that this was a Parisian scribe used by Mersenne and recommended by him to Hobbes after the latter's arrival in Paris. There is no reason to think that the scribe was a member of the English diaspora in Paris; with the sole exception of the Leviathan manuscript, all of the known texts prepared by him were in Latin or French. That the scribe was a Frenchman is suggested, too, by the fact that some words in the Leviathan manuscript appear in what seem to be French-influenced forms: 'montaynes' for 'mountaynes'; 'parfumes' for 'perfumes', 'cognissance' for 'cognisance', 'responsable' for 'responsible', 'entend' for 'intend', 'circonstance' for 'circumstance', 'dommage' for 'dammage', 'fondation' for 'foundation', 'mountagne' for 'mountayne', and 'Sauuages' for 'Sauages'.[15] Some biblical names, too, occur in more or less Gallicized forms: 'Josue', for example, or 'Moyses'.[16] As for the scribe's command of English, scrutiny of his version of Leviathan suggests that it was utterly nonexistent. Typical errors include the following: 'afser' for 'after', 'goesh' for 'goeth', 'someting' for 'something', 'anoyded' for 'auoyded', 'earsly' for 'earthly', 'Exemptiom' for 'Exemption', 'te' for 'the', 'wose' for 'whose', 'Dut' for 'but', 'thoug' for 'though', 'amongt' for 'amongst', 'wod' for 'wood', and 'greth' for 'goeth'.[17]

That this scribe did not understand what he was reading is a significant point, since it means that he must have copied what he saw with unusual faithfulness. He may have suffered very occasional mental interference from the forms of familiar French words, but he would not have undergone the equivalent (and, for an English scribe, much more frequent) process of inter-

6796, fos. 155–61; Harl. 6796, fos. 178–92.

[12] BL, MSS Harl. 6796, fos. 267–90 (de Beaune, 'Notes brièves'); Add. 4417, fos. 26–37 (Vieta, 'Harmonicon coeleste', extract); Harl. 6796, fos. 193–266 (Hobbes, Latin Optical Treatise).

[13] Chatsworth, MSS Hobbes A. 3 (De cive); A. 4 (De corpore, 'Ch. XIX'); A. 5 (De homine, fragment).

[14] Chatsworth, MS Hardwick, drawer 145, item 21 (Sorbière, 'Discours contre la fréquente saignée'). On all the manuscripts mentioned here (and some others), see Raylor, 'Date and Script'; Malcolm, 'Hobbes, Latin Optical Manuscript'.

[15] BL, MS Egerton 1910, fos. 35v, 67v, 68v, 75v, 88r, 91v, 102r, 104r, 201r, 231r. [16] Ibid., fos. 37v, 67v.

[17] Ibid., fos. 4v, 8v, 42v, 60v, 95v, 105v, 127r, 151v, 172r, 192r, 199v, 205v, 222r.

ference from English vocabulary; even his misreadings must have been, so to speak, accurately inaccurate, deriving directly from the visual appearance of the words in the original manuscript from which he was copying. Where that original (and no longer extant) manuscript is concerned, there are several possibilities. Either it was Hobbes's own rough draft, or it was a fair copy made from that draft; and, in the latter case, either that fair copy was made by Hobbes himself, or it was prepared by another scribe. The idea that a French scribe with no knowledge of English could have been set to work copying from Hobbes's irregular, crabbed, and jerky rough hand cannot seriously be entertained. That Hobbes had prepared a fair copy of the entire text for the printer is not unthinkable; although the final versions of most of his works written in Paris in the 1640s were made by scribes (for example, the Latin Optical Treatise, the Anti-White, and the English Optical Treatise), he did write out his brief text on the mechanics of swordsmanship for the Marquess of Newcastle in his own hand. But if the Parisian scribe had been copying from a fair copy manuscript written by Hobbes, one would expect the pattern of misreadings to reflect the characteristics of Hobbes's own handwriting; and this is clearly not the case. Most obviously, the manuscript from which the scribe was copying made use of a long 's', a form not present in Hobbes's writing: mistaken readings by the scribe include 'rigouroufly' for 'rigourously', 'fide' for 'side', 'if' for 'is', and 'vife' for 'wise'.[18] The other manuscript must also have had a stumpy, truncated 't' and a rather rectilinear 's' which were easily confused: hence 'afser' for 'after', 'lengsh' for 'length', 'thould' for 'should', 'purtes' for 'purses', 'rasher' for 'rather', and 'so' for 'to'.[19] Those two letters are quite distinct in Hobbes's hand. There must also have been either a rather compressed form of 'm' in that manuscript, or an over-elaborate 'n': thus the scribe could write 'Exemptiom' for 'Exemption', 'nome' for 'none', 'them' for 'then', and 'mammom' for 'mammon'.[20] These letters too are clearly distinguishable in writing by Hobbes. Certain mistakes, on the other hand, could easily be made by an uncomprehending reader of Hobbes's handwriting: it has a final 't' which can look like an 'l', a medial 'o' which might be a 'u' or a 'v', a similarly open medial 'o' with a final loop to it which could be an 'e', and it even has a dislocated 'e' which could be a small 'd' with its ascender looping back across itself. None of those errors was made by the French scribe when he copied out Leviathan. The conclusion must be that he was copying from a fair copy of the entire work which had been made for Hobbes by another person—presumably, an Englishman in [18] Ibid., fos. 102r, 118v, 147r, 194r.

[19] Ibid., fos. 4v, 14r, 64v, 183v, 194r, 227v.
[20] Ibid., fos. 105v, 195v, 214r, 220v.

Paris who was capable of reading Hobbes's own rough draft. And since the time, trouble, and cost involved in making a complete copy of such a lengthy work must have been considerable, it seems reasonable to assume that that other fair copy was the manuscript which Hobbes sent off to the printers in London.

Confirmation of this can be found in some of the detailed correspondences between the first edition (known as the 'Head' edition) and the French scribe's manuscript. Near the end of Chapter 11, the Head edition refers to people giving thanks to their gods 'in the time of an expected good successe'; the French scribe also wrote 'an expected' but when Hobbes revised the manuscript, he corrected it to 'unexpected'.[21] The mistake is one that would be made by a scribe who was thinking in English, so it can plausibly be attributed to the other scribe, who prepared the copy-manuscript for the printers. Similarly, in Chapter 34 the Head edition has the phrase 'to take Inspiration in the proper sense, or to say that Good Spirits entred into men'; the same phrase appears in the fair-copy manuscript, but there Hobbes deleted 'or' and substituted 'as', which is what the argument requires.[22] This 'or' too (which superficially makes sense) looks like a misreading by an English-speaking scribe, which was then faithfully copied by his Parisian counterpart. There are also several cases of small omissions (in both the Head and the manuscript) which may have been made by the English scribe, since the resulting text reads tolerably well without the omitted word; these are corrected by Hobbes in the manuscript.[23] A more obvious misreading, occurring in both the Head and the manuscript, is the phrase 'without subjection to Lawes, and a coërcive Power to tye their lands from rapine, and revenge': here 'lands' was corrected to 'hands' by Hobbes in the manuscript, but it survived his scrutiny of the copy-manuscript sent to the printers and was printed by them, being picked up only at the final stage, when it was listed in the Errata.[24] (One other error in the manuscript, not corrected by Hobbes, must presumably reflect an error which was made in the English scribe's manuscript but which, in this case, was spotted in the printing-house: in the phrase 'the time therefore of the writing of that Book, must be long after the time of the fact', the manuscript has 'must belong'.)[25]

While the presentation manuscript thus closely follows the manuscript from which it was copied, it also diverges from the Head edition in many substantive ways; these divergences show that the other manuscript was sub-

[21] See p. 162. [22] See p. 632.
[23] See pp. 962 ('to [be] Vicar'), 964 ('as [in] Gods Right'), 974 ('and [is] unnecessary').
[24] See p. 282. On the Errata-list, which was probably sent in by Hobbes, see below, pp. 216–18.
[25] See p. 594.

ject to a later revision. Two striking examples demonstrate that the manuscript reproduces an earlier version of the text. Towards the end of Chapter 42, the Head edition has the following: 'As for the distinction of Temporall, and Spirituall, let us consider in what Sense it may be said intelligibly, that the Temporall, or Civill Power is Subject to the Spirituall.' In the manuscript an extra phrase is still legible between 'Spirituall' and 'let us consider': 'I entend to examine it in another place therefore passing it ouer for the present,'—words written by the scribe and deleted later by Hobbes.[26] Clearly that intention to examine the subject was not properly fulfilled, and so the phrase was deleted from the manuscript sent to the printers. The other striking instance concerns the numbering of the laws of nature in Chapters 14 and 15. When Hobbes treated this topic in De cive, he presented first of all a fundamental or general law, and then listed a series of 'special' or particular laws, numbering them from one to twenty.[27] Embarking on this subject in Leviathan, he numbered the fundamental law as the first in the sequence, the first special law as the second, and the next as the third. But in the middle of Chapter 15 he reverted—no doubt because he was working from notes derived from De cive—to the previous numbering, writing 'third' when he should have written 'fourth', and so on. These misnumberings were copied by the Parisian scribe and subsequently corrected by Hobbes in the manuscript; they must also have been corrected in the other manuscript, either by Hobbes or by an alert reader in the printing-house, before the Head edition was printed.[28] And a similar change was necessary in the case of the title of Chapter 14, which, in the Parisian scribe's version, began with the phrase 'Of the first naturall Lawe'; in the manuscript, Hobbes changed this to 'Of the two first naturall Lawes', and in the Head edition it became 'Of the first and second NATURALL LAWES'.[29] Here it seems that the chapter heading also reflected the numbering used in De cive, and that although the decision to change the numbering in the body of the text of Chapter 14 was made and effected before the English scribe prepared his copy, the title was left, by an oversight, unchanged.

As we have already seen, the presentation manuscript preserves some passages referring to the Independents which Hobbes probably deleted for prudential reasons, at a rather late stage, in the copy-manuscript which he sent to the printers.[30] A few other changes, of a minor nature, may possibly reflect a wish not to cause offence to the authorities in England. Thus a remark about making the common people less apt 'to mutinyes, and change of gouerment' was altered to 'to mutiny against their Governors'; and a statement that after the Elizabethan Reformation the English bishops exercised their functions 'in Right of the King' was changed to 'in Right of the Queen and her Successours'.[31] Similar motives might possibly explain Hobbes's decision to omit a sentence at the end of Chapter 12, following his comments on the 'unpleasing Priests' who were the causes of all changes of religion in the world: 'On whom when men by common frailety are Carried to execute their anger they beare downe not onely Religion w^{ch} they reduce to Priuate fancy but also the Ciuil gouerment that would vphold it, reducing it to the naturall Condition of Priuate force.'[32]

[26] See p. 912. [27] De cive, II.1–3, III.1–25. [28] See pp. 230–38. [29] See p. 198.
[30] See above, p. 64.

There are some other substantive passages in the presentation manuscript which did not survive in the printed edition; the reasons for their omission do not fall into any overall pattern. The most prominent case is in Chapter 29, where there is a heavily deleted passage taking up six and a half lines in the manuscript; this comes at the end of the paragraph discussing the 'seditious doctrine' that 'every private man is Judge of Good and Evill actions', and it clearly corresponds to the equivalent passage in De cive, which alludes to the sin of Adam and Eve in eating of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil.[33] Hobbes may have deleted this in the copy-manuscript sent to the printers because a similar discussion of that biblical passage had already been presented in Chapter 20.[34] In Chapter 10, in the printed edition, Hobbes's discussion of the Germanic origins of heraldry and coats of arms ends as follows: 'All which, by an observing Reader, may be found in such antient Histories, Greek and Latine, as make mention of the German Nation, and Manners, in their times.' In the manuscript, however, that sentence was: 'The places of antient History out of w^{ch} this that I haue sayd may be gathered, are at lardge collected by Philip Cluuerius in his Germania antiqua.'[35] Hobbes may have removed the reference to Cluverius for either or both of two reasons: his general policy throughout the book was not to give source references, and he may have preferred to be thought of as a person who had read widely for himself among the ancient sources, rather than as someone dependent on a secondary work.

In the great majority of cases, however, Hobbes's reasons for making his changes to the copy-manuscript sent to the printers seem to have been essentially stylistic. Sometimes the changes are improvements on a very small scale. In Chapter 17, for example, the phrase 'one one way, another, another' was changed to 'one this way, another that way'; at the end of Chapter 15 the words 'then are they lawes properly so called' was altered to 'then are they properly called Lawes', which supplies a much more satisfying final cadence.[36] Similarly, when we read in the Head edition that 'Adam was created in such a condition of life, as had he not broken the commandement of God, he had enjoyed it in the Paradise of Eden Everlastingly', this is clearly preferable to the manuscript's version, which has '. . .in a condition of life, such as had he. . .'.[37] Sometimes a long and ungainly sentence was reorganized, or substantially rephrased. Thus, for example, in Chapter 45 the manuscript has the following:

[31] See pp. 178, 1116. [32] See p. 186. [33] See p. 502. [34] See pp. 318–20. [35] See p. 146.

> This nature of vision hauing neuer bene discouered by the Antient pretenders to naturall Knowledge, much lesse by other men that busie in the poursuit of power, honor and the meanes to satisfy and secure their animal appetites, haue eyther no leasure, or no will to looke after any so remote a cause of that they looke for, as this of Knowing the nature of theyr owne Phancye, is the cause that all nations haue conceaued that those Images, w^{ch} are made by sense, are thinges really existent wthout vs . . .

That syntactical tangle was simplified in the version sent to the printers, with the omission of some unnecessary material, as follows:

> This nature of Sight having never been discovered by the ancient pretenders to Naturall Knowledge; much lesse by those that consider not things so remote (as that Knowledge is) from their present use; it was hard for men to conceive of those Images in the Fancy, and in the Sense, otherwise, than of things really without us . . .[38]

And in Chapter 26 an awkwardly bracketed construction, 'The sentence of the subordinate Judge (who ought to haue regard to the reason w^{ch} moued his soueraigne to make such law) if it be according therevnto, is his Soveraigns Sentence', was changed to: 'The subordinate Judge, ought to have regard to the reason, which moved his Soveraign to make such Law, that his Sentence may be according thereunto; which then is his Soveraigns Sentence.'[39]

It is of course possible to suppose, in the case of some of the smaller changes, that these alterations were made in the printing-house by a stylistically alert corrector. But such activity would, for the most part, go beyond the normal role of a corrector or compositor; and the whole pattern of changes very strongly indicates a process of authorial revision before the copy-manuscript was sent off. At what stage, then, was that revision made? If Hobbes had been working in instalments, having a few chapters copied at a time by the English scribe and then going through them to make his revisions, one would expect him to have delayed the handing over of the English scribe's version to the Parisian scribe until those revisions had been effected. That clearly did not happen; so it can be assumed that the revisions were made only at a very late stage, after the whole text had been first copied out by the English scribe and then transcribed by the French one. This is confirmed by the evidence of a passage in the 'Review, and Conclusion', where Hobbes corrected one of his earlier theological claims:

[36] See pp. 242, 258. [37] See p. 698. [38] See p. 1012. [39] See p. 422

> In the 36. Chapter I have said, that it is not declared in what manner God spake supernaturally to Moses: Not that he spake not to him sometimes by Dreams and Visions, and by a supernaturall Voice, as to other Prophets: For the manner how he spake unto him from the Mercy-Seat, is expressely set down Numbers 7. 89. in these words, From that time forward, when Moses entred into the Tabernacle of the Congregation to speak with God, he heard a Voice which spake unto him from over the Mercy-Seate . . . But it is not declared in what consisted the praeeminence of the manner of Gods speaking to Moses, above that of his speaking to other Prophets . . .[40]

In Chapter 36, discussing the ways in which God spoke to Moses, Hobbes had argued first of all that he communicated with him by means of angels (that is, visions supernaturally induced in Moses's mind), as he did with other prophets; but then Hobbes had tried to make an exception for those occasions when Moses received instructions from God in his capacity as a sovereign prophet, someone who, like his successor-sovereigns, 'the High Priests, and the pious Kings', would make enquiries of God and then transmit God's will to the people.[41] His purpose seems to have been to create a special category for sovereigns, whose claim to transmit God's will to their people would become unchallengeable—ostensibly because he had shown that God's manner of operation here was beyond human understanding, but perhaps with the underlying implication that no actual communication from God was needed in these cases, since the claim to act on God's behalf was inherent in the office of the sovereign. The attempted back-tracking in the 'Review, and Conclusion' suggests that someone (perhaps a theologically expert friend, such as John Cosin?) had pointed out to Hobbes that the verse in Numbers 7 disproved the claim that God's manner of speaking to Moses was not 'declared' in the Bible. Hobbes had made that claim twice in Chapter 36. First he had written: 'But in what manner God spake unto them, is not declared, nor made manifest'; that wording survives in the presentation manuscript, but in the Head edition it has been emended to 'But in what manner God spake unto them, is not manifest.'[42] And a little later he wrote that the way in which God communicated with the sovereign prophets, 'as it is not declared so also it is not intelligible'; that wording is in the presentation manuscript, but the Head edition has simply: 'is not intelligible'.[43] This suggests that the revision of the copy-manuscript must have been made some time after the writing of the 'Review, and Conclusion': had Hobbes already eliminated the claim that this matter was not 'declared', he would not have quoted it there.

[40] See p. 1138. [41] pp. 664–8. [42] See p. 668.

[43] See p. 668. The manuscript has a further addition by Hobbes at the end of this sentence: 'otherwise then by a voyce'.

The likely sequence of events was as follows. Hobbes may have passed his draft in instalments to the English scribe, or he may have given it to him for copying only when he had completed it. The English scribe prepared the copy-manuscript for the printers. That manuscript was then copied (again, either in instalments or on completion) by the French scribe—whose presentation manuscript, it should be added, includes the 'Review and Conclusion' in a slightly earlier form than that of the Head edition. Only then did Hobbes go through the copy-manuscript making stylistic and other revisions, before sending it off to London.

The fact that the great majority of the changes made to the copy-manuscript were not also made in the presentation manuscript should probably not surprise us. The stylistic changes did not affect the meaning in any very important ways, but their introduction by Hobbes would have affected the visual appearance of the text quite badly, with sometimes extensive deletions and insertions; some minor disfigurement of the manuscript was unavoidable, as Hobbes corrected the garblings of words by the French copyist, but one can understand that he would not have wanted the pages to be heavily defaced by his own interventions. Just a few significant deletions (such as that involving the reference to Adam and Eve in Chapter 29) were made. However, it would be wrong to suppose that when Hobbes made those deletions, he was working from a list of deletions or other changes made in the copy-manuscript, merely selecting the most important items from that list. All the evidence suggests that his correction and alteration of the presentation manuscript was done independently, without consulting any record of the changes made to the copy-manuscript.

In some cases, when Hobbes noticed a problem in the text, the solution he imposed was different in the two manuscripts. For example, in a discussion of the fact that Christian sovereigns had allowed 'the encroachments of Ecclesiastiques upon their Office', it seems that the copy-manuscript had the same slightly defective wording (thanks, probably, to an eye-skip by the English scribe) as the presentation manuscript: 'I say they might haue hindred in the beginning.' In the copy-manuscript that went to the printers this was altered to '. . . hindred the same in . . .', but in the presentation manuscript Hobbes changed it to '. . . hindred it in . . .'.[44] Similarly, in a passage of his-[44] See p. 1112. It is of course conceivable that the former correction was made in the printing-house. But the verb 'to hinder' could be intransitive in this period, so a compositor would not have thought 'hindred in' an error that required correction; whereas Hobbes evidently did.

torical narrative, the phrase 'did now exercise the same' was changed to 'did afterwards exercise the same' in the former version, and 'did then exercise the same' in the latter.[45] And in the final paragraph of Chapter 19, discussing the way in which the Romans had brought the 'Principall men' of conquered nations into their own governing institutions, Hobbes wrote (in the wording copied by the scribe of the presentation manuscript) that they 'took many of them euen into the senate and offices of charge euen in the Romane citty'. Correcting that manuscript, he deleted the second 'euen'; but it seems that when he corrected the copy-manuscript, he deleted the first, since only the second survives in the printed edition.[46]

There are other mismatches between the two versions of the text. Several cases arise where the marginal notes are concerned. Sometimes the note in the Head edition is a little fuller, suggesting that Hobbes expanded it when revising the copy-manuscript: for example, in Chapter 4, where the presentation manuscript has only 'Names Proper', the Head has 'Names Proper & Common'.[47] Sometimes Hobbes may have added new notes to the copy-manuscript: in Chapter 6, for instance, six appear in the printed edition and not in the presentation manuscript.[48] In Chapter 12, where the presentation manuscript has no notes, Hobbes probably added at a late stage to the copy-manuscript all the notes that now appear in the Head; and in Chapters 13 and 46 it appears that he added new notes to both versions of the text, with different wordings.[49] So far as the corrections which Hobbes made to the presentation manuscript are concerned, in some cases it seems that these were not made to the copy-manuscript, as the uncorrected form was printed in the Head edition. Thus, for instance, the Head has the following sentence in Chapter 10: 'For let a man (as most men do,) rate themselves at the highest Value they can; yet their true Value is no more than it is esteemed by others.' This sort of confusion between singular and plural (especially in general or impersonal statements) was a characteristic of Hobbes's prose; he seems to have corrected it when he noticed it, but often he failed to notice it at all. Here the copy which went to the printers evidently escaped his scrutiny; in the presentation manuscript, however, he changed 'a man' to 'men'.[50] On some small points, indeed, Hobbes does seem to have scrutinized the presentation manuscript more thoroughly than he did the manuscript sent to the printers. Some errors which the French scribe had evidently taken over from the copy-manuscript were corrected by Hobbes; but he had failed to correct them in the copy-manuscript itself, and they passed into the Head edition, being finally corrected (presumably, by Hobbes) only by means of the printed Errata-list. In Chapter 33, for example, five errors corrected by Hobbes in the presentation manuscript receive their correction in the printed Errata of the Head edition.[51]

[45] See p. 1114. Again, it is conceivable that the former correction was made in the printing-house.
[46] See p. 304. [47] See p. 52. [48] See pp. 78, 82, 88.
[49] It seems that Hobbes had not finalized the marginal notes of several chapters when he first gave his draft to be copied by the English scribe. Anomalously, one chapter (Ch. 11) had numbered paragraphs and no marginal notes; possibly this was a relic of an earlier convention, abandoned when Hobbes decided to add marginal notes to his text. [50] See p. 134.

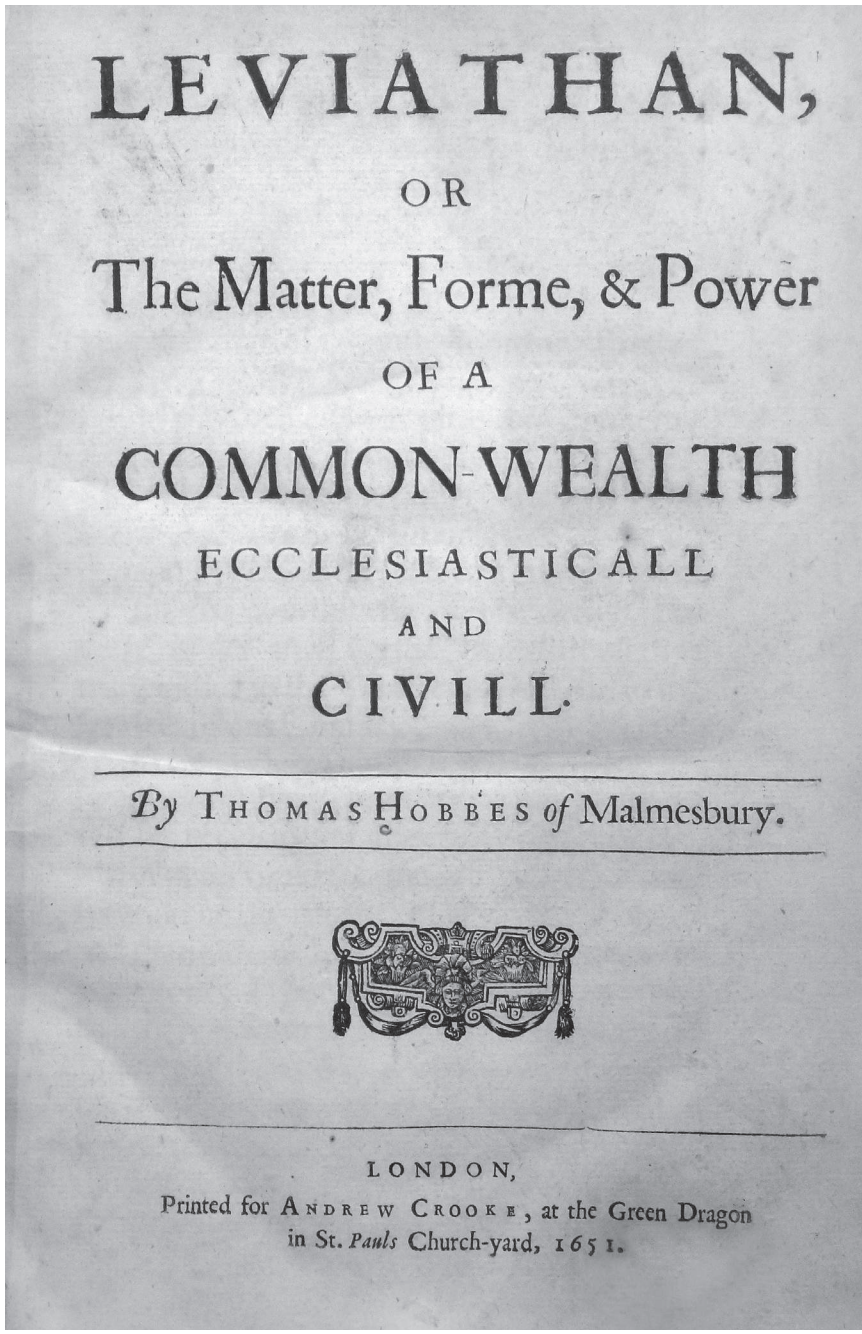
The natural conclusion to be drawn from this evidence is that Hobbes was in more of a hurry when he corrected the copy-manuscript, because he was eager to send it off to London as soon as he could; this might also help to explain why he failed to keep a systematic record (as he could have done, perhaps, using his original draft) of the changes he made. The correction of the presentation manuscript was a later, independent, and somewhat more leisurely operation. Presumably Hobbes did this in the interim between sending off the copy-manuscript (which he may have done in December 1650) and receiving proofs of the edition (which may have begun in mid-February 1651). His corrections of errors in those proofs were, as we shall see, listed in the printed Errata; and here it is noteworthy that the Errata pick up a handful of errors that Hobbes had failed to correct in the presentation manuscript.[52] So while his work on the correction of that manuscript may have contributed to his correction of the proofs, by alerting him to errors that had remained in the copy-manuscript, it most probably took place some time before the proof-correcting process.

To sum up: the presentation manuscript preserves an early state of the text, that of the unrevised fair copy made by an English copyist from Hobbes's draft. Starting with that state of the text, Hobbes went on to generate two different versions: the revised version of the English scribe's manuscript, which was sent to the printers, and the revised version of the presentation manuscript, in which Hobbes made many small corrections and changes. Among the latter set of corrections there may be some that help to identify scribal errors that persisted in the copy-manuscript and entered into the printed edition. But there are also corrections or improvements that diverge from the main line of development of the text. It is to the next phase of that development, the Head edition, that we must now turn.

The Head Edition

The few known chronological facts about the printing of the first edition of Leviathan have already been mentioned: the work was licensed and entered in the register of the Stationers' Company (in the name of the bookseller

[51] See pp. 592, 600, 602, 606. There are 3 other errors in this category: see pp. 264, 282, 828.
[52] See pp. 306, 778, 782, 1038.



LEVIATHAN,

OR

The Matter, Forme, & Power

OF A

COMMON-WEALTH

ECCLESIASTICALL

AND

CIVILL.

By THOMAS HOBBES of Malmesbury.

LONDON,

Printed for ANDREW CROOKE, at the Green Dragon in St. Pauls Church-yard, 1651.

FIGURE 5. Leviathan, Head edition, printed title page

Andrew Crooke) on 20 [/30] January 1651; not long after [14/] 24 April, Edward Hyde was told by Hobbes in Paris that 'he receiv'd every week a Sheet to correct'; Hobbes also showed Hyde his dedicatory epistle to Francis Godolphin, which bears the date 15/25 April; and the printed book was on sale in Oxford shortly before 6 [/16] May.[53] Thus, if Crooke began the printing operation immediately after the book was registered and licensed, the printing could have taken a maximum of fifteen weeks.[54]

The book is a small folio, in fours—which means that it is gathered in quires, each consisting of one folded sheet inside another. (The leaves are therefore assigned the signatures 1 to 4: the quire's outer sheet consisting of 1 and 4, the inner sheet, 2 and 3.) There are 100 sheets, plus the folding table, plus the engraved title page. The sheets are signed in three alphabetical sequences (omitting 'J', 'V', and 'W'): from A to Z, from Aa to Zz, and from Aaa to Ddd. The first quire, containing the preliminary matters, is not paginated until its final leaf, which contains the Introduction: the second and final page of this is numbered as page 2. The main text then begins on p. 3 (sig. B1r), and the pagination which follows duplicates 247–8, and omits 257–60, ending on 396.[55] Each of the four parts of the text begins on a recto page, and also ends on a recto, which is followed by a blank verso.

There are clear indications that this book was set by two different printers, with the dividing-line precisely half-way through the book, at the end of the second part—i.e., at the end of Chapter 31, which finishes on sig. Bb4. (That the work divided so neatly into two halves seems to have been planned by Hobbes, albeit for unclear reasons; in the presentation manuscript too the third part begins exactly at the half-way mark.) The printer of the first half of the book signed the first and second leaves of each quire; the printer of the second half signed the first, second, and third. And while the two printers appear to have used the same roman typeface for the main text, the small italic typefaces used for the marginal notes differ. In 1940 the Harvard bibliographer W. A. Jackson identified the printer of the first half as Roger Norton, and the printer of the second as Richard Cotes, but without offering any evidence for these attributions.[56] Evidence can be found, how-

[53] See above, pp. 91–3, 95.

[54] It is of course conceivable that printing had already begun before the work was licensed and registered (for a possible example of this from 1656, see Feather, 'Publication of Oceana', esp. pp. 262, 266). But the minatory effect of the caution-money provisions of the 1649 Act (see above, p. 60) must still have been strongly felt at this time; and all the evidence discussed above concerning the timing of the writing, copying, and revision of Leviathan suggests that the work cannot have been ready for printing until very late in 1650.

[55] In the present edition, the duplicated pages are referred to as $^{1}247$, $^{1}248$, $^{2}247$, $^{2}248$. For fuller details, see the bibliographical description on pp. 326–7, below.

[56] Anon. [Jackson], Carl Pforzheimer Library, ii, pp. 492–3.

FIGURE 6. Leviathan, Head edition, sig. A4r: the 'crowned head' ornament ever, to confirm them. While it has not been possible to locate any examples, in other printings by Roger Norton, of the 'Head' ornament which appears on the title page (a small, roughly oblong block containing a man's head and two vases of flowers, with swags below and pendent tassels on either side), the larger ornament which appears above the Introduction on sig. A4r can be found in several works that are known to have been printed by him. This ornament is a long oblong with a central crowned head, flanked by two smaller heads facing right and left, with the rest of the design taken up by cornucopias and foliage. Exactly the same block appears above the Preface in a book by Lancelot Andrewes, printed by Norton in 1650.[57] In another work printed by him in 1651, the block shows slight damage to the top edge of the flounce on the left side of the crown, damage which is not present in Leviathan; and further damage, to the right-hand edge of the block, is visible in subsequent printings by Norton in 1653, 1654, and 1660.[58] As for the printer of the second half of the Head edition, he is most easily identifiable by means of the large ornamental capital 'I' (where the letter is flanked by two mermaids, bearing foliage) used at the beginning of Part 3 (p. 195, sig. Cc1r). This ornament has a frame with a thick outer border, and in the Leviathan printing there is a small break in that border, almost at the mid-point of the upper edge. The same ornament is found, without the damage, in a book by Christopher Massey printed by Cotes in the second half of 1649, and again in a work by John Lightfoot printed by him at the beginning of 1650; but in another work by Lightfoot, printed by Cotes in the spring of 1650, the damage to the ornament's border is clearly visible.[59]

[57] Andrewes, Pattern of Catechistical Doctrine, sig. [*]1r; this book is described on the title page as 'printed by Roger Norton'.

[58] Taylor, XXVIII Sermons (1651), sigs. A1r, C2r, E1v; Jackson, Collection of Works (1653), sig. a2r; de Bado Aureo, Tractatus (1654), sig. π2r; de Macedo, Tessera romana (1654), sig. B1r; Morice, Coena quasi KOINH (1660), sig. a1r. All these works are described on their title pages as printed by R. Norton. Note that the block used on sig. b1r of Clement Edmonds's translation of Julius Caesar's Commentaries (1655, printed by Roger Daniel) is not identical, being a different version of the same design.

Both printers were well known. Norton was the son of a famous printer, Bonham Norton, who had held a half-share in the office of the King's Printer under James I; and at the Restoration Roger Norton himself was described in a testimonial not only as having printed royalist 'letters declarations and papers', but also as having hidden and looked after royalist agents in his house.[60] Cotes was also an experienced printer, who seems, in contrast, to have enjoyed good relations with the parliamentarian régime; in 1642 he was appointed official printer to the City of London.[61] But the political affinities of these men are unlikely to have played any part in their selection for the job by Andrew Crooke. (Slightly more relevant, perhaps, is the fact that Cotes and Crooke were personal friends: when Cotes drew up his will in December 1652, he left 'my beloved freind Andrew Crooke' twenty shillings for a memorial ring, and appointed him an overseer of the will.)[62]

The most significant fact here is that Crooke divided the job between two printers. This would have required a certain amount of extra work on his part, making sure that their typefaces matched and that they followed the same conventions; the obvious reason for incurring this extra trouble would have been to speed up the printing by having both halves of the book produced concurrently. That Crooke did not simply employ Norton first and then, for some reason, transfer the work to Cotes once Norton had printed the first half, is neatly demonstrated by the fact that Norton printed the preliminary quire, which, as normal custom dictated (and as the presence there of Hobbes's dedicatory epistle of 15/25 April shows), was printed last of all. Modern readers may be surprised by the idea that a printer could have calculated, when looking at the copy-manuscript, that the third Part of the book would begin on precisely p. 195; but 'casting off' copy (marking in the copy-manuscript where the page divisions would be) was a skill which printers possessed in a high degree, and it is reasonable to assume that the English copyist in Paris had written in a clear and regular way, facilitating this task.[63] Some publications of this period show signs of faulty casting off, [59] Massey, Microcosmography, sig. A2r ('Printed by Richard Cotes'); Lightfoot, Harmony of the Evangelists, sig. *2r ('Printed by R. C.'; the dedicatory epistle is dated 28 Jan. [/7 Feb.] 1649/1650); Lightfoot, Temple, sig. *3r ('Printed by R. C.'; the preface is dated 3 [/13] Apr. 1650).

[60] Plomer, 'King's Printing House', esp. p. 372. See also the entry in Plomer, Dictionary, 1641–67, p. 139.

[61] Ibid., p. 53. In his will (see below, n. 62) Cotes left to his son 'twenty pounds for which I have the seale of the Citty of London which I lent to the state by way of Fifty subsidies' (fo. 33v).

[62] TNA, PROB 11/220, fo. 34r.

[63] See Moxon, Mechanick Exercises, pp. 239–44; Simpson, Proof-reading, pp. 84–90; Bond, 'Casting off Copy'. Only a very clearly written manuscript could have been copied by a French scribe who did not know English.

with spaces between chapters fluctuating wildly to take up the slack or save space, and ends of pages sometimes being crammed with denser printing (or even with smaller type). No such signs of incompetence are apparent in the Head edition, but there is one possible indication of a subtle adjustment in the first half. Normally the chapters there are followed by a single-line gap, with a continuous rule below it, and the start of the next chapter immediately below that. Twice, where a chapter ends close to the bottom of a page (Chapters 5 and 29), the remaining space is left blank, and the new chapter begins at the head of the next page. But at the end of Chapter 19 this does not happen: the beginning of Chapter 20 is crammed into the remaining space, even though that space is smaller than in the other two cases. Possibly this reflected a need to catch up with the pagination marked up in the copy. But there was in fact plenty of slack in the system: at the ends of Part 1 and Part 2, as mentioned above, there was room for a blank verso page.[64]

There was a time when modern historians of printing believed that it was possible to calculate how long it would have taken to print any particular book, using a standard rate of production that applied to compositors and press-men. Thus Carlton Hinman, for example, suggested that two compositors, serving one press, would produce one sheet, in an edition of 1,200 copies, in one day.[65] Such assumptions were challenged in a classic study by D. F. McKenzie which demonstrated that in a typical busy printing-house a large number of works would be printed concurrently, in no very systematic way: the important thing was to keep up a flow of work for the workmen, and the pattern of production of any particular book could be quite irregular as a result.[66] McKenzie also showed that there was no fixed relationship between the number of compositors working on a book at any one time and the number of 'skeleton formes' used.[67] On the other hand, in the case of Leviathan

[64] It may also be significant that, in the second half of the book, where a chapter ends only slightly more than half-way down the page, the remaining space is left blank (as in Chs. 33, 34, 46); this contrasts with, e.g., Ch. 18 in the first half, which ends lower down the page than any of those, but is immediately followed by Ch. 19 on the same page. This might imply that the need to comply with cast-off pagination was felt to be less pressing in the second half of the book. But on the other hand there is one place in the second half (the last 13 lines of p. 239 of the Head edn., sig. Hh3r) where the compositor packed the text very tightly, resorting twice to macrons to abbreviate words; this does look like an effort to comply with cast-off pagination.

[65] Hinman, Printing and Proof-reading, i, p. 46.

[66] McKenzie, 'Printers of the Mind', in his Making Meaning, pp. 14–85. McKenzie did not reject the validity of the calculations as such, merely the likelihood of the calculated work being done uninterruptedly on one book. He himself noted that one compositor and one press might produce 5 or 6 sheets (quarto) containing 50,000–72,000 ens of text in total (the equivalent of roughly 3½ sheets (folio)) per week in a print run of 1,200–1,500 copies (p. 19), and that printing 48½ sheets (folio), in a print run of 1,000, was 6 weeks' work for two men at a single press ('Economies of Print', p. 400).

[67] The term 'forme' refers to the frame containing the type for one side of a sheet (in the case of Leviathan, two pages), and/or to the typeset text which it holds. At the end of the printing of a forme, the type is broken up and redistributed, but the running titles (and, if used, rules) can be kept in place: these elements, which then persist from one printed forme to another, are called the 'skeleton forme'.

we can assume that there was some sense of pressure of time (the desire for speed being Crooke's main reason, presumably, for dividing the work between two printing-houses), and in any case we do have a figure (fifteen weeks) for the maximum amount of time that the printing can have taken. If each printing-house produced approximately three-and-a-half sheets per week, that would have been sufficient; whether the printers achieved this with bursts of work by multiple compositors, or steady plodding by one or two, might have depended on the nature and quantity of the rest of their workload. As it happens, though, analysis of the skeleton formes in the two halves of the book tends to suggest a steady pattern of work in both cases; there is no way of knowing how continuous the work was, but when it happened, it seems to have followed a fairly regular pattern. In Part 2 of the book, for the first twelve quires (sigs. M–Z), four skeleton formes are used, with several changes of order. Listed in outer-to-inner order in each quire (that is, first the outer forme of the outer sheet, then the inner; then the outer forme of the inner sheet, then the inner), they run as follows: M: abcd; N: abcd; O: bacd; P: abcd; Q: adbc; R: adcb; S: adcb; T: adcb; U: abcd; X: cabd; Y: dcbd; X: adcb; Y: dcbc; Z: adcb.[68] In Part 3 of the book, the pattern is similar: Cc: efgh; Dd: efgh; Ee: fhge; Ff: hgef; Gg: ghef; Hh: ghef; Ii: efhg; Kk: fegh; Ll: ghfe; Mm: hefg; Nn: hegf; Oo: ehgf; Pp: ehfg; Qq: fehg; Rr: fegh; Ss: fheg; Tt: hgfe.[69] The fact that four skeleton formes were used does not tell us how many compositors must have been working on the book at any one time, but it does suggest that between two and four were involved in the process overall.

The evidence of the skeleton formes is relevant, however, to another question: that of the kind of proof-correction that Hobbes was engaged in when he told Edward Hyde 'that he receiv'd every week a Sheet to correct, of which he shewed me one or two Sheets'.[70] The notion that Hobbes received just one sheet a week is puzzling, since there were 100 sheets in total; it is possible that Hyde misunderstood, or later misremembered, what Hobbes told him, and that he was receiving a weekly package containing a number of sheets, or it may be that (as the uneven distribution of the Errata suggests) Hobbes had received only a selection of sheets.[71] For an author who lived close to [68] The last two quires are harder to interpret: Aa: (?)ac(b?); Bb: (a?)cb(?). Skeleton formes 'a' and 'c' also provide evidence that the printing followed the sequence of the book: 'a' had a rather imperfect letter 'f' in both instances of the word 'Of' from sigs. M to S, which was replaced with a new letter in sig. T; 'c' had a full point after the left-hand chapter number in sigs. M and N, which dropped out thereafter, and was finally reinstated in sig. Bb.

[69] Here too there is one small sign of sequentiality: an incorrect full point after the word 'CHRISTIAN' in skeleton forme 'e' had finally been removed (or dropped out) by sigs. Ss and Tt.

[70] See above, p. 93.

[71] Had the printing really proceeded at a rate of one sheet per week, it would have taken nearly two the printing-house, correcting initial proofs was a normal (though not obligatory) part of the process of having a book published.[72] But what is quite clear is that Hobbes, in Paris, cannot have been engaged in correcting initial proofs and sending them back to London so that the printer could then make the corrections and start printing those pages. For this to have been possible, it would have been necessary to keep a huge amount of text in standing type while waiting for the corrections, given that the time needed for a proof to be sent to Paris and returned to London might have been between two and three weeks in good conditions. Each of the two printers would have needed to hold between seven and ten-and-a-half sheets' worth (between fourteen and twenty-one formes) of set type at any one time. Doing so would have caused them economic harm, by tying up their type and equipment; it would also have greatly exceeded the known maximum in this period.[73] But the evidence of the skeleton formes shows that at any one time each printer could have maintained a maximum of only four formes (two sheets) in type. It follows, then, that when Hobbes corrected the specimen sheets which had been sent to him, he was compiling a list of errata to be printed in the final quire. This too was quite common practice for authors who lived far away from the press. The author James Yonge, for example, when preparing a manuscript of his work for the printer, added the instruction: 'I desire that every sheet as its drawn off may be sent me p^{r} post, and befor the whole be finished, I may send up a correction of the errata'; and the list of errata on a prefatory page of William Drage's A Physical Nosonomy (1665) began with the statement from the printer, 'Reader, In regard of the Authors distance from the Press, and Intricacy of the Copy, these faults have escaped, which he hath Corrected, in this manner.'[74] years. This is incompatible with the evidence of Payne's letter of May 1650; it would also render inexplicable the choice of two concurrent printers.

[72] See the classic work by Percy Simpson, Proof-reading, esp. p. 49.

[73] See Bowers, 'Notes on Standing Type'. The longest examples noted by Bowers of works entirely reprinted from standing type consist of 2½ sheets (octavo) (in 1577) and 2¾ sheets (quarto) (in 1633). This quantity of type may have been exceeded in the case of Bacon's Instauratio magna (London, 1620), where the evidence appears to suggest that up to 4 sheets (folio) were set at any one time (see Bacon, The Instauratio magna Part II, pp. ciii–cxiii). Four sheets (octavo) of standing type were kept between two impressions of Vossius, De Sibyllinis oraculis (Bodl., MS Rawl. D 397, fo. 412r); and 4½ sheets (quarto) were kept between the 1st and 2nd impressions of Hyde's Brief View (see Madan, Oxford Books, iii, p. 335). In some cases proofs were sent to authors at their homes, if those homes were close to the printing-houses in London (see Gants, 'Printing of Ben Jonson's Workes', esp. pp. 41, 55–6). But I know of only two 17th-century examples of initial proofs being sent long-distance by post for correction: see the account of the printing of William Seaman's translation of the New Testament (Oxford, 1666) in Malcolm, 'Comenius, Boyle, Oldenburg', and the account of the printing of Rahn and Pell's Introduction to Algebra (London, 1668), in Malcolm and Stedall, John Pell, pp. 201–4. These were both special cases: the first was in Ottoman Turkish, and the second was mostly in algebraic notation.

[74] Cambridge University Library, MS 7913 (J. Yonge, 'Sidrophel the Quack Astrologer Exposed', 1692), fo. 1v; Drage, Physical Nosonomy, sig. π2r.

As we have seen, some of those errors were things Hobbes had already corrected in the presentation manuscript; he also spotted a handful of errors which he had failed to notice in that manuscript, although they were present there too.[75] In the majority of cases, the Errata corrected mistakes which we may assume to have been made by the compositor in London, since the presentation manuscript has the correct text. These errors took several forms: in Chapter 42, for example, there are examples of misreading ('observe' mistakenly printed for 'obey'), transposition ('our Saviours of' for 'of our Saviours'), and omission ('if shall hear thee' for 'if he shall hear thee'; 'haven' for 'heaven').[76] In some cases the mistake was very obviously just a printing error: 'signied' for 'signified', for instance, or 'tisme' for 'Baptisme', or 'to ay' for 'to Lay'.[77] While the majority of errors dealt with in the Errata could have been spotted by an alert reader in the printing-house, there are some that would scarcely have been noticed by anyone other than Hobbes. For example, in the passage 'I see not . . . any reason to doubt, but that the Old, and New Testament . . . are the true Registers of those things, which were done and said by the Prophets, and Apostles. And so perhaps are some of those Books which are called Apocrypha, and left out of the Canon, not for inconformity of Doctrine with the rest, but only because they are not found in the Hebrew', there is nothing in the sense that could cause the reader to stumble. Hobbes would have known that 'and left out' should have been 'if left out': this was a correction he had made in the presentation manuscript. But since 'and' was the scribal reading there, we may assume that it was the reading in the copy-manuscript too—in which case it would not have seemed to require correction even if the printers had been checking their work carefully against the manuscript.[78]

There is just one anomalous entry in the Errata that deserves special attention. Near the end of Chapter 17, Hobbes wrote that the sovereign was able to 'conforme' (i.e., adapt, mould) the wills of his subjects to peace and mutual aid. That was the reading in the presentation manuscript, so it was presumably present in the copy-manuscript as well. In the Head edition this was printed as 'performe' (perhaps because Hobbes, in making an alteration to the copy-manuscript two words earlier, had added an ill-placed caret mark or line which looked like the descender of a 'p'). The Errata-list says that the word should be 'forme', which, while it does at least make better sense than 'performe', is a surprising departure from the original.[79] It is possible to imagine that Hobbes, when reading the specimen of this printed page, chose 'forme' himself as a good enough correction, without recalling or checking what he had originally written. However, at the last minute a further correction was made by the printers, who arranged for a tiny cancel-slip, containing the prefix 'con', to be produced in order to be pasted over the 'per'.[80] Of course they could have discovered that 'conforme' was the correct reading merely by checking their own manuscript version of the text; but it is hard to imagine why they would have gone to such trouble if they had 'forme' as a valid authorial correction listed in the Errata. To explain this oddity, one might perhaps suppose that 'forme' was a correction invented (without checking the manuscript) by the printers, who added it to the Errata-list, and that 'conforme' was a later correction, submitted by Hobbes, which arrived only at the last minute. But the window of opportunity for Hobbes to send in his corrections—between his conversation with Hyde after 14 [/24] April and the publication of the book by 6 [/16] May—was so limited that one must doubt whether Hobbes transmitted more than one set of instructions; his list of errata was surely sent together with the text of his dedicatory epistle, and the work would have been published as soon as those items were printed. It is more reasonable to suppose that his list of errata did specify 'conforme'; that 'forme' was printed in the Errata by mistake; and that it was a last-minute checking of those printed Errata against Hobbes's handwritten list that generated the cancel-slip correction.

[75] See above, p. 209. [76] See pp. 782, 788, 794, 796. [77] See pp. 228, 762, 860.

[78] See p. 602. (Probably a badly written 'if' in Hobbes's draft had been misread by the English scribe as some sort of 'et' or ampersand.) Rogers and Schuhmann suppose (i, p. 93) that the entire work, once printed, was checked by a professional corrector in the printing-house who was having the manuscript read out loud to him. But printers such as Crooke did not employ professional correctors (see the comments in Gaskell, New Introduction, p. 111). The suggestion is doubly implausible: a corrector acting in this way would not have found errors of the kind discussed here, but he would surely have found many others (see below) not in fact mentioned in the Errata.

The printed Errata-list is very far from being a complete listing of all the errors in the text of the Head edition. It seems likely that Hobbes did not receive specimen sheets of the entire book, and there may even have been quite long sequences of sheets which, for one reason or another, failed to reach him: his list contains only one item (on p. 48) before p. 88, and nothing between pp. 298 and 361. At some points, what now seem evident errors (if one compares the Head with the presentation manuscript) were either not seen by Hobbes or, if he did see them, not recognized as such. Thus in a phrase about 'the Alteration or succession' of the passions, 'Alteration' should have been corrected to 'Alternation'; in a discussion of the Athenian practice of ostracism, where the Head referred to a citizen's oyster-shell 'written with the name of him he desired should be banished, without actuall accusing him', the word 'actuall' should have been corrected to 'at all'.[81] There are other small errors of this kind which the evidence of the manuscript makes it possible to correct.[82] And, in addition, there are of course many compositorial errors which are easily recognizable as such: 'thonghts', 'Commssiion', 'understod', 'Magnamity', and so on.[83] No doubt Hobbes took the attitude of many authors in this period, which was that the correction of such self-evident errors could properly be left to the readers. He was, in any case, not a perfectionist in these matters. Commenting on four such typographical errors in a short Latin text printed for him by William Crooke in 1674, he told Crooke that there was no need to correct them, since 'if any scholar finds these faults he vnderstands them to bee faults very well'.[84]

[79] See p. 260. [80] See below, p. 223. [81] See pp. 84, 330.

Like most early modern authors, Hobbes had allowed considerable latitude to the typesetters. His approach here was also summed up in the comments he made to William Crooke in 1674:

> As for the differencing of words by Italick Carecters it is not necessary, if it were it would be soe in manuscripts. Antiently they who writ a good stile either in prose or in verse as Cicero, Virgill etc: were vnderstood, without different Carecters, paraenthesies, wthout Points [sc. punctuation marks]. So that those Toy's were brought in at first to soften harsh stiles.[85]

In the presentation manuscript of Leviathan (where the scribe does not use italics, but writes in larger script for emphasis or biblical citation) the punctuation is rather loose, often lacking commas where the modern reader would expect them, and the capitalization of key terms is not very consistent. The printers tightened up the punctuation; they capitalized more terms; and they also used a two-tier method of presenting key terms and definitions, with italics for some terms and small capital letters for terms of special importance (though the criteria they used are not very clear).[86] An example will illustrate the difference between the two. Here is the opening of Chapter 7 as it appears in the manuscript (with the use of italics here to represent larger script):

[82] See, e.g., pp. 278, 358.

[83] See the Register of Literal Faults (which indicates that Norton's printing was slightly less afflicted by such errors than Cotes's; both, however, were within the normal range of accuracy for this period).

[84] Correspondence, ii, p. 748. Errors substantively affecting the sense were a different matter, however. Dealing with Sorbière over the printing of the 2nd edn. of De cive in 1646, Hobbes had been willing to pay for one entire sheet to be reprinted; if more such errors were found, he was keen that they be specified in a printed Errata-list in the book (Correspondence, i, pp. 142–3).

[85] Ibid., ii, p. 748.

[86] One modern writer has suggested that this system was Hobbes's own (Rhodes, 'Hobbes's unReasonable Fool', pp. 94: 'Hobbes usually shows defined terms all in capital letters, words being used in a technical sense, especially those previously defined, are given a capitalized first letter'; 101(n.): 'because the capitalization appears to be systematic, it is reasonable to assume that it was produced by Hobbes'); but the evidence of the manuscript—which, though at one remove from Hobbes's draft, must be closer to Hobbes's usage than the Head edition—goes against this.

Of all discourse, gouerned by desire of Knowledge, there is at last an end, eyther by atteyning, or by giuing ouer. And in the chayne of discourse, wheresoeuer it be interrupted there is an end for that time.

If the Discourse be merely Mentall, it Consisteth of thoughts that the thing will be, and will not be, alternately; or that it has bene, and has not bene alternately. So that wheresoeuer you breake of the Chayne of a mans discourse you leaue him in a Praesumption of it will be, or it will not be, or it has bene, or has not bene. All w^{ch} is Opinion. And that w^{ch} is alternate Appetite in deliberating concerning Good and Euil, the same is alternate opinion in Enquiry of the truth of past, and Future. And as the last Appetite in Deliberation, is called the will, so the last opinion in search of the truth of past and future, is called the Judgment, or resolute and finall sentence of him that discourseth. And as the whole chayne of Appetites alternate, in the question of Good or Bad, is Called Deliberation, so the whole chayne of Opinions Alternate, in the question of True or False is Called Dubitation, and Doubt.[87]

And here is the same passage, as it appears in the Head edition:

Of all Discourse, governed by desire of Knowledge, there is at last an End, either by attaining, or by giving over. And in the chain of Discourse, wheresoever it be interrupted, there is an End for that time.

If the Discourse be meerly Mentall, it consisteth of thoughts that the thing will be, and will not be; or that it has been, and has not been, alternately. So that wheresoever you break off the chayn of a mans Discourse, you leave him in a Praesumption of it will be, or, it will not be; or it has been, or, has not been; All which is Opinion. And that which is alternate Appetite, in Deliberating concerning Good and Evil; the same is alternate Opinion, in the Enquiry of the truth of Past, and Future. And as the last Appetite in Deliberation, is called the Will; so the last Opinion in search of the truth of Past, and Future, is called the JUDGEMENT, or Resolute and Finall Sentence of him that discourseth. And as the whole chain of Appetites alternate, in the question of Good, or Bad, is called Deliberation; so the whole chain of Opinions alternate, in the question of True, or False, is called DOUBT.[88]

Here one sees more thorough punctuation and a greater use of initial capitals, italics, and capitalized words. (Some of the capital 'C's in the manuscript may be disregarded; it seems that the Parisian scribe was copying from an English hand in which the minuscule form of this letter underwent a gradation of sizes.) Also noticeable is the fact that the manuscript generally uses an older style of orthography, with 'eyther', 'atteyning', 'chayne', 'of' (for 'off'), and 'bene', as well as medial 'u' for 'v'; the printers tend to modernize, but do not do so systematically, retaining one 'chayn' and the spell-

[87] BL, MS Egerton 1910, fos. 19v–20r.

[88] See p. 98. Note here that the omission of 'alternately' may have been an improvement made by Hobbes to the copy-manuscript; likewise the elimination of 'Dubitation, and'; and the difference between 'in Enquiry' and 'in the Enquiry' could be explained either on that basis or as eye-skip by the Parisian scribe.

ings 'Mentall' and 'Finall'. The manuscript's spelling was certainly closer to Hobbes's own usage; having learned to write in the Elizabethan period, Hobbes habitually used old forms such as 'wee', 'farre', and 'sunne'.[89] It may be that, either for reasons of age or because printers were more sensitive to current practice, the compositors of the Head tended to use more modern conventions, and that no special set of instructions was given to them by Crooke. Certainly no rigorous rule was imposed; old spellings crop up frequently in both halves of the book. But there is some evidence to suggest that a conscious policy was being effected, at least to some extent, where both the modernization of spelling and the more systematic introduction of capital letters were concerned.

This evidence emerges from collating the in-press variants of the Head edition. In the era of the hand-printed book it was common practice, while a forme was being printed, to inspect a sample printing and make small corrections. Even if the setting of the text was perfect, this was worth doing, as it was possible for individual pieces of type to drop out during the printing process; but the opportunity could also be taken to amend misprints, and make small improvements to the setting. The conditions under which sheets were dried and stored before being made up into the individual volumes were such that no volume would normally emerge consisting only of corrected sheets; hence the need for a modern editor to collate multiple copies, to pick up the in-press variants they contain. Collating copies of the Head shows that both Norton and Cotes commonly engaged in in-press correction of this kind. Many of these changes involved amending small errors that had been missed in the initial proofs: 'privedge' for 'priviledge', 'Righr' for 'Right', 'Trauslation' for 'Translation', and so on.[90] But in three cases there are more systematic changes of a different kind.

On sig. E3v (p. 32), in the first two paragraphs of Chapter 8, the uncorrected sheets stated that the intellectual virtues 'go commonly under the name of a good witte; though the same word Witte, be used also, to distinguish one certain ability from the rest', and went on: 'I mean, that Witte, which is gotten by Use onely, and Experience; without Method, Culture, or Instruction. This NATURALL WITTE, consisteth principally in two things . . .' This spelling of 'witte' also occurred in the presentation manuscript. But in the corrected sheets of the Head edition, those four instances of the word were systematically changed to 'wit', 'WIT', 'Wit', and 'WIT'.[91] On sig. P1v [89] These three examples are taken from his holograph letter to the Earl of Newcastle of 16 [/26] Oct. 1636 (Correspondence, i, p. 37).

[90] See the Register of In-Press Variants.

[91] See p. 104, and the entries in the Register of In-Press Variants.

(p. 108), no fewer than eleven words were given initial capital letters (among them, the word 'liberty', five times); some other corrections were also made on that page, and several changes to initial capitals (adding five, removing two) were also made on the other page that made up the same forme (sig. P4r; p. 113).[92] Similar changes, but on a smaller scale, were made on sig. R3v (p. 128): three words were given initial capitals there, and one such change was made on the other page in that forme (sig. R2r; p. 125).[93] These three formes (all in Norton's half of the book) are the only cases where multiple changes of these kinds were made. The reason for this state of affairs can only be guessed at. Perhaps a compositor who routinely applied these conventions, having been temporarily replaced three times by an apprentice, or by a colleague who did not normally work on the book, returned to the printing-house in time to inspect the other person's work and make alterations to it. Other explanations may be possible; but what must be doubted is that this sort of change was being regularly made between the initial proof and the printing, as it would have been very wasteful for a compositor to apply one convention when initially setting the text and another when inspecting it. In other words, these three cases should probably not be interpreted as occasions where the printing process went ahead without normal proof-correction having taken place.[94]

The reader may wonder how it can be said with such confidence that one state of the text, in each of these cases, is the corrected version. The answer is that although most early-modern books consist of random assortments of sheets from both early and late in the printing process, there is an exception to this rule. Sometimes a printer would produce a small quantity of copies of the book on larger (and better-quality) paper, either for sale at a premium price or for the author to distribute as presentation copies to patrons and friends.[95] In these cases the large-paper versions of each forme would be printed separately, either at the beginning of the run for that forme, or—more commonly, in order to include all corrections—at the end.[96] In the case of the Head edition of Leviathan, collation of the variants demonstrates that the large-paper printing came last. The in-press corrections are, as a rule, [92] See pp. 324–8, 340–42, and the entries in the Register of In-Press Variants.

[93] See pp. 380, 388–90, and the entries in the Register of In-Press Variants.

[94] The absence of ordinary misprints from the 'uncorrected' states of the first two formes also counts against such an idea, though it must be noted that the third forme contains two misprints ('controvesie' and 'understod') in both uncorrected and corrected states (see the Register of Literal Faults).

[95] See Juel-Jensen, 'Fine and Large-Paper Copies', and 'Fine and Large-Paper Copies: A Further Note'; and 'Fine-paper copy, large-paper copy' in Suarez and Woudhuysen, Oxford Companion to the Book, ii, p. 721.

[96] Juel-Jensen notes (see above, n. 95) two books by Drayton where it is probable that the large-paper printing took place at the end of the run.

incorporated in the text of the large-paper copies. However, this does not mean that the large-paper copies are perfectly reliable. They contain not only those typographical errors that were never corrected but also two kinds of error that arose during the printing process: some letters dropped out of the forme, and some in-press corrections (typically, replacing letters that had dropped out) were botched, creating new errors.[97] Nevertheless, the general superiority of the large-paper copies is clear.

One final phase of correction remains to be discussed, though it has been partly mentioned already. Perhaps the very last thing to be printed was the folding table which accompanies Chapter 9. This took up one side of a full-size sheet. Below the table, roughly 1.5 cm from the bottom of the page, an instruction to the binder was printed: 'Place this Table between folio 40. and 41.' At the same level near the foot of the page, but much further on, the printers added the letters 'con' and, after a gap, '; as'. These two small items were meant to be cut out (when the bottom inch or so of the page, including the instruction to the binders, was removed) and used as cancel-slips, to be pasted over two erroneous printings in the book—errors that were contained in the large-paper copies as well as the others.[98] The first of these, involving 'performe' for 'conforme', has already been discussed. The second was on sig. P1v (p. 108), where the printed text began a paragraph with the statement, 'Liberty and Necessity are Consistent: As in the water, that hath not only liberty, but a necessity of descending by the Channel'; the cancel-slip was intended to change 'Consistent: As' to 'consistent; as'. Here there was nothing unusual about the use of a capital letter after a colon; the problem was that this punctuation obscured the way in which the sentence was carefully echoing the first sentence of the previous paragraph: 'Feare, and Liberty are consistent; as when a man throweth his goods into the Sea for feare the ship should sink . . .'.[99] This looks like the sort of thing that would have mattered more to the author than to a compositor; and certainly some special motive would have been needed to make the printers go to all the extra trouble of providing for a cancel-slip. So although it may seem significant that this second correction applied to one of the pages where the compositor made a number of in-press stylistic corrections, it is much more likely that it had the same cause as the other cancel-slip correction—namely, as suggested above, a request by Hobbes. Presumably a last-minute check of the list of errata sent in by Hobbes revealed, after the page containing the Errata had been printed, that one of his requests had been misinterpreted or misprinted ('forme'), and that another (this one) had been carelessly omitted.

[97] For examples of the first kind, see the Register of In-Press Variants, entries for pp. 84 (where the type dropped out during the large-paper printing), 118 (where it dropped out before the large-paper printing). For examples of the second kind, see the entries for pp. 430, 712.

[98] On the general use of cancel-slips see Chapman, Cancels; Simpson, Proof-reading, pp. 19–24.

[99] See p. 326.

However, the trouble taken to provide for the cancel-slips seems not to have been matched by any care in instructing booksellers and binders about them. Of the fifteen exempla collated or consulted for the present edition, only two have the first cancel-slip correctly pasted in; two have the second correctly pasted, and one has it slightly misplaced. The copies which have the cancel-slips are all large-paper, but several large-paper copies do not have them.[100] And while in some other copies the bottom strip of the table, containing the instructions to the binder, was cut away, the cancel items at the end of that line seem to have been—perhaps uncomprehendingly—discarded.

It is clear, at least, that some large-paper copies were treated with particular care. The large-paper copies in general are certainly more impressive, physically, than the rest of the edition. Whereas the normal copies are typically 27.5 × 18 cm, the large-paper copies range from 32 × 21 cm to 33.5 × 22 cm.[101] The paper is indeed of finer quality; it has a watermark of a shield containing two lions, and was produced by Richard Guesdon (or Guédon) in Normandy.[102] One large-paper copy, now in Cambridge University Library, received an extra touch of de luxe treatment: it was rubricated, with the margins of the text on each page marked by finely ruled lines in red ink. In several cases, the original owners of the large-paper copies were people connected personally with Hobbes; these copies were evidently used as gifts by the author. Thus the large-paper copy in Durham University Library was owned by John Cosin, whom Hobbes had known in Paris.[103] That in the Bodleian was owned by John Selden; Aubrey's notes on Hobbes record that 'When his Leviathan came out, he sent by his stationer's (Andrew Crooke) man a copie of it, well-bound, to Mr. John Selden', and that Hobbes enjoyed a 'strict friendship' with Selden in the final years of the latter's life.[104] Another copy, sold at auction in 1977, belonged to the jurist Sir Simon Degge (1612–1704), who wrote on the engraved title page that it was 'A gift from my most worthy friend Gilbert Ward, to whom the author gave this'.[105]

[100] See the Register of In-Press Variants.

[101] See the details given in the listing at the head of the Register of In-Press Variants.

[102] See Heawood, Watermarks, no. 594, and the comments in Heawood, 'Further Notes on Paper', p. 130. On the Guesdon family see Heawood, 'Paper Used in England', and the details in Gaudriault, Filigranes, p. 218. The normal-paper copies of Leviathan used a mixed stock of paper; watermarks include a 'pot' design, a large 'pot' with the letters 'O P', and two different 'posts' designs, one of which (approximately resembling Heawood, Watermarks, nos. 3,491 and 3,495) has the letters 'C N D'.

[103] See above, pp. 99, 157.

[104] Bodl., pressmark A. 1. 17 Art. Seld.; Aubrey, 'Brief Lives', i, p. 369; see also Toomer, John Selden, ii, pp. 789–90. Unfortunately Selden did not annotate his copy; it has two minor annotations (on pp. 326 and 395) in a 17th-century hand, but the hand is not his.

[105] Sotheby's (New York), 15 Nov. 1977, lot 127: 'Ex dono dignissimi Amici Gilberti Ward cui Author

Others apart from Selden received copies of Leviathan as gifts from Hobbes soon after publication: the Oxford scientist Ralph Bathurst, for example, was sent two copies by 27 May [/6 June] 1651, though whether these were large-paper is not known.[106] The large-paper copy now in the Bibliothèque nationale de France was previously in the French royal library; possibly it came into that collection from Charles du Bosc, Hobbes's English-speaking friend, who had strong connections at Court.[107] The large-paper copy owned by the Earl of Ailesbury was probably a gift from Hobbes; the Earl would have been known to Hobbes personally, as he was a cousin of the Earl of Devonshire.[108] And there are several other large-paper copies known today, whose original owners cannot be identified.[109]

How many large-paper copies were printed is not known. In some other cases from the late seventeenth century, 25, 50, or 60 large-paper copies were made; but in one instance, at the beginning of the eighteenth, 150 were produced, out of a total print run of 1,500.[110] In the case of Leviathan the overall print run is also unknown, though the fact that copies of the first edition are quite frequently found in the market, and are held by many libraries, tends to suggest that the production was towards the upper end of the usual scale—perhaps 1,200 or even 1,500.[111] If so, the investment by Crooke would have been considerable: on a print run of 1,200, at a very rough estimate, he might have costed the work at something over £170.[112] The relations hunc dedicavit Sy Degge.' Gilbert Ward, an attorney from Ticknall, Derbyshire, had died in 1656, leaving bequests in his will to two members of the Earl of Devonshire's household staff: Roger Jackson and John Hanson (Ward's godson); he also noted that he had received a farm worth £13 6*s* 8*d* from the second Earl of Devonshire, and that he had lived in the household of the late Lady Grace Cavendish (TNA PROB 11/268, fos. 171r–172r).

[106] See Correspondence, i, p. 180.

[107] See ibid., ii, pp. 795–7. The volume (pressmark Rés. G. F. 4) has a fine early binding, which was presumably executed in England: the label on the spine reads 'LEVIATHAN | BY THOM | HOBBES'.

[108] On this copy see below, at n. 149.

[109] These include those in Cambridge University Library; King's College, Cambridge; the New York Public Library (see the Register of In-Press Variants for details), as well as the John Rylands Library, Manchester University, pressmark F/95B3 (where the corrections listed in the Errata have been entered in ink, but in a hand different from Hobbes's, and the cancel-slips have not been cut from the table). Also noteworthy is the copy sold at Sotheby's, New York, on 19 Nov. 1974, of which the original owner was the royalist politician Sir Philip Warwick (who, however, is not known to have had personal connections with Hobbes).

[110] Plot's Natural History of Oxfordshire (1677) had 50 'upon the best flour deluce [sc. fleur de lis]', out of a total print run of 750, and Iamblichus, De mysteriis (1678) had 25 on the same paper, out of a total of 1,000 (Bodl., MS Rawl. D 397, fos. 426r, 426v); Stillingfleet's Vindication (1691) had 60 (Moore, Primary Materials, p. 61); Suidas, vol. 1 (1705) had 150 (McKenzie, Making Meaning, p. 39).

[111] Cf. also the list of inscribed copies, below, pp. 229–30. There is no reason to think that owners were more likely to inscribe their names at one period than at another; so this may give a very rough indication of the relative sizes of the print runs.

[112] This calculation is based on evidence of costs and costing methods in Bodl., MS Rawl. 397, fos. 412r–427v (details from which are printed in Madan, Oxford Books, iii, pp. 329–71); McKitterick, History of Cambridge University Press, i, pp. 280–95; McKenzie, Making Meaning, pp. 40–41 (n.). The rough between authors and their publishers in this period, before the age of regular publishing contracts, were highly variable; some authors heavily subsidized the printing of their works, while others could receive significant payments for them.[113] In the case of Leviathan it seems unlikely that Hobbes (for whom £170 would have represented more than twice his basic annual income while he was living in Paris) would have borne a large share of the costs, though the evidence of the cancel-slips (if the explanation offered above is correct) does suggest an unusually strong desire on Crooke's part to comply with his wishes, as if he were, to some extent, calling the tune.[114] One small element of authorial subsidy can definitely be assumed, though: it is very likely that Hobbes himself paid for the plate of the engraved title page, which he had commissioned from Bosse himself.[115] Hobbes must already have spent a significant sum on the preparation of the vellum manuscript; since this shows how strong his desire was to use his work for the purposes of gratifying a patron, one might argue that he would have willingly paid extra, on the same basis, for a stock of large-paper copies of the printed version. But, on the other hand, Andrew Crooke was an experienced publisher who must have known that he had on his hands a book which would earn a name for itself, and sell. Stationers sometimes paid their authors in kind, with copies of the book; so it is quite possible that the large-paper copies were, in this case, supplied as a form of payment by the publisher to Hobbes.

The Bear Edition

After the Head, there were two further editions of Leviathan. They are known, in accordance with the printer's ornaments on their title pages, as the 'Bear' and the 'Ornaments': the former has a block showing a bear flanked by foliage, and the latter has a pattern of small ornaments or fleurons. That the Bear was the second edition, and the Ornaments the third, is clear from assumptions are as follows, for a print run of 1,200: composition and correction @ 8*s*. per sheet: £40 4*s*.; press-work @ 2*s*. 6*d*. per ream: £31 14*s*. 5*d*.; 'printer's third' for overheads: £23 19*s*. 6*d*.; paper @ 6*s*. per ream: £76 2*s*. 6*d*. Total: £172 0*s*. 5*d*. (Large-paper copies are ignored for this calculation.) This yields a unit cost of 2*s*. 10*d*. The retail price of a copy was 8*s*. 6*d*. (see below, p. 231); the retail price could be roughly 3 times the unit cost (McKenzie, Making Meaning, p. 40 (n.)).

[113] See Kirschbaum, 'Author's Copyright', esp. pp. 61, 72–3, 79.

[114] Had Hobbes been paying for the whole production, Crooke's name and address would probably not have been given on the title page (see McKenzie, Making Meaning, pp. 118, 132), and it may also be doubted whether Crooke would have registered the work with the Stationers' Company.

[115] Cf. the evidence of Pieter Blaeu's letter to Hobbes in 1667, stating that all the plates for the Latin works printed by Crooke had been made and engraved at Hobbes's expense (Correspondence, ii, pp. 693, 695).

LEVIATHAN,

OR

The Matter, Forme, & Power

OF A

COMMON-WEALTH

ECCLESIASTICALL

AND

CIVILL.

By THOMAS HOBBES of Malmesbury.

LONDON,

Printed for ANDREW CROOKE, at the Green Dragon in St. Pauls Church-yard, 1651.

FIGURE 7. Leviathan, Bear edition, printed title page

internal evidence, and has long been recognized. (One clear indication of this is the fact that copies of the Bear have a very worn impression of the engraved title page, whereas in the Ornaments the engraving has been rather crudely retouched.) But since both editions reproduce on their title pages the publication details of the Head (with Crooke's name and address, and the date '1651'), there has been much uncertainty about the dates of their publication and the identities of their printers.

Some external evidence suggests that the Head edition was the only one available to readers during the 1650s and 1660s. In 1654 both Seth Ward and Robert Vilvain quoted, in their criticisms of Leviathan, wordings that appeared only in the Head edition.[116] In 1656 Hobbes's admirer Samuel Tuke noted down another passage of this kind, and so did Hobbes's French disciple François du Verdus; John Bramhall did likewise in 1658.[117] When Abraham van Berkel made his Dutch translation (published in 1667), he used the Head edition.[118] Thomas Tenison also quoted a distinctive passage from the Head in 1670; and when Edward Hyde prepared his refutation of Leviathan in the period 1668–74, he also used that edition.[119] In two of these cases, we also have Hobbes's response to the critic. Replying to Ward in 1656, he wrote that the word objected to was a scribal or compositorial mistake; he did not say that he had already corrected the error in a second edition, but in the Bear edition the word was indeed changed accordingly.[120] And in his reply to Bramhall, written in 1668, Hobbes rather disingenuously argued that the words in question did not really mean what they appeared to say; again, he did not write that he had already corrected them in another edition, although here too the Bear does embody a correction.[121]

External evidence of the same kind, witnessing to the use by readers of the Bear edition, is hard to find. Perhaps the first definite reference in print to the existence of more than one edition of Leviathan came in an auction catalogue prepared by the London bookseller Richard Chiswell in May 1682, which had an entry for 'Hobbe's (Th.) Leviathan; the first and best Edition—London 1651'.[122] At some later date Anthony Wood, in the entry

[116] Ward, Vindiciae, p. 58 (quoting p. 1074); Vilvain, Theoremata, fo. 242v (quoting p. 994). (In these and the following examples, the quoted text will be found in the textual apparatus of the present edn.)

[117] BL, MS Add. 78423, fo. 46v (quoting p. 90); Correspondence, i, p. 357, quoting p. 992); Bramhall, Catching of Leviathan, p. 490 (quoting p. 992).

[118] See Schoneveld, Intertraffic of the Mind, p. 129, n. 383.

[119] Tenison, Creed of Mr. Hobbes, p. 214 (quoting p. 992); Hyde, Brief View, p. 225 (quoting p. 718).

[120] Hobbes, Six Lessons, p. 61 (EW vii, p. 347).

[121] Hobbes, Answer to a Book, pp. 99–100 (EW iv, p. 359).

[122] [Chiswell,] Bibliotheca smithiana, p. 278. There is a similar reference to a 'best edition' copy in an auction catalogue by Samuel Carr in 1683: [Carr,] Bibliotheca waltoniana, p. 26. ('Best edition' was a standard bookseller's phrase; so its use here—as opposed to 'better edition'—need not be taken to imply that more than two edns. were believed to exist.)

on Hobbes in his Athenae oxonienses, listed 'Leviathan . . . Lond. 1651. fol. Reprinted there again with its old date an. 1680 fol.'[123] The source of Wood's information is not known, but he may very well have been thinking of a list printed in 1680 by Chiswell himself, specifying new books obtainable from his shop, in which Leviathan was included.[124]

Another type of external evidence is of some further help in setting up a possible chronological framework for the republication of Leviathan: early dated ownership inscriptions in copies of the book. A search for these has yielded the following list (which extends here to copies of the Ornaments edition, although discussion of the publishing history of that edition will be held over until the next section).[125]

Head: 1652 (Rochester University, NY)[126]
Head: 1652 (Pforzheimer Library copy, University of Texas, Austin)
Head: 1653 (Christie's, London, 21 November 1961, lot 97)[127]
Head: 1654 (State Library of Victoria, Australia)
Head: 1651–6 (Sotheby's, New York, 15 Nov. 1977, lot 127)[128]
Head: 1656 (Edinburgh University)[129]
Head: 1656 (Sotheby's, London, 15 December 1987, lot 294)
Head: 1656 (Berg Collection, New York Public Library)
Head: 1660 or earlier (Sotheby's, 20 November 2003)[130]
Head: 1664 (John Rylands Library, Manchester University).[131]
Head: 1665 (Christie's, London, 16 November 2005, lot 76)
Head: 1668 (Pepys Library, Magdalene College, Cambridge)
Head: 1669 (University of Southern California)

Bear: 1678 (Trinity College, Cambridge)
Bear: 1681 (University of Colorado, Boulder)

[123] Wood, Athenae oxonienses, iii, p. 210.

[124] Burnet, Some Passages, sig. N4^{r}. Leviathan was also advertised in another such catalogue of books 'printed for, and sold by Richard Chiswell' two years later: Burnet, Abridgment, sig. CC2^{r} (present in some copies of the 1st issue of the 1682 edn., e.g. BL, pressmark 1508.829).

[125] This search has been conducted over many years, by questionnaire and by personal inspection; I am very grateful to all the librarians and other individuals who have assisted me (including, of course, the great majority who had no such inscriptions to report), and regret that it is not practicable to thank them all individually here.

[126] The date in this copy is attached not to an ownership inscription but to a poem written on p. 331.

[127] A Head edn. inscribed '1653' was also offered for sale by William Reese Co., New Haven, Conn., in 2004; I have not been able to ascertain whether this was the same copy.

[128] See above, n. 105; the date here is an inference from the inscription by Degge, since Ward died in 1656.

[129] The date in this copy is the date of presentation to the library.

[130] This copy has an ownership inscription noting purchase of the book in Mar. 1662/3; but that can be presumed to represent a purchase at second-hand, as it also has an inscription on the final page (in a different hand), 'p[er]legi 15:^{o} 7:^{bris} 1660' ('I finished reading this on 15 Sept. 1660').

[131] The date in this copy (pressmark SC 7897C) is attached to a jotting on p. 396.

Bear: 1681 (Bloomsbury Book Auctions, London, 16 July 1987, lot 222)
Bear: 1683 (House of Lords Library)

Ornaments: 1702 (Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif.)
Ornaments: 1709 (Aberdeen University)
Ornaments: 1710 (Pontificio Collegio Scozzese, Rome)
Ornaments: 1714 (collection of Prof. Eric Nelson)
Ornaments: 1717 (Trinity College, Cambridge)
Ornaments: 1731 (Juniata College, Penn.)
Ornaments: 1733 (Guildhall Library, London)

A few other copies have been excluded from this list because they can definitely be assumed to represent later purchases at second-hand: a Head dated 1692 (Case Western Reserve), a Head dated February 1693/4 (Christie's, New York, 17 June 2008, lot 181), a Head dated 1698 (Bonhams, London, 27 March 2007, lot 145), and a Bear dated 1717 (Temple University). It is of course possible that some of the items included in the list were themselves second-hand purchases. Taken as a whole, nevertheless, the list does generate a coherent chronological pattern; and it also supplies the earliest known date (1678) at which copies of the Bear were in existence.

Another kind of evidence is also of some use for a study of the publishing history of the book: records of the prices paid for copies at different times. Details of prices paid are sometimes included in the ownership inscriptions; information of this kind can also be gleaned from some other sources—above all, annotated copies of book auction catalogues, in which the hammer price was recorded. In the table that follows, details are given of all known prices of Leviathan between 1651 and 1750.[132]

Here the most significant details, where the background to the printing of the Bear is concerned, are the rise in the price of a second-hand copy from 10*s*. in 1663 to 24*s*. in 1668, and the fact, recorded by Pepys, that a new copy in 1668 commanded the extraordinarily high price of 30*s*. The stock of new copies of the Head may have been running very low by that time, but two special factors may also have boosted the price: the Fire of London, which destroyed many booksellers' stock, and the announcement in October 1666

[132] Where the price is a minimum printed in the catalogue (a practice which began in the second quarter of the 18th century), it is followed here by '(+)'. Early auctions are referred to either by the name of the owner of the library that was disposed of (in the form, 'Digby sale'), or by the name of the auctioneer (in the form, 'sale by Osborne'). Inscribed copies are referred to by library. Copies are identified as 'Head', 'Bear', or 'Ornaments', where this is known. Again, the table is extended here to cover the period discussed in the next section's account of the printing of the Ornaments edition. The starting-point for the research on annotated auction catalogues was the listing in Birrell, 'Books and Buyers', pp. 51–3. Further research was hugely assisted by the suggestions and advice of Giles Mandelbrote.

Leviathan prices

New copies (presumably)			Second-hand copies
1651 (May)	Payne letter[133]	8*s*. 6*d*.
1651 (July)	Hartlib bill[134]	8*s*. 6*d*.
1653 (Dec.)	Cavendish accounts[135]	8*s*. 0*d*.
1654	State Lib., Victoria, Australia (Head)	9*s*. 0*d*.
			1663 (Mar.)	Sotheby's 2003 (Head)[136]	10*s*. 0*d*.
			1668	Pforzheimer Lib., Texas (Head)[137]	24*s*. 0*d*.
			1668 (Sept.)	Pepys, diary[138]	24*s*. 0*d*.
1668 (Sept.)	Pepys Lib., Cam. (Head)[139]	30*s*. 0*d*.
1678	Trinity, Cam. (Bear)	15*s*. 0*d*.
			1680 (Apr.)	Digby sale[140]	15*s*. 8*d*.
			1680 (Nov.)	Bysshe sale[141]	18*s*. 6*d*.
			1681	BBA 1987 (Bear)[142] (presumed second-hand)	11*s*. 0*d*.
			1682 (May)	Smith sale (Head)[143]	14*s*. 8*d*.
			1682 (Nov.)	Parsons sale[144]	12*s*. 2*d*.
1683	House of Lords (Bear)	17*s*. 0*d*.
			1683 (Feb.)	Arthur sale[145]	12*s*. 2*d*.
			1683 (Dec.)	Lloyd sale[146]	12*s*. 0*d*.

[133] BL, MS Harl. 6942, no. 132, Payne to Sheldon, 6 [/16] May 1651: 'It is in folio, at 8^{s}. 6^{d}. price.'

[134] Hartlib Papers, Sheffield University Library, 31/20/12A: 'Mr harlibs Bill 6th Iuly 1651 . . . hobs Leviathan 08 – 6.'

[135] Chatsworth, MS Hardwick 14, p. 6 (entry for Dec. 1653): 'By m^{r} Halily for Bookes . . . Leuiathan 8s.'

[136] Sotheby's, London, 20 Nov. 2003, lot 153 (see above, n. 130).

[137] Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center, University of Texas at Austin, pressmark Pforz. 491. The previous owner, de Cardonnel, had been given the book in 1652, and had died in 1667 (see above, pp. 159–61).

[138] Pepys, Diary, ix, p. 298.

[139] Pepys recorded this price (the price of a new copy) in the copy he bought, even though his copy was bought second-hand; see the discussion in Malcolm, Aspects, p. 344.

[140] [Cooper,] Bibliotheca digbeiana (BL, pressmarks C.122.e.12 and C.194.b.36), p. 82.

[141] [Dunmore,] Bibliotheca bissaeana (Cambridge University Library, pressmark Syn. 5.67.2), p. 65. This publication is dated '1679' in some catalogues, apparently because Sir Edward Bysshe died in that year; but his death was on 15 [/25] Dec., and this sale began on 15 [/25] Nov.

[142] Inscription in copy sold at Bloomsbury Book Auctions, London, 16 July 1987, lot 222.

[143] [Chiswell,] Bibliotheca smithiana (BL, pressmark 821.i.3 (1), in Mic. B.619/548), p. 278.

[144] [Millington,] Choice Catalogue (BL, pressmark 821.i.3 (3), in Mic. B.619/548), p. 8.

[145] [Millington,] Catalogus librorum Joannis Arthurii (BL, pressmark 821.i.3 (5), in Mic. B.619/548), 2nd pagination, p. 11.

[146] [Millington,] Bibliotheca lloydiana (BL, pressmark 821.i.3 (12), in Mic. B.619/548), p. 18.

Leviathan prices (cont.)

New copies (presumably)			Second-hand copies
			1687 (May)	Coventry sale[147]	10*s.* 0*d.*
			1687 (Oct.)	Jacomb sale[148]	10*s.* 0*d.*
			1690 (May)	Ailesbury sale (Head, large-paper)[149]	16*s.* 6*d.*
			1692	Case Western Res. (Head)	17*s.* 0*d.*
			1693 (Nov.)	Meggott sale[150]	14*s.* 4*d.*
			1694 (Feb.)	Christie's, New York, 17 June 2008 (Head)	11*s.* 0*d.*
			1695 (May)	Scott sale[151]	12*s.* 0*d.*
			1695 (Dec.)	Puller sale[152]	9*s.* 2*d.*
			1698 (July)	Bonhams 2007 (Head)[153]	7*s.* 6*d.*
			1699 (Feb.)	Skinner sale[154]	8*s.* 6*d.*
1702	Huntington Lib. (Ornaments)	21*s.* 0*d.*[155]
			1702 (Nov.)	Woodward sale[156]	10*s.* 0*d.*
			1711 (Mar.)	Bernard sale[157]	9*s.* 0*d.*
			1728 (Nov.)	Woodward sale[158]	8*s.* 9*d.*
			1731 (Jan.)	Collins sale[159]	6*s.* 2*d.*
			1731 (Jan.)	Gray sale[160]	8*s.* 6*d.*
			1732 (Mar.)	sale by Montagu[161]	10*s.* 0*d.* (+)
			1741 (Feb.)	Chilwell sale[162]	8*s.* 0*d.* (+)

[147] [Cooper,] Catalogue of Books (Longleat House copy: in BL, microfilm PB 700 730), p. 16.
[148] [Millington,] Bibliotheca jacombiana, p. 80.
[149] [Bullord,] Bibliotheca curiosa (Houghton Library, Harvard University, pressmark *65JC–128 F; the printed catalogue does not identify the library, but an annotation in this copy describes it as 'The remainder of the Library of the E. of Ailesbury'), p. 21. (I am very grateful to Prof. Eric Nelson for checking this item.)
[150] [Millington,] Bibliotheca megottiana (BL, pressmark SC 1038 (1), in Mic. B.619/258), p. 19.
[151] [Millington,] Bibliothecae nobilissimae pars posterior (BL, pressmark SC 1038 (2), in Mic. B.619/258; also BN, pressmark Q-2519), 2nd pagination, p. 15.
[152] [Millington,] Catalogus librorum Tim. Puller (BL, pressmark SC 1038 (3), in Mic. B.619/258), p. 15.
[153] Inscription in a copy sold at Bonhams, London, 27 Mar. 2007, lot 145.
[154] [Millington,] Bibliotheca skinneriana (BL, pressmark SC 1037, in Mic. B.619/258), p. 26.
[155] This note of the price accompanies two inscribed dates: 17 July 1702 and 21 Aug. 1705. It is assigned here to the earlier one, as the latter may have recorded purchase at second hand, and the price is very high.
[156] [Millington,] Bibliotheca woodwardiana (London, 1702) (BL, pressmark SC 922* (5)), p. 14.
[157] [Ballard,] Bibliotheca bernardiana (BN, pressmark Delta-48523), p. 192.
[158] [Bateman and Cooper,] Catalogue (BL, pressmark 11900.b.19), p. 114.
[159] [Ballard,] Bibliotheca Antonij Collins (BL, pressmark 270.i.23 (1)), p. 150.
[160] [Ballard,] Catalogus librorum (BL, pressmark 270.i.23 (4)), p. 69.
[161] Montagu, Catalogue, p. 5.
[162] Payne, Catalogue of Scarce and Useful Books, p. 8 ('Leviathan, best Edition').
[163] C. Marsh, Catalogue, p. 15.

New copies (presumably)	Second-hand copies
	1747?	Greenhill sale[163]	6*s*. 0*d*. (+)
	1748 (Dec.)	sale by Osborne[164]	6*s*. 0*d*. (+)
	1748 (Dec.)	ditto (finely bound)[165]	7*s*. 6*d*. (+)
	1749 (May)	Kynaston sale[166]	6*s*. 0*d*. (+)
	1749 (May)	sale by Payne[167]	6*s*. 0*d*. (+)
	1750 (Dec.)	sale by Osborne[168]	6*s*. 0*d*. (+)

that the House of Commons committee considering the Bill against Atheism and Profaneness was to investigate Leviathan.[169]

As we have seen, this threat of parliamentary action against Hobbes seems also to have had a strong psychological effect on the elderly author, leading him not only to pen a number of accounts of the law of heresy but also to make some significant changes to the theological arguments of Leviathan when translating it into Latin. Fears of hostile action by the authorities would also have limited the options for the production of a new edition of the English: the most prudent course, clearly, was just to reprint the original text, including the '1651' publication details on the title page, so that a new copy could be either passed off as a copy of the first edition or explained away as an unauthorized piracy of it. Yet at the same time the concerns which had led Hobbes to alter some theological passages in the Latin might well have motivated him to make similar alterations in the English. There are in fact a few passages in the Bear edition where Hobbes's eschatological theory (concerning the 'eternal' succession of generations of the reprobate, living and procreating on earth) has been modified, along the same lines as the changes in the Latin translation. The nature of these modifications thus strongly suggests that Hobbes was involved in some way in the production of the Bear edition. He was motivated to make them from 1666 onwards; and the evidence of the prices suggests that there was a strong commercial case for a new edition from 1668 onwards. It seems reasonable to expect, then, that an effort to reprint Leviathan would have been made quite a few years before 1678, the year of the first dated ownership inscription in a copy of the Bear.

Detailed evidence does in fact survive of an attempt to reprint Leviathan in London in 1670. On 28 September [/8 October] of that year the printing-[164] Osborne, A Catalogue (with the Prices Printed), p. 54. This catalogue (of which there is a copy in the BN, pressmark Q-9152), gives the date of the auction as 14 Dec., and also includes an advertisement for a book 'just published', Linden's Treatise on Chalybeat Waters (published by Osborne in London in 1748).

[165] This second copy, also listed in Osborne, A Catalogue (with the Prices Printed), p. 54, was described as 'The same, neatly bound in red Calf, gilt, &c.'.

[166] Osborne, Catalogue of Thirty Thousand Volumes, p. 37.

[167] Payne, Catalogue of a Curious Collection, p. 10.

[168] Osborne, A Catalogue of the Libraries, p. 58.

[169] See above, p. 153.

house of John Redmayne (a Liveryman of the Stationers' Company, and the son-in-law of the well-known printer Roger Daniel) was raided. In the words of Redmayne's later affidavit, 'There came to my house M^r^ Leak Master of the Company of Stationers with Warden Roper, accompanied with M^r^ Norton and M^r^ Mearne, who found at my house printing a book intituled Hobbes Leuiathan, and there seized on two sheets.'[170] On the following Monday (3 [/13] October) the Court of the Stationers' Company discussed Redmayne's case; the decisions made by the Court were recorded as follows.

> Whereas this Co^r^t of Assistants were this Day given to vnderstand, that one Redmayne . . . has been lately discovered to Print a Book Called, Hobbs his Leviathan, w^ch^ (as he affirmes) he was Imployed to doe, by one M^r^ John Williams; It is Ord'red, That the Printing Presse, of the said Redmayne, be forthw^th^ by the Wardens of this Company, taken downe and demolished And that the said Redmayne be suddenly indicted vppon the Act, for preventing vnlycensed Bookes, and Regulating the Presse.
>
> Ordred that the foresaid Redmayne, be summoned to bring in all the heapes (now in his house) of the bookes called Hobbs his Leviathan, and Esopps Fabules, w^ch^. he hath vnlawfully Printed &c.[171]

Redmayne's affidavit takes up the story.

> The Thursday sennight following [sc. Thursday 6 [/18] October] they came again and took away my Press, and demanded where the residue of the Sheets were, which I told them, were thirty eight more, & were also seized upon. They likewise demanded of me who I printed this book for, I told them for M^r^ John Williams, who had it (he said) from M^r^ Andrew Crook, with his order to print.[172]

The chronology of Redmayne's account is confirmed by an entry for 6 [/16] October 1670 in the Wardens' Accounts of the Stationers Company: 'Item paid at the taking downe of M^r^ Redmaines Presses M^r^ Tyler M^r^ White M^r^ Flesher M^r^ Mearne at 3 severall places: 000 06 01.' And a further entry records an extra payment to a Company employee, Mr Cleaver: 'Item paid him more that hee had laid out vpon the taking downe M^r^ Redmaines Presse and seizing of the sheetes of the Leviathan: 000 04 06.'[173]

On the face of it, this was a straightforward case of unlicensed printing being punished by a Stationers' Company that was rigorously enforcing the law. The punishment—not only the seizure of the sheets of Leviathan, but [170] TNA, SP 29/279/95(I).The date 'September 28^th^ 1670' is written at the head of this page. Previous writers (e.g., Macdonald and Hargreaves, Bibliography, p. 29; Williams, 'Was There a 1670 Leviathan?', p. 82) have assumed that this is the date of the affidavit; but the sequence of events plainly shows that this was the date of the first raid. The affidavit was written on 19 [/29] Oct., as the covering sheet by Samuel Mearne makes clear.

[171] SC, Court Book D (reel 56), fo. 176r.

[172] TNA, SP 29/279/95(I).

[173] SC, Wardens' Accounts (reel 76), entry for that date.

the dismantling of Redmayne's presses—looks severe: according to a survey in 1668, Redmayne had four compositors, two pressmen, one apprentice and just two presses, so the 'taking downe' of his presses would have put him, at least for some time, out of business.[174] That the Company was acting with such rigour is also easily explicable: long-running animosities between it and the 'Surveyor of the Press', Sir Roger L'Estrange, had come to a head in August 1670, when L'Estrange used the threat of revoking the Company's charter to demand that it change its by-laws and improve its conduct, especially where the control of unlicensed printing was concerned.[175] A show of zeal by the Company was much to be desired; that, probably, is why one member of the Court of the Company, Samuel Mearne, went to the extra trouble of obtaining a written account of these proceedings from Redmayne himself, and trying to deliver it in person to the Under-Secretary of State, Joseph Williamson, on 19 [/29] October.[176]

On the other hand, one reason for L'Estrange's hostility was that the Stationers' Company, at the highest levels, had ingrained habits of connivance with—or, at least, profiting from—unlicensed printing; and those habits had not suddenly gone away. When the House of Lords conducted an enquiry into the Company in 1677, one witness reported, among other discreditable details, that 'M^{r} Mearne and others of the Stationers having seized upon 1000: of Dyers Sermons an Vnlicensed Book M^{r}. Mearn sold the said Bookes to M^{r}: Royston, and M^{r}: Royston sold them to M^{r}. Write who sold them publickly in his shop.'[177] The witness's list of 'Particulars' against the Company began with three serious charges: 'That several of the Chief men of the Company do both Sell, and Connive at many of those Libells, which they are Commanded to Search for, and Discover'; 'That they give Notice beforehand, of a Search to be made'; and 'That upon Information, they do sometimes put off Searching till things may be removed out of the way.'[178]

This is the background against which the episode of the 1670 printing of Leviathan must be considered; for there are several aspects of that story

[174] Plomer, Dictionary, 1641–1667, p. 153 (TNA, SP 29/243/181).

[175] See TNA, SP 29/278/167 (L'Estrange memorandum, 14 [/24] Sept. 1670); Kitchin, Sir Roger L'Estrange, pp. 184–91; Blagden, Stationers' Company, pp. 154–5.

[176] Mearne's covering note, addressed to Williamson and written at the 'Councell Chamber dore', states: 'If y^{e} Leviathan should be called for this Inclosed may serve for y^{e} Present. Y^{e} Printer is gon & I am in great hast & Just Leasure enough to Subscribe my selfe Sr your most humble Seruant Sam: Mearne' (TNA, SP 29/279/95).

[177] Parliamentary Archives, London, House of Lords papers, 1676/7, item 338, fo. 127r (accusations by John Seymour). For other details see Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 352–3.

[178] Parliamentary Archives, London, House of Lords papers, 1676/7, item 338, fo. 121r. It is noteworthy that Mearne's response was not to attempt to disprove the allegations, but merely to make countercharges of corruption against L'Estrange (fo. 129r). See also the valuable discussion of these issues in Hetet, 'Wardens' Accounts'.

that must arouse suspicion. It is odd that the officials of the Company on their first raid should only have made off with a sample of two sheets, not bothering to seize the rest of what had been printed. It is strange too that the decision to go ahead with a full-scale raid should have been made at a Court meeting on 3 [/13] October, but not carried out until three days later: the Court of the Company, which must have included friends of Crooke and Williams, was hardly the ideal vessel to contain such a secret. Then, when the second raid was carried out, the Company's officials seem to have depended on Redmayne to tell them how many other sheets he had printed, and where they were. Some suspicion must also arise over Redmayne's punishment: the Court's decision referred not only to Leviathan, but also to an edition of Aesop (which infringed another printer's rights to that work), yet within a few months an edition of Fabulae Aesopi went on sale, with the imprint 'Ex officina Johannis Redmayne'.[179] Similarly, although one of the entries in the Wardens' Accounts for 6 [/16] October (quoted above) indicates that both of Redmayne's presses were dismantled, Redmayne was able to produce five books in 1671, and four in 1672.[180] As for the treatment of the two prominent booksellers who had commissioned the printing, John Williams and Andrew Crooke, this too is rather surprising, insofar as no punishment was imposed at all, apart from a curious transaction (discussed below) involving payment by Williams for the seized sheets. Crooke no doubt had many friends in the upper echelons of the Company, having served as Master of it in 1665 and 1666. Whether he employed Williams as an intermediary in commissioning Redmayne, or whether he had brought Williams in as a partner in the venture, is not known; but it is possible that his use of another bookseller did make it possible for him to distance himself to some extent from the affair.

The subsequent history of the confiscated sheets of Leviathan also arouses suspicion. After the seizure in September and October 1670, a complete silence descended on this subject in the Stationers' Company records for more than three years. Then, on 11 [/21] December 1673, an order was sent to the Company by the Bishop of London: 'These are to Require You to Damask or obliterate whatsoever Sheets you have seized of a Book intitled, Leviathan: & for your so doing this shall be your Warrant.'[181] Despite this peremptory command, it took the Company roughly three months to comply: only on 24 March [/3 April] 1674 did the Wardens' Accounts record the payment of £1 13*s*. 'for damasking the Leviathan'.[182] On the following day the Company servant who had been entrusted with the task, William Bailey, wrote out a receipt for the payment he was given: 'Received of M^r^ Samuell Mearne y^e^ Summe of Thirty shillings for Damasking forty five Reames of the Leviathan and for carriage three shillings.'[183] The sheets made their next appearance in the records on 2 [/12] November 1674, when it was 'Ordred that the Damask sheetes of a Booke called Hobbes Leviathan bee delivered to Randall Taylor Beadle of this Company to be delivered to M^r^ Jn^o^. Williams and M^r^. Tho: Sawbridge Members of this Company'.[184] And finally, on 12 [/22] February 1675, four years and four months after the original seizure, John Williams paid the Company £2 13*s*. 6*d*. 'for soe much Expended in the seizure & Damasking part of Hobbs his Leviathan'.[185] Taking these last two entries together, it becomes clear that Williams had not only reimbursed the Company for its expenses; he had also, in effect, bought back the sheets.

[179] Hetet, 'Wardens' Accounts', p. 45.

[180] Williams, 'Was There a 1670 Leviathan?', p. 83. Redmayne remained active as a printer until his death in *c.*1683: see Treadwell, 'London Printers', p. 36.

[181] SC, Box A, envelope 3, item vi (reel 97). Damasking involved over-printing or stamping the sheets to render them illegible: see the discussion in Oman and Hamilton, Wallpapers, p. 14.

There are three possibilities here. Redmayne may have yielded only some of his work (keeping either the entire print run of some sheets, or a portion of the production of the 40 sheets he handed over). Or, if all his work was handed over, some of the sheets may later have been siphoned off (before the damasking) and returned to him, or to Williams, or to Crooke. Or again, the claim that the sheets were damasked may have been fictitious, with Williams bribing Bailey, the Company servant, to return some or all of the sheets to him in a usable condition. One intriguing aspect of the evidence does suggest that the first and second scenarios are more likely than the third. According to Redmayne's affidavit, 40 sheets were taken; but according to William Bailey's receipt (quoted above), only 45 reams were damasked. The discrepancy is striking. The print run for such a work would most probably have been at least 1,000 copies, which would imply, therefore, that at least 40,000 sheets were seized. Yet 45 reams of paper is only 21,600 sheets: if this was the genuine total, with nothing withheld or siphoned off before that stage, then the print run would have had to be the surprisingly low figure of 540 copies. William Bailey would surely have covered his tracks more convincingly than that. What this suggests is that the record of damasking is probably genuine, and that a significant proportion of the printing had indeed been either withheld at the outset or subsequently siphoned off. Again, if the first and second scenarios are therefore to be preferred to the third, then on the same grounds one might suspect that the second is more plausible than the first:

[182] SC, Wardens' Accounts (reel 76), entry for that date.
[183] SC, Box A, envelope 3, item vii (reel 97).
[184] SC, Court Book D (reel 56), fo. 240r.
[185] SC, Wardens' Accounts (reel 76), entry for that date.

the officers who raided Redmayne's printing-house on 6 [/16] October were also experienced printers, and would have had a good idea of the quantity of paper taken up by 40 sheets in a normal print run. But this is to assume that they were not already conniving with Redmayne, which is a rather uncertain assumption.

These speculations point to two overall conclusions. First, if the Bear Leviathan was indeed based on a salvaged rump of Redmayne's printing, then it would seem likely that the total number of copies of the Bear was, in the end, smaller than that of a normal print run. Some evidence does indeed support the idea that the quantity of Bears printed was much smaller than that of Heads; anyone who has searched for early editions of Leviathan will be aware that there are simply many more Heads than Bears in existence today. A rough indication is given by the annual volumes of Book-Auction Records, which record the number of copies offered for sale between 1962 and 1997 as 101 Heads and 37 Bears.[186] And the second implication of the scenarios sketched above is that if the Bear edition represents the completion of a rump of Redmayne's interrupted printing in 1670, there should be two different types of sheet in any copy of the Bear—the salvaged sheets and the subsequent completion—with some discernible differences between them. It cannot be assumed, however, that this distinction would apply simply to 40 sheets (or 38, if Redmayne had reprinted by the time of the second raid the two sheets seized in the first) versus the rest. The salvaging may have been a more haphazard process, in which varying amounts of different sheets were retained or recovered; if some survived only in small quantities, these might then have been discarded, to be replaced by new sheets in the completion of the printing.

A close inspection of the Bear does in fact reveal that its sheets were divided between two compositors or printers using different typefaces—and that the division is far from neat. In most cases (but not all), the pages can be quickly identified by their running titles: one typeface is usually associated with a running title in small capital letters, while the other sets its running title in a larger type. As a rough guide, therefore, the two typefaces can be distinguished by reference to 'small-title' pages and 'large-title' pages. The most easily identifiable feature of the small-title pages is the use of a semi-colon in which the comma element makes an unusually full, billowing curve; the equivalent element in the large-title pages is quite normal. In the small-title pages the top of the most commonly used long 's' also leans generously far over to the right; again, the large-title pages have a more normal version of this letter. Italic 'w' in the text of the small-title pages has the form of two contiguous 'v's; the equivalent in the large-title pages is looped at the centre. The design of italic ampersand is also different; and, indeed, there are minute differences of design or proportion to be observed in almost every other letter-form.

[186] Book-Auction Records, 59 (1962, for 1961–2) to 95 (1999, for 1997). The total for the Ornaments edition is even smaller, however: 23. Cf. also the comments above, n. 111.

But the most striking aspect of this evidence is the pattern of distribution of the pages between the two typefaces. The first quire, sig. A, is in the large-title typeface; sigs. B and C are in the typeface of the small-title pages; then sig. D reverts to large-title, and so on. In some quires, each sheet is in a different typeface. The distribution through the whole volume can be tabulated as follows.

Distribution of typefaces in the Bear edition

Small-title typeface	Large-title typeface	Small-title typeface	Large-title typeface
	A		Aa
B			Bb
C			Cc
	D		Dd
	E	Ee
	F1,4	Ff
F2,3		Gg
G1,4		Hh
	G2,3	Ii
	H1,4		Kk1,4
H2,3		Kk2,3
I1, I4			Ll
	I2,3		Mm
	K		Nn
	L		Oo
M			Pp
	N		Qq
	O		Rr
	P	Ss
	Q1,4	Tt
Q2,3		Vv
	R	Xx
S		Yy
T		Zz
	U	Aaa
	X	Bbb
	Y	Ccc
	Z	Ddd

Note: The folding table also shares the typeface of the small-title pages.

This division of the material is very striking. Of course, with a page-by-page reprint, it was not necessary for all the sheets to be printed sequentially; if two teams had been working in the same printing-house, they might have divided the work between them on a rather sporadic basis, but it is highly unlikely that they would have divided quires in this way. (As we shall see, in this case there is some typographical evidence to show that quires were normally printed together.) And this work was surely not done in the same printing-house: not only do all the typefaces differ between the two sets of sheets, but that difference correlates with a difference in the paper stock.[187] In a normal printing operation, if a bookseller had commissioned two printing-houses to print a book concurrently (as Crooke did with the Head edition), that bookseller would have supplied the appropriate quantity of paper to both printers, with the result that the paper stock would have been the same throughout the volume. The nature of the division of both paper and typefaces in the Bear strongly supports the hypothesis that this edition was a later completion of an assortment of sheets from Redmayne's printing.

Two questions thus arise: who was the printer that completed the work, and which of the two types of sheet was produced by which printer? The answer to both questions is supplied by the printer's ornaments in the first quire of the book: the 'bear' ornament on the title page, and a block at the head of the 'Introduction' which has a central oval, flanked by two angels, depicting St Christopher between the letters 'C C'. In the early 1950s a Dutch librarian suggested that this St Christopher ornament was probably—although 'as yet we cannot prove it'—a device of the Amsterdam printer Christoffel Cunradus.[188] Proof that this identification was correct can in fact be found in a number of works printed by Cunradus. The St Christopher ornament appears, exactly as in the Bear Leviathan, in a work printed by Cunradus in 1671; it is also present in a number of books printed by him for another bookseller, Jacob van Meurs, in the period 1669–81.[189] Two of the works printed for van Meurs (in 1680 and 1681) contain not only that ornament but also the 'bear', exactly as it appears on the Leviathan title page; and the same 'bear' is found in four other Cunradus printings, dating from the period 1676–82.[190] It is thus clear that Cunradus, in Amsterdam, printed quire 'A',

[187] The 'small-title' sheets are a mixed stock, with either a 'three circles' watermark or a 'pot' (see Malcolm, Aspects, p. 342); the 'large-title' pages have an infrequent watermark consisting of the initials 'A P'.

[188] Macdonald and Hargreaves, Bibliography, p. 28.

[189] The work issued by Cunradus in 1671 was Visscher, De waare tempel (see p. 3, sig. A2r); for a listing of the other works (the last of which was printed for van Meurs's widow), and the reasons for identifying Cunradus as the printer of them, see Malcolm, Aspects, p. 362.

[190] The works containing both ornaments are Dapper, Naukeurige beschryving (1680) (see title page and sig. *3v), and Dapper, Asia (1681) (see title page, 'Vorrede', and p. 456); for a listing of the other works see Malcolm, Aspects, p. 362.

FIGURE 8. Leviathan, Bear edition, sig. A4r: the 'St Christopher' ornament from which it follows that he was the printer of the large-title pages, while Redmayne can be presumed to have printed the small-title pages.

Ideally, it ought to be possible to confirm this last point by matching typographical details of the small-title pages with the typography of known printings by Redmayne. This has not been attempted systematically; the main roman typeface appears to be identical with the type used in two books printed by him, Samuel Hinde's England's Prospective-Glasse (1663) and Peter du Moulin's A Vindication of the Sincerity of the Protestant Religion (1664)—except that the distinctive long 's', a common form of that letter in Leviathan, is not present there. It may be that Crooke, Williams, and Redmayne had gone to some trouble to make their printing difficult to trace; the very crude and ugly ornamental capital used at the start of Part 4 of the book (p. 333, sig. Vv1r) was perhaps prepared as a one-off, to be used in this printing and then destroyed.[191] Nevertheless, even without strong typographical evidence confirming the attribution of these pages to Redmayne, the attribution itself is highly probable. We know that Redmayne's printing was instigated by Crooke, Hobbes's publisher; substantive changes to the text, derived almost certainly from Hobbes, are present in the Bear edition (as it happens, on the pages attributed to Redmayne). For an English book in this period to be a hybrid printing in which roughly half of the work was done in Amsterdam is extremely unusual, and so too is the physical division of the work. Only some rather extraordinary set of circumstances could have given rise to this; the raid on Redmayne's press fits this requirement precisely. (And, as we shall see, there is further evidence that can be used to match the surviving Redmayne pages with the exact details of the raids on his press.)

Comparison between the Redmayne pages and the Cunradus pages reveals a number of systematic differences between them. The setting of commas differs, with Cunradus generally using the French method (with a thin space between comma and preceding word) and Redmayne the English (no space at all).[192] Many names printed in roman in the Head are given in italic in the Bear: there are roughly 400 instances of such changes, and they occur exclusively on pages printed by Redmayne. Where names in the Head are printed with a capital followed by small capitals, the Bear in some cases prints the whole name in capitals: this change, again, is made only on Redmayne pages. A systematic substitution of round brackets for square ones occurs in two quires (Ff and Gg); these were both printed by Redmayne. Apostrophes are introduced in just a few places: the sheet Hh2,3, and the quires Zz and Bbb: these too are all printed by Redmayne. The rate at which the Head's punctuation is altered in the Bear varies widely: the two most heavily altered quires are Hh and Zz, which are both by Redmayne, and the ones showing almost no changes are K, M, P, S, U, Ll, and Qq, all of which are by Cunradus.[193]

[191] I am very grateful to Nicholas Smith for this suggestion.

As these last details indicate, Redmayne's compositors showed much more confidence in making small changes to the presentation of the text. This is particularly noticeable where orthography is concerned. Although the compositors of the Head had converted some old spellings into new when setting from the manuscript, they had left many old spellings unchanged; these were often changed into new spellings by Redmayne's compositors. Such changes involved not just a few standard transformations (such as dropping a final '-e', or reducing a final '-all' to '-al'), but a whole gamut of minor adjustments, which demonstrate that these compositors were entirely at home in the English language: thus they changed 'despoyle' to 'despoil', 'beleeve' to 'believe', 'chayre' to 'chair', 'antient' to 'ancient', 'further' to 'farther', 'powre' to 'power', and so on. Such changes occur on all the pages printed by Redmayne. The contrast here with the pages printed by Cunradus is very striking: while G1r (a Redmayne page) has 30 cases of modernization, for example, G2r (a Cunradus page) has none whatsoever. Generally, the Cunradus compositors reproduce all the old spellings they find: 'ayde', 'enemyes', 'bruit', 'Atteynder', 'bin' (for 'been'), 'tyding', 'Souldier', 'strengthned', 'controwl', etc. Often, where the Head goes through a sequence of variant spellings, the Cunradus compositors reproduce the sequence exactly: thus on P4v we have 'Heyr . . . Heyre . . . Heire', and on R2v we find 'Counsellers' in a marginal note, alongside 'Counsellor . . . Councell . . . Counsel'.

At first sight, it looks as if the Dutch compositors have not grasped any of the principles on which these alternating word-forms operate. However, in some cases a move is made by them in the opposite direction, changing the Head's new-spelling forms into old-spelling ones; this becomes quite frequent in the quires Nn–Rr, a run of 40 pages in which 'he' is changed 31 times to 'hee', and 'be' 37 times to 'bee'.[194] Many lines in the Head edition are quite loosely set, with generous spacing between the words; it seems that the Dutch compositors felt ill at ease with these large spaces, preferring a tighter line. One device they used to fill space was the tailed letter (a letter ending in a long trailing horizontal). The normal use of such a piece of type was at the end of the last word in a paragraph, for decorative effect; but here, on some of the Cunradus pages, we find it used to take up space in the middle of a line.[195] More importantly, the Dutch compositors were evidently aware that many English words existed in two forms, without and with a final '-e', and made use of this second alternative to place a little more type in the line. For it is noticeable both that the changes to old spelling on the Cunradus pages consist overwhelmingly of this one kind of alteration and that they occur in lines that had room to spare. This indicates a much more mechanical process than the one taking place in the case of the Redmayne compositors, who evidently had an all-encompassing alternative English orthography in their minds. That the process was mechanical is suggested also by the fact that the Cunradus compositors produced words such as 'approache' (Nn3v), 'Preache', 'Teache' (O02r), 'Preacheing', 'Teacheing' (Pp2v), 'sortes', and 'afterwardes' (Qq1r), which go beyond the register of old spelling that is present in the Head: possibly they were applying a rule without any clear sense of its limits.[196]

[192] See Malcolm, 'Making of the Bear', p. 24.
[193] See Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 150–51, 178.

It must be doubted whether the Dutch compositors had more than the most rudimentary knowledge of English.[197] The greater frequency of misprints on their pages, compared with proof-corrected Redmayne pages, tends to confirm this: corrected Redmayne pages typically have between zero and one misprint per forme, while Cunradus formes (which all seem to have been proof-corrected) range between zero and ten, with most between one

[194] See ibid., pp. 148–9.

[195] See, e.g., sigs. Y3v, Aa3v, Bb3v, Ll2r, Mm3r, Nn2v, Nn3r, Pp1r, Qq3v.

[196] Of course these forms were within the range of possible English spellings, having been common in the 16th century and having lingered on (especially in handwriting) thereafter. But it cannot be said that these pages were set by someone with an overall fluency in any particular version of English orthography, 16th-century included. Possibly the printing of 'Israell' for 'Israel' (Ll2r) also represents an ignorantly mechanical application of the rule concerning an additional '-l'. Cf. also the frequent alteration of 'writing' to 'writting': this phenomenon (including 'writer' to 'writter') occurs 7 times on Cunradus pages (O1v (twice), P2v, Q4v, U4r, Cc4r (twice)).

[197] Even Willem Sewel's A New Dictionary English and Dutch (1691)—printed in Amsterdam for a specialist in English-language materials—included an apology to the readers (sect. 2, p. 431) for the number of misprints it contained, 'because the Workmen, not understanding the English, have not used that carefulness which was requisite in such a Work as this'. Note also that, according to an early 17th-century guide for printing-house correctors, most compositors who set Latin and Greek did not actually know those languages: Hornschuch, Orthotypographia, pp. 26–7.

and five.[198] (That some Redmayne pages were not proof-corrected at all, and therefore have a large number of misprints, will be discussed below.) Cunradus's compositors even produced a glaring misprint, 'ANDREW CKOOKE', on the title page. Their errors are of interest for qualitative as well as quantitative reasons. Some strongly suggest the influence of the Dutch language: for example, 'Engeland' (which is the Dutch for 'England'); 'kome' (cf. Dutch 'komen'); 'RICHT' (cf. Dutch 'richten', 'richter'); 'speack' and 'breack' (where diphthong + '-ck' is a common formation in seventeenth-century Dutch); and 'houw' and 'unlauwfull' (where 'ouw' and 'auw' are also frequent combinations). And where the English of the Head edition has ' 'tis ', the Cunradus pages thrice insert a space between the 't' and the 'i', thus turning ' 't ' into a free-standing element—something which is to be found very frequently in Dutch (as a shortened version of the definite article 'het'), but not at all in English.[199]

The treatment of errors in the Head edition also presents a contrast between the English and Dutch compositors. Redmayne's men corrected most of the ones they found, reproducing just six in their 181 pages; Cunradus's compositors reproduced 20 such errors in 210 pages, including eleven cases of utterly non-viable English words such as 'privedge' (D1v, for 'priviledge'), 'Magnamity' (Y1v), 'aith' (Cc1r, for 'Faith'), and 'Cantroversise' (N1r, copying 'Controversise', an error for 'Controversies', and adding a further mistake).[200] Where the errors listed and corrected in the Head's Errata are concerned, it seems that no definite policy was applied; the Errata-list was reprinted in the Bear, but the compositors were not apparently instructed to preserve all those errors unchanged in the text. Redmayne's typesetters corrected the two glaring errors that were present on their pages; Cunradus's men had fifteen glaring errors in theirs, of which they corrected four, tried to correct one but got it wrong, and left ten uncorrected. The four successful corrections are: on L1r, 'signified' for 'signied'; O2v, 'is decided' for 'in decided'; Mm4r, 'heaven' for 'haven'; Pp3v, 'to lay his Hands' for 'to ay his Hands'. (The unsuccessful one is on Mm4v, where the Head has 'enter inter into', the Errata-list requires 'enter into', but Cunradus has 'inter into'.)[201] This suggests that some knowledge of English was applied in the Cunradus printing-house, but that its application was neither reliable nor systematic.

[198] See Malcolm, 'Making of the Bear', pp. 13–14.

[199] For these and further examples see ibid., pp. 15–16.

[200] See ibid., p. 16, where three puzzling errors left in Redmayne pages are also mentioned.

[201] It seems very possible that no reference was made to the Errata-list when these corrections were made. Had any conscious policy been adopted concerning that list, the copy of the Head from which Cunradus was working would presumably have contained either systematic corrections or a systematic set of 'stet' instructions; but the evidence does not support either of these scenarios.

And the level of linguistic skill required here was not in fact very high: the correct forms 'signified', 'heaven', and 'to lay his [or 'their'] Hands' all occurred in the immediate contexts of those misprints.

There are many signs that Redmayne's compositors did automatically correct the text, or at least make changes that would have seemed to them like improvements. Often these changes were in tiny matters where, for a native English speaker, little conscious decision-making need have been involved. Thus we have the less common negative forms 'unsufficient' and 'injust' replaced by the more common 'insufficient' and 'unjust' (Q2r, T2v); the unhyphenated 'self love' changed to 'self-love' (T2v); and 'not one title of the Law of Nature' changed to the more Biblical 'not one tittle . . .' (T3v). Attempted improvements include, for example, 'all manner of sins' instead of 'all manner of sin' (Yy1v). In some cases the change is not a positive improvement, merely a small amplification or substitution (not harming the sense) of a kind that could be made more or less unthinkingly by someone at home in the English language: 'their Children' for 'the Children' (S1r), 'not yet' for 'not' (Ee4r), 'or any other' for 'or one other' (M4r), 'him' for 'himself' (Kk3r), 'would' for 'should' (Kk3v), 'consisteth' for 'consisted' (Ddd3v), and so on. But in 20 cases the Redmayne compositors made erroneous substitutions, replacing one word with another which, although a genuine English word, does not fit the sense. Just one of these could be explained by a random omission of a letter ('were' instead of 'where', Gg2r); in almost all the other cases, the misprint was clearly caused by varying combinations of visual error and mental interference from other vocabulary: thus 'difficult' instead of 'different' (H2v), 'meditation' for 'mediation' (Gg2v), and 'slumber' for 'slaunder' (Gg3v). Here too, the character of these changes indicates workmen fully at home in the English language.

The Cunradus pages do also contain some corrections and improvements—though significantly fewer than in the Redmayne pages. The Head's misprint 'unfegined' is corrected to 'unfeigned' (Mm2r); 'tyth' is replaced by 'tenth' in a Biblical quotation (O4r), where 'tenth' is the word used in the Authorized Version; 'Lieutenant to God' is changed to 'Lieutenant of God' (Ll3v), which reads more naturally; the phrase 'whatsoever a Subject . . . is compelled to in obedience to his Soveraign' becomes 'whatsoever a Subject is compelled to doe in obedience to his Soveraign' (Mm2r); and similarly 'Servants are obliged . . . to what is commanded them' becomes 'Servants are obliged . . . to doe what is commanded them' (Oo4r).[202]

[202] For instances of some other Cunradus alterations which, although viable, do not seem significant, see Malcolm, 'Making of the Bear', pp. 20–21. The two cases here involving 'to doe' are somewhat contrasting: in the former, the text seems to call for it (the following phrase has 'and doth it not'); in the

Were these improvements made at the initiative of Cunradus's compositors, or of someone present in his printing-house? Although the other evidence makes it seem doubtful that any fully competent English-speaker was used by the Dutch printer on a systematic basis, it is not impossible that some such person gave his services, albeit very intermittently. Another possibility which should be considered is that the copy of the Head used by Cunradus contained some hand-written corrections. Striking support for this theory can be found in the case of one of the corrections just mentioned: the insertion of 'to doe' on sig. Mm2r. On this page, as on many others, the Cunradus compositor was copying the Head not just page by page, but line by line. The lineation on this page was exactly reproduced for 33 lines, until one line above the line containing the inserted 'to doe'. That prior line was then set more tightly, so that instead of copying the Head and terminating with 'Sub-' (breaking the word 'Subject' over the line-ending), it was able to end with the entire word 'Subject', thus providing the extra space in the next line for the insertion of 'to doe'. This strongly suggests that the insertion was a problem which the compositor had seen coming—in other words, that it was marked in writing in his copy. That some such written instructions were also present in the copy used by Redmayne is suggested by an unsuccessful correction in one of his pages. In the Head, where Hobbes refers to the seventy Elders of Israel under Moses, the text should have read 'and these were all of Moses his election', but was printed as 'and these were of all Moses his election' (Kk2r). In the Bear, this page (printed by Redmayne) has 'and these were Moses of all his election'. Here it seems that a transposition mark, which was meant to indicate the switching of 'of' and 'all', was erroneously taken as transposing 'of all' and 'Moses'.[203] It thus seems possible that some of the substantive corrections in the Redmayne pages, mentioned above, may have been made on the basis of written instructions in the copy—though the tiny variations made by Redmayne's compositors are much less likely to have had such an origin. However, it must still be doubted whether such small verbal changes, even if written in the margin of the copy, originated from Hobbes himself; while it is easy to understand his desire to introduce the major changes relating to doctrinal matters, it is a little difficult to believe that the elderly author—who was by the late 1660s badly afflicted with the 'shaking palsy'—would have descended to this level latter, 'obliged . . . to what is commanded them' is followed by 'bound . . . to no more than that they have undertaken', so that adding 'to doe' disrupts the symmetry of the passage.

[203] It might alternatively be supposed that the transposition mark was a proof-reader's mark, made in the Redmayne printing-house. However, as we shall see, the outer forme of Kk2,3 appears to be one of the formes that were not proof-read at all.

of detail. Also open to doubt is the assumption that there was a single annotated copy of the Head, used by both Redmayne and Cunradus. These issues raise problems for a modern editor of the text, who needs to decide which variants should be treated as authorial. The policy adopted in the present edition is discussed in Chapter 3 of the Textual Introduction, below.[204]

One other aspect of the Redmayne compositors' work deserves special attention: the way in which the pattern of misprints correlates with the evidence of the skeleton formes. Mention has already been made of the skeleton formes in the Head edition, which indicate a regular system of production by compositors using a maximum of four formes at any one time. But when we turn to the skeleton formes in the Bear, we find a more unusual pattern. Once again, there is a decisive difference between the Redmayne pages and the Cunradus pages; but, even more significantly, there are developments within the Redmayne pages which, if combined with the evidence of the misprints, can shine more light on the story of what happened in Redmayne's printing-house.

The difference between the Redmayne and Cunradus sheets is that Redmayne used skeleton formes and Cunradus did not. Instead, Cunradus retained the headings of pages, but often transferred them, using the composing-stick, to new positions, so that when a heading was next used it was often paired with a different heading over the other page in that forme. Thus in Part 3 of Leviathan, the same heading for a right-hand page is used on Nn1r and Nn3r, but the headings of the corresponding left-hand pages (Nn4v and Nn2v) are quite different; one of those left-hand pages, Nn4v, has the same heading as Mm3v, but the right-hand pages corresponding to those two pages (Nn1r and Mm2r) are not the same. In Part 2 of Leviathan, where the wording of the heading is the same on both left-hand and right-hand pages ('Of COMMON-WEALTH'), we even find the same heading being used once on a left-hand page (U3v) and once on a right-hand page (Z2r), the only change being the necessary switching of the page number. This evidence cannot be interpreted with much confidence, but what it seems to suggest is a busy printing-house in which the number of physical formes (that is, the actual frames) was limited, and where the printing of sheets of Leviathan was a low-priority job, not carried through on a systematic basis but fitted in from time to time when the schedules of other jobs permitted.

Redmayne, on the other hand, did use skeleton formes, and the pattern of their use in the surviving Redmayne pages, when combined with the tally of misprints, is highly suggestive. It is given here in tabulated form.

[204] See pp. 315–16.

Misprints and skeleton formes in the Bear edition

Forme		Misprints	Skeleton	Comments
Part 1
B	1,4 outer	0	a
	1,4 inner	1	a
	2,3 outer	0	a
	2,3 inner	0	a
C	1,4 outer	4	a
	1,4 inner	0	a
	2,3 outer	4	a
	2,3 inner	3	a
F	2,3 outer	10	b	type similar to Part 3 headlines (skeleton 'g')
	2,3 inner	9	b
G	1,4 outer	1	a
	1,4 inner	0	a
H	2,3 outer	0	a
	2,3 inner	1	a
I	1,4 outer	0	a
	1,4 inner	0	a
M	1,4 outer (1r)	0	a
Part 2
M	1,4 outer (4v)	0	c
	1,4 inner	1	c
	2,3 outer	0	c
	2,3 inner	0	c
Q	2,3 outer	1	c
	2,3 inner	0	c
S	1,4 outer	1	c	wandering type: all S formes printed together
	1,4 inner	0	c
	2,3 outer	1	c
	2,3 inner	1	c
T	1,4 outer	0	c	wandering type: all T formes printed together
	1,4 inner	0	c
	2,3 outer	0	c
	2,3 inner	2	c
Part 3
Ee	1,4 outer	3	d
	1,4 inner	2	e
	2,3 outer	1	(rogue)
	2,3 inner	7	(Part 4)	headings from 'i' in Part 4 (Aaa 2,3 outer)
Ff	1,4 outer	5	e
	1,4 inner	2	d
	2,3 outer	4	e
	2,3 inner	4	d

Forme		Misprints	Skeleton	Comments
Gg	1,4 outer	6	e
	1,4 inner	4	e
	2,3 outer	7	e
	2,3 inner	13	d
Hh	1,4 outer	4	e
	1,4 inner	13	d
	2,3 outer	14	f	1st use of 'f'
	2,3 inner	3	d
Ii	1,4 outer	8	f	4th use of 'f'
	1,4 inner	11	g
	2,3 outer	7	f
	2,3 inner	9	f
Kk	2,3 outer	15	f	2nd use of 'f'
	2,3 inner	8	f	3rd use of 'f'
Ss	1,4 outer	7	g
	1,4 inner	0	f
	2,3 outer	8	f
	2,3 inner	5	g
Tt	1,4 outer	3	f	4v blank
	1,4 inner	12	g
	2,3 outer	7	f
	2,3 inner	8	g
Part 4
Vv	1,4 outer	2	h
	1,4 inner	0	h
	2,3 outer	1	h
	2,3 inner	4	h
Xx	1,4 outer	3	h
	1,4 inner	0	h
	2,3 outer	1	h
	2,3 inner	8	h
Yy	1,4 outer	7	i
	1,4 inner	4	j
	2,3 outer	5	i
	2,3 inner	14	i
Zz	1,4 outer	1	h
	1,4 inner	7	h
	2,3 outer	0	k
	2,3 inner	1	k
Aaa	1,4 outer	15	i
	1,4 inner	10	j
	2,3 outer	15	i
	2,3 inner	9	j
Bbb	1,4 outer	1	h
	1,4 inner	1	h

Misprints and skeleton formes in the Bear edition (cont.)

Forme		Misprints	Skeleton	Comments
	2,3 outer	2	h
	2,3 inner	3	h
Ccc	1,4 outer	8	(?)	1r anomalous spacing; 4v blank
	1,4 inner	9	h
	2,3 outer	25	i
	2,3 inner	19	i
Rev., & Concl.
Ddd	1,4 outer	3	l (adapted)	1r blank; r–h heading joins l–h on 4v
	1,4 inner	6	l
	2,3 outer	3	l
	2,3 inner	1	l

The clearest thing to emerge from this pattern is that some parts of the book were printed with just one forme; and it also seems likely, in view of the small quantity of misprints they contain, that those sheets did undergo proof-correction. This applies to all the sheets in Part 1 with the exception of the sheet F 2,3 (which will be discussed below), to all the sheets in Part 2, to some quires in Part 4 (Vv, Xx, and Bbb), and possibly to the 'Review, and Conclusion' (Ddd). The printing of these sheets was, it would appear, a steady but rather unhurried process: a single forme would have required the services of one or at most two compositors, and time was also available for proof-checking. An efficient pattern of work might perhaps have involved two compositors working in tandem, one on Part 1 (for example) and the other on Part 2, so that while one forme was being printed, the other was being distributed and reset.

During the setting of Part 3, however, the pattern of work seems to have changed. For quires Ee, Ff, and Gg, two skeleton formes were used (with the exception of the sheet Ee 2,3, which will be discussed below). For the outer forme of Hh 2,3 a third skeleton forme was introduced, which then jumped ahead to Kk, before returning to Ii, where it was joined by a fourth.[205] These last two skeletons were also used in the two later quires of Part 3. And in [205] The order of the first 4 uses of this skeleton, given in the 'comments' in the table, is established as follows: the 1st use has both the misprint 'CONMONWEALTH' and an ink-clot on the 'M' in the r-h heading, and 'Part. 3,' (with an erroneous comma) in the l-h heading; the 2nd corrects the 'N' but keeps the ink-clot and the '3,'; thereafter the 3rd and 4th correct the '3,' and have diminishing versions of the ink-clot. These two corrections are not at variance with the evidence that the text on the page was not corrected. It would seem that, at this stage, even though some errors were noticed as the pages were printed, the pressure of time did not permit the halting of the printing process, with the result that the errors in the skeleton were the only ones for which the opportunity for correction could arise, when it was prepared for reuse.

Part 4, those quires that were not made with a single skeleton were produced using three other skeletons. In all of these cases, the level of misprints is significantly higher; while the single-skeleton quires never have more than thirteen errors per quire, and mostly have fewer than seven (with four quires containing three misprints or fewer), the number of errors in the multiple-skeleton quires is mostly higher than fifteen, in some cases reaching 30 (Gg, Tt, and Yy), 34 (Hh), 35 (Ii), 49 (Aaa), and even 61 (Ccc).[206] It thus seems that most or all of the multiple-skeleton quires were printed in an entirely uncorrected state—which also suggests that the process had become subject to considerable haste.

As we have seen, Redmayne underwent two raids, eight days apart. He might well have started to accelerate his production some time before the first raid; but, if he had not speeded up by then, he must surely have done so immediately thereafter, when he would have known that it was only a matter of time before the Company tried to put a complete halt to his printing of the book. The pattern of skeleton formes and misprints here does suggest that Redmayne shifted from using one of his presses to using both of them, putting more compositors to work and telling them to dispense with proof-correction. Indeed, there are some further details here which may represent more specific evidence of the first raid. On that occasion two sheets were seized, which means that, if Redmayne was still seriously intending to complete the book, those two sheets would have had to be hurriedly reprinted during the following eight days. And it so happens that there are two anomalous sheets in the first and third parts of the book, which show special signs of haste and also appear to have been composed during or after the printing of some much later sheets. In Part 1, sheet F 2,3 not only contains nineteen misprints but also makes use of a skeleton which appears nowhere else in the surviving Redmayne sheets of that part; it contains distinctive type (a swash capital 'P' in the word 'Part', and large capitals in 'MAN') which resembles the type used much later in the book, in skeleton 'g'. In Part 3, sheet Ee 2,3 is even more anomalous: the outer forme has a made-up skeleton which corresponds to nothing else in the book (and may have been made up rather hastily: the italic word 'Part' on Ee2r has a roman 't', and the 'Chap. 35' on Ee3v lacks a full point after the numeral), while the inner forme, extraordinarily, has headings taken from Part 4 ('OF THE KINGDOM', 'OF DARKNESS'), which can be identified with the ones used in skeleton 'i' in the outer forme of Aaa 2,3. The quantity of misprints in this sheet (eight) is not so great, but the failure to spot the glaring error in the headings does suggest that in this case too there was no correction of initial proofs.

[206] These include many very glaring errors: e.g., on sig. Ccc3v, 'Lieutenat', 'inwrda', 'Satet' (for 'State'), 'Obedince', 'notu nfitly', 'preceive', 'Doemons', 'Ecclisiastiques', 'Univresall', 'Curches', 'Exocismes', 'liekwise', 'Chidren', 'Clergy: are' (for 'Clergy, are'), and 'receved'.

Precise and definite conclusions cannot be drawn from this sort of evidence, for more than one reason. As McKenzie has emphasized, 'there is no relationship of an easily statable kind between compositors, skeleton-formes, and press-crews.'[207] And it cannot be assumed that a printer producing a page-by-page reprint would work sequentially through the entire book; the similarity in modus operandi between at least some quires of Part 4 here and those in Parts 1 and 2 suggests that Redmayne may have started work on Part 4 before he turned to Part 3. (On the other hand, it is very unlikely that his work was so non-sequential that he would have printed odd halves of quires in isolation. In two quires here, S and T, the wandering pattern of vertical displacement of a letter or a full point in the heading shows that the entire quire was printed together.) As has already been suggested, the salvaging of sheets by Redmayne after the raid might have been a rather messy business, in which some sheets were recovered only in reduced quantities which could not be used for the future edition. We do not know whether he was telling the truth when he said that the 38 sheets taken on the second occasion were the 'residue' of the printing; and since we cannot be sure how many sheets Redmayne had printed, there is no way now of making a precise correlation between the sheets printed by Cunradus and the ones confiscated from Redmayne's printing-house. Nevertheless, the anomalous nature of the sheets F 2,3 and Ee 2,3 does seem consistent with the idea that two sheets were hastily reprinted at a late stage; and the overall pattern here, with its apparent shift towards the use of more compositors and the abandonment of proof-correction, does suggest a speeding-up of the printing process that is entirely consistent with the scenario put forward above.

It can thus be concluded that the Bear edition was printed in two phases, first by Redmayne in 1670 and then by Cunradus at some time before the end of 1678. Some documentary evidence helps to fill in the story of when the completion of the printing was organized—and by whom. After the death of Andrew Crooke in 1674, his widow, Elizabeth, found that she had many debts to settle. One way of raising money was to sell the copyrights he had owned. The following entry appears in the minutes of the Court of the Stationers' Company for 22 February [/4 March] 1675: 'Vpon the reading of an Assignm^{t} made by M^{rs} Crook to M^{r} Wright & alsoe of a Catalogue of severall bookes thereunto annexed It is ordered that Hobbes Leviathan be not entred.'[208] John Wright was a well-established bookseller (active since the 1630s) whose name has already featured briefly in this account: he was the 'Mr. Write' who obtained copies of a seized book and 'sold them publickly in his shop'.[209] The refusal of the Company to allow this particular transaction to be recorded in its Register did not invalidate the sale of the copyright, however; while such registration provided some extra safeguard in cases of disputed rights or pirated printings, any transfers of rights could be defended in the civil courts, and many were not registered with the Company. As we shall see, there are good reasons for thinking that the copyright of Leviathan was sold to Wright. This attempted assignment of Leviathan to John Wright in February 1675 can be taken to imply that the printing, by that stage, had not yet been completed: if Mrs Crooke had possessed finished copies of such a money-spinner at that time, she would surely have gone ahead and dealt in them, instead of passing away her rights. The conjunction—which may not have been coincidental—of this sale with the return (completed by February 1675) of the confiscated sheets of the 1670 printing to one of the people involved in commissioning it forms the natural starting-point for the process of completing the printing of the Bear, which must have taken place, therefore, within the period 1675–8.

[207] McKenzie, Making Meaning, p. 99.
[208] SC, Court Book D, fo. 242r (reel 56).

Further evidence allows us to fill in more detail about the history of the copyright of the text after February 1675. In the eighteenth century, London booksellers used specialist auctions (to which only publishing and wholesaling booksellers were admitted) to trade in their copyrights of books; often the rights so traded were small fractions of the copyright, as the original right had been divided more than once by partnership, inheritance, or sale.[210] Surviving catalogues of these auctions reveal that shares in the copyright of Leviathan were traded in this way. In April 1738 an auction was held of copyrights owned by the late Benjamin Sprint. One lot consisted of a group of copyrights that had previously been owned by Thomas Basset; Leviathan was included in this group. Sprint's share was one-eighth of Basset's holding, and Basset's holding, in the case of Leviathan, had been one-quarter of the copyright.[211] In January of the following year, a sale of copyrights owned by John Walthoe included a lot consisting of seven titles, one of which was Leviathan; the lot was described as 'one Ninth of Mr Chiswell's Share', but the fraction owned by Chiswell was not specified.[212] In February 1740 an

[209] See above, p. 235. On Wright see Plomer, Dictionary, 1641–1667, p. 198, and his Dictionary, 1668–1725, p. 321.

[210] On these trading practices see Belanger, 'Booksellers' Sales of Copyright', and Mandelbrote, 'Richard Bentley's Copies', pp. 55–94.

[211] Bodl., John Johnson collection, Ward trade catalogues [hereafter: 'Ward trade catalogues'], no. 65 (ESTC T 129911), Anon., The Following Copies and Parts of Copies of the Late Mr Benjamin Sprint. . . (London, 1738), p. 4, lot 85.

[212] Ward trade catalogues, no. 71 (ESTC T 212352), Anon., A Catalogue of Books in Quires, and Copies, auction of the copyrights of the late George Conyers also included Leviathan in the listing of a multiple lot: as in the Sprint sale, Conyers's share was one-eighth of the share in the copyright 'formerly belonging to Mr. Thomas Basset', and Basset's share was stated to have been one-quarter.[213] In November of that year a sale of copyrights owned by the late Ranew Robinson included a multiple lot of 'Shares of Copies formerly belonging to Mr Richard Chiswell'; Robinson had owned one-ninth of Chiswell's share, and Chiswell's share of Leviathan was specified as one-quarter.[214] Those are the only surviving catalogues that refer explicitly to Leviathan, but a comment in the description of the lot in the Conyers sale makes it possible to identify a fifth auction that included a share, or shares, of Leviathan: 'N.B. This Lot of Copies sold in one of the Sales of the late Mr. Nicholson's Copies, for Forty One Pounds.' This refers to an auction, in April 1718, of copyrights owned by the late John Nicholson, in which one lot was described as 'All the Copies formerly belonging to Mr. Tho. Basset, deceas'd . . . of which the late Mr. John Nicholson's Share is One Eighth'; the lot gave a list of 22 titles (similar but not identical to the list in the Conyers sale), and ended with the words, 'Besides all his other Parts and Shares of Copies . . . too numerous to be here inserted.' In one surviving copy of the auction catalogue, a manuscript annotation records that this lot was sold to Mr (Robert) Knaplock for £41.[215] And it also seems likely that Nicholson had owned one of the fractions of Chiswell's share in Leviathan: another lot in the same auction consisted of his one-ninth portion of Chiswell shares, and the list of 59 titles which followed (not including Leviathan) ended with the words, 'Besides his Share of all Mr. Chiswell's other Parts and Shares of Copies undisposed of, too numerous to be here inserted.'[216]

If the last two presumed sales of shares of Leviathan are included, this yields a total of six such fractions of the copyright in that work. Nicholson, Sprint, and Conyers had each held a one-eighth share of Basset's one-quarter share; and Nicholson, Walthoe, and Robinson had each owned a one-ninth share of Chiswell's portion, which was also described (in the Robinson sale) as a one-quarter share. The significance of this evidence is not only that it demonstrates that the copyright was a valued asset which had undergone a continuous process of ownership and transmission; it also being the Remaining Part of the Stock of Mr Walthoe, Senior (London, 1739), p. 3, lot 4.

[213] Ward trade catalogues, no. 78 (ESTC T 129918), Anon., A Catalogue of the Copies and Remaining Part of the Quire-Stock of Mr George Conyers, Deceas'd (London, 1740), p. 3, lot 41.

[214] Ward trade catalogues, no. 82 (ESTC T 129921), Anon., A Catalogue of the Remainder of the Quire-Stock; and also of the Copies belonging to the late Ranew Robinson (London, 1740), p. 3.

[215] Ward trade catalogues, no. 1 (ESTC T 129884), Anon., At the Queen's Head Tavern . . . The Following Lists of Copies belonging to the late Mr. John Nicholson. . . (London, 1718), p. 6, lot 5.

[216] Ibid., pp. 8–9, lot 7.

shows that the copyright of Leviathan had been divided, at an early stage, into four shares, and it gives us the names of two of their owners. 'At an early stage' here almost certainly means at the time when the Bear edition was being prepared—that is, in or not long after 1675. Richard Chiswell, as we have seen, actually included Leviathan in lists of new books for sale at his shop in 1680 and 1682; this fact accords perfectly with the evidence of copyright ownership, since, as the owner of a quarter-share in the copyright, he would have had one-quarter of the stock to sell.[217] Chiswell acted quite often as a co-publisher with John Wright, and so too did Thomas Basset, another prominent bookseller of the 1670s and 1680s. In January 1678, for example, Basset and Wright jointly entered the copyright of Adam Littleton's Linguae latinae liber dictionarius quadripartitus in the Stationers' Company register, and later that year the work was published with the names of Basset, Wright, and Chiswell on its title page.[218] The names of three owners of the quarter-shares in Leviathan can thus be stated with confidence.

For the fourth name, there are several possible candidates; in the period 1673–82 we find Basset, Wright, and Chiswell co-publishing with Thomas Dawks (one book), Samuel Heyrick (one book), Thomas Newcomb (one book), and George Sawbridge (two books).[219] But their most frequent collaborator, by a very wide margin, was Robert Scott: between 1672 and 1684 Basset, Wright, Chiswell, and Scott jointly issued no fewer than seventeen titles, in 24 editions.[220] Their collaboration was most intensive in the years 1675–80, when sixteen of those editions appeared. There is also some evidence to suggest that when John Wright purchased his group of copyrights from Andrew Crooke's widow in 1675, he arranged to share many or most of them with Basset, Chiswell, and Scott. No original list of this group survives (it seems that Wright and Mrs Crooke decided in the end not to have the transaction entered at all in the Company's Register), but an investigation of the earlier printing history of the seventeen titles published jointly by Basset, Wright, Chiswell, and Scott shows that seven of them had previously been Andrew Crooke publications, six of which had probably been acquired [218] Eyre, ed., Transcript, iii, p. 55.

[217] See above, p. 229.

[219] Respectively: Royal College of Physicians, Pharmacopoeia [English] (1682); A. Colquitt, Modern Reports (1682); Royal College of Physicians, Pharmacopoeia [Latin] (1677); N. Wanley, Wonders (1673), and E. Coles, Dictionary (1679).

[220] M. Cervantes, Don Quixote (1672); Cicero, Orationum (1675, 1679); W. Schickard, Horologium (1675); W. C., Decimarum (1676, 1683); R. Hooker, Works (1676, 1682); Sir Thomas Herbert, Travels (1677); Lucian, Dialogorum (1677, 1685); Sir John Mandeville, Voyages (1677); Ovid, Metamorphoseon (1677); Vergil, Opera (1677); Sir Thomas Browne, Religio medici (1678, 1682); H. Finch, Exact Accompt (1679); R. Johnson, Famous History (1680 (×3)); R. S., Counter-Scuffle (1680); W. Basse, Help (1682); C. Butler, Rhetoricae (1684); J. Norden, Poor Man's Rest (1684).

after Crooke's death.[221] This, then, is a pattern of transmission into which Hobbes's Leviathan very neatly fits. The main reason for dividing the copyright among a group of booksellers was to share the costs of production; the procedure also lowered exposure to risk, expanded the network of distribution, and—a consideration, perhaps, in the case of the rights to Leviathan, which could not easily have been defended in court—reduced the danger of pirated editions, as a potential pirate would be unwilling to antagonize several prominent booksellers at one stroke. And where the peculiar problem posed by Leviathan was concerned, namely, the need to complete the surviving rump of the 1670 edition, the services of Robert Scott could have been particularly useful: specializing in the importation of Continental books, he had many contacts abroad and travelled frequently across the Channel and the North Sea.[222] In 1672 he had a French translation of Gumble's life of General Monck printed for him (with the imprint 'A Londres, chez Robert Scot') by Joan Blaeu in Amsterdam; and in 1676 he and Blaeu's son prepared an ambitious scheme for an edition of the collected works of John Selden.[223] It is highly likely, therefore, that Robert Scott was the person who arranged the completion of the Bear edition with Christoffel Cunradus. As an habitué of the Dutch printing scene, he probably knew that Cunradus had developed a reputation, from the late 1650s onwards, as a printer of works by heterodox religious writers of many kinds, including Quakers, Socinians, Collegiants, and Behmenists; indeed, Cunradus holds the unusual distinction of having printed both Hobbes's Leviathan (in part, at least) and Spinoza's Tractatus theologico-politicus.[224]

One final problem remains, however, concerning the printing of the Bear edition. What was the reason for using the 'bear' ornament on the printed title page? Was this choice made merely on a whim by Cunradus, or was there some deliberate policy at work? On the face of it, the fact that the original 1651 publication details were reprinted on the title page suggests that the edition was meant to be regarded, by unsuspecting purchasers, as an original printing; yet on the other hand the use of a very different ornament [221] One, the Cervantes, must have been bought from Crooke during his lifetime, as the Basset, Wright, Chiswell, and Scott edition appeared in 1672; but the others were all printed by them in the period 1676–80. They are listed here by the name of the author (see above, n. 220, for other details), and with the dates of their Andrew Crooke editions: Cervantes (1652); Hooker (1662, 1666); Herbert (1664, 1665); Lucian (1655, 1664, 1667); Mandeville (1657, 1670); Finch (1660 (×2)); Johnson (1660, 1670).

[222] On Scott see Plomer, Dictionary, 1668–1725, pp. 264–5; Rostenberg, 'Robert Scott'; Smolenaars, 'Scott'.

[223] Kleerkooper and van Stockum, De boekhandel, ii, pp. 1164 (n.), 1164–6; on the printing of Gumble see also Blaeu, Lettere ai fiorentini, p. 205.

[224] On Cunradus see the biographical details in Kleerkooper and van Stockum, De boekhandel, i, pp. 155–6; on his printing of works by heterodox writers see Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 374–9.

clearly signalled that it was no such thing. It is perhaps understandable that the original 'head' ornament was not used; had the authorities learned about this new printing and tried to find out who was responsible for it, the use of that ornament would have told them that there was a fairly close connection with the organizers of the original edition.[225]

Two points seem potentially relevant here: the fact that John Redmayne possessed a version of the 'bear' ornament, and the fact that it was otherwise much more commonly used in the Netherlands than in England. The origins of the design go back at least as far as the 1570s, when a larger ornament, including the 'bear' element, was in use. In this larger design (an extended oblong, sufficient to cover the width of a folio page), the bear is flanked by a dog on each side, with a huntsman standing behind it. An example of this bear-and-huntsmen ornament was present in England in 1579.[226] At some time before 1615, the bear was extracted and turned into a free-standing ornament, which became much more popular, as it was small enough to be used in quarto printings.[227] Many Dutch printers had versions of the 'bear' ornament; it is found, for example, in printings by van Colster (Leiden, 1615), Basson (Leiden, 1630), Maire (Leiden, 1640), Blaeu (Amsterdam, 1642), Smidt (Middelburg, 1659), Kuyper (Amsterdam, 1668), Noenart (Utrecht, 1671) and van Hoeve (Gouda, 1687)—as well as the printings by Cunradus already mentioned (Amsterdam, 1676–82).[228] In England, however, only one example of the 'bear' ornament is known. It appears in a book printed by Augustine Matthews in 1635, and in one printed for Nathaniel Butter in 1640; it was used in a work printed (probably by Roger Daniel and his son-in-law John Redmayne) for John Williams in 1655, and again in a work published probably by Williams in 1659, before being used in a minor Redmayne publication, a French-language pamphlet of 1660.[229]

By the 1660s, therefore, it seems that John Redmayne was the only possessor of a 'bear' ornament in England. And yet a close inspection of the details of these ornaments shows that the one used in the Bear edition was that owned by Cunradus, not the one used by Redmayne (nor, for that matter, [225] It must be admitted, though, that this argument would also apply to the use of the original plate for the engraved title page; but perhaps it would have been claimed that this had been sold, lost, or stolen.

[226] See Plomer, English Printers' Ornaments, p. 193, item 44.

[227] The outer parts of the original design were also reworked into a smaller oblong, with the bear omitted and the two dogs now facing each other nose to nose; this was sometimes combined with the bear ornament (placed below it as a pendant). For details see Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 366–7.

[228] This listing follows ibid., with the addition of Elichmann, Tabula Cebetis (Leiden: Maire, 1640), final page; van Limborch, De veritate (Gouda: van Hoeve, 1687), pp. 48, 354, 364.

[229] This listing follows Malcolm, Aspects, pp. 347, with the addition of Wither, Collection of Emblemes, (London: A. M. for H. Taunton, 1635), sig. O02r; Hamond, Paradox (London: for Nathaniel Butter, 1640), sig. F4r. One early English-language publication with a 'bear' ornament on its title page, Cartwright's Confutation of the Rhemists Translation (1618), was printed in Middelburg.

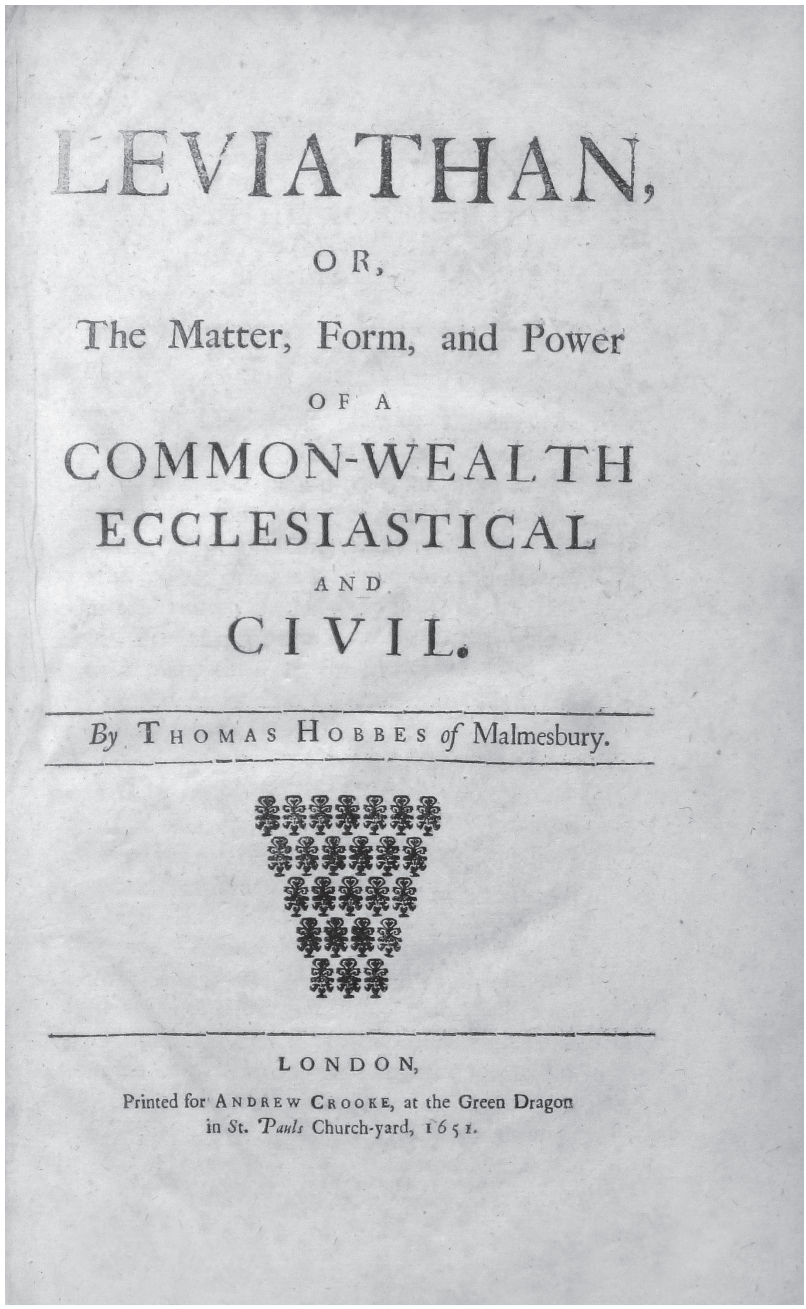
any of the others in circulation in the Netherlands). If this was not a coincidence, and if the 'bear' ornament was deliberately chosen for the title page, then one element of the explanation must presumably be that there was a plan to pass off the whole edition as a Dutch piracy. It is conceivable that some bear-ornamented title pages had already been printed by Redmayne (in accordance with that plan, as the chances of anyone identifying him as the printer by means of his French pamphlet were very remote), and that the initial idea was to ask Cunradus merely to imitate those pages to make up their number. (If so, that initial idea was entirely abandoned; no variant title pages are known.) Alternatively, the plan may have been that if the Redmayne–Cunradus edition sold out quickly, the use of this particular ornament would then have allowed Redmayne to make another edition thereafter, which could similarly be passed off as just a further quantity of the same Dutch printing. Given the state of the evidence, however, the full explanation may never be known with any certainty. While much can be established about the printing of the Bear edition, it seems that it has not yielded up every single one of its secrets.

The Ornaments Edition

For the construction of a critical edition of Leviathan, it should not be necessary to consider editions produced after Hobbes's death unless they incorporated authorial changes. In the case of the Ornaments edition, there are good prima facie reasons for supposing, on chronological grounds, that it can be disregarded. The data concerning early ownership inscriptions, presented above, show that the earliest known dated copy of this edition is from 1702. And the whole story of the Bear edition indicates that the printing of the Bear was begun in the final decade of Hobbes's life and completed within (at most) four years of his death; copies would surely have remained on sale until long after Hobbes was in his grave. Some investigation of the printing of the Ornaments edition seems nevertheless to be called for, first, because it has been claimed that this edition incorporated Hobbesian corrections, and secondly, because the dated inscriptions are only indicative evidence.[230] Since the edition presents itself as a 1651 printing, and since the question of the true date (and the identity of the printer) has been very little studied, it may be useful to offer some account of its printing history here.

[230] For the claim, see Rogers and Schuhmann, i, pp. 166–76.



LEVIATHAN,

OR,

The Matter, Form, and Power

OF A

COMMON-WEALTH

ECCLESIASTICAL

AND CIVIL.

By THOMAS HOBBES of Malmesbury.

LONDON,

Printed for ANDREW CROOKE, at the Green Dragon
in St. Pauls Church-yard, 1651.

FIGURE 9. Leviathan, Ornaments edition, printed title page

The Ornaments edition does indeed include quite a large number of small changes to the text: some correct misprints, and may have been made by the typesetters, while others involve corrections, improvements, or would-be improvements that may have been made by someone who had gone through the text with some care before the printing began. The text in question was a copy of the Bear edition, and this person clearly did not have access to, or knowledge of, the readings in the Head edition in cases where the two diverged. Sometimes the corrections made in the Ornaments were intelligently made, and happened to restore what was in the Head (or even, in a handful of cases, what is to be found in the fair-copy manuscript). But sometimes the corrector guessed badly. Commenting on the first emergence of philosophy among the ancient Greeks, Hobbes's words were—in the Head, which agrees also with the manuscript—'then began Seven men . . . to get the reputation of being Wise; some of them for Morall and Politique Sentences'; in the Bear this last word was misprinted as 'Sentence', and in the Ornaments that word was wrongly corrected to 'Science'.[231] And the phrase which was given in the Head and the Bear as 'the times, as they have along been in the Christian Church' was changed in the Ornaments not to '. . . as they have long been . . .' (the correct reading, as found in the manuscript), but to '. . . as they have all along been . . .'.[232] There are no changes here that would require us to believe that they had been derived from Hobbes himself.[233]

Where the date of the Ornaments edition is concerned, the ownership inscriptions provide a terminus ad quem of 1702. Some further guidance can perhaps be gained from the evidence of prices paid for Leviathan, as tabulated above. These data should of course be treated with some caution. At any auction, the presence of just two people who really want an item can produce an unusually high price, while the presence of no more than one who wants it can produce an unusually low one. There are other uncertainties here: more might be paid, for example, for a book in a superior binding. Nevertheless, the overall trends of these movements in prices may still have something to tell us. The high prices of second-hand copies of Leviathan in the period 1680–82 (when in some cases they appear to have been higher than the cost of a new Bear) suggest that a considerable pressure of demand had built up during the period, from the late 1660s to the late 1670s, when no new copies of the text could be obtained, and that, given the mostly under-the-counter nature of the sales of new Bears, it took quite a long time for the book-buying public to become aware that new copies were available.[234] By 1683, however, the price of a second-hand copy had settled somewhat, and the two figures for 1687, which are lower again, may indicate that a supply of new Bears was still available. (It is possible, nevertheless, that a more complete set of figures for this period might show some spike in prices between the summer of 1683 and at least the autumn of 1686. In July 1683, in the wake of the Rye House Plot, Oxford University issued an official condemnation of 'Certain Pernicious Books', including Leviathan, and held a well-publicized burning of them.[235] In two auctions during the subsequent few years, copies of Leviathan seem to have been withdrawn from sale, as a result of direct or indirect pressures from the authorities.)[236] The higher prices recorded here for the period 1690–93, on the other hand, may suggest that copies of the text had become harder to obtain; the high price of the Ailesbury copy in 1690 was no doubt due, at least in part, to the fact that it was a large-paper copy in a fine binding, but the other two items are also well above the 1687 level (though the 1694 item comes closer to it). It has already been suggested that the print run of the Bear edition may have been significantly smaller than that of the Head.[237] It is possible, then, that the supply of new Bears was exhausted by the end of the 1680s.

[231] See p. 1054. [232] See p. 1000.

[233] For a more detailed discussion of these issues, analysing the evidence put forward by Rogers and Schuhmann, see Malcolm, 'Making of the Ornaments', pp. 8–15.

When was the demand for copies of Leviathan first met by new copies of the Ornaments edition? On the face of it, the evidence of the prices supplies a clear answer to that question: in 1695, when the cost of a second-hand copy dropped by almost a quarter, from 12*s*. 0*d*. to 9*s*. 2*d*. By 1698 it had fallen even further, to 7*s*. 6*d*., and it then stabilized in the range 8*s*.–10*s*. (with one exception) for the next 40-odd years. 1695 is a significant date, because it was during that year that the old Licensing Act, with its system of pre-publication censorship, was finally allowed to expire. A new Bill, debated in Parliament in March and April 1695, proposed retaining pre-publication licensing for works in the fields of politics, religion, and law, and also provided for the prosecution of anyone who printed a work 'contrary to the Christian [234] I say 'mostly' under-the-counter, in view of Chiswell's advertisements of 1680 and 1682 (see above, at n. 124).

[235] See [Oxford University,] Judgment and Decree, esp. pp. 3–5. On the burning see Wood, Life and Times, iii, p. 63.

[236] [Millington,] Bibliotheca oweniana (BL, pressmark C.194.b.38), p. 26 (Leviathan, unsold). This sale was held on 26 May [/5 June] 1684. From this copy of the catalogue, annotated with prices and names of buyers, it is clear that only a very few items were unsold; they include several other works condemned in Oxford, such as the Vindiciae contra tyrannos and Milton's Defensio pro populo anglicano (pp. 23, 27). [T. Phillips,] Bibliotheca angleseiana (London, 1686) (Lambeth Palace Library, London, pressmark Z 999 (P4)), 2nd pagination, p. 27 (Leviathan, unsold). This sale commenced on 25 Oct. [/4 Nov.] 1686. T. A. Birrell notes a contemporary report that at the auction 'a stop was put to the sale of some treasonous and seditious books, by public order' ('Books and Buyers', p. 60).

[237] See above, pp. 225, 238.

Religion'; but that Bill was not passed, and the former Act thus lapsed, with nothing to replace it, when Parliament was prorogued on 3 [/13] May.[238] That the price of a copy of Leviathan dropped significantly between May and December 1695 might be taken to show that the owners of the copyright responded quickly to these new conditions, arranging the printing of the Ornaments in the summer or autumn of that year. However, some hesitation is called for in interpreting this evidence: the low figure for December 1695 is, after all, just one figure. In the case of the Bear it seems to have taken a long time for the mostly surreptitious sales of new copies to have an impact on the second-hand price; it would be rather surprising if the appearance of the Ornaments edition had become generally known in a matter of just a few months. What was generally known, on the other hand, was the fact that the Act had lapsed, so it may be that the fall in prices reflected not the knowledge that new copies already existed, but the expectation that they soon would, and the feeling that the premium formerly paid for a copy of a non-licensable work should no longer apply. All that this evidence allows us to conclude, therefore, is that the Ornaments edition was probably produced in or after 1695—the terminus ad quem being the date of the inscribed copy, 1702.

It should be noted that the lapsing of the Licensing Act did not mean that a new edition of a work such as Leviathan could be published with impunity. A royal 'Proclamation for Preventing and Punishing Immorality and Profaneness' of February 1698 included clauses directed against 'pernicious books and pamphlets, which contain impious doctrines against the Holy Trinity and other fundamental articles of our faith', warning that both authors and publishers would be 'punished according to the utmost severity of the law'.[239] A few months later, the 'Act for the more effectual suppressing of blasphemy and profaneness' (usually known as the Blasphemy Act) reached the statute book; this declared it a punishable offence to 'deny any one of the persons in the holy Trinity to be God, or . . . deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be of divine authority'.[240] As John Feather has noted, this Act was 'essentially confirmatory legislation': denial of the Trinity, or of the truth of the Christian religion and its holy scriptures, was already a common law offence. In 1676 Lord Chief Justice Hale had declared: 'Christianity is a parcel of the Laws of England and therefore to reproach the Christian religion is to speak in subversion of the law.'[241] Even before the passing of the Act, a writer [238] See Astbury, 'Renewal of the Licensing Act', pp. 310–17.

[239] CSPD, 1698, p. 107.

[240] [Anon., ed.,] Thirty Nine Articles, p. 120. On the background to this Act see Hayton, 'Moral Reform and Country Politics', pp. 58–9.

[241] Feather, 'English Book Trade and the Law', pp. 56, 60.

such as John Toland had fallen foul of the law for writing and publishing too freely on theological matters: in 1697 his Christianity Not Mysterious was condemned both by a Middlesex grand jury and by the Irish House of Commons (which ordered his arrest). That the publishers of Leviathan in the period 1695–1700 should have preferred to conceal their own identity is thus hardly surprising.

Some of those publishers can nevertheless be identified, thanks to the evidence of the later sales of fractions of the copyright, discussed above. One of the four original sharers in the copyright, Richard Chiswell (who became the most prominent and successful of them all), continued to do business until not long before his death in 1711, so it is very likely that he was a co-producer of the Ornaments edition.[242] Robert Scott died in 1710; the last publication to carry his name on the title page appeared in 1706, but he had been almost completely inactive as a publisher for many years before that, and his main business (as a dealer in learned books) had undergone a severe contraction in 1688, when most of his stock was sold off in an auction organized by his former apprentice Benjamin Walford.[243] In several cases Walford also acquired Scott's shares of copyrights: for example, where Scott had appeared as co-publisher with Basset, Wright, and Chiswell of Mandeville's Voyages (1677) and Johnson's Famous History (1680, three editions), his name was replaced by Walford's in the new editions of both works in 1696.[244] So it seems likely that, if the Ornaments was printed after c.1695, Benjamin Walford would have been one of the sharers in it. Thomas Basset disappears from the records in 1698, and seems to have acted as a publisher for the last time in 1693; in 1694 he was excused serving as Upper Warden of the Stationers' Company because his 'Circumstances . . . incapacitated him', and in 1696 the Commissioners of Bankruptcy for Thomas Basset wrote to the Company requesting a list of all the copyrights he owned.[245] The division of his shares into one-eighth portions may have occurred soon after the liqui-

[242] It could be supposed that he had sold his share long before 1702; but this is contradicted by the evidence of the copyright auctions, mentioned above, which show that Leviathan travelled in convoy (so to speak) with a mass of other Chiswell items, none of which is known to have been jettisoned by him at such an early stage. On Chiswell see Dunton, Life and Errors, passim; Treadwell, 'London Trade Publishers'; Amory, 'Chiswell'.

[243] See Smolenaars, 'Scott'. Nevertheless, although he was much less active in business in the 1690s, he still attended the Stationers' Company, and competed unsuccessfully for the Mastership in 1693 and 1697 (see Shell et al., Index, p. 355).

[244] Walford became a publisher in 1693, and 'retired from business or died between 1709 and 1711' (Plomer, Dictionary, 1668–1725, pp. 298–9). Scott's will divided his property equally between his three children, but referred only to real estate and stock in the Stationers' Company, not to any copyrights (Guildhall Library, London, MS 9171/55, Commissary Court of London, Register of Wills, 1710–11, unfoliated).

[245] Shell et al., Index, pp. 80–81; Plomer, Dictionary, 1641–67, p. 16; SC, Court Book F (reel 57), fos. 204v (excused), 248r (Commissioners' request).

dation of these assets; but unfortunately the details of the commissioners' proceedings have not survived. As for John Wright, he died in 1685; two later John Wrights are mentioned in the records, but they were never active as publishers.[246] Wright's shares of copyrights seem to have passed to two booksellers, Matthew Wotton and George Conyers: in several of the works which Wright had published jointly with Basset and Chiswell, his name is replaced by those of Wotton and Conyers in new editions from 1687 onwards.[247] These were two young booksellers who would continue to publish until well into the third decade of the next century.[248] That Conyers acquired a group of Wright's copyrights is confirmed by the auction catalogue of Conyers copyrights in 1740, which lists sixteen shares of titles 'formerly belonging to Mr John Wright'; but Leviathan is not included in this list, so the fate of Wright's quarter-share must remain obscure.[249] And at some time, as we have seen, Conyers also acquired one of the one-eighth portions of Basset's quarter-share. To conclude: if the Ornaments edition was produced in, say, 1700, the dominant figure in the process would probably have been Chiswell, who may be presumed to have retained his quarter-share. Another quarter-share might have been held by Benjamin Walford; Basset's quarter might already have been divided into eight portions; and the fate of Wright's share is not known, although it might possibly have been divided into two equal parts, held by Wotton and Conyers. So although the production of this edition seems to have been a surreptitious affair (no contemporary reference to it, and certainly no advertisement of it, has ever come to light), the secret would have been shared by perhaps as many as twelve London booksellers.

So much for the people who organized the printing; but who was the printer? The physical book itself does not offer many clues. It is a tall folio, roughly 33 × 20 cm, which makes it similar in height to the large-paper copies of the Head. But the Ornaments is far from being a luxury product; it uses a distinctively rough and poor-quality paper, which is thin, feathery to the touch, prone to browning, and full of imperfections, including what look like chopped hairs. The paper stock (which is not watermarked) is the same

[246] Shell et al., Index, p. 431.

[247] E.g., Johnson, Famous History (1687, 1696); Mandeville, Voyages (1696); Royal College of Physicians, Pharmacopoeia londinensis (printed in 1682 for Basset, Chiswell, Wright, and T. Dawks; printed in 1691 for Basset, Chiswell, Wotton, Conyers, A. Dawks, and I. Dawks).

[248] Wotton died in 1725; Conyers was active as a publisher until at least 1727 (see Plomer, Dictionary, 1668–1725, p. 321; Plomer, Bushnell, and Dix, Dictionary, 1726 to 1775, pp. 59, 272). It is not clear by what length of time the death of Conyers preceded the sale of his copyrights and remaining stock in 1740.

[249] Ward trade catalogues (see above, n. 211), no. 78. These include nine of the titles which Wright had published with Basset, Chiswell, and Scott; one of these is listed as a quarter-share, but most of the others are one-eighth shares, which suggests that Conyers and Wotton had divided Wright's quarter-shares between them.

throughout the volume, but two different roman typefaces are used for the main text, one in quires B–P, plus Cc and the inner sheet of Dd (Dd 2,3), and the other in the rest of the book. The fact that the same italic typeface is used for the marginalia throughout the book suggests, however, that this volume was produced by two teams in the same printing-house.[250] The most distinctive features of the book are the three printer's ornaments that feature in it: two fleurons and a factotum. The printed title page uses rows of a large fleuron (here called 'fleuron 1'); a row of this fleuron reappears at the head of the 'Introduction' (sig. A3r), where it is combined with rows of another, smaller, fleuron ('fleuron 2') to form a block; and at the beginnings of Parts 3 and 4 of the text (sigs. Cc1r and Vv1r) a factotum—that is, an ornament with a central space, into which any ordinary capital letter can be inserted—is used to form a large decorated initial. The factotum, although it used a very common design (symmetrical sprays of flowers filling a square shape), was a unique item, which would differ from any other block carved to the same pattern; but fleurons were metal items produced by the same method that was used for the production of type (punches and matrices)—in other words, they were mass-produced. In hunting for printers who used these ornaments, it would clearly not be sufficient to confine the search to printers known to have worked for Chiswell, Basset, and the others mentioned above; other booksellers, whose names are not known, may also have been involved in the production of the Ornaments edition, and in any case not all of the books produced by those named booksellers identified their printers. So instead, a general search has been made, looking at all books printed in the period 1695–1700 that give an identification of the printer on their title pages. Once candidate printers were identified, their entire known output was also inspected.[251]

The hunt for the factotum has proved entirely unsuccessful; many ornaments with very similar designs were in use, but not one example matches precisely the one used in the Ornaments edition.[252] Where the two fleurons [250] One oddity is worth reporting here. The exemplum in the Nimitz Library of the US Naval Academy, Annapolis, MD, contains two copies of the sheet H1,4. I am very grateful to Dr Jennifer Bryan for confirming that this does not involve a cancellation; the two are identical, so it seems that this was merely an error in the printing-house and the bindery.

[251] This search was made possible by EEBO. Many other books have been inspected, but not systematically, outside that range of dates. The great majority of books were inspected only online; but ornaments (and, as described below, typefaces) were looked at in physical copies. It should be emphasized that fleuron 2, in particular, must be examined very closely; a fleuron of almost (but not quite) the same design, 5 mm high, is very commonly found, but the fleuron used in the Ornaments edition measures only 4 mm.

[252] This search has taken in not only the printed works of the period, but also the small body of modern studies of printers' ornaments of the 17th and 18th centuries: Plomer, English Printers' Ornaments; Sale, Samuel Richardson, pp. 251–316; Miller, 'Thomas Newcomb'; Miller, 'A London Ornament Stock'; Maslen, Bowyer Ornament Stock; Goulden, Ornament Stock of Woodfall.

are concerned, however, the search has yielded just two printers who used both of them: John Richardson and John Darby.[253] Richardson's use of both was more prolific. Fleuron 1 is to be seen in ten books printed by him between 1675 and 1696; fleuron 2 can be found in eight books printed by him between 1680 and 1693.[254] In three cases, both fleurons are found together in the same book.[255] Darby's use was much more limited. Only one item bearing his name contains fleuron 1 (Anon., An Answer to a Letter from a Gentleman in the Country relating to the Present Ministry, 1699), and only one has fleuron 2 (Schroder, Compleat Chymical Dispensatory, 1669). However, alongside the anonymous pamphlet of 1699, which was printed for Abigail Baldwin, must be placed four other short works printed for her in 1699–1700, which have similar rows of fleuron 1 on their title pages and which, though the printer's name is not stated, were very probably printed by Darby.[256] Abigail Baldwin was (like her husband, Richard, who died in 1698) one of the leading Whig publishers, and John Darby was one of the printers most closely associated with her.[257]

In an attempt to decide between Richardson and Darby, another type of investigation has been pursued: seeing whether the typefaces used in the Ornaments can be matched to typefaces known to have been used by these two printers. As was mentioned above, the Ornaments divides (more or less) at sig. Q into two parts. For the main text, which is in the size known as 'English', each part has its own typeface, both roman and italics; the italic type in the second part includes, for some capital letters, swash capitals as well as plain ones. For the marginal notes both parts use the same italic type, which is in 'small pica'. In addition, a larger typeface ('double pica') is used [253] On Richardson, a general printer active between 1675 and 1703, see Plomer, Dictionary, 1668–1725, p. 253. On Darby see below, nn. 274–7.

[254] I give abbreviated references here, using the author designations employed in EEBO. Fleuron 1: Clarke, Marrow (1675); Hayter, Meaning (1675), Fettiplace, Sinners (1680), Catholic Church, Actes (1682); R. B., Admirable (1684); de Grey, Compleat (1684); Jordaine, Duodecimal (1687); Langston, Lusus (1688); Patrick, Hearts Ease (1685); Walwyn, Physick (1696). Fleuron 2: Fettiplace, Sinners (1680); Basse, Help (1682); Monteage, Debtor (1682); Indagine, Book (1683); R. B., Admirable (1684); de Grey, Compleat (1684); Anon., Advice (1688); Anon., Psalter (1693).

[255] Fettiplace, Sinners (1680); R. B., Admirable (1684); de Grey, Compleat (1684).

[256] The Answer to a Letter has a row of 4 fleurons. The other items are: Anon., A Discourse concerning the Rise and Antiquity of Cathedral Worship (London, 1699: 2 rows of 5 fleurons); Anon., An Epistle to Sr. Richard Blackmore (London, 1700: 2 rows of 5 fleurons); Anon., The Way to Heaven in a String (London, 1700: 2 rows of 5 fleurons); R. Gold, The Dream: To Sr. Charles Duncomb (London, 1700: 2 rows of 4 fleurons).

[257] On the Baldwins see Plomer, Dictionary, 1668–1725, pp. 15–17 (referring mistakenly to 'Ann' Baldwin); Rostenberg, Literary, Political, and Legal Publishing, ii, pp. 369–415 (referring mistakenly to 'Anne'); Treadwell, 'London Trade Publishers', pp. 101–10. The Baldwins frequently collaborated with Andrew Bell, another leading Whig bookseller, who was Darby's son-in-law. On Darby's work for Bell and Baldwin see also Schwoerer, "No Standing Armies!", p. 178 (referring mistakenly to 'Andrew' Baldwin).

for the Dedicatory Epistle on sig. A2r–v; and there are several different sizes of larger capital letters, including, on the title page, 'two lines pica' (8 mm high) and 'four lines pica' (15 mm high).[258] Two extra-large capitals, 'Y' and 'N', 27 and 26 mm high, are also used, on sigs. A2r and A3r.

An examination of books printed by John Richardson has yielded five items, dated from 1682 to 1688, which use a typeface, both roman and italic, very similar to that of the second half of the Ornaments; but there are some small details, such as the serifs on the roman capital H, that do not quite match.[259] One of these items also includes some double pica type which closely resembles that used in the Dedicatory Epistle of the Ornaments.[260] Otherwise, this search has not produced matches for any of the other typefaces or capitals (with one possible exception, mentioned below). A study of items printed by John Darby, on the other hand, has yielded a wide range of positive results. For the roman and italic typeface used in the first part of the Ornaments, there are eleven matches, dated between 1697 and 1705.[261] For the roman and italic type used in the second part, there are three matches, from the years 1700–1702.[262] Of particular interest here are two works by Toland printed in 1702, his Christianity not Mysterious and his Apology for Mr. Toland, of which the former has the type of the first part of the Ornaments, and the latter that of the second. Although the second of these items has its own separate title page, signatures, and pagination, there is clear evidence that they were sold—and, probably, bound—together (which suggests that they had been produced in Darby's printing-house at more or less the same time): the title page of the former includes the words, 'To which is Added, An Apology for Mr. Toland', and Darby's 1715 catalogue of his books would list these works under the single heading, 'Christianity not Mysterious, and his Apology'.[263] These twinned items also provide another match with a typeface used in the Ornaments: Christianity not Mysterious and the Leviathan edition both use the same small Greek type.[264] This Greek type can also [258] For the names of these type-sizes I have used the Caslon specimen printed in Luckombe, Concise History, pp. 133–68. Slightly different sizes are given, however, in Stephenson and Stephenson, Specimen of Printing Types.

[259] Monteage, Debtor (1682); de Grey, Compleat Horse-man (1684); Jordaine, Duodecimal (1687); Fuller, Treatise (1688); Langston, Lusus (1688).

[260] Jordaine, Duodecimal, sig. B2v.

[261] Burgess, Golden Snuffers (1697); [Toland,] Militia Reform'd (1698); Ludlow, Memoirs (1698–9); Harrington, Oceana (1700); Heigham, Call (1700); Smith, Essay (1701); Toland, Christianity not Mysterious (1702); Godwin, History (1704); Sidney, Discourses (1704); Toland, Account (1705); Toland, Ordinances (1705). The items here by Ludlow, Harrington, and Toland (1702) do not carry the printer's name, but are known to have been Darby's work; all three were listed in a catalogue of 'Books sold by John Darby in Batholomew-Close' in 1715 (BL: bound with Asgill, Collection of Tracts, pressmark C.126.d.2).

[262] Calamy, Sermons (1700); Nye, Historical Account (1700); Toland, Apology (1702).

[263] For the catalogue see above, n. 261. See also the entry in Carabelli, Tolandiana, pp. 23–4.

[264] Compare, e.g., Christianity not Mysterious, p. 131, with the Ornaments, pp. 290–91.

be found in another Darby production of 1709.[265] The double pica used in the Dedicatory Epistle of the Ornaments is to be found in the dedication of Thomas Goodwin's History of the Reign of Henry V (1704), which uses the typeface of the first part of the Ornaments for its main text, and also in the dedication of the Memoirs of Denzil Lord Holles, edited by Toland and printed (probably by Darby) in 1699.[266] The small pica italic typeface used in the marginal notes to the Ornaments has proved harder to match, but there is one Darby printing, a translation of las Casas, issued in 1699, that uses what seem to be the same italics.[267]

A search for matching display capitals among Darby printings has also yielded some positive results. In this case, unlike that of ordinary typefaces, the sample from which one has to work is very small (just a few individual capital letters); but, on the other hand, the larger the capitals, the more precisely they can be compared. For the 'two lines pica' capitals on the title page of the Ornaments (i.e., the words 'COMMONWEALTH ECCLESIASTICAL' and 'CIVIL'), one match has been found with a pamphlet which was printed for Abigail Baldwin in 1700, probably by John Darby.[268] For the 'four lines pica' capitals (i.e., the word 'LEVIATHAN'), there is one match in a book printed by Darby in 1710, and another in a book printed by 'J. R. and J. D.' in 1682.[269] Here 'J. D.' is probably John Darby, but it is also possible that 'J. R.' is John Richardson. This volume also has an extra-large 'Y', closely matching the one used in the Ornaments; the same 'Y' can also be found in a pamphlet printed (by an unnamed printer—probably Darby) for Abigail Baldwin in 1700.[270] And the other extra-large capital from the same alphabet, 'N', can be found in two printings, one by 'J. D.' in 1682 and one by 'J. Darby' in 1685.[271]

The evidence of the typefaces can be taken, then, as indicating quite strongly that the printer of the Ornaments was John Darby. Unfortunately this finding has not made it possible to match the paper in the Ornaments with paper from the same stock, used in a dated printing by him. Since the paper in the Ornaments is not watermarked, a precise identification would [265] J. Piggott, Funeral Sermon (London, 1709), e.g., p. 24.

[266] This book was described on the title page as 'printed for Tim. Goodwin'—another Whig bookseller, and a friend of Darby's. It was also advertised by Abigail Baldwin in April 1699. On this, and Toland's involvement, see Ludlow, Voyce from the Watch Tower, pp. 29–30.

[267] B. de las Casas, An Account of the First Voyages (London, 1699).

[268] H. Hody, A Short Examination of a Discourse concerning Education (London, 1700), title page.

[269] S. Johnson, Works (London, 1710), sig. B1r; T. De Laune, Tropologia: A Key to open Scripture Metaphors (London, 1682), Book 3, separate title page.

[270] De Laune, Tropologia, Books 2 and 3, title page; Anon., St. Ignatius's Ghost, appearing to the Jesuits (London, 1700), title page.

[271] E. Pearse, The Conformist's Second Plea for the Nonconformists (London, 1682), sig. π3r; T. Godwin, Romanae historiae anthologia (London, 1685), sig. A2r.

depend on matching the spacing of the chain-lines (which are mostly between 24.5 and 26.5 mm apart); but even on the subjective criteria of the look and feel of the paper, all the Darby printings that have been examined have been ascertainably different. The closest matches are the poor-quality papers used in Ludlow, Memoirs (1698–9) and Toland, Anglia libera (1701)—which, however, are appreciably thicker than the paper of the Ornaments. The paper used in las Casas, Account (1699) is also similar, but lacks the small hairs. Paper even more closely resembling that of the Ornaments has been found in a few pamphlets of the period 1698–9; but in no case is the match perfect.[272]

These searches for matching paper do at least yield the finding that this kind of poor-quality paper became common in the final years of the 1690s. Some other indications also point towards such a dating of the Ornaments. The dates of Darby's use elsewhere of the main typefaces found in the Ornaments, as given above, were 1697–1705 for the first typeface and 1700–1702 for the second; and the conjunction of both in a single production, the twinned Toland texts of 1702, is particularly suggestive. Another indication is given by the fact that the use of patterns of fleurons on title pages becomes almost a hallmark of a group of similar-looking works printed, probably by John Darby, in the period 1698–1700. The Memoirs of Denzil Holles (1699) has a pattern of eight fleurons on its title page. The pamphlets printed, probably by Darby, for Abigail Baldwin in 1699–1700, with their patterns of fleuron 1, have already been mentioned; to these may be added a similar item printed for Andrew Bell (Darby's son-in-law) in 1699, which uses a different fleuron in two rows of four, and another pamphlet, a polemic against standing armies by the radical Whig clergyman Samuel Johnson, printed for Abigail Baldwin in 1698, which, like the Ornaments, arranges the fleurons as a downwards-pointing triangle.[273] Generally, the use of patterns of fleurons to ornament title pages was not common in this period.

One other reason may be suggested for placing the printing of the Ornaments in the latter part of the period 1695–1702. All references to 'John Darby' above have been to John Darby senior, the prominent printer of non-conformist and radical works. He would have been in many ways an ideal candidate for the job of printing the Ornaments, as he had a long history of surreptitious printing, being a resilient veteran of many searches and confiscations. One scholar has called his career 'perhaps the most persistent and successful instance of resistance to the strictures of censorship and press surveillance in Restoration England'.[274] Also relevant is the fact that he enjoyed a particularly close association with Richard Chiswell; an analysis of works printed by Darby in the period 1667–89 lists no fewer than 32 items printed for Chiswell.[275] But there is one thing about Darby that may make it seem surprising that he should take on the printing of Leviathan: his well-known religious piety.[276] It is possible that, if the printing took place in the latter part of the period 1695–1702, it was undertaken and managed by his son, John Darby junior, about whose religious inclinations much less is known. John Darby junior joined the business in 1694; he was admitted to the Livery of the Stationers' Company in 1696, and in the summer of 1698 he began to enter copyrights under his own name in the Company's Register.[277] By this stage he was clearly taking an active role, making deals and initiating business; John Toland's agreement in January 1698 to supply 'as much original copy or Translations of his own composition as shall amount to thirteen pounds five shill. per quarter' was made with John Darby junior, and so too was his contract, signed in July 1699, concerning the reprinting of Harrington's works.[278] This close association with Toland means, also, that John Darby junior was in contact with someone who had been deeply influenced by Hobbes's ideas.[279] Hobbes's hostility to 'priestcraft' and ecclesiastical jurisdiction would, in any case, have resonated with the Darbys; and that post-1688 Whigs might have felt some kinship between their position

[272] S. Clark, Scripture-Justification (London: printed by S. Bridge for T. Parkhurst, 1698); [D. Defoe,] The Poor Man's Plea to all the Proclamations (London: printed for A. Baldwin, 1698); [E. Ward,] The World Bewitch'd (London, 1699). The chain-line distances are significantly different from those in the Ornaments in each of these cases.

[273] Anon., A Dialogue between a Director of the New East-India Company, and one of the Committee (London: printed for Andrew Bell, 1699); S. Johnson, A Confutation of a late Pamphlet (London: printed for A. Baldwin, 1698).

[274] Lynch, 'Darby'. See also Hetet, 'Literary Underground', pp. 160–94 ('The Darbys: A Case Study of an Underground Press'); Lynch, 'Mr Smirke and "Mr Filth"', pp. 48–9; Hinds, 'Roger L'Estrange', pp. 18–19; Worden, 'Whig History'. Details of Darby's many brushes with the authorities can be found using the index entry for his name in McKenzie and Bell, Chronology and Calendar.

[275] Hetet, 'Literary Underground', pp. 212–25.

[276] John Dunton wrote: 'I might call him the Religious Printer—He goes to Heaven with the Anabaptists' (Life and Errors, p. 328). L'Estrange called him 'a bold, cunning and bloody Anabaptist' (Hinds, 'Roger L'Estrange', p. 18).

[277] Hetet, 'Literary Underground', pp. 197–8; Eyre, ed., Transcript, iii, p. 482. John Darby senior was still active (he entered Sidney's Discourses in Aug. 1698: Eyre, ed., Transcript, iii, p. 484), but apparently taking a more secondary role. Shell et al. suggest that the father remained active until 1715 (Index, p. 148); but Lynch gives his date of death as Dec. 1704, and cites the probate copy of his will, which surely clinches the matter ('Darby'). References to John Darby after 1704 must therefore concern the son.

[278] BL, MS Add. 4295, fos. 6r, 10r–v.

[279] For examples of Hobbesian ideas in Toland's writings see Toland, Christianity not Mysterious, ed. McGuinness, Harrison, and Kearney, pp. 34–5, 40; Champion, Republican Learning, p. 177; and cf. more generally the comments in Parkin, Taming the Leviathan, pp. 402–9. The possibility cannot be altogether excluded that it was Toland who made the corrections in the Bear which served as copy-text to the printers of the Ornaments; but those corrections are less interventive, and less creative, than the changes Toland is known to have made in other texts he edited. (See, e.g., Harrington, Oceana, pp. vii–viii; Ludlow, Voyce, pp. 28, 32; Worden, 'Whig History', p. 221, n. 46.)

and Hobbes's theory of the basis of political authority is also suggested by the fact that in *c.*1700 Abigail Baldwin issued a new edition of the quasi-Hobbesian work by Thomas White, The Grounds of Obedience.[280] But, in the end, business was business, both for the booksellers who commissioned the printing of the Ornaments and for the printer who carried it out. What exactly they thought of the book's contents cannot now be known. What can be established, with reasonable confidence, is the identity of at least some of the booksellers, the identity of the printer, and the time—between 1695 and 1702, with the balance of probabilities tending towards the latter part of that period—when the Ornaments was printed.

Finally, the price data presented above make it possible to speculate a little further about how long the Ornaments edition remained in print. The evidence of dated ownership inscriptions has already suggested that it was available until at least 1733; but of course it could be supposed that that 1733 inscription was made in what was already a second-hand copy. The fairly level pattern of prices (and, from 1732 onwards, minimum prices) shown in the table suggests that the supply of new copies did remain constant in the 1730s—and, indeed, in the 1740s. For an edition to remain available for 40 years or more may strike the modern reader as extraordinary; but it was not so rare in the eighteenth century, when several well-known editions stayed in the shops for between 40 and 50 years.[281] Other explanations for this level pattern of prices are also possible. It may be, for example, that even if the supply of new copies of Leviathan ceased in, say, 1735, the price remained depressed by both a steady flow of second-hand copies onto the market and a gradual decline in interest in this text, which, 80 or 90 years after its original publication, must have lost some of its power to shock. That Hobbes had not ceased to interest English readers, however, is indicated by the publication in 1750 of the imposing folio volume of his Moral and Political Works, in which Leviathan was also included. No bookseller or printer was mentioned on the title page of this edition; but it may be presumed that its sponsors included those booksellers who had bought shares in the copyright of Leviathan in the trade auctions of the previous few decades. By this date, at least, the Ornaments had surely gone out of print.

[280] White, The Grounds of Obedience (London: 'Printed, and sold by A. Baldwin', n.d.).

[281] See Anon., Books printed by the Booksellers of London, pp. 2–3, giving the examples of Bentley's Milton (43 years), Pope's Shakespeare (48 years), and the 16-volume edition of the Spectator (50 years).

Additional note: While this book was going to press, I noticed that a Chatsworth library catalogue of the 1690s (no. iv in Beal, Index, p. 573) has an entry under 'Manuscripts': 'Leuiathan'. No such entry occurs in other Chatsworth catalogues, before or after this one. It seems likely that this was in fact a MS of the Elements of Law (cf. n. 1, above).

2

THE LATIN LEVIATHAN

A Manuscript

No manuscript of the Latin text of Leviathan is known today. However, a tantalizing record of such a manuscript is to be found in a catalogue (no. 458) issued by the prominent dealer Karl W. Hiersemann in Leipzig in 1918:

Hobbes, Thomas. 'Leviathan sive de materia etc. civitatis ecclesiasticae, et civilis authore J. [sic] H. Malmesburiensi'. A finely written seventeenth-century manuscript on paper, in Latin, with a richly ornamented title page and three initials (likewise) in pen-and-ink drawing. 721 pp. of text, including the Appendix; 15 pp. index, 4 pp. title and preface. Gilt-edged leaves. Contemporary red leather binding, gold-tooled. The MS has been kept immaculately clean. The back cover somewhat damaged at the edges. 420 [Marks].[1]

It is not known who purchased the manuscript; although the extensive 'Zettelkartei' (card index) of the Hiersemann company survives, it does not include any entry for this item.[2] No annotated copy of the catalogue, or other trace of the sale, has been located.[3] The manuscript is not apparently held by any major state or university library, and no Hobbes scholar has ever mentioned it. If it remained in Germany, it may perhaps have been destroyed in the Second World War. But Hiersemann had a large, international clientele, so there is no reason to assume that the buyer must have been German.

[1] Hiersemann, Katalog, p. 39, item 137: 'Hobbes, Thomas. Leviathan sive de materia etc. civitatis ecclesiasticae, et civilis authore J. H. Malmesburiensi. Lateinische, hübsch geschriebene Papier-Handschrift des 17. Jarh. mit reich ornamentirtem Titelblatt und 3 ebensolchen Initialen in Federzeichnung. 721 S. Text, einschliesslich des Appendix, 15 S. Register, 4 S. Titel u. Vorrede. Fol. Goldschnitt. Gleichzeitiger rother Lederbd, mit Goldpressung. Tadellos sauber erhaltenes Ms. Rücken an den Kanten etwas lädirt. 420 [M.]'

[2] I am grateful to Hans-Rainer Arnold, Director of the Zentralantiquariat Leipzig (the owners of the Zettelkartei), for this information. The statement by Wilhelm Obrich that all the records of Hiersemann were destroyed in 1950 (Hundert Jahre Hiersemann, pp. 42–3) is thus incorrect; but I have not been able to trace any other records of the firm. I am grateful also to Gerd Hiersemann, of the present-day publishing company Anton Hiersemann Verlag, for his comments on this.

[3] I am grateful to those who answered my inquiries at the Sächsisches Staatsarchiv, Leipzig; Leipzig University Library; the Börsenverein des Deutschen Buchhandels; the Deutsches Buch- und Schriftmuseum der Deutschen Bücherei; the Deutsche Schillergesellschaft (Schiller Nationalmuseum, Deutsches Literaturarchiv), as well as the rare books or manuscripts departments of the Staatsbibliothek, Berlin; the Österreichische Nationalbibliothek, Vienna; and the Herzog August Bibliothek, Wolfenbüttel.

One of Hiersemann's regular customers, as it happens, was the sociologist and leading Hobbes scholar Ferdinand Tönnies. Among his surviving correspondence one finds two letters from Karl W. Hiersemann, one of which, dated 9 July 1918, replied to an order which Tönnies had made from Hiersemann's catalogue no. 453.[4] And yet, not only does Tönnies's surviving correspondence (which is, admittedly, far from complete) contain nothing about the Leviathan manuscript, but there is no mention of it in any of his subsequent writings on Hobbes. It is possible that catalogue no. 458 never reached him, because of the disruptions of the final months of 1918. But it is also possible that Tönnies did make a closer enquiry about the manuscript, and concluded that it was of little or no interest for the study of Leviathan.

To Hobbes scholars, two manuscripts would be of the greatest possible interest: the draft dictated by Hobbes, and the manuscript (presumably, a fair copy made from the draft) which was sent to Blaeu in Amsterdam.[5] The description in Hiersemann's catalogue could not possibly apply to the former; and it must be doubted whether the latter, as something designed for a strictly utilitarian purpose—with the probable fate of being thrown away once the typesetters had finished with it—would have been given 'a richly ornamented title page and three initials (likewise) in pen-and-ink drawing'. But perhaps the most important clue here is the reference to fifteen pages of index. The edition of the Latin Leviathan printed by Blaeu in 1668, and reprinted by him in 1670, ends with a list of contents, occupying just over two pages, followed by an index which takes up ten pages. The word in Hiersemann's catalogue translated here as 'index' ('Register') could also mean a list of contents, but the statement that it filled fifteen pages must imply, in this case, that the index was meant. And there is, as we shall see, strong evidence to show that the index to the Latin Leviathan—which appeared for the first time in the 1668 edition—was not made by Hobbes, but was compiled by someone working for Blaeu.

It follows that this manuscript was very probably copied from the printed edition, and not vice versa. (The number of pages specified almost suggests that the copyist regularly turned one page of the original—which has 365 pages of printed text, including the Introduction and Appendix but excluding the dedicatory epistle and the index—into two pages of manuscript; but the match is not quite perfect.) Such copying of a printed book may seem a surprisingly labour-intensive and expensive process for anyone to have engaged in, as an alternative to searching the market for another copy.

[4] Schleswig-Holsteinische Landesbibliothek, Kiel, Tönnies-Nachlass, Correspondence, item 749.

[5] It is conceivable that there was only one manuscript, not two—but not at all likely, as the risk of its being lost in transit would have been too great.

But in some circumstances—perhaps in a place far removed from the general traffic in books, or in a jurisdiction where prohibited books came under some real control—such copying did take place, especially of irreligious or 'free-thinking' works. Typical examples include a manuscript of Hobbes's Historia ecclesiastica, copied in every detail (including the publication details on the title page) from the 1688 printed edition, and a manuscript of John Toland's Adeisideimon and Origines judaicae, which similarly reproduces the 1709 edition of those works.[6] It seems reasonable to assume that this manuscript of the Latin Leviathan was another item of the same kind.

The 1668 Edition

Of the few chronological facts that are known about the production of the first edition of the Latin Leviathan, most have been stated above. In 1663 the Dutch publisher Joan (or Johan) Blaeu was already planning to produce a collection of Hobbes's philosophical works in Latin; his son Pieter discussed the matter with Hobbes in London in 1664; he suggested to Hobbes in December 1667 that he send two-thirds of the manuscript of the Latin Leviathan straight away, to speed up the process of printing it; and the entire Opera philosophica, including that text, was published in 1668.[7] When exactly that publication took place is not known; writing in May or June, Hobbes referred to his Latin Leviathan as 'by this time I think . . . printed beyond the Seas', which suggests that he expected it to have been completed by then, but had not yet received a copy.[8] It seems likely that he had to wait until the end of the year: Samuel Sorbière wrote to Hobbes from Paris on [22 January/] 1 February 1669 to say that 'I hear that the volume containing your Latin works has been published', requesting a copy and explaining that 'all the copies which came here were sold off immediately'—which suggests that the first copies apparently had not reached Paris until the very end of 1668, or even January 1669.[9] Unfortunately the accounts and business papers of the Blaeu family do not survive, so it is impossible to add much detail to this skeletal outline. Nor is it possible to discover how this plan had first arisen—whether, that is, the initiative had come from Blaeu or from Hobbes, or [6] Stiftung Fürst Liechtenstein, Vienna, MS N-7-6 (Hobbes); Herzog August Bibliothek, Wolfenbüttel, MS 149.22 Extrav. (Toland).

[7] For all these details see above, pp. 166–8. Pieter Blaeu was in London between mid-Mar. and late May or early June 1664: see Blaeu, Lettere ai fiorentini, pp. 120–21, 124.

[8] Hobbes, Answer to a Book, p. 45 (EW iv, p. 317).

[9] Correspondence, ii, pp. 706–7 ('Audio . . . Volumen Operum tuorum Latinorum in lucem prodijsse'; 'distracta statim fuere quae hûc venerant Exemplaria').

FIGURE 10. Opera philosophica, title page

perhaps from a third party such as Sorbière (who seems to have transferred allegiance from the Elzeviers to the Blaeus in 1649, when he had his French translation of De cive printed by Joan Blaeu in Amsterdam).[10]

What is clear is that Hobbes had had the good fortune to form a connection with one of the most respected and successful publishers, not only in the Netherlands, but in the whole of Europe. Blaeu's father, Willem Janszoon Blaeu, was an astronomer who had started business in Amsterdam as a seller of globes, maps, and instruments, and had later become a printer of high-quality maps and books. In 1637, one year before his death, Willem Blaeu opened a grand printing-house on the Bloemgracht, containing no fewer [10] In his letter to Hobbes (above, n. 9), however, Sorbière claimed credit only for having delivered the text and plates of the Opera philosophica to Blaeu.

LEVIATHAN,
SIVE
De Materia, Forma, & Poteſtate
CIVITATIS
ECCLESIASTICÆ
ET CIVILIS.
AUTHORE
THOMA HOBBES,
Malmesburienſi.

FIGURE 11. Opera philosophica, section title page of Leviathan

than nine presses for letterpress, and six (or, in one account, nine) for maps and plates; and 30 years later, Joan opened a second and even larger one in the Gravenstraat, with ten presses for text and four for plates. Joan Blaeu (1598–1673) was a highly educated man, a public figure—he served on the Amsterdam City Council from 1651 to 1672—and a canny businessman.[11] From 1662 onwards much of the day-to-day business was conducted, however, by his son Pieter (1637–1706), who managed the firm's bookshop (on the present-day Damrak) and 'was constantly on the lookout for texts that were worth publishing'.[12] The Florentine bibliophile Antonio Magliabechi, who met Pieter in 1660, described him as 'an extremely graceful, extremely polite, extremely handsome and very intelligent young man'; perhaps Hobbes was equally charmed by him when he met him four years later.[13] Although Pieter's visit to England on that occasion was in fact on behalf of the City Council of Amsterdam, the Blaeus had many business dealings with the English: in 1654, for example, Joan Blaeu obtained from Cromwell a privilege protecting his 'whole Mapps of Scotland, and Ireland' from being copied, and in 1667 he took legal action to recover debts from the heirs of James Allestree.[14] Writing to Hobbes in December of that year, Pieter Blaeu mentioned that he knew the London bookseller Samuel Thomson, and also said that he had used the services of another London bookseller, Cornelius Bee, to send Hobbes a specimen of the work printed so far; it is not known whether the Blaeus had had dealings with Andrew Crooke, but the dispute between those two parties (referred to in Pieter's letter) over payment for the plates suggests that their relations had not been particularly close or cordial.[15]

[11] de la Fontaine Verwey, 'Het werk van de Blaeu's', pp. 2–7; Koeman, Joan Blaeu, pp. 5–8, 17 (six), 107; Blaeu, Lettere ai fiorentini, pp. 57 (n.) (nine), 209.

The most important reason for the Blaeus' success was that they made a very high-quality product, not only in their special line of business (atlases and maps) but also in their book-printing more generally. Of one of their books it was said that 'the most scrupulous search failed to uncover a single printer's error in the entire voluminous work.'[16] Not only did they pride themselves on the work of their correctors, but also, very unusually in this period, they did all the correction before proceeding to the printing of the forme.[17] In one sense, at least, the evidence of their printing of Leviathan in 1668 tends to confirm this point: collation of multiple copies reveals just one case of ordinary in-press correction, and otherwise the only changes are (with one rather special exception) instances of type dropping out of the forme during the printing process.[18]

However, the Latin Leviathan was far from error-free; indeed, by the high standards of the Blaeus, its printing was a lamentable performance. When an Errata-list was inserted (at a very late stage, as we shall see) in the space following the list of contents near the end of the book, it enumerated 65 errors, [12] Ibid., pp. 55–9 (quotation: p. 58).

[13] Ibid., p. 53 (n.): 'giovan garbatissimo, cortesissimo, bellissimo e molto intelligente.'

[14] Bodl. MS Rawl. A 328, fos. 73–4; Gemeentelijke Archiefdienst, Amsterdam, NA 3206, fos. 145v–146r.

[15] Correspondence, ii, pp. 693–6.

[16] Koeman, Joan Blaeu, p. 19 (referring either to Grotius, De iure belli ac pacis (1646) or to Godefroy, ed., Corpus iuris civilis, 2 vols. (1663–4)).

[17] See Hellinga, Kopij en druk, p. 149 (describing the Blaeus as the only printers in the 17th-century Netherlands to do this).

[18] The exception concerns the Errata-list. See the Register of In-Press Variants (Latin).

and added: 'Other lesser errata will easily be corrected by the reader.'[19] Those other errata were many, and some of them were quite gross: 'nomibus' for 'nominibus', 'significanr' for 'significant', 'nentes' for 'neuter', 'nobi scum' for 'nobiscum', 'multitune' for 'multitudine', 'snpernaturaliter' for 'supernaturaliter', 'elgendus' for 'eligendus', 'justiitae' for 'justitiae', 'Trinitatatis' for 'Trinitatis', and so on.[20] The most serious mistake (unnoticed by the compiler of the Errata) was made towards the end of Chapter 31, where the compositor's eye skipped backwards from one clause ending in 'est' to a previous one, with the result that he repeated an entire passage of 22 words.[21] Many of the Greek words were also wrongly accented, which suggests both that the copy was faulty and that a competent corrector was not used to scrutinize all the initial proofs. And in a large number of cases, Latin constructions which were either impossible (for example, a singular noun governing a plural verb) or shoddy (for instance, failing to use the subjunctive after 'cum', or writing 'suus' for 'eius') were allowed to pass. That such Latin fell below the normal standards applied in the Blaeu printing-house is confirmed by the fact that many of these faults were corrected in the 1670 Blaeu edition.

However, it would probably be an exaggeration to say that there was no scrutiny whatsoever of the text by a corrector in 1668, as there is at least one case of a deliberate—though misguided—correction. In a passage in Chapter 42, the English quotes a phrase from St Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy, 'Stirre up the gift of God which is in thee, by the Laying on of my Hands', as evidence that Paul had ordained Timothy, and then begins the next sentence: 'We read also, that St. Paul had Imposition of Hands twice . . .'[22] In the Latin, it seems that the full point was omitted at the end of the first sentence, either because it was not visible in the manuscript, or because of an error in the initial setting of the text; and an attempt was then made to make sense of the following phrase, 'Sancto Paulo manus impositas bis fuisse legimus' by inserting a comma and the word 'à' before it. This correction, erroneously taking 'Sancto Paulo' as an ablative, would have been made only by someone who had followed the sense of the previous sentence, and assumed that the imposition of hands by St Paul (not on him) was the subject of the discussion.

For the poor quality of the Latin throughout the text, Hobbes was of course the person ultimately to blame. Some of the errors treated as printing faults in the Errata-list might also be explained by supposing that they were copied unthinkingly from the manuscript: Hobbes or his amanuensis might well have been responsible for 'coërcione' (instead of 'coërcitione') and 'Pharaohnis' (instead of 'Pharaonis'), given that the English language has 'coercion' and 'Pharaoh'.[23] But there is a larger category of errors, derived very probably from misreadings of handwriting, the responsibility for which is hard to apportion. In one place the 1668 edition has 'ei' where it should be 'et' (this was corrected, to '&', in the Errata-list). Elsewhere it has 'mox' for 'non'; '&' (again, representing 'et'), for 'est'; 'sicut' for 'simul'; 'Disputatione' for 'Dispositione'; and 'Morum' for 'illorum'.[24] The case of 'nentes' for 'neuter' has already been mentioned; and there are a few literal faults which suggest simple misreadings of letters, such as 'contensioso' for 'contentioso', 'requieviscet' for 'requievisset', and 'Recipiscentiam' for 'Resipiscentiam'.[25] But blame cannot be assigned here with any certainty, without knowing whether the manuscript sent to the printers was penned by James Wheldon or not. If Wheldon did write that manuscript, it would be very hard to imagine that his neat and extremely legible hand could have generated errors such as 'sicut' and 'Morum'. The most likely explanation would then be that the misreadings were made by Wheldon himself, when he copied from a draft version which was, at least in part, written by someone else. (That other person would presumably have been another amanuensis or scribe, but the possibility that some parts of the draft text were written by Hobbes should not be ruled out, despite the indication in Pieter Blaeu's letter that Hobbes had said that he was dictating the whole translation; Hobbes might have exaggerated a little on this point, to emphasize the difficulty and time-consuming nature of the task.)[26] But if, on the other hand, Wheldon took the initial dictation, and his corrected version was then copied by someone else, the misreadings should in that case be blamed on the obscurities of that other person's handwriting.

[19] See pp. 14–15.

[20] See the Register of Literal Faults (Latin). Note that this register is not an exhaustive list of such errors, as it does not include either the substantive errors (generated, for the most part, by misprints) corrected in the 1670 edn., or the similar substantive errors corrected only in this edn.; these are recorded in the textual apparatus. [21] See the Register of Literal Faults (Latin) for p. 569. [22] pp. 862–3.

Was the Errata-list drawn up, like the one in the Head edition of the English, by Hobbes himself? The possibility cannot be altogether excluded, but it does seem very unlikely. It is true that Pieter Blaeu's letter to Hobbes of early December 1667 included the statement: 'I would hope that you have already received the copy of your works which I sent you via Mr Bee. I very humbly beg you to look through it thoroughly, so that I may correct as soon as possible anything which you may think necessary, in the plates just as much as in the rest of it.'[27] If Hobbes had cared about typographical errors, he would have had longer to hunt for them in the case of these 'works' (which probably meant most or all of the other seven texts in the collection) than in the case of Leviathan; but none of the other works eventually issued in the Opera philosophica includes an Errata-list, so it seems that Hobbes was not concerned with that level of correction. (He seems to have requested just three significant changes: these are discussed below.)[28]

[23] See pp. 277, 687. This plausible suggestion was made by Land, 'Bibliographische Bemerkungen', p. 374. [24] See pp. 257, 335, 431, 507, 613, 935.

[25] See the Register of Literal Faults (Latin) for pp. 211, 613, 671, 999. Any of these last three could have been caused merely by wrongly distributed type.

[26] That some dictation did take place is suggested by two errors in Ch. 36, where the biblical references '20. 7' and '20. 3' are given as '27' and '23' respectively (see pp. 659, 665); these changes would not have been generated by compositors speaking or thinking in Dutch. However, other scenarios involving Hobbes's amanuensis and/or another helper are also possible: cf. above, the General Introduction, Ch. 3, n. 191.

Blaeu's own decision to add an Errata-list seems to have been made at a very late stage. In one copy the Errata-list is absent, while the setting of the rest of that page, sig. 5a4v, is the same; and in two known copies the Errata-list is absent from that page, but is supplied, in a setting identical with the normal printings of the list, on an extra cancel-slip (roughly 10 cm high and 13 cm wide) pasted or tipped in to face that page.[29] This evidence in itself would seem to be straightforward, indicating that a few sheets of sig. 5a had already been printed before the Errata-list was finalized. But what complicates the story is that in the two cases where the Errata are supplied on a cancel-slip, the Index, which (together with the very brief index of biblical citations which follows it) normally occupies the next eleven pages (sigs. 5b1–4, 5c1–2r), is also absent. It is easy to imagine that, since some sheets of sig. 5a had been printed without the Errata-list, a number of cancel-slips were later made, after the correct versions of that sheet had all been run off, for inclusion with those pages; but it is not immediately obvious why the copies of the book that contained those cancel-slips should have been sent for sale or binding without the Index, while one copy, containing the defective sig. 5a4v but not the cancel-slip, was given the Index pages. And a further complication is that one of the copies with the Errata slip (but not the other) contains a short text which was printed by Blaeu in the late summer of 1669 and added to copies of the Opera philosophica thereafter; the copy that includes it was thus part of Blaeu's remaining stock at that time, and appears to have been sold eventually by another bookseller in 1676.[30] This last detail seems to preclude one possible explanation for the Index-less copies, which would be that the printing of the Index was delayed, and that these copies were made up and sent off before it was accomplished. It is perhaps more likely that the sheets containing the Errata-less sig. 5a4v were held back as long as possible because they were defective, and that by the time they were used, there was a slight shortfall in the quantity of sheets of the Index; those made-up copies would in turn have been held back from sale as long as possible, since a fussy buyer might have returned them if perfect copies were still available. That might explain the two copies with no Index; in the other copy, the omission of an Errata-slip was perhaps just a mistake. But this is at best a very speculative solution to the problem.[31]

[27] Correspondence, ii, pp. 693–5 ('Je veux esperer que vous avez desia receu l'exemplaire de vos Oeuvres, que je vous ay envoyé par Mons.r Bee, Je vous supplie treshumblement de le bien feuilleter, afin que je fasse au plûtost corriger ce que vous pourriez trouuer estre necessaire tant pour les planches que pour le reste'). [28] See below, pp. 283–4.

[29] Bodl., pressmark Vet. B3 e. 113 (absent); King's College, Cambridge, pressmark Keynes A. 05. 12–13, and a copy offered for sale by Richard Hatchwell in 1979 (Hatchwell, Thomas Hobbes, item 227) (slip).

[30] On the extra text see below, p. 285; on the purchase in 1676 see also p. 285 (though it is also possible that that purchase was second-hand).

What is clear is that Hobbes himself was not responsible for the compilation of the Index. The wording used in it is, in places, quite un-Hobbesian. For example, when Hobbes says that there is no need to think that Adam imposed terms for all kinds of mathematical or philosophical concepts, the Index summarizes with the phrase 'vocabula technica' (technical words), employing an adjective not used by Hobbes; where Hobbes criticizes the opinions of 'Iudices' (judges), the Index refers to them as 'Legistae'; where Hobbes writes that states are 'suspecti' (regarded with suspicion) by one another, the Index describes them not only as 'suspicantes' but also as 'excubantes' (keeping watch).[32] The term used for Holy Communion, 'S. Synaxis', appears nowhere in the text of Leviathan, where 'Coena Dominica' (the Lord's Supper) is Hobbes's standard phrase.[33] More importantly, the indexer has in several cases simply misunderstood the passage under consideration. Thus a sub-entry under 'Civitas' (Commonwealth) says: 'an assembly under one man is a crowd, but otherwise it is a part of the ruler, 88'; but in the passage referred to, in Chapter 18, when Hobbes writes that 'under one man they are the common people, but under an assembly they are part of the ruler', the subject, 'they', is all the people ('omnes'), not an assembly.[34] Similarly, the entry for 'Incarceratio' says 'Incarceration, prolonged, is against natural law, 149'; but the criticism which Hobbes makes in the passage referred to is not of lengthy imprisonment as such, but of prolonged detention before trial, when the incarceration does not yet have the character of a legal punishment.[35] Three entries, under 'Ius' (Right), 'Leges' (Laws), and 'Libertas' (Liberty), argue that right is the cause or origin of law, and liberty the cause or [31] Whether the other two anomalous copies were among the last to be sold by Blaeu cannot now be established. The provenance of the Hatchwell copy is not known. Nor is that of the Bodl. copy, beyond the fact that it bears a 19th-century bookplate of the first or second Baron Belper.

[32] See pp. 1245; 1267; 1277, entry for 'Potestas summa' ('Reges & Personæ summam potestatem habentes hostes inter se, semper excubantes & suspicantes. 65. 106.').

[33] See p. 1285 ('S. Synaxis. 194. 231.'). [34] See pp. 269–70. [35] See pp. 490–91.

origin of obligation—a strange and rather elementary misunderstanding of Hobbes's argument in Chapter 14 that 'RIGHT, consisteth in liberty to do, or to forbeare; Whereas LAW, determineth, and bindeth to one of them: so that Law, and Right, differ as much, as Obligation, and Liberty.'[36] These are just some of the many cases that demonstrate that the author of the Index was not Hobbes himself, but someone working—rather hastily, it appears—for Blaeu.

The idea of including such an index seems to have come from studying the Dutch translation of Leviathan (published in 1667), which, as we have seen, contained a copious subject index, as well as a detailed index of biblical citations.[37] (Blaeu's edition also added a list of biblical citations, but this was a much more perfunctory affair, containing just 16 references to 'the more prominent passages', with a note explaining rather airily that 'those who look them up will find many others, besides, that present themselves to their view'.)[38] Indeed, the compiler of Blaeu's Index seems to have taken from the Dutch translation not only the idea of an index but some of the actual material presented there. The first three entries in the Dutch index read as follows:

Aaron had no sovereign power over the Jewish people, 486; he was consecrated as a priest by Moses, 641; by erecting the golden calf he practised idolatry, 674, 679; how he had to perform sacrifices on behalf of himself and the people, 496.
Abbadon, 468.
Abiathar was deposed by King Solomon, 491, 591.[39]

And here are the first three entries in the Index to the Blaeu edition:

Aaron did not have sovereignty over the people of Israel, p. 222; consecrated as High Priest by Moses, 298; practised idolatry by forging the golden calf, 312; had to perform sacrifices on behalf of himself and the priests, 226, 227
Abaddon, the name of a function or quality, 213
Abiathar, the High Priest deposed by King Solomon, 224, 272[40]

Here it is clear that while the Blaeu indexer was following closely in his predecessor's tracks, he was pausing to consider the text each time (elucidating Hobbes's point about 'Abaddon', for instance, and giving Abiathar his title). But it is also clear that he did not pause for long: his last sub-entry for Aaron shows that when he looked up the passage, which begins, 'Aaron was to sac-

[36] See pp. 198–9. [37] See above, p. 165. [38] See pp. 1288–9.

[39] Hobbes, Leviathan, tr. van Berkel, sig. Bbb3r: 'Aaron heeft over het Joodsche Volck geen Souverayne Magt gehadt. 486. Hy is van Moses tot het Priester-Ampt ingewijdt. 641. Heeft met het opregten van het Goude-Kalf Afgoderije bedreven. 674. 679. Hoe hy voor hem en het Volck offeren moest. 496
Abbadon. 468
Abjathar wort van den Koning Salomon afgeset. 491. 591'.

[40] See pp. 1244–5.

rifice for himself and the Priests a young Bullock; and he was to receive from the people two young Goates, of which he was to sacrifice one for the people', he read as far as the first clause (which refers to Aaron sacrificing on behalf of himself and the priests) and no further.[41] The haste with which the indexer worked may explain the fact that he rather quickly abandoned the method of using the Dutch index as a crib; looking up the passages in the Dutch, finding their equivalents in the Latin, and making adjustments for differences in alphabetical order between terms in the two languages must have become a tiresomely fiddly business. The correspondences are close for the entries on 'Abraham', 'Academy', 'Acts of Councils', and 'Adam', but thereafter the Blaeu indexer goes his own way; the entry for 'Angelus' (Angel) in the Latin, for example, bears no relation to the Dutch entry for 'Engel'. Generally, the Dutch index is fuller, covering many names and terms omitted in the Latin index, and giving much more detailed entries for many key terms, especially in the area of religion.[42] The compiler of the Dutch index may well have been the translator, Abraham van Berkel, himself, whose primary interest seems to have been in Hobbes's religious ideas. The indexer for Blaeu, on the other hand, was probably just a young scholar paid to do such work; he was, moreover, in a hurry.

A sense of urgency is clearly audible in Pieter Blaeu's letter to Hobbes of December 1667: he asked Hobbes to send corrections as soon as possible; he wanted the two-thirds of the text that was ready to be sent straight away, so that 'as soon as I receive it, I shall start printing it in order not to lose any time while waiting for the rest to be done'; and, even so, he was proposing to publish Hobbes's works in two instalments, with the items already printed appearing some time before the text of Leviathan.[43] The reason for speed was presumably not that there was any special deadline to meet, but simply that the Blaeus wanted to begin recouping, as soon as possible, the money they had laid out on the printing of the other works in the collection. Yet in the end Hobbes's Opera philosophica seems to have been issued as a single publication. The reasons for this are not entirely clear, but the holding back of the already printed material may have been due, at least in part, to Hobbes himself. At some time after mid-December 1667 he seems to have sent a reply, or replies, to Pieter Blaeu, in which he called for three significant alterations to be made. First, he asked for the arrangement of the works to be changed. This was recorded in the opening pages of the published edition, where a contents page listed the eight works in the order originally intended by both author and publisher, but a 'Small Suggestion to the Reader' on the reverse of that page explained that Hobbes had changed his mind, and was now suggesting that the works be bound, in a different order, in three volumes.[44] However, since Leviathan had come last in the old ordering, and since the new arrangement proposed having it bound separately as the third volume, this in itself should not have caused the abandonment of the plan to publish the works in two phases. A more likely reason is that Hobbes asked Blaeu to delay the publication of the earlier materials, as he still wished to make some substantive additions to them. The text of Examinatio et emendatio, as eventually published, included a final three-page addition, introduced by Blaeu with the words, 'What you see below was sent by the author when the work was already finished and printed'; and an even more substantial addition, of eleven pages, was made to the text of Problemata physica.[45] So it was probably thanks to the delays incurred by these changes that Hobbes's entire Opera philosophica, quae latinè scripsit, omnia. Antè quidem per partes, nunc autem, post cognitas omnium objectiones, conjunctim & accuratiùs edita ('All the philosophical works which he has written in Latin—previously published, indeed, separately, but now, after taking note of everyone's objections, published together, and more accurately') was issued as a single item, probably near the end of 1668.

[41] See pp. 760–61.

[42] Compare, e.g., the entries for 'Geest' and 'Spiritus'; 'Hell' and 'Infernus'; 'Mirakel' and 'Miracula'; 'Paus' and 'Papatus'.

[43] Correspondence, ii, pp. 693–6 (p. 694: 'aussytôt que je l'auray receu, J'en commenceray l'Impression pour ne pas perdre du temps en attendant que le reste se fasse').

This was—leaving aside the typographical errors in Leviathan—a handsome production, in quarto, with clearly legible type and on good-quality paper. At a total of 1,244 pages, it could be bound as a single volume, but many copies were bound as two. Some were put in the original order, and some in the order specified in the 'Small Suggestion to the Reader'; but binding in three volumes, as recommended there, seems to have been much less common—perhaps simply for reasons of cost. That Hobbes himself preferred to adhere to his revised scheme, however, is shown by the fact that the copy he donated to his alma mater, Magdalen Hall, was bound as three volumes.[46] If the three-volume scheme was followed, this meant that the Latin Leviathan appeared as a single bound volume. Individual volumes of this kind, usually described as volume III on the binding, occasionally appear for sale, having evidently become separated from the rest of the work.[47] But it must be doubted whether there was any intention, on the part of the Blaeus, to sell copies of Leviathan separately; had they had such plans, they would surely have run off a new title page, with publication details, in place of the section title preceding the work, which does not mention the publisher, place, or date. Nevertheless, the Blaeus were presumably aware that the Leviathan translation was the chief selling-point of the whole publication, and it is not surprising that, two years later, it was Leviathan that they reprinted, without the rest of the collection. That does not necessarily mean that the collection as a whole was slow to sell. In June 1669 Hobbes sent the Blaeus a mathematical pamphlet, Quadratura circuli, and asked them to print that text and add it to the copies of the Opera philosophica still in stock; this was done, though only after mid-August, when Hobbes had supplied a revised version of the pamphlet's text. But only a minority of copies of the Opera philosophica found today contain the pamphlet, which suggests that by September 1669 the majority had already been sold or distributed. None of the three copies in the Bodleian Library contains it; and of the four copies in the Keynes collection, only one (bearing an ownership inscription which indicates that it was bought 'in the town of Bergen [op Zoom]' in 1676) has this extra item.[48]

[44] Hobbes, Opera philosophica, sig. *2v, 'ADMONITIUNCULA AD LECTOREM'.

[45] Ibid., sigs. E5r–E10r; Ss4v–Tt1v (sig. Ss4v: 'Quod subjectum vides, D. Author jam absoluto & excuso opere misit'). The appendix to Problemata physica is not signalled in the same way by Blaeu, but its unusual signing (between E4 and F1) and pagination (pp. '40,b'–'40,m') are sufficient evidence of a late addition.

[46] On the ordering see the comments in Macdonald and Hargreaves, Bibliography, p. 77. Hobbes's gift was recorded in the Magdalen Hall benefactors' book as 'opera latine 3 Vol 4.to' (Hertford College, Oxford, MS 2/4/2, fo. 31v); it was later rebound as two volumes (but still in the ordering specified in the 'Small Suggestion'), and is now pressmark (B) C. 1. 13, 14. It does not bear any corrections or annotations by Hobbes.

Some copies of the Opera philosophica were distributed in England. We know from a letter sent by Pieter Blaeu to Hobbes in July 1669 that Andrew Crooke had written to Blaeu demanding 25 copies of the work, as payment for the permission he had given to print texts to which he held the English copyright. (Blaeu asked Hobbes for his advice about this; we may guess that Hobbes, who had a close relationship with Crooke, advised him to send the copies.)[49] But a larger quantity of copies came to England under a special arrangement between Blaeu and Cornelius Bee, the London bookseller through whom Blaeu had previously transmitted to Hobbes the specimen printing of the earlier part of the Opera.[50] For a number of copies—the quantity is not known, but it would probably have been at least 50, to justify the extra trouble—a variant title page was printed, with the imprint 'Amsterdam, at the house Joan Blaeu. They are also for sale in London at the house of Cornelius Bee, at the royal arms, in the street commonly called Little Britain, 1668.'[51] It may have been the delivery of these books to Bee that [47] See, e.g., Hatchwell, Thomas Hobbes, item 185.

[48] King's College, Cambridge, pressmark Keynes A. 05. 12–13 ('Andreas De Bro Berghen in Urbe A.° 1676'). This is the copy with the errata slip, lacking the index (see above, p. 280).

[49] Correspondence, ii, pp. 708–9 (9 [/19] July 1669).

[50] See above, p. 277.

[51] 'AMSTELODAMI, Apud IOANNEM BLAEV. Prostant etiam LONDINI apud CORNELIVM BEE, sub In-prompted the advertisement in the London 'Term Catalogue' in February 1669: 'Thomae Hobbes Malmesburiensis Opera philosophica . . . In Quarto. Two Volumes. Price, bound, 20s.'[52] If so, the date of the advertisement, like that of Sorbière's letter, does tend to suggest that copies can have become available only at the end of 1668, or even in January 1669. (At any rate, Bee certainly had his copies before the late summer of 1669; they do not include the extra pamphlet which was added then by Blaeu.) In the mid-eighteenth century the bibliophile Siegmund Jakob Baumgarten claimed that this Cornelius Bee issue was 'really printed in England', and that although it agreed in the smallest details with the Blaeu edition, the type and the paper showed it to be different; he argued that Bee had been the original printer of the Opera philosophica, and that the operation had then been transferred to Holland because of the opposition of the English authorities.[53] This claim was then taken up by another German writer, Friedrich Gotthilf Freytag, who, having come across a volume which had the Cornelius Bee title page but contained only De corpore, De homine, and De cive, suggested that those were the only works printed in England, and that the full edition was printed thereafter in Amsterdam. The Bee issue, he noted, 'is much less common in these parts, since it was printed in England, as the typeface demonstrates'.[54] Both Baumgarten and Freytag were mistaken, however; the type and paper are the same as in the normal Blaeu edition, and Freytag was misled by the fact that he had seen only the first volume (as arranged in the order set out in the 'Small Suggestion to the Reader') of a two- or three-volume set.

Cornelius Bee had been active as a bookseller since the late 1630s. He may have known Joan Blaeu personally, having perhaps made his acquaintance when he visited Holland in 1655.[55] That he was used as a trusted intermediary by the Blaeus in 1667 has already been noted; indeed, it may have been thanks to that transaction, which allowed him to see a pre-publication copy of much of the Opera philosophica, that he decided to become a subsidiary publisher of the work. Bee seems to have been more a book dealer than a publisher; the list of items issued over his own imprint is fairly small, though of high intellectual quality, with a series of publications on astronomy in the 1650s, a major work by Selden (De synedriis (3 vols., 1650–55)), an edition of Aeschylus (1663), and, above all, the nine folio volumes of biblical commentary edited by John Pearson, Critici sacri (1660), of which Bee was the lead-signibus Regalibus in Vico vulgò vocato Little Brittain. 1668.'

[52] Arber, ed., Term Catalogues, i, p. 7.

[53] Baumgarten, Nachrichten, iii (1749), pp. 494–6 (p. 495: 'wirklich in England gedruckt').

[54] Freytag, Analecta litteraria, pp. 460–61 (p. 461: 'in his terris, multo est infrequentior, cum in Anglia excusa est, id quod litterarum demonstrat character').

[55] Plomer, Dictionary, 1641–67, p. 19; McKenzie and Bell, Chronology and Calendar, i, p. 372.

ing co-publisher.[56] His personal reputation was high: in 1659 the antiquary William Somner described him as 'a man, indeed, who has deserved well of the literary world, because of the many books of better note which he has published at his own care and expense'.[57] Even if Blaeu himself had not regularized his position with Andrew Crooke, the holder of the rights to many of Hobbes's texts, it may be assumed that Bee would have taken care to do so. Nevertheless, it is a little surprising that Cornelius Bee so openly advertised the sale of a collection including Leviathan, a text which had recently been threatened with investigation by a parliamentary committee, and for the reprinting of which—in the English language, at least—no bookseller could possibly have expected to obtain permission from the authorities in England.

The 1670 Edition

The second Blaeu edition of the Latin Leviathan was issued, as a separate publication, not as part of a 'collected works' edition, in 1670. The circumstances of its production are not documented, and it is not mentioned in the surviving correspondence of either Hobbes or Pieter Blaeu. One early inscription records purchase of a copy on 20 [/30] August 1670, which supplies a terminus ad quem for the publication of the book.[58]

In many ways the 1670 Leviathan is a very close copy of the 1668 text: it has the same small quarto format, the same page size, and the same type. The ornamented capitals used in 1668 at the beginnings of the dedicatory epistle, the Introduction, Parts 2, 3, and 4, and the Appendix, are all reused; a merely decorative ornament used at the end of Part 1 (p. 82) is also used again, but where the 1668 printing employs it a second time at the end of the list of contents (sig. 5a4v), the 1670 edition has a different ornament. The only major differences in the presentation of the book are that 1670 has a full title page, with publication details; the Errata-list disappears, as those errors have been corrected in the text; and a single new 'Erratum' is listed, at the very end of the book, below the index of biblical citations. Although there are many small textual changes, the 1670 edition is essentially a page-by-page [56] The preparation of the Critici sacri took six years and cost 'Cornelius Bee and his Partners' a total of 'about a Thousand pounds, besides Paper and Printing' (see Bee et al., Case of Cornelius Bee).

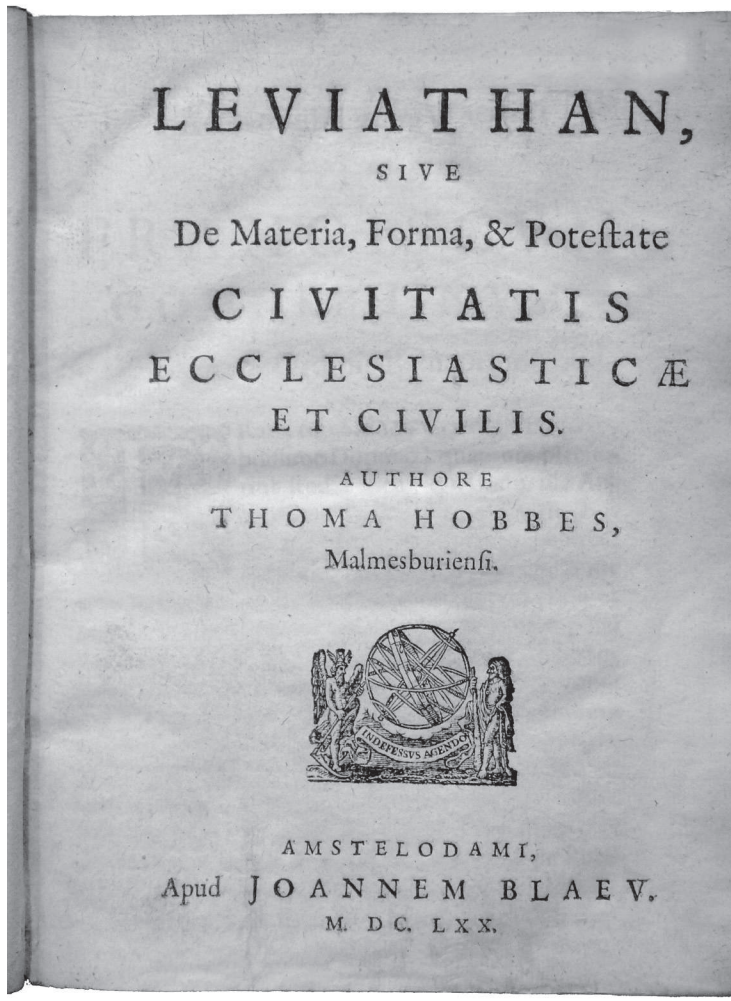
[57] Somner, Dictionarium saxonico-latino-anglicum, sig. a4v: 'viro sanè, ob plures melioris notae libros ipsius curâ & impensis in vulgus emissos, de re literariâ bene merito'.

[58] Kungliga Biblioteket, Stockholm, pressmark 165 A (blank leaf before title page: '20 Aug: 70. Rip:'). This copy seems to have been bought in England (the inscription on the title page is 'E libris Mich: Harding e Coll. Trin: Oxon:', i.e., Michael Harding, BA 1669, Fellow of Trinity College, Oxford, 1672, who died in Oxford in 1689 (Foster, Alumni, ii, p. 648), and a later inscription is by 'J Henninge. Oxonij. A[nn]o 97'). The meaning of 'Rip:' is unclear.



LEVIATHAN,
SIVE
De Materia, Forma, & Poteſtate
CIVITATIS
ECCLESIASTICÆ
ET CIVILIS.
AUTHORE
THOMA HOBBES,
Malmesburienſi.
AMSTELODAMI,
Apud JOANNEM BLAEV.
M. DC. LXX.

FIGURE 12. Leviathan, 1670 edition, title page

reprint of 1668—indeed, for the most part, it follows it line by line. There are only a few cases where a change in lineation means that a page-break takes place at a different point in the text. The break between pp. 37 and 38 differs slightly, simply because of a difference in the setting of the same text; the change in that of pp. 43–4 is caused by a small textual revision; the difference in the case of pp. 171–2 is the only major one, caused by elimination of the 22-word dittography mentioned above.[59] The altered break between pp. 225 and 226 arises from a very small textual change; and the differences in the cases of pp. 255–6, 342–3, and 346–7 arise only from resetting the same text.

[59] See above, p. 278.

One consequence of this close reproduction of 1668 was that pages from one edition could be used, if necessary, to make up a defective copy of the other. This happened in at least one case (as we shall see). But the main reason for following 1668 so precisely must have been that the compositor's task thereby became much simpler: no foresight was needed for the avoidance of 'widows' (short end-of-paragraph lines at the tops of pages) or 'orphans' (single start-of-paragraph lines at the bottoms of pages) or single-word end-of-paragraph lines anywhere, and less juggling with spaces was needed for line justification. It is therefore not surprising to see that the capitalization of words and the use of italics (both of which have an effect on length) were left almost always unchanged. In some ways the reproduction of the 1668 edition was quite mechanical: an incorrect catchword at the bottom of p. 191, for example, was precisely reproduced. Some minor changes in punctuation may perhaps have been made by the compositors, whether consciously or not. But overall, the mechanical nature of the reproduction of the text makes it seem likely that the specific changes found in 1670 were the responsibility of the corrector, who had evidently gone through the whole work with some care.

These changes are many and various. Preferred Latin spellings are imposed: thus 'expectandi' becomes 'exspectandi', 'coeci' becomes 'caeci', 'oportunitate' becomes 'opportunitate', 'veruntamen' becomes 'verumtamen', 'representativa' becomes 'repraesentativa', and so on.[60] Some biblical names are given a different orthography: thus 'Abirom' is changed to 'Abiron', and 'Abiathar' to 'Abjathar'.[61] The punctuation is lightly revised, the main change being a more thoughtful use of the colon (sometimes replacing a semi-colon, which could have the function of a colon in the 1668 printing). In the first paragraph of Chapter 41, for instance, the first clause (up to '. . . Partes') has a semi-colon in 1668 but a colon in 1670; and in the second paragraph, the phrase 'hoc modo' is followed by a comma in 1668 and by a colon in 1670.[62] The evident printing errors in 1668 (including, as mentioned above, all those listed in the Errata) are corrected, though the typesetters in 1670 do introduce a few new errors of their own.[63] There are many small improvements to Hobbes's Latin, some of them making necessary changes

[60] For the occurrences of the 1668 forms see pp. 191, 321, 473, 763, 1181.

[61] Similarly, see pp. 745, 1245.

[62] For the 1668 punctuation see p. 761. The changes were not always so thoughtful, however; in the final sentence of the first paragraph here, the semi-colon after 'docendo' was also changed to a colon.

[63] E.g., pp. 239, 'decimasaptima' for 'decimaseptima'; 507, 'Craeci' for 'Graeci'.

to comply with elementary rules of grammar (above all, the matching of singular subjects with singular verbs, and of plurals with plurals), and some removing blemishes (the most common of which are inconsistencies in Hobbes's use of tenses, and a failure to use the subjunctive). A small number of improvements—or, at least, intended improvements—are also made to the Index, which suggests that the corrector and the indexer were two different people.

Sometimes a change in the wording of Hobbes's Latin was evidently dictated not so much by the rules of Latin as by a consideration of the meaning of the passage. In some cases scrutiny of this kind led to the correction of a simple misprint, which a hasty reader might have left undisturbed: for example, 'punire' (to punish), a misprint for 'puniri' (to be punished).[64] From time to time the corrector made a larger change, with good reason. For instance, where 1668 had 'Quod Prophetis extraordinariis loquutus sit, dictum est supra. Quomodo autem loquutus est ad Prophetas hos, Vocationis perpetuæ?' ('That God spoke to extraordinary prophets, has been said above. But how did he speak to these prophets of perpetual vocation?'), the corrector of 1670 recalled that the whole previous discussion had been about how God spoke to his extraordinary prophets, and changed 'Quod' to 'Quomodo'—thereby also restoring the symmetry of the two quoted sentences.[65]

In many cases, however, the correction was unnecessary or positively mistaken. In Chapter 8, for example, Hobbes wrote in the English that 'the most sober men, when they walk alone without care and employment of the mind, would be unwilling the vanity and Extravagance of their thoughts at that time should be publiquely seen: which is a confession, that Passions unguided, are for the most part meere Madnesse'; the last phrase was accurately translated in the 1668 version as 'Passiones irregulares plerumque Insaniam meram esse', but the corrector in 1670 was puzzled by the somewhat redundant use of 'meram', and so rewrote the phrase as 'Passiones meras irregulares plerumque Insaniam esse' ('mere unguided passions are for the most part madness').[66] This type of correction, albeit mistaken, shows quite a high degree of attention to the text. Again, near the end of Chapter 17 Hobbes wrote, describing the sovereign: 'For by this Authoritie, given him by every particular man in the Common-Wealth, he hath the use of so much Power and Strength conferred on him, that by terror thereof, he is inabled to conforme the wills of them all.' In the 1668 edition this was translated as 'Authoritate enim tanta ab omnibus & singulis collata . . . conformare possit'; the corrector in 1670, not understanding the ablative construction

[64] See p. 267. [65] See p. 669. [66] See p. 115.

(perhaps because of the lack of a circumflex on the second 'a' of 'tanta'), changed 'Authoritate' to 'Authoritas', making it the subject of 'possit', and thereby producing a sentence which made reasonable sense ('For so much authority . . . is enabled to conform . . .')—but not the sense that Hobbes had intended.[67] Earlier in the same chapter Hobbes had written: 'Nor is it the joyning together of a small number of men, that gives them this security; because in small numbers, small additions on the one side or the other, make the advantage of strength so great, as is sufficient to carry the Victory; and therefore gives encouragement to an Invasion.' Translating it into Latin, he had abbreviated slightly: the middle part of the sentence became, in the 1668 edition, 'quia in parvis numeris parva Sociorum accessio ad certam sufficit victoriam' ('because in small numbers, a small addition of allies suffices for certain victory'). The corrector in 1670 changed 'ad certam sufficit' to 'incertam reddit', so that the phrase meant 'because in small numbers, a small addition of allies renders uncertain the victory'—a correction that might be described as both intelligent and wrong-headed.[68] Many other examples of this kind could be given, and they all demonstrate two things: that the corrector was someone other than Hobbes, and that when he made his corrections he was working only from a scrutiny of the 1668 edition. There is nothing that would require us to suppose that he ever checked against the original copy-manuscript of the Latin, and there is ample evidence that he did not check against the published English text.

The 1670 text shows signs, then, of quite careful revision. Curiously, however, it also contains evidence of unusual carelessness in the printing-house, where in one respect there seems to have been an elementary failure of communication between the corrector and the compositors. When the pages or sheets of the 1668 edition, annotated by the corrector, were passed to the compositors, they must have included a handful of annotations where the corrector had sensed the need for a textual change, but had had difficulty formulating it. In these cases he had made a tentative note, keyed to an asterisk in the text. But (perhaps because he had forgotten, by the time he reached the end of the text, to go back and deal with these points) he seems not to have mentioned this to the compositor, who in each case dutifully set the asterisk together with the tentative annotation (the latter, sometimes, in brackets). Thus in Chapter 14, where the English had the following passage, 'And therefore there be some Rights, which no man can be understood by any words, or other signes, to have abandoned, or transferred. As first a man cannot lay down the right of resisting them, that assault him by force, to take away his life; because he cannot be understood to ayme thereby, at any Good to himselfe. The same may be sayd of Wounds, and Chayns, and Imprisonment . . .', the Latin in 1668 omitted the entire 'As first. . .' sentence, thus rendering the phrase 'The same may be sayd. . .' quite obscure. (The error may have been committed by Hobbes, or by the copyist in England, or by the compositor.) The corrector in 1670 sensed the need for an insertion at that point; and since he noticed that subsequent sentences pursuing this line of argument were introduced with 'Secundò' and 'Tertiò' ('Secondly', 'Thirdly'), he added the note which was duly printed in the text as follows: '(*Primò, de morte intentata---)' ('First, concerning a situation where death is threatened . . .').[69] The phrase he used was derived from a discussion a couple of pages later, where the English had 'For (as I have shewed before) no man can transferre, or lay down his Right to save himselfe from Death, Wounds, and Imprisonment', and the Latin translated 'Death' as 'Mortem intentatam' ('threatened death' or 'a threat of death').[70]

[67] pp. 260–61. [68] See pp. 256–7.

Near the end of Chapter 14, Hobbes discussed the two kinds of fear that might make people keep their covenants: fear of invisible spirits and fear of powerful men. In the English he had written: 'The Feare of the former is in every man, his own Religion: which hath place in the nature of man before Civill Society. The later hath not so; at least not place enough, to keep men to their promises; because in the condition of meer Nature, the inequality of Power is not discerned, but by the event of Battell.' In the 1668 edition the first part of the second sentence was given as 'Posterior Metus cum Civitatibus natus est; sed ad cogendos homines ad Pactorum praestationem non sufficit' ('The latter fear was born with commonwealths; but does not suffice to compel men to fulfil their covenants . . .'). Since the Latin went on to translate the rest of the second sentence, referring to what happened in the state of nature, the corrector in 1670 was understandably puzzled; the line of thought given in the original English ('hath not so; at least not place enough, to . . .') had been eliminated by the too definite statement that this kind of fear 'was born with commonwealths'. But instead of adding some qualification to the phrase 'Posterior Metus cum Civitatibus natus est', the corrector added an asterisked note which was printed as follows, after the word 'sed': '(*extra Civitatem)' ('outside the commonwealth'); this may have clarified the meaning of the clause that followed, but it merely intensified the problem, since a fear which was born only when commonwealths came into being could not have played even a partial role before they existed.

In Chapter 22, Hobbes had described 'leagues' formed by individuals

[69] See pp. 202–3. [70] See pp. 216–17.

within the state as factions and conspiracies, and had commented: 'For all uniting of strength by private men, is, if for evill intent, unjust; if for intent unknown, dangerous to the Publique, and unjustly concealed.' The somewhat abridged version of this given in the Latin was—thanks to scribal or compositorial error in 1668—defective, lacking a word for 'intent': 'quoties autem Civium vires suas conjungentium incognitum est, ut Civitati periculosum, injustum & injustè celatum est' ('for whenever the [ ] of the citizens uniting their forces is unknown, insofar as it is dangerous to the commonwealth it is unjust, and unjustly concealed'). The corrector in 1670 added another asterisked insertion here, this time with good justification: '(*consilium)' ('intent', 'plan').[71]

Early in Chapter 42, the corrector found one sentence which had become garbled in the 1668 edition; unable to decide how to remove the difficulty, he merely put asterisks at the beginning and end of the sentence. These too were dutifully rendered by the compositor.[72] And later in that chapter there was the following passage in the English: 'For to every End, the Means are determined by Nature, or by God himselfe supernaturally: but the Power to make men use the Means, is in every nation resigned (by the Law of Nature, which forbiddeth men to violate their Faith given) to the Civill Soveraign.' In the 1668 edition the phrase 'which forbiddeth men to violate their Faith given' was omitted; otherwise the translation was fairly accurate, but it was printed with a rogue comma in the final clause, as follows: 'Vnicuique enim Fini Media determinantur vel per Naturam, vel per Deum ipsum supernaturaliter: sed potestas cogendi homines Mediis certis uti in omni gente per Leges Naturae est, in Summo Imperante Civili.'[73] This seems to have puzzled the corrector, who was probably prompted thereby to take 'uti' as a form of 'ut' ('as'), instead of the verb 'to use', and therefore would have found the whole phrase incoherent ('but the power of forcing men by certain means, as it is in every nation by the laws of nature, in the civil sovereign').[74] Unable to solve the problem, and perhaps intending to return to it later, he just put an asterisk between 'est,' and 'in'; this asterisk too was faithfully reproduced by the compositor.

Out of these five cases, therefore, there is only one ('consilium') that is so plainly correct and sufficient that one might imagine that it had been contributed by Hobbes. The 'Primò, de morte intentata---' correction was also well-intentioned; but its provisional, jotting-like quality makes it an unlikely candidate for an authorial improvement. Of the other three cases, one is a correction of an ultimately unhelpful kind, and the other two are expressions of sheer bewilderment. Given the common form of all these asterisked interventions, it can be concluded with some certainty that they were all the work of the corrector in Amsterdam, and not contributed by the author himself.

[71] See pp. 370–71. [72] See p. 787, where the nature of the difficulty, and some possible solutions, are presented in note n. [73] See pp. 916–17.

[74] The corrector was probably also not expecting such an ugly construction as 'potestas cogendi homines . . . uti', which is calqued on the English construction, 'the Power to make men use'.

That Hobbes had anything to do with the production of this edition must be doubted. Whether he was even told about it in advance is not known. But we may presume that he became aware, sooner or later, of its existence; the work is commonly found in public collections in the United Kingdom, so it seems that it was quite widely available in England.[75] Auction catalogues record the sale of second-hand copies in London in 1678, 1683, and 1704 (at 5*s*. 2*d*., 4*s*., and 1*s*. 9*d*., respectively).[76] The wide distribution of the 1670 Leviathan shows that sales of the 1668 Opera philosophica had not quenched demand for the work; indeed, as was suggested above, the Latin Leviathan was probably the main selling-point of that collection, and if the Blaeus encountered a strong demand for the Leviathan on its own, they may have decided to satisfy it before the stock of the 1668 collection was completely exhausted. That might explain an anomalous copy of the 1668 edition of Leviathan, in which one quire is in fact from the 1670 printing. In that quire, the printed signatures (sig. Mm) have been crossed out and the relevant ones for the 1668 edition (sig. 4n) written in ink; this may suggest instructions to a binder, at a time when the work was still in sheets, in which case the Blaeus were perhaps making good a defective copy of the 1668 printing after 1670. But other explanations are of course possible: an owner of a defective copy might simply have brought in the missing quire from a cheap or damaged copy of the 1670 edition at a later stage.[77] Similarly, the copy of the 1668 Opera philosophica in Leiden University Library in which the second volume includes a copy of the 1670 Leviathan could represent a combination made by the Blaeus, or by another bookseller, at the outset; but it may have been just the product of a later improvisation.[78]

[75] The online catalogue COPAC (www.copac.ac.uk), a union catalogue of academic and public libraries in the UK, lists 20 copies (accessed Dec. 2009).

[76] [Dunmore and Chiswell,] Catalogus librorum Doctoris Worsley (BN, Q-2520), 2nd pagination, p. 13; [Millington,] Catalogus bibliothecae Joannis Arthurii (BL, 821. i. 3(5)), p. 17; Hooke, Bibliotheca Coppingiana (BL, 821. g. 3(3)), p. 5.

[77] This anomalous copy is in the collection of Prof. Kinch Hoekstra, to whom I am very grateful for allowing me to examine and collate it. The binding is in a German style, from the late 17th or early 18th century.

[78] Leiden University Library, pressmark 546 C 13–14. The bindings of the two volumes have been re-backed, and the original boards, of plain white vellum, cannot be dated with any accuracy. But the age- and dirt-stains on the page edges suggest that this Leviathan has been bound with the other items in the second volume for a very long time.

The Undated Issue of the 1670 Edition

It is possible that at some time in the period 1668–70, when the Blaeus received requests from booksellers or buyers who wanted only the Leviathan, they acceded to some of those requests, and thus eventually found themselves with some rump copies of the Opera philosophica lacking the Leviathan section; those copies could have been made up, after 1670, using the new edition. There was in fact a special issue of the 1670 edition, in which the title page was replaced by a close imitation of the section title which preceded the work in the 1668 collection.[79] One would expect this issue to have been used to make up otherwise deficient copies of the 1668 Opera philosophica. Yet the few known copies of the special issue have all survived as separate volumes; no copies have been found in combination with the rest of the 1668 Opera philosophica (though it may be that some lurk there unnoticed). A possible explanation for this state of affairs is offered below.

The 1676 and 1678 Issues of the 1670 Edition

It was fortunate that the reprinting of the Latin Leviathan happened only two years after the 1668 edition, and not four or more. It thus took place at the apogee of the Blaeu firm's career. From 1672 onwards, however, a series of hammer blows fell, first on the Blaeus, then on the commerce and economic life of the Netherlands, and then on the publication of Hobbes's works in that country.

The first blow was the catastrophic fire which broke out in the Blaeus' new printing-house (in the Gravenstraat) at 3 o'clock in the morning of 23 February /2 March 1672. Within three hours the building was destroyed, together with all the presses, a huge quantity of engraved plates, 30,000–40,000 pounds of type, a mass of paper, and a large store of printed books.[80] The Blaeus still had their other printing-house (where many books were stored) and their shop; but the financial losses were enormous, and after Joan Blaeu's death at the end of the following year a severe programme of retrenchment was begun. The stock of books and plates was sold in a series of auctions in 1674–7; the shop was sold in 1678; and although the printing-house continued to issue a few items under the Blaeu imprint, it was mostly [79] One copy of this issue is Bodl., pressmark Vet. B3 e. 124 (where the title page is slightly cut down); another is listed in Hatchwell, Thomas Hobbes, item 187 (specifying also a misprinting of sig. Ee3 as 'Ee5' which is not, however, peculiar to this issue); another copy is in the editor's collection. The issue is not recorded in Macdonald and Hargreaves, Bibliography.

[80] Blaeu, Lettere ai fiorentini, p. 209; Koeman, Joan Blaeu, pp. 10–11.

LEVIATHAN,
SIVE
De Materia, Forma, & Poteſtate
CIVITATIS
ECCLESIASTICÆ
ET CIVILIS.
AUTHORE
THOMA HOBBES,
Malmesburienſi.
LONDINI,
Apud JOHANNEM TOMSONI.
M. DC. LXXVI.
Vet. A3 1023

FIGURE 13. Leviathan, 1676 'Tomson' issue of the 1670 edition, title page (Bodl. Vet. A3 e.1023; by permission of the Bodleian Library, University of Oxford)

used by other publishers (especially by members of a partnership, the 'Compagnie', which the Blaeus joined).[81]

The second blow was the invasion of the United Provinces by France in May 1672; the French penetrated into the heart of the country, seizing Utrecht in June, and were prevented from advancing further only by the deliberate flooding of a large area of land. France's allies included the Prince-[81] Koeman, Joan Blaeu, pp. 97–100; van Eeghen, De Amsterdamse boekhandel, iii, pp. 23–5.

Archbishop of Münster and the Elector of Cologne, with the result that the Dutch were almost surrounded. During the years that followed, until the Treaty of Nijmegen in August 1678, blockades and seizures had a serious effect on Dutch commercial life.

The third blow seems very minor in comparison, but is nevertheless significant where the publishing history of Hobbes's works is concerned. The effect of the publication of the Dutch Leviathan in 1667 had been to provoke a whole sequence of public denunciations of the work: these included decrees forbidding people to read it, issued by the Classis of Amsterdam in 1667; complaints about it in the Synod in 1668; a formal request to the States of Holland from the Deputies of the Synods of South and North Holland, asking for a ban on it in 1670; and a repetition of that request in 1671.[82] Finally, in July 1674, a general decree (acceding to those requests) was issued by the Court of Holland over the name of the stadhouder, forbidding the 'printing, distributing, or selling' of Leviathan, as well as Spinoza's Tractatus.[83] The ecclesiastical denunciations did not, admittedly, deter the publisher of the Dutch translation of Leviathan from reissuing the work, with his name on it, in 1672.[84] But the civil decree was a more serious matter. Some sign of the fear it engendered is given by the fact that when a Dutch translation of Hobbes's De cive was issued in 1675, the names of the translator, printer, and bookseller were all omitted from it.[85]

From the large number of copies of the 1670 Leviathan that survive today, it can at least be assumed that the main stock of them was not stored in the Gravenstraat printing-house. But if some of the remaining stock of the 1668 Opera philosophica was there, including perhaps some copies from which the Leviathan section had been removed and sold off separately, this could explain why the undated issue mentioned above, with its title page mimicking the section title page of the 1668 printing, had eventually to be sold on its own. In this scenario, the small number of copies of this issue would have been produced at the outset, with the intention of making up those incomplete 1668 sets; but because the 1670 Leviathan was printed at the old printing-house, [82] See, respectively: Meinsma, Spinoza en zijn kring, p. 270; Knuttel, Verboden boeken, p. 57; Kleerkooper and van Stockum, Boekhandel, i, pp. 157–9; Meinsma, op. cit., p. 386. A later reference to a condemnation of Leviathan by the pastors of Utrecht (Cocq, Hobbesianismi anatome, sig. *3v) probably alludes to the Synodal resolution of 1670.

[83] Cau et al., Groot placaet-boek, iii, pp. 523–4 ('te Drucken, divulgeren ofte verkopen').

[84] Macdonald and Hargreaves, Bibliography, p. xvi.

[85] Hobbes, De eerste beginselen. On this edition (omitted from Macdonald and Hargreaves, Bibliography) see Schoneveld, 'Some Features of the Editions of De Cive' pp. [135], 141. It also seems likely that the 1672 Dutch Leviathan was subject to seizures and confiscations, as it is much rarer than the 1667 edition. The union catalogue of Dutch libraries records 12 copies of the 1667 edn., but only one (in Amsterdam University Library) of the 1672 edn. (http://picarta.pica.nl, accessed in the Royal Library, The Hague, Jan. 2010).

on the Bloemgracht, these copies of the special issue remained there and so escaped the fire.[86] It is noteworthy that in this issue the title page is the only page that differs; in other words, it was put in as a cancel page. This contrasts, as we shall see, with the other issues of the 1670 Leviathan.

Those other issues are dated 1676 and 1678. Both have very similar title pages, with the title given in the wording of the 1670 edition, then a printer's ornament consisting of a coin of the Emperor Titus, and at the bottom the imprint 'LONDINI Apud JOHANNEM TOMSONI' ('London, at the house of John Tomson') in 1676, and 'LONDINI Typis JOANNIS THOMSONII' ('London, printed by John Thomson') in 1678. Since the bulk of the book, in each case, consists of sheets of the 1670 Blaeu edition, it is clear that the claim made in the 1678 imprint cannot be true. The wording in 1676 was more ambiguous, but the bizarre mismatch of accusative and genitive in 'JOHANNEM TOMSONI' ('apud' takes the accusative) raises the suspicion that it was altered at the last minute from 'Typis JOHANNIS TOMSONI'. Is it possible that a John Tomson or Thomson was involved in some way in the history of these issues, albeit not as their printer? Pieter Blaeu's letter to Hobbes in 1667 expressed friendly feelings towards, and long acquaintance with, the London bookseller Samuel Thompson or Thomson (Blaeu used the latter spelling).[87] However, Samuel Thompson died in the second half of 1668, and the terms of his will make it evident that his business, gravely weakened by 'my late losses in the Fireing of London', had to be wound up after his death. He did have a son called John, but the will stipulated 'that my Sonne John bee maintained in the place where hee now is in Oxford vntill hee bee Master of Arts, and enter on the Ministry'.[88] John Thompson graduated BA at St Edmund Hall, Oxford, in 1668, and did proceed MA in 1671; while it is not known whether he had any sort of clerical career thereafter, it is fairly certain that he did not become a printer or bookseller by trade.[89] One might imagine that he somehow got involved in selling these particular books, even though that was not his profession; but the 1676 and 1678 title pages do not imply that 'John Thomson' was taking the role performed by Cornelius Bee in 1668. Bee's function was clearly designated as the person selling the books (for which purpose the address of his shop was given in the imprint), whereas the 'John Tomson' imprint supplied no address, identified him in 1678 as the printer, and made [86] For evidence that it was printed there, see below, p. 300.

[87] Correspondence, ii, pp. 694–5.

[88] TNA, PROB 11/328, fos. 266v–267v (will made in Aug. and proved in Nov. 1668).

[89] Foster, Alumni, iv, p. 1477; there is no entry for him in Plomer, Dictionary, 1668–1725, or in McKenzie and Bell, Chronology (which mentions just one John Thompson, not a printer or bookseller: iii, p. 201). The assumption that he was the publisher of these issues of the Latin Leviathan was mistakenly made in Correspondence, ii, p. 696.

no mention of the true printer. And, finally, it must be said that if the whole purpose of these issues was to sell copies in England, it is surprising that English institutional libraries do not contain any copies that can be shown to have been in the country since the seventeenth century. Of the 1676 issue only two are known in the United Kingdom today, both of which have non-English provenances (compared with two surviving copies in France, four in Germany, and two in Finland); of the 1678 issue not a single copy is known in England (and none in France, but five in Germany and one in Switzerland).[90]

In short, all the evidence suggests that the imprint was fictitious. The Blaeus were no strangers to ruses of this kind. As Pieter confidentially informed his friend Antonio Magliabechi in 1664, Joan Blaeu produced huge quantities of Catholic liturgical and devotional works in his printing-house under the fictitious Cologne imprint of 'Balthazar van Egmond'.[91] The connection with Samuel Thompson would thus have been merely that his surname came into the head of one of the Blaeus when they were trying to think of a typical English name. But while the bogus nature of the Tomson imprint can be taken for granted, the precise reasons for it are less clear. It might be thought that the subterfuge was a response to the decree of 1674, which had apparently put some fear in the hearts and minds of Dutch publishers. However, the decree proscribed two types of activity: printing the work on the one hand, and distributing or selling it on the other. The Blaeus could not have been held liable after 1674 for a printing which had occurred in 1670, so there was no reason to remove the original date—indeed, there was good reason to retain it. As for the offence of distributing or selling the book, this would have been the same offence whether the book was printed in Amsterdam or in London.

Another relevant consideration is the fact that whereas the undated issue of the 1670 edition (the one discussed above, with the imitation of the section title page of 1668) was achieved simply by the use of a cancel title page, [90] Bodl. pressmark Vet. A3 e. 1023 has an annotation in an 18th-century German hand, an ownership inscription by 'Hofmann, D.', and the stamp of the 'Preetzer Prediger Bibliothek' (the library at Preetz, in Schleswig-Holstein, founded by the Lutheran pastor Petrus Scheele in 1693). BL, pressmark C. 123. fff. 11(1.), has an inscription dated 1715 recording that it was given by Peter Koller, a student of theology, to 'J. Rud. Cramer'—perhaps Johann Rudolf Cramer, from the canton of Zurich, who edited Maimonides, Hilkot bikkurim (Leiden, 1702). The figures given here are taken from the websites of COPAC, ESTC (http://estc.bl.uk), the Karlsruher Virtuelle Katalog (http://www.ubka.uni-karlsruhe.de/kvk.html), and the Catalogue collectif de France (http://ccfr.bnf.fr) (all accessed Dec. 2009). The following are also recorded: 1676: Duke University Library, University of Sydney, State Public Historical Library (Moscow); 1678: Harvard University, Harvard University Law School, University of Chicago, University of Pennsylvania. One early auction catalogue does list a Latin Leviathan as published in '1675' ([Millington,] Catalogus librorum Joannis Arthurii, p. 17 (BL pressmark 821 i 3(5): sold for 4*s*.)); but as it also gives the place of publication as Amsterdam, this may be assumed to be a mistranscription or misprint for '1670'.

[91] Blaeu, Lettere ai fiorentini, p. 108. Henk van Veen indicates that other false imprints of this kind were also used by the Blaeus (p. 56).

these 'Tomson' issues involved the reprinting of one entire sheet. The original arrangement of the book in 1668 had included a half-sheet for the title page and dedicatory epistle, and another half-sheet for the last two leaves (sig. 5c1–2, containing the end of the Index and the index of biblical citations). In the 1670 edition these two half-sheets were, naturally enough, printed together as a single sheet (sigs. *1–2 and Bbb1–2); and it was this sheet that was entirely reset, in close imitations of the 1670 printing, in the 1676 and 1678 issues.[92] (That this printing was done by the Blaeus is shown not only by the use of the same typefaces, but also by the use of the same ornamental initial on sig. *2r—details which tend to show, also, that the 1670 edition was printed in the old printing-house on the Bloemgracht, where the type and the ornament remained out of harm's way.) Resetting these pages, and reproducing them so precisely, would have involved much more work than merely printing cancel title pages, so there must have been a good reason for doing so.

Where cancel pages were concerned, if a publisher was distributing a book to booksellers (something which, in quantity, was generally done in sheets), he would usually score the page to be cancelled (the 'cancellandum') with a sharp knife, but leave it in place, sending that sheet and the cancel page (the 'cancellans') together.[93] If, as was less common, he cut out the cancellandum before consigning the book, the fact that such a change was being made would be fully apparent so long as the book was being sent in unbound sheets; only in a bound copy would it be difficult to see that a cancellation had taken place. And the visibility of the cancellation in an unbound set of sheets would be greatest, of course, where the cancellation was of the title page of the book—the first sheet to be looked at. The reprinting of the entire sheet would remove this problem. What these considerations suggest is that the main aim of the Blaeus in not only changing the imprint but also reprinting the whole sheet was to evade a certain kind of scrutiny of unbound copies of the book, in transit. And what is relevant here, therefore, is not the general prohibition, within the territory of Holland, of distributing or selling the book, but the commercial problems experienced by Dutch producers during the Franco-Dutch war of 1672–8, when their products were subjected to embargoes and confiscations. To disguise the Dutch origin of the book, it would have been necessary either to have every single copy bound (with a cancel title page) before it was exported, or to print a new sheet so that it would not be apparent that the title page had been replaced. The fact that such a high proportion of the surviving copies of the 'Tomson' issues is to be found in Germany suggests that the main concern may have been with deliveries to the Frankfurt and Leipzig book fairs; perhaps the route normally used by the Blaeus went through hostile territory, and they were obliged either to find another route or to disguise the book as something merely in transit through the United Provinces.[94] The quantities were, admittedly, rather small (if the number of surviving copies is any guide); yet it seems that the financial gains from the 1676 issue must have made the operation worthwhile, as the whole process was repeated in 1678, with a fresh setting and printing of the sheet containing the title page. This scenario does at least offer a plausible account of the production of the two 'Tomson' issues; without much more evidence of similar practices by Dutch publishers during these years, however, it is a tentative explanation which must remain little more than a conjecture.

[92] In some copies of the 1678 issue in particular, e.g., the University of Chicago copy (pressmark JC 153. H65), the paper of the new sheet is appreciably inferior to, and has undergone much more browning than, the rest of the book.

[93] See Gaskell, New Introduction, p. 135.

These two issues contain a variety of very minor changes, the majority of them in the Index, and none of them affecting the sense. Some changes to capitalization and orthography are made in both issues, some in one and some in the other; both correct the misprint 'authotitate' (for 'authoritate') found in the 1670 printing; the 1676 issue has rather more misprints than the 1678 one, but the latter does introduce some misprints of its own (such as 'epilipsiam', for 'epilepsiam'), and it is certainly based on the 1670 edition, not the 1676 one (one entire index sub-entry, mistakenly omitted in 1676, is included in 1678).[95] There is nothing here of real importance to the text. But one feature of these issues does raise a larger question: the ornament, reproducing a coin of the Emperor Titus, used on the title page. This item, derived presumably from a numismatic work, is a fairly accurate representation of one of the larger and commoner coins of that emperor, probably a sestertius. It shows his head in profile, with the inscription around it: 'IMP. T. CAES. VESPAV. C. [for: VESP AVG.] P. M. TR. P.P.P. COS VIII.', standing for 'Imperator Titus Caesar Vespasianus Augustus Pontifex Maximus Tribunicia Potestate ['holding the Tribunician power'] Pater Patriae ['Father of his Country'] Consul VIII ['Consul for the eighth time']. It dates, therefore, from 80–81 AD.[96] Was it pure chance that led to the selection of this particular image—the main desideratum being that it should not be recognizable as Dutch, or as the ornament of any known printer? Perhaps. Yet the choice of this coin may have carried, on the other hand, a subliminal message. This obverse occurs with various reverses, but the most famous is that with a palm tree and a trophy-heap of captured weapons, amid which are a dejected couple of captive Jews, with the legend 'IVD CAP' ('Iudaea capta', 'Judaea captured'). The image had been introduced on coins of Vespasian ten years earlier, and had obviously held its triumphalist appeal for a long time. It is not unthinkable that, among the scholarly hacks and well-educated correctors who frequented the Blaeus' printing-house on the Bloemgracht, there was one who had some knowledge of the contents of Hobbes's book, and who thought it appropriate to place on it, if only by implication, an emblem of the total destruction of the Temple of God.

[94] That the export of Dutch books to these markets was badly disrupted is suggested by A. H. Laeven's analysis of the titles sold there: the number of Dutch titles in the fair catalogues fell from 727 in 1660–69 to 326 in 1670–79 ('Frankfurt and Leipzig Book Fairs', p. 191).

[95] See sigs. Bbb1r (s.v. 'Scripturae Sacrae': 'authoritate'), Bbb1v (missing entry; 'epilepsiam').

[96] I am very grateful to Prof. Ted Buttrey for this elucidation, for his account of the reverse of the coin (used below), and for his comment: 'The many numismatic books of the 16th and 17th centuries often illustrate imaginary coins with fictitious types and legends. This is for real.'

The Pardoe Advertisement of 1682

The following item was listed in the Term Catalogue (a tri-annual publication advertising new books) for Hilary Term 1682, published in February of that year: 'Leviathan, sive de Materia, Forma, et Potestate, Civitatis Ecclesiasticae et Civilis. Cum Appendice. Authore Tho. Hobbes Malmesburiensi. In Quarto. Printed for M. Pardoe at the Black Raven in the Strand.'[97] Mark Pardoe is known to have operated as a bookseller at that address (usually given as 'at the Black Raven, over against Bedford House in the Strand'); during the period 1677–86 he produced more than 20 works of a rather miscellaneous character, including a handful of scientific treatises, a few religious texts, several pamphlets by Sir William Petty, and the second edition of John Milton's History of Britain (1678).[98] It is certainly not inconceivable that he commissioned a new printing of the Latin Leviathan—or, alternatively, that he made an arrangement with the Blaeus similar to the one previously made by Cornelius Bee, resulting in a delivery of copies with a new title page bearing his name. However, no copy of any such Pardoe edition, or Pardoe issue, has ever been found. This total lack of physical evidence makes it seem more likely that he had merely obtained a quantity of the original 1670 edition, and that, whether accidentally or by design, the advertisement in the Term Catalogue was misleading its readers when it described the work as printed for him.

[97] Arber, ed., Term Catalogues, i, p. 473.
[98] See the entry in Plomer, Dictionary, 1668–1725; EEBO gives 22 items with his imprint.

3
THE PRESENT EDITION

Previous Modern Editions

The folio volume of Hobbes's Moral and Political Works, issued by an anonymous editor in 1750, contained a text of the English Leviathan that had been revised and modernized in various ways: it incorporated many small changes to punctuation, orthography, and capitals, as well as some intelligent corrections, some minor stylistic changes, and some errors of transcription. Thereafter the text remained unprinted for the best part of a century, until it appeared in the third volume of Sir William Molesworth's edition of Hobbes's English works in 1839. Molesworth too made a large number of minor changes, some intelligent, some positively mistaken, and some, perhaps, unintended; he silently corrected or expanded biblical references; and he also engaged in a wholesale modernization of accidentals. Several subsequent editions did, however, make an effort to reproduce the features of the 1651 edition: one issued by the Oxford bookseller James Thornton in 1881, one edited by W. G. Pogson Smith in 1909, the Everyman's Library edition (by A. D. Lindsay) of 1914, and the Penguin edition (by C. B. Macpherson) of 1968. The edition produced by A. R. Waller in 1904, although it applied some modern typographical conventions, did also stick closely to the spelling, capitalization, and punctuation of the original. But none of these offered an entirely error-free reprinting of the text. Other modern editors have given themselves considerable latitude to modernize or intervene in the orthography, punctuation, or paragraphing of the original: these include Henry Morley in 1885, Michael Oakeshott in 1946 (whose reworking of the original was on an almost Molesworthian scale), Edwin Curley in 1994 (who, however, scrupulously explained the degree to which he had intervened), and J. C. A. Gaskin in 1996 (who modernized spelling, and also made, as he explained, some changes to italicization and capitalization). For readers who wanted an entirely unaltered version of a 1651 printing, two photographic reproductions became available: the Scolar Press edition of 1969, which reproduced an exemplum of the Head in the British Library (pressmark 522.k.6), and the edition in the series 'Klassiker der Nationalökonomie' (Düsseldorf), published in 1990, which reproduced an exemplum of the Head in the possession of the 'Handelsblatt' company.[1]

Attempts to investigate the textual history of the work, and to apply the fruits of that investigation to an edition of it, were rather slow in coming; a definitive statement of the differences between the Head, Bear, and Ornaments editions appeared for the first time in Macdonald and Hargreaves's bibliography of Hobbes in 1952. A pioneering, rudimentary effort was made by A. R. Waller in 1904, whose edition included an appendix of textual notes listing substantive variants in the Ornaments edition (the most important of which were present also in the Bear edition—though Waller, in any case, did not distinguish between the two). In the Introduction to the Penguin edition, C. B. Macpherson made some comments on the in-press variants discovered by comparing copies of the Head edition, but his study of them was not systematic, and he made no effort to incorporate such findings into his construction of the text.

The first serious attempt to consider such questions was made by Richard Tuck in his 1991 edition: Tuck understood that the large-paper copies were printed at the end of the print run of each forme, incorporating all stop-press corrections, and therefore used the Cambridge University Library large-paper exemplum as the copy-text for his edition. Not all problems were solved by so doing, however; the lack of collation of in-press variants meant that those errors that had crept in during the printing of a forme in 1651 (thanks to the unnoticed loss of type, or to mistaken attempts to correct such loss, when noticed) could not be systematically corrected. (It may also be said that the actual reproduction of the text was not free of errors in Tuck's edition. Nor did he investigate the question of Hobbesian responsibility for any of the substantive changes in the Bear edition, although a few of those changes were recorded.) The one other way in which his edition represented a major advance was his recording of variant readings found in the fair-copy manuscript—something that no previous edition had done. Only a selection of the more important variants was included; but in many cases these variants were not merely recorded in a note, but promoted to the text as a superior reading. This was done, as a rule, when the manuscript contained a correction in Hobbes's hand to a passage which, uncorrected, corresponded to the passage printed in the Head edition; the principle seems simple enough, but there are, as we shall see, reasons for doubting whether any such simple rule should be applied.[2]

[1] For details of all the edns. mentioned here, see the Bibliography. There have also been some partial edns. of the text; these are ignored here.

[2] In one case, indeed (p. 183 of his edn.), Tuck himself drew attention to the fact that Hobbes's 'correction' generated an inferior reading.

The only edition of the English Leviathan to have presented itself as a 'critical edition' was the one prepared by G. A. J. Rogers and Karl Schuhmann, published in 2003.[3] This version of the text was in one sense very accurate: it was not contaminated by mistranscriptions or misprints. In its apparatus, this edition also gave a much more thorough (though not entirely complete) listing of the variants in the manuscript. Some very perceptive emendations were also made in this edition (but also some very questionable ones). Taken as a whole, however, this edition had many problematic features. Schuhmann had not collated copies of the Head edition for in-press variants; nor did he adopt Tuck's precaution of using a large-paper copy as his copy-text, declaring instead that 'one may safely state that any copy of the Head will do'.[4] Schuhmann's method, rather, involved collating modern editions (the Everyman, the Penguin, etc.) as surrogates for original exempla of the Head, on the grounds that each had used a different exemplum as its copy-text, and had therefore reproduced the variants of that exemplum. Unfortunately this method did not permit him to distinguish between genuine variants faithfully reproduced, deliberate but silent emendations by the modern editors, mistranscriptions by them, and misprints by their typesetters.[5] The false assumptions in Schuhmann's method became mutually reinforcing when he attempted to demonstrate that the large-paper copy used by Tuck did not consist of corrected sheets: on the one hand he did not notice that the only cases where the large-paper copies had errors not present in other copies were cases where type had dropped out or had been wrongly reinserted (something that would have become obvious if only he had performed a collation of copies of the Head); and on the other hand he argued that Tuck's large-paper copy belonged to 'the many copies' printing an erroneous word in quire N—not realizing that all copies of the Head printed that word, and that those modern editors who gave a corrected version of the word had corrected it (whether consciously or unconsciously) themselves.[6]

Even more problematic was this edition's account of the printing history,

[3] In the brief discussion which follows, I attribute the main features of the edn., and the theory about the printing of Leviathan on which it is based, to Karl Schuhmann; I do so without wishing to diminish the contribution made to the edn. by his co-editor, John Rogers. Schuhmann worked on this edn. during his final illness (it was published after his death); the inadequacies mentioned here should not be taken to detract from his major contributions to Hobbes scholarship more generally.

[4] Rogers and Schuhmann, i, p. 261.

[5] For example: he listed 10 errors occurring in Waller's edn. which demonstrated, he argued, that the two copies of the Head used by Waller were 'among the ones printed relatively early', since those errors were 'corrected' in other copies (ibid., p. 100). But those errors do not occur in any copy of the Head; it appears that they were all introduced in Waller's edn.. There is, in any case, no such thing as a copy of the Head 'printed relatively early'; all copies are mixtures of sheets, with the sole exception of the large-paper copies, which represent the final printing of each forme.

[6] Ibid., p. 121.

which set the whole construction of the text on a false basis. Schuhmann supposed that Andrew Crooke had commissioned the simultaneous printing of the Head in England and the Bear in the Netherlands, and that the copy for the latter consisted of proofs of the former, sent to Paris, corrected there by Hobbes, and sent on to Amsterdam—with the consequence that, in many matters of detail, the Bear represented the superior text. The reason offered for such an implausible scenario (indeed, a scenario without any known parallel in the printing history of the period) was that Crooke was afraid that the Head edition might be confiscated by the authorities in London, and therefore arranged to have a second printing in reserve; but this idea is simply not compatible with the fact that he had the book licensed and registered, and printed it with his own name and address. There are many other features of the evidence that become impossible to account for on the basis of this scenario.[7] Having pushed the dating of the Bear back to 1651, Schuhmann then identified the Ornaments with the edition printed in 1670, and assumed that it contained Hobbes's own corrections and improvements.[8] Small changes made by the corrector of the Ornaments were therefore treated as authorial, and promoted to the text. (For example: in a discussion of the reputation of the seven sages of ancient Greece, where, as we have seen, the Head had—in accordance with the manuscript—'some of them for Morall and Politique Sentences', the Bear had the misprint 'some of them for Morall and Politique Sentence', and the Ornaments, working from the Bear, 'corrected' this to 'some of them for Morall and Politique Science'; Schuhmann promoted 'Science' to his text, as the correct reading.) The many small changes introduced from the Bear and the Ornaments—and, in some cases, from the manuscript without sufficient warrant—mean that the wording of Leviathan presented by Schuhmann is not a reliable text.

Where the Latin Leviathan is concerned, the modern publishing history is very sparse. Since the 1670 edition the Latin text has appeared only twice in print. The first appearance was in 1841, in Molesworth's edition of Hobbes's Latin works. This was, in essence, a reproduction of the 1668 text; but, as with the English, Molesworth made systematic changes to orthography, punctuation, capitalization, and italicization, and he also introduced his own biblical references into the text for citations that otherwise lacked them. The second modern printing was in 2001, in Raffaella Santi's trilingual English–Italian–Latin edition. Here, while the Latin text had some of the formal features of Molesworth's edition, Santi stated that she had corrected Molesworth's text in the light of the 1668 and 1670 editions; but the precise method used for the construction of her text was not explained. Santi did not record any differences between the two early editions, and appears to have thought that they were identical, with the exception of a number of misprints present in the former and corrected in the latter.[9]

[7] For more detailed comments see Malcolm, 'Making of the Bear'.
[8] For more detailed comments see Malcolm, 'Making of the Ornaments'.

For modern scholars, the most valuable contribution was made by François Tricaud in 1971, when he printed a French translation of the English text of Leviathan with a detailed set of notes translating also those passages that differed in the Latin.[10] The method used for indicating the differences was not as user-friendly as it might have been (footnotes were keyed only to the ends of passages; this gave readers the task of working back to find the beginning of the altered text, and it also discouraged the signalling of omissions, since the omitted material had to be repeated in the note). But although the present edition differs from Tricaud on some points of interpretation, and notes some changes passed over by him, it is a pleasure to pay tribute to the fine and penetrating intelligence of his work. Also valuable, though much less comprehensive, is the noting and translation of major additions in the Latin text given by Edwin Curley in his edition of the English Leviathan—though it must be pointed out that the full title of that edition, Leviathan, with Selected Variants from the Latin Edition of 1668, is not correct, as the text used by Curley was the 1670 edition (in its 1678 issue), which differs on many small but substantive points from the 1668 text. Both Tricaud and Curley supplied complete translations of the Appendix to the Latin Leviathan; another translation, heavily annotated, was published by George Wright in 1991; and translations of the Appendix into Italian have been published by Agostino Lupoli in 1988 and Raffaella Santi in 2001.[11] Tricaud's final contribution, however (left unfinished at his death, but subsequently completed by Martine Pécharman and published in 2004), was a translation of the entire Latin Leviathan into French; this edition also presents, in its footnotes, some selected variants from the 1670 edition, as well as many suggested emendations of the Latin, largely derived from the late Karl Schuhmann.[12]

[9] Hobbes, Leviatano, ed. and tr. Santi, p. lviii. A sampling of Santi's text suggests that her correction of Molesworth's text was based on the 1668 edn.

[10] The pioneer here was another scholar, Raoul Anthony, who had issued a similarly annotated translation, but of Part 1 only, in 1921.

[11] For Wright's translation see Hobbes, '1668 Appendix'; for Lupoli's, see Hobbes, Scritti teologici, pp. 205–55; Santi's is in her edn. of Leviathan. My own translation was made afresh; I have compared it with these 5 versions, and find that I have differed from them on a number of points.

[12] Hobbes, Léviathan (2004). As Pécharman explains (pp. xxx–xxxiv), Tricaud began his task on the assumption that the 1670 edn. was superior; his translation was subsequently realigned with the 1668 wording. Pécharman's Introduction also gently corrects his theory of the priority of the Latin.

Finally, it should also be mentioned that several modern editions and translations have included valuable explanatory notes, identifying references and quotations, elucidating unfamiliar terms, and so on. Among the editions already mentioned, there are useful notes of this kind in those by Curley, Gaskin, and Tricaud, as well as in the section entitled 'Biographical Notes' in Tuck's edition; also valuable in this regard are the Italian translation by Gianni Micheli (1976) and Hermann Klenner's edition of the German translation by Jutta Schlösser (1996).

Basic Features of the Present Edition

The Clarendon Edition aims to present original material as accurately as possible, omitting only those aspects of it that are of no potential importance for the study of its meaning. Thus the original orthography, capitalization, italicization, punctuation, and paragraphing are adhered to; but not the original lineation, pagination, catchwords, or ornaments, nor typographical features such as long 's', or the ligatures 'æ' or 'œ'.[13] Where the Head edition prints some capitalized words in small capitals with a larger capital initial letter, the entire word is given in this edition in small capitals; where it presents the first word of a chapter with a display capital, then an ordinary capital, and then the rest of the word in lower case, it is given here as a normal capitalized word. Where macrons have been used to abbreviate words, they are silently expanded if the abbreviation is entirely unambiguous (as it is in the few cases where they are used in the Head edition). Where the Head edition has ambiguous end-of-line hyphenations (such as 'Schoole-men' or 'two-fold'), these have been resolved, if possible, on the basis of other (non-ambiguous) occurrences of the same word, or an equivalent formation, in the copy-text. In the absence of such occurrences, the decision has been made on the basis of the form given in the MS. A list of these cases is given at the end of the text, together with a list of ambiguous end-of-line hyphenations occurring in the present edition. (The problems addressed by these lists do not arise in Hobbes's Latin, where hyphenated formations are extremely rare.) In biblical citations, the Head edition sometimes has spaces between chapter and verse numbers and sometimes does not; this has been regularized, with spaces, since some of the lists of references are hard to interpret correctly without spacing. The use of roman and italic fount for punctuation has also been regularized. The original page numbers of the Head and 1668 editions are given in bold in the text, within square brackets; where a word was broken over two pages, the new page number here is given after that word, to avoid an ugly typographical intrusion. At one point in the English, the page-turn occurs in a passage promoted to the text from the Bear edition; in that case, the siglum 'B' is added to the page number in the text, and the passage from the Head edition, printed in the textual apparatus, includes the new page number with the siglum 'H'.

[13] The lineation of the title pages is, however, reproduced; and the running titles in this edn. reproduce the wording, though not the typography, of those in the copy-texts.

The Index to the Latin Leviathan is included (and translated) in this edition. Even though (as has been argued above) it was certainly not written by Hobbes, it nevertheless forms part of the Latin edition; and its contents are not without interest, as it presents a detailed listing of the topics and arguments that caught the interest of a seventeenth-century reader.

The basis for the choice of copy-texts has been fully set out in the first two chapters of the Textual Introduction. For the English Leviathan, the copy-text is a large-paper copy of the Head edition; for the Latin, it is a copy of the relevant part of the 1668 Opera philosophica. In each case, the collation of other copies of that edition for in-press variants has yielded some points on which the copy-text required correction; these corrections have been incorporated into the text, and the original reading of the copy-text recorded in the Register of In-Press Variants. In both the English and the Latin the copy-text also contains, like all other copies of that edition, a number of evident misprints; these too have been corrected in the text, and the original readings recorded in the Register of Literal Faults. (But in the case of misprints specified in the printed Errata-lists in the copy-texts themselves, the correct readings, as called for there, have been promoted to the text, and the erroneous ones have been recorded in the textual apparatus below it.)

There is one other form of purely editorial correction of the copy-text. In a very small number of cases in the English, and a much larger number of cases in the Latin, the wording in the copy-text appears to be positively wrong, even though it cannot be dismissed automatically as a misprint (in the way that words garbled by transposition, omission, turned letters, etc., can be). For example, in the last paragraph of Chapter 5 Hobbes distinguishes certain and uncertain signs of 'science', as follows: 'Certain, when he that pretendeth the Science of any thing, can . . . demonstrate the truth thereof perspicuously to another: Uncertain, when onely some particular events answer to his pretence, and upon many occasions prove so as he sayes they must.'[14] Here a strict grammarian might argue that the last phrase ('and upon many occasions prove so. . .') was governed by the 'particular events' as its subject, and that it therefore required no correction; but Hobbes often failed to comply with such strict rules, and the natural reading of this passage would surely lead one to assume that he was making a contrast between the 'some' and the 'many'. His own Latin version of the last phrase had the sense which one would naturally expect, 'but many others do not'; and the argument developed from this passage emphasized the folly of relying on principles that were subject to 'many exceptions'—the counterpart of the 'many occasions' in the problematic phrase.[15] This suggests that that phrase should have been 'and upon many occasions prove not as he sayes they must', even though the wording 'prove so' is found in both the Head and the manuscript. In the present edition, the reading 'prove not' is promoted to the text, and 'prove so' is recorded in the textual apparatus.

[14] p. 76.

A simpler case of the need for emendation occurs in Chapter 46, where the Head has the following sentence: 'It is . . . false Philosophy, to say the work of Marriage is repugnant to Chastity, or Continence, and by consequence to make them Morall Vices; as they doe, that pretend Chastity, and Continence, for the ground of denying Marriage to the Clergy.'[16] Here the manuscript also included the phrase 'to make them Morall Vices', but Hobbes corrected 'them' to 'it'. A moment's consideration of the meaning of the sentence will confirm that the reference was to 'the work of Marriage' (that is, sexual intercourse between man and wife), not to 'Chastity, or Continence'; it seems that the error was not a scribal one, but arose from a lapse of attention by Hobbes in his original draft. However, his correction involved another lapse, as he forgot to change 'Morall Vices' to 'Morall Vice'; so this emendation is made in the present edition.

Changes of this kind have been made, counter to the testimony of the Head and the manuscript, in a handful of cases; but the general presumption of this edition is against intervening to improve the text, unless such an improvement is directly required. Thus no attempt has been made to 'tidy up' cases where the italics used for a quotation do not coincide exactly with the quotation itself; doing so might involve eliminating potential ambiguities in the meaning. Nor is Hobbes's English tidied up in any way, so long as it falls within the bounds of seventeenth-century usage in general, and Hobbesian usage in particular; this includes Hobbes's rickety mismatches of singular and plural in general or impersonal constructions (which he himself did sometimes correct, but seems often to have found untroubling).

[15] Cf. also the comment in Ch. 36 (p. 660) on 'Impostors . . . who gain . . . a greater reputation of Prophecy, by one casuall event that may bee but wrested to their purpose, than can be lost again by never so many failings'. [16] p. 1090.

However, the situation is rather different where Hobbes's Latin is concerned. For while English is a very flexible and forgiving medium (and was even more so in the seventeenth century), Latin has many rules that cannot be bent. A statement such as 'homo . . . amant' is more like the linguistic equivalent of a misprint—an impossible utterance which risks obscuring the intended meaning. We are entitled to assume that if any such error had been drawn to Hobbes's attention, he would automatically have had it corrected. For the purposes of editorial intervention, a broad distinction has been made between impossible Latin and bad Latin; the latter includes many of Hobbes's characteristic faults, such as his mishandling of the subjunctive or his failure to follow correct sequences of tenses. The 1670 Blaeu corrector was active in emending both Hobbes's impossible Latin and his bad Latin; this edition allows all Hobbes's bad Latin to stand (on the grounds that it is possible, and Hobbes's), and intervenes only to correct Latin which is impossible, or which quite evidently does not express Hobbes's meaning. The original is always recorded in the textual apparatus at the foot of the page. Where the correction is to be found in the 1670 edition, this is recorded as such, so that the correction made in the present edition appears as the promotion to the text of a variant from 1670 (even though it is made for intrinsic reasons, not because any textual authority as such is attributed to 1670); but in some cases the passage was not dealt with by Blaeu's corrector, and in others his correction was ill-judged. There are quite a few cases where the text in 1668 is evidently corrupted, and only a rather speculative correction can be offered: here an explanatory note is usually added too, to discuss the nature of the problem and to draw attention to the fact that the proposed emendation may not be very secure.

In some cases, where the need for an emendation seems likely but not definite, the original text has been allowed to stand, and the suggestion has been put forward, instead, in an explanatory note. This practice is followed in both the Latin and the English. The explanatory notes have also been used to correct all inaccurate references to biblical passages. Some of these inaccuracies may have been caused by scribal or compositorial error, but some may be authentic expressions of Hobbes's citation-by-memory, and it would of course be wrong for an editor to elide the evidence of this; all such cases are therefore handled in the explanatory notes.[17]

[17] Where an inaccurate reference in the English is repeated in the Latin, it is allowed to stand there too, and the explanatory note is also keyed to the Latin. However, where the English reference is correct, and the Latin makes an error in repeating it, it is emended in the Latin text, with the erroneous version reported in the textual apparatus.

The Recording of Textual Variants

Textual variants may be of two kinds, substantive and accidental. The former change the meaning of the word or passage; the latter change other textual features (capitalization, italicization, punctuation, etc.) without having a significant effect on the meaning. An ordinary misprint, where the meaning is still recoverable (e.g. 'supperstitious', 'Commssiion', 'understod'), counts here as an accidental variant. The distinction is concerned only with the effect of the change, not with the cause: wrongly distributed type may cause a mere misprint in nine cases out of ten, but if in the tenth case it happens to create a word with a different meaning which changes the sense of the passage, that is a substantive variant. Similarly, moving a comma may in many cases either create an obvious misprint or have no effect on the meaning; but in some cases it may completely change the meaning of a sentence. The essential criterion for treating a change as substantive is, in each case, that at least the possibility of a new meaning is created.

In the present edition, substantive textual variants are recorded in an apparatus placed at the foot of each page and keyed by line numbers to the text. The relevant word or phrase of the text appears as the lemma, before a single closing square bracket; the variant or variants appear after the bracket. (To avoid confusion with that bracket, any parentheses that would normally be presented as square brackets in these entries are given as curly brackets.) The following sigla are used: MS: the fair-copy manuscript of the English Leviathan (BL, MS Egerton 1910); H: the Head edition; H-Errata: the Errata-list in H; B: the Bear edition; 68: the 1668 edition of the Latin; 68-Errata: the Errata-list in 68; 70: the 1670 edition of the Latin; 76: the 1676 issue of 70; 78: the 1678 issue of 70. (The last two apply only to the pages that were reset in those issues: sigs. 3a1–2 and 5c1–2.)[18] In simple cases, the word before the lemma represents the reading of the copy-text, and the variant is from another version of the text, the siglum of which is given after it. Any version of the text not listed after the lemma can be understood to conform to the wording given before the lemma. Sometimes the word before the lemma is a word which has been promoted to the text from one of the other versions; in these cases it appears with its siglum, and the copy-text's reading is given (with its siglum) as the variant after the lemma. Where the word has been promoted in this way from the manuscript, it may have been slightly altered to conform to the orthography, etc., of the Head edition (e.g., 'euen' changed to 'even'); in such cases the word appears first in its altered form as it stands in the text, with the phrase 'this edn.', followed by the reading of the manuscript. The same happens when the manuscript has a correction by Hobbes: this is presented in a transcription indicating the nature of the correction, and specifying Hobbes's responsibility for it. (For the method used to present such details, see the section entitled 'Conventions used in the Presentation of Manuscript Material', below.) The textual apparatus also records the small number of cases in which an in-press variant in the Head edition gives rise to a change in meaning; in these cases the variant is described as 'some H', and the reader is directed to the Register of In-Press Variants. And, as mentioned above, the textual apparatus is used to record the errata listed in the copy-text's Errata-list: the correction is made in the text and presented in the lemma with the siglum 'H-Errata' or '68-Errata', with the uncorrected form listed as the variant.

[18] Note also that in one annotation (on p. 905), the single erratum given in 70, 76, and 78 is also cited as 70-Erratum, 76-Erratum, and 78-Erratum, respectively.

Those errata consist mostly (though not exclusively) of accidental variants; they are listed in the apparatus because of their special status as variants to which the copy-texts themselves drew attention. Otherwise, however, the textual apparatus lists only substantive variants (which means, it is hoped, that the information contained in it will always be of potential interest to the reader). In the case of the English text, it is clear that Hobbes had direct responsibility for the substantive features of the text in the manuscript. It has also been shown that he was responsible for a small number of substantive changes in the Bear; many other substantive changes there, it has been argued, were not made by him, but the fact that they appeared in an edition that came out in his lifetime and in which he was in some way involved means that they are at least of potential interest, and should be recorded. In the case of the Latin text, it has been argued, on internal textual grounds, that the many substantive changes made in 1670 were not by Hobbes. But since this edition also came out in Hobbes's lifetime, and since the lack of external documentary evidence means that we simply do not know whether he was involved in some way in its production (for example, he might have sent a letter to Blaeu, drawing attention to at least some of the things that required correction), these substantive variants also need to be recorded. To justify the recording of accidental variants, however, a higher standard of proof is required: it would be necessary to have some positive evidence that Hobbes was responsible for such changes. Were it known that Hobbes was responsible for the very many small changes to the Bear at this level of the text, the Bear would be taken as the copy-text and the accidental variants from the Head would be recorded in the apparatus; but there is no evidence of such Hobbesian responsibility. The many thousands of orthographic variants in the Bear edition may not be without interest for some scholarly purposes; scholars who have those special purposes will be able to consult copies of the Bear in research libraries.

The Promotion of Textual Variants

It has already been mentioned that, in some cases, a variant found in a version of the text other than the copy-text has been promoted to the text itself, with the copy-text's wording being recorded in the apparatus. It has also been pointed out that this is a fairly frequent occurrence in the Latin text, where a correction made in the 1670 edition has been promoted, not because any special authority is attributed to that edition, but because the correction is a necessary one in order to restore the sense. The more problematic cases, therefore, concern variants promoted to the English text from the manuscript or the Bear.

Where the manuscript is concerned, it may be helpful to repeat here the conclusion to the account of it presented in the first chapter of the Textual Introduction:

> The presentation manuscript preserves an early state of the text, that of the unrevised fair copy made by an English copyist from Hobbes's draft. Starting with that state of the text, Hobbes went on to generate two different versions: the revised version of the English scribe's manuscript, which was sent to the printers, and the revised version of the presentation manuscript, in which Hobbes made many small corrections and changes. Among the latter set of corrections there may be some that help to identify scribal errors that persisted in the copy-manuscript and entered into the printed edition. But there are also corrections or improvements that diverge from the main line of development of the text.[19]

It thus follows that there may be some cases where the original text of the presentation manuscript (i.e., as written by the French scribe, not as corrected by Hobbes) preserves a correct reading which was subsequently rendered incorrect by the printers of the Head. For example, in Chapter 22 the Head edition has the following: 'For though every man, where he can be present by Nature, desires to participate of government; yet where they cannot be present, they are by Nature also enclined, to commit the Government of their common Interest rather to a Monarchicall, then a Popular form of Government . . .'[20] Here the manuscript has a comma in a different position, which significantly alters the sense: 'can be present, by Nature desires'; and consideration of the meaning of the whole passage (cf. 'they are by Nature also enclined') confirms that this is the correct reading. This reading has therefore been promoted to the text in this edition. There are also several cases where the manuscript has undergone a correction by Hobbes, who had evidently noticed an error there which he had failed to correct in the copy-manuscript that went to the printers; examples of these corrections (such as 'unexpected' for 'an expected', or 'to take Inspiration in the proper sense, as to say that Good Spirits entred into men' for 'to take Inspiration in the proper sense, or to say that Good Spirits entred into men') have already been given, above.[21] But it has also been pointed out already that not every correction made by Hobbes in the presentation manuscript should necessarily be taken to have authority over the wording of the Head. In some cases, Hobbes made one correction to the copy-manuscript and a slightly different one to the presentation manuscript. His correction of the latter was, as we have seen, an independent operation, made after the copy-manuscript had been sent off; moreover, the changes he made amounted sometimes not so much to the necessary elimination of error (or restitution of omitted material) as to a subsequent stylistic improvement. For example, in the last paragraph of Chapter 19, where the Head has the sentence, 'And this was it our most wise King, King James, aymed at, in endeavouring the Union of his two Realms of England and Scotland', Hobbes intervened in the manuscript to delete the first 'King' and its comma.[22] This may have been meant as a stylistic improvement, or it may even have arisen from an over-hasty reading (which gave him the impression that the repetition was just a scribal dittography); but in any case it was not a change that Hobbes was obliged to make in order to restore the meaning of the original. Such changes lie, so to speak, outside the direct line of development of the text; they are of course of interest, but they do not have a claim to be promoted to the text, in place of the Head's reading. They are therefore confined to the textual apparatus.

[19] Above, p. 209. [20] p. 358.

Where the Bear edition is concerned, it has been argued above that a small number of significant textual changes, in discussions of eschatology in Chapters 38 and 44, must be attributed to Hobbes. Two other changes, serving to clarify (rather than alter) a theological argument, occur in Chapter 44, where the Head reads as follows: 'Againe, if the Kingdome of God began (as Beza . . . would have it) at the Resurrection; what reason is there for Christians ever since the Resurrection to say in their prayers, Let thy Kingdome Come?' Here the Bear changes 'at the Resurrection' to 'at the Resurrection of Christ', and 'ever since the Resurrection' to 'ever since his Resurrection'; these alterations look very much like authorial revisions, and have been promoted to the text accordingly.[23] Another substantive change can also be assigned to Hobbes with some confidence. When Seth Ward reacted acrimoniously in 1654 to Hobbes's comments on the universities, he singled out the following phrase from Leviathan: 'And for the study of Philosophy, it hath no otherwise place, then as a handmaid to the Romane Religion.'[24] Hobbes's response (published in 1656) was that he had written, or had meant to write, 'had no place', not 'hath no place', and that 'hath' was 'either a mistake of the Printer, or if it were so in the Copy, it could be no other then the mistake of a letter in the writing'; the correction was duly made in the Bear edition.[25] In these cases, at least, a direct attribution of the change to Hobbes seems secure. There are also four places where the Bear edition adds new marginal notes, each time on a theological subject.[26] This does not look like the sort of thing that a corrector would have done on his own initiative (still less a compositor), and two of the notes in particular have a Hobbesian pointedness to them (in Chapter 36: 'The Cretians had Prophets', against the passage observing that 'St. Paul saith of the Cretians, that a Prophet of their owne said, they were Liars'; and, later on the same page, 'Prophets only from God').[27] They are therefore also treated as authorial, and promoted to the text. And because of the significance of all these changes, the reader's attention is also drawn to them in the explanatory notes.

[21] See above, p. 202. [22] p. 304.

It is noteworthy that these changes all occur on pages printed by Redmayne. Since that printing was commissioned by Crooke, we can assume that the copy of the Head from which Redmayne worked was supplied to him by Crooke, who had direct relations with Hobbes, so it is easy to imagine that it contained some authorial annotations. As we have seen, there is some evidence that the copy used by Cunradus also contained some written changes; but there is no particular reason to think that that copy, supplied presumably by Wright, Chiswell, Basset, or Scott, had any connection with Hobbes. The small changes which may be supposed to have been written in that copy (on the grounds that they are unlikely to have been made on the initiative of Dutch compositors), such as 'tenth' for 'tyth', or 'Lieutenant of God' for 'Lieutenant to God', are more or less indifferent; there is one positive improvement, involving the insertion of 'doe', but, as we have seen, there is another insertion of 'doe' which positively harms the symmetry of the passage where it is made.[28] The attribution of these changes to Hobbes thus seems doubtful; in this edition, they are recorded in the textual apparatus, but not promoted to the text itself.

[23] See p. 980. [24] Ward, Vindiciae academiarum, p. 58; see p. 1074.
[25] Hobbes, Six Lessons, p. 61 (EW vii, p. 347). [26] See pp. 626, 646, 658, 660.
[27] pp. 658, 660. [28] See above, pp. 245–6, n. 202.

Finally, a comment on the general assumptions that underlie constructing a text in this way. The Clarendon Edition follows the basic principles of what has become known as the Greg–Bowers method of textual criticism, which distinguishes between substantive and accidental features of the text and operates accordingly with a two-tier theory of textual authority.[29] This method has been criticized on two grounds: because it depends on a concept of authorial intention (which has been declared outmoded), and because it results in the construction of a 'Mischtext', a composite containing elements from different actual texts.[30] To the first criticism, the answer must be that while the concept of authorial intention is certainly not unproblematic, only worse editorial problems are generated by the attempt to abolish it.[31] As for the problematic nature of a Mischtext: the collation of in-press variants necessarily leads to the creation of a synchronic Mischtext, an 'ideal copy' which may nowhere actually exist; if readers can tolerate this, it becomes harder to see what their objection in principle can be to a Mischtext of the diachronic variety. The anti-Mischtext attitude of some modern theorists can lead only to a slavish reproduction of a single version of the text (as some have explicitly recommended); this implies a rejection of the whole enterprise of textual criticism as it has been practised since the Renaissance.[32] But in any case, what the objectors seem to have forgotten is that a critical edition consists not just of a text, but of a text-plus-apparatus—a device which can enable readers to reconstitute several different chronological layers of the text, as they wish. Perhaps the best way in which to think of a critical edition of this kind, therefore, is as an archive. It is an archive of textual information arranged on certain organizing principles, and the leading effect of those principles is to generate a composite reading-version of the text; but reading that version is certainly not the only way in which the archive is to be exploited or explored.

[29] On the Greg–Bowers method and related theoretical issues there is an entire corpus of writing; the key works are by Sir Walter Greg, Fredson Bowers, and Thomas Tanselle. See Greg's classic article of 1950, 'The Rationale of Copy-Text', reprinted in his Collected Papers, pp. 374–91; Bowers, Bibliography and Textual Criticism, and Essays in Bibliography; Tanselle, 'Some Principles', 'Recent Editorial Discussion', and 'Classical, Biblical, and Modern Textual Criticism'. See also the Center for Editions of American Authors, Statement of Editorial Principles.

[30] For statements of both arguments, see Zeller, 'Struktur und Genese', and Vonhoff, '"Copy-Text Theory" Revisited'. A version of the first is also developed in McGann, Critique (under the influence of Zeller: see pp. 32, 101–2). McGann's argument, emphasizing the fundamentally 'social' nature of the text, might lead to the conclusion (unacceptable, in my view) that much later non-authorial changes to the text are of no less importance to the study of its meaning than authorial ones, since the social constitution of texts is a process that can continue indefinitely.

[31] See the long and searching discussion of this issue by Tanselle, 'The Editorial Problem'.

[32] See, e.g., Vonhoff, '"Copy-Text Theory" Revisited', pp. 74, 84–5.

Conventions used in the Presentation of Manuscript Material

The following conventions apply both in the Introductions and in the apparatus to the edition, the only general difference between the two being that square brackets (as given here) become curly brackets in the textual apparatus. Where a deletion is legible, it is presented thus: 'I have [now del.] said'. Interlinear material is presented thus, using a sign reminiscent of a caret mark: 'I have [>not] said'. Other information about the text may be given in italics in square brackets, such as '[page cut]' (indicating that the page edge has been cut down, truncating the text). This information may be combined with a conjectural restitution of the text: 'I have [page cut al]ways said'. Superscripts are reproduced; entirely unambiguous contractions are expanded, but in the case of potentially ambiguous ones, the expansion is placed in square brackets. Uncertain readings are placed in square brackets, with an italicized question mark: 'I have [never*?*] said.'

In the presentation of material from the manuscript in the textual apparatus, care is taken to specify which changes are in Hobbes's hand, using the initials 'TH' for Hobbes. Thus there are entries of the form 'I have [now del. by TH]'; 'I have [ever corr. to never by TH] said' (where 'corr.' stands for 'corrected'). For an ordinary interlineation by the scribe, the method described above is used, with a quasi-caret mark. On the other hand, for an addition by Hobbes (which may be either interlinear, or in an adjacent space), the formula is: 'I have [not added by TH] said.' Illegible material is described as 'illeg.'. Other information given within square (or curly) brackets will be self-explanatory.

The Translation Apparatus

One aim of this edition is to translate and record all the significant changes made by Hobbes when he translated Leviathan into Latin. The symbols and numbered footnotes that have been added for this purpose are meant to function as, so to speak, a conversion kit, enabling the Latinless reader to convert Hobbes's English text into a translation of Hobbes's Latin text. They are referred to here as the 'translation apparatus'.

The apparatus takes three forms. (1) In cases where Hobbes has added completely new material in the Latin, the English text is marked with a single superscript number at the point where the addition is made, and the new material is translated in the relevant footnote. (2) Passages in the English which are omitted in the Latin are marked at beginning and end with a superscript '°'. (3) Where a passage in the English has been significantly altered in the Latin, it is marked at beginning and end with a superscript number (that is, with the same number, repeated), and the altered material is translated in the relevant footnote.

The fact that some of the superscript numbers appear once only, and some in pairs, should not cause any confusion. When a single superscript is used for an addition, there is always a visual clue that it is single, so that the reader does not need to look for its pair: normally it is placed between two words, with a space on either side (whereas the paired superscripts are always attached to the beginnings and ends of words, like quotation marks); more rarely, if it represents an addition to a clause terminated by a punctuation mark, it is placed between the word and the punctuation mark. (This second usage looks ungainly; but it is logical, and the visual clue is useful. A reader who wishes to read the text without regard to the notes will quickly become accustomed to ignoring all of them, including the ungainly ones.) Within the notes themselves, another visual clue is used: an addition is always preceded by a caret mark. The system is, it is hoped, straightforward to operate; the only slight complication is that in some cases the reader has to make small mental adjustments to the surrounding punctuation in order to operate the substitution of an altered passage. (Where an altered passage requires an additional piece of punctuation at the beginning, it is added in the footnote; but there are other cases where a change is needed which, although less easy to convey in a note, will nonetheless be self-evident to the reader.)

The primary purpose of this apparatus is to provide an English version of the Latin, for the benefit of readers of the English; that is why it is keyed entirely to the English page. The secondary purpose is to indicate the changes made in the Latin. But the apparatus is not intended to function as a register of individual units of change (were such a thing possible); several distinct changes in close proximity may be combined into a single note. Indeed, this is done whenever possible, since the one obvious disadvantage of the system is that operating it causes interruptions to reading as the eye jumps to the foot of the page, and the convenience of the reader is a major consideration.[33] (For the same reason, however, multiple omissions, in fairly close proximity, are more likely to be recorded separately, as the eye can absorb this information without departing from the main text.) On the other hand, any large alteration or omission that extends to more than one paragraph is divided, by paragraph, into two or more contiguous notes. This is partly for the convenience of the reader, who thus does not need to search beyond the confines of a single paragraph for the other half of a pair of superscripts; it also aids the setting of the English and Latin in parallel, making it easier to place annotations in the openings that contain the Latin they translate. Readers should also be aware that for an altered passage, the precise location of the opening and closing superscript may be dictated not just by the alteration Hobbes made but also by the need to weave the translation as neatly and economically as possible into the existing English text; sometimes the construction in the translation of the Latin may be adapted to the surrounding construction in the English in order to achieve this.

[33] From this limited point of view, it is of course true that the most convenient solution would be a complete translation of the Latin, like the one provided by Tricaud and Pécharman (see above, at n. 12). But that solution, while satisfying the first purpose, would thwart the second, requiring readers to make their own detailed analysis of every passage in order to discover which elements had been added, changed, or omitted in the Latin.

In the case of three chapters (9, 46, and 47), the changes made by Hobbes in the Latin are so extensive that it has proved necessary to provide, in place of this apparatus, translations of the entire chapters. These are printed together with the Latin. And in the case of the Appendix to Leviathan, where no Hobbesian English equivalent exists (and the Index to the Latin edition, which was not by Hobbes), a complete translation has been placed on the pages facing the Latin text.

All these translations are into modern English. Where a key term is present in Hobbes's English in the (more or less) corresponding text, and it can be employed in the translation without an awkward shift of register, this is done; a few specifically Hobbesian terms, such as 'commonwealth', are used throughout; but there has been no attempt to follow his vocabulary at the expense of clarity or consistency, and no wish to create a Hobbesian pastiche. Changes of construction are not noted when they do not significantly affect the meaning (e.g., plural to singular; changes of tense; different forms of impersonal construction; or more elaborate cases, such as where the English says 'many do not' and the Latin says 'some do', if the overall meaning is the same). Nor does the apparatus note the creation or removal of insignificant doublets; or the expansion or reduction of a row of nouns or adjectives where what is happening is the addition or removal of a virtual synonym; or commonly recurring cases of different terms which stand for the same thing (e.g., 'Christ' and 'the Messiah'). But it does note such things as the use of 'civis' ('citizen') for 'subject' (which seems automatic most of the time, but does involve a potentially significant difference of meaning—and Hobbes does occasionally use 'subditus'). Overall, it has been necessary to operate some sort of de minimis rule; the threshold is set fairly low, but to set it any lower would involve filling the page with a mass of tiny details. While details of that kind are too unimportant to trigger a note on their own, however, they will nevertheless be taken into account if they happen to fall within a larger passage which requires translation. It should also be pointed out that the translation sometimes finds it better to ignore the barely-signifying conjunctions which Hobbes has a tendency to use; while the dictionary translates 'autem' as 'however', Hobbes often employs it as a very mild version of 'but' or 'and'. Finally, it should be noted that while the Latin employs italics quite frequently, this translation uses them to the extent that they would normally be used in a modern English translation; but where a translated phrase is part of a longer passage italicized in the original English (typically, a biblical quotation), it is also italicized.

One further complication concerns the treatment of quotations from the Bible. Throughout the editorial materials of this edition, all biblical quotations are taken from the Authorized Version (AV), unless otherwise described. However, a more precise system of description has proved necessary in the case of translations from Hobbes's Latin. Sometimes it is not possible to use AV, because Hobbes has used the Vulgate, or the Junius–Tremellius Old Testament, or the Beza New Testament, and a translation of that wording has to differ significantly from AV. In these cases a translation is given here in modern English, with the addition of '[Vulg]', '[Junius–Tremellius]', or '[Beza]' after the translated sentence. In some cases Hobbes uses a Latin version which is apparently his own, and which itself does not correspond to AV; here a translation is given in modern English but without any such annotation, so that the reader can see that the wording is solely Hobbes's. In other cases Hobbes gives a Latin version which does not correspond to any of the standard Latin texts, but does correspond directly to AV; here AV is used as the translation, with the annotation '[AV]'. And in some cases he uses the Vulgate or Junius–Tremellius or Beza, but the wording is such that AV can be used as an accurate translation of it; in these cases both annotations are given, thus: '[Vulg; AV]'. Where the Latin version given is substantially one of these versions, but with some very minor deviations, the abbreviation 'approx' is added. Hobbes sometimes quotes in the Latin a longer or shorter version of the biblical passage quoted in the English; in these cases—and in all cases where the Latin quotes passages not quoted at all in the English—the correct biblical reference is given in the notes. But if the passage quoted in the Latin is the same as that quoted in the English, and the correct biblical reference is given in the English text itself, it has not been thought necessary to add a further note to the Latin, giving the same reference.

The Explanatory Notes

After the translation apparatus there comes a layer of mostly explanatory editorial notes; these are keyed to superscript letters in the text. (The letter-series runs through the alphabet, and then goes through the alphabets aa–az, ba–bz, and so on; in all chapters except those that have no translation apparatus, the first alphabet leaves out the letter 'o', to avoid confusion with the superscripts that indicate omission.) A single sequence of notes is used for both the English and the Latin: often the annotated material appears in both texts, but sometimes the relevant superscript will be found in only one or the other. And where the annotated material occurs in a Latin passage that is translated in the translation apparatus, the superscript letter appears there too.

The compilation of these explanatory notes has followed the reasonably minimalist principles of the Clarendon Edition. Subjective, interpretative, and digressive notes are excluded. So too are notes saying 'Hobbes also discusses this in the following other works'. Such a note would be appropriate only in a case where Hobbes quoted, or directly referred to, an earlier work by him (something which does happen, but very rarely, in Leviathan). As the discussion in Chapter 2 of the General Introduction has shown, there are indeed some passages in Leviathan that are related in some ways to passages in previous works by Hobbes; but this is a complex issue. In many cases the connection may be rather more loose than the kind of relationship conjured up by the term 'source'; and in the one case where an earlier work was clearly a direct source for many passages in Leviathan, namely De cive, to annotate every echo and resemblance would crowd many pages with quite mechanical references. On this matter the reader is referred instead to the discussion in the General Introduction.[34]

Typically, the explanatory notes may have the following purposes: (1) identifying quotations (direct) and allusions (indirect, but they must be strongly identifiable, and textual—this category includes many biblical quotations and allusions); (2) elucidating historical statements (for example, identifying historical figures; but a few, such as Charles I and Julius Caesar, have been spared this treatment, for fear of insulting the reader); (3) elucidating other factual statements or references (legal or theological, for example); (4) explicating technical terms (such as legal phrases), or words or phrases given in Latin or Greek (unless Hobbes himself gives a sufficient explanation of their meaning in the text); (5) explaining the meanings of English words; (6) drawing attention to editorial emendations of the text. Where an emendation has involved solving a puzzle, and where other solutions might be possible, an explanatory note is used to draw attention to the nature of both the puzzle and the solution. But in some cases the note merely comments on the oddity of a phrase in the text, suggesting that it may be in need of emendation, or even suggesting a possible emendation, which it has been decided, on balance, not to promote to the text itself.

[34] See above, pp. 12–13, 101–5.

For the fifth category above, it has been necessary to make some assumptions about what is or is not easily comprehensible to the modern reader. Terms which, although seldom used today, are commonly encountered in the written language have not been explicated (for example, 'choler'); other words are not annotated if their meaning is, in context, self-evident (such as 'defectuous', 'invitement', or 'representant'); but words for which a modern reader might be expected to consult a dictionary (such as 'bewray', or 'surreption') are explicated. Those who habitually read seventeenth-century English will find some of these notes superfluous; but there will be political scientists, philosophers, and other readers who come to Hobbes without such familiarity with the period, and may find them useful. However, some very commonly occurring terms which differ from modern usage, but can be readily understood in their Hobbesian context, are not noted: for example, 'doctor' in the sense of 'teacher', 'office' with the meaning 'role' or 'duty', 'propriety' in the sense of 'property', 'virtue' in the sense of 'efficacy' or 'active power', and 'pretend' with the meaning (close to the Latin or French) of 'claim' (though frequently with a suggestion that the claim is false—the sense may merge, more or less, with the modern meaning of deliberate simulation).

Many of these notes deal with terms which a hasty reader might pass over without realizing that they required explication; these are the 'false friends' of seventeenth-century English, words such as 'control', 'conversation', 'information', or 'security', which could have significantly different meanings from the ones they bear today. As a general rule, words are explicated in cases where the meaning in question is one described by the Oxford English Dictionary (OED) as 'rare', 'obsolete', or 'archaic'. For such words (unlike terms such as 'bewray' or 'surreption') a general glossary would not be suitable, not only because some of them have different meanings in different places—including, in some cases, their modern meanings—but also because the reader would not be aware of the need to look them up in it. On the first occurrence of such a word (or, indeed, of any word requiring explanation) in any chapter, its meaning is given in a note; subsequent occurrences in the same chapter are annotated with a direction to that previous note (but further occurrences within the same paragraph are not noted).[35] Very occasionally, because of the frequency of use in a particular chapter, a more general note is given on the first occurrence of the word in that chapter.

[35] The repeated references in subsequent paragraphs may seem superfluous to those readers who are reading the entire text in sequence; but they may be useful to those readers who have just looked up a particular passage.

Textual references are given to standard modern editions in the case of classical works (Loeb, Oxford Classical Texts, or Teubner; note that for Thucydides, the text itself is referred to as Peloponnesian War, while Hobbes's translation is referred to as Eight Bookes), to AV for biblical quotations, to Migne's Patrologia graeca and Patrologia latina for patristic material, to standard modern editions for writers such as Aquinas and Calvin, and to editions used by or available to Hobbes in the case of most early modern texts. Hobbes's direct quotations do not cause many difficulties (partly, perhaps, because there are so few of them). The problems arise, rather, in the area of allusions to other writings. An attempt has been made to annotate all cases where Hobbes says 'as some have said', 'it has been argued', etc., giving a textual warrant; this has been possible in many cases, but difficult where some statements or arguments are concerned. (The attempt has not been made, however, in some cases where Hobbes is just making very general claims about the teachings of 'the schools'.) In addition, there is a small number of cases in which it has been felt that a likely source of information is worth noting, or a strong textual parallel in a work which Hobbes is certain or very likely to have known (e.g., by Montaigne, Descartes, or Mersenne). But these cases have been kept to a minimum, as they represent the initial incline of a very slippery slope. There are some points in the book where an editor might write, with reasonable confidence, a note saying that Hobbes was silently controverting a particular writer's opinion: for example, when he argues in Chapter 8 that the 'difference of Witts' is not caused by 'the temper of the brain', he is surely disagreeing with Juan Huarte, whose book Examen de los ingenios: The Examination of Mens Wits he seems to have known well.[36] But an editor who starts to comment on likely targets of disagreement in this way is opening flood-gates which—given Hobbes's negative attitude to a huge range of earlier philosophical positions—will become very difficult to close. Again, there are some passages in Leviathan which, according to some modern scholars, may be modelled on or influenced by passages in other authors. Gianfranco Borrelli, for example, has argued that the metaphor for the unsociable man in Chapter 15, describing him as a hard and irregular stone that has to be discarded by builders, is taken from a passage in Virgilio Malvezzi's Discorsi on Tacitus. Although the resemblance is suggestive, the metaphor is used somewhat differently in the two cases, and there is no strong verbal parallelism; ideas of this kind could circulate in many different ways in a literary culture, and it would be rash for an editor positively to assert a 'source' relationship in a case of this kind.[37] Similarly, commentators have suggested various texts as the 'sources' of Hobbes's famous negative enumeration of the features of the state of nature, which culminates in the words, 'no Arts; no Letters; no Society; and which is worst of all, continuall feare, and danger of violent death; And the life of man, solitary, poore, nasty, brutish, and short.' George Klosko and Daryl Rice have argued that it derives from Thucydides' description of the primitive state of Greece, while Borrelli has written that Hobbes was 'certainly' inspired by a short phrase by Anton Francesco Doni.[38] But again, the verbal parallels are not strong enough to require an editor to treat the other text as a 'source'; and while it is undoubtedly true that Hobbes was influenced by Thucydides' ideas, to designate all the forces that may have shaped Hobbes's own ideas is a task which—mercifully—goes far beyond the duties of an editor of Leviathan.

[36] See p. 110.

[37] Borrelli, Il lato oscuro, p. 124 (citing Malvezzi, Discorsi, p. 62); Leviathan, p. 232.

[38] Klosko and Rice, 'Thucydides and Hobbes', p. 406; Borrelli, Il lato oscuro, p. 117, 'sicuramente' (quoting 'questa breva vita, caduca, dubbiosa, misera e mortale' ('this short life, which is in decline, uncertain, wretched, and mortal') from Doni, I mondi, p. 57).

4

A BIBLIOGRAPHICAL DESCRIPTION OF THE EDITIONS USED IN THE PRESENT EDITION

The English Leviathan

1. The 'Head' Edition

LEVIATHAN, | OR | The Matter, Forme, & Power | OF A | COMMON-WEALTH | ECCLESIASTICALL | AND | CIVILL. | [rule] | By THOMAS HOBBES of Malmesbury. | [rule] | [ornament: head, between vases of fruit and flowers, in frame, with pendent tassels] | [rule] | LONDON, | Printed for ANDREW CROOKE, at the Green Dragon | in St. Pauls Church-yard, 1651.

Collation: Folio: engraved title leaf + A–Z^4, Aa–Zz^4, Aaa–Ddd^4 + folded broadside printed table.

Contents: Engraved title page [upper half: town with landscape behind, and colossus with crowned head holding sword and crozier; lower half: ten panels containing symbolic objects or scenes, and central section with tasselled hanging and cartouche, bearing inscription: LEVIATHAN | Or | THE MATTER, FORME, | and POWER of A COMMON= | WEALTH ECCLESIASTICALL | and CIVIL. | By THOMAS HOBBES | of MALMESBVRY. | London | Printed for Andrew Crooke | 1651]; [verso blank]; A1r printed title page as above; A1v blank; A2 TO | MY MOST HONOR'D FRIEND | M^r FRANCIS GODOLPHIN | of Godolphin. ; A3 The Contents of the Chapters. ; A3v Errata. ; A4 [headpiece ornament: crowned head between two heads in profile and cornucopias] THE | INTRODUCTION. (pp. 1–2); B1r–Ddd4v text (pp. 3–396), divided as follows: pp. 3–83 OF MAN. (running title: Part 1. Of MAN.), including folding table between pp. 40 and 41; pp. 85–193 OF | COMMON-WEALTH. (running title: Part 2. Of COMMON-WEALTH.); pp. 195–331 OF A | CHRISTIAN | COMMON-WEALTH. (running title: Part. 3. OF A CHRISTIAN COMMON-WEALTH.); pp. 333–87 OF THE | KINGDOME | OF | DARKNESSE. (running title: Part. 4. OF THE KINGDOME OF DARKNESSE. ; pp. 389–96 A REVIEW, and CONCLVSION. (running title: A REVIEW AND CONCLVSION.)

Notes: Sig. A signed on second leaf, sigs. B–Bb signed on first two leaves, the rest on first, second, and third. Pagination as follows: 1–248, 247–56, 261–396. Blank pages: M1v, Bb4v, Tt4v, Ccc4v, and the verso of the folding table. Ornamented initials as follows: A2r: large 'Y'; A4r (p. 1): large 'N'; B1r (p. 3): small 'C'; Cc1r (p. 195): large 'I'; Vv1r (p. 333): large 'B'. Size of volume: standard copies, approx. 27.5 × 18 cm; large-paper copies range from 32 × 21 cm to 33.5 × 22 cm.[1]

Copies collated and consulted: see the listing at the head of the Register of In-Press Variants (English).

2. The 'Bear' Edition

LEVIATHAN, | OR | The Matter, Forme, & Power | OF A | COMMON-WEALTH | ECCLESIASTICALL | AND | CIVILL. | [rule] | By THOMAS HOBBES of Malmesbury. | [rule] | [ornament: bear clasping foliage, between two partly coiled snakes] | [rule] | LONDON, | Printed for ANDREW CKOOKE, at the Green Dragon | in St. Pauls Church-yard, 1651.

Collation: Folio: engraved title leaf + A–Z^4, Aa–Zz^4, Aaa–Ddd^4 + folded broadside printed table.

Contents: Engraved title page [upper half: town with landscape behind, and colossus with crowned head holding sword and crozier (landscape and colossus badly worn); lower half: ten panels containing symbolic objects or scenes, and central section with tasselled hanging and cartouche, bearing inscription: LEVIATHAN | Or | THE MATTER, FORME, | and POWER of A COMMON= | WEALTH ECCLESIASTICALL | and CIVIL. | By THOMAS HOBBES | of MALMESBVRY. | London | Printed for Andrew Crooke | 1651]; [verso blank]; A1r printed title page as above; A1v blank; A2 TO | MY MOST HONOR'D FRIEND | M^r FRANCIS GODOLPHIN | of Godolphin. ; A3 The Contents of the Chapters. ; A3v Errata. ; A4 [headpiece ornament: central oval of St Christopher carrying Christ-child, with initials 'C. C.', between two angels] THE | INTRODUCTION. (pp. 1–2); folding table commonly bound between pp. 2 and 3; B1r–Ddd4v text (pp. 3–396), divided as follows: pp. 3–83 Of MAN. (running title: Part 1. Of MAN.); pp. 85–193 OF | COMMON-WEALTH. (running title: Part 2. Of COMMON-WEALTH.); pp. 195–331 OF A | CHRIS-

[1] Additional note: An exemplum in Amsterdam University Library (pressmark OM 63 1878) has sig. A3 ('The Contents of the Chapters') bound before sig. A2 (the dedicatory epistle); it may be a sophisticated copy. In this exemplum, sig. A4 (the Introduction) is signed 'B', and this leaf has browned more heavily than the others, which may be further evidence of sophistication; but the setting of this leaf appears to be standard, and the reason for the incorrect signature is not apparent.

TIAN | COMMON-WEALTH. (running title: Part. 3. OF A CHRISTIAN COMMON-WEALTH.); pp. 333–87 OF THE | KINGDOM | OF | DARKNESS. (running title: Part. 4. OF THE KINGDOM OF DARKNESS. ; pp. 389–96 A REVIEW, and CONCLVSION. (running title: A REVIEW AND CONCLVSION.)

Notes: Sig. A signed on second leaf, sigs. B–Bb signed on first two leaves, the rest on first, second, and third (Tt3 misprinted 'Tt2'). Pagination as follows: 1–248, 247–56, 261–394, 397, 394. Pages misnumbered as follows: 34: '43'; 214: '241'; 219: '126'; 232: '252'; 335: '337'; 338: '336'. Blank pages: M1v, Bb4v, Tt4v, Ccc4v, and the verso of the folding table. Ornamented initials as follows: A2r: large 'Y'; A4r (p. 1): large 'N'; Cc1r (p. 195): large 'I'; Vv1r (p. 333): large 'B' (crude woodcut). Size of volume: approx. 29.5 × 19cm.

Copies consulted: BL, G 2455; Cambridge University Library, Marshall b.1; a copy in the editor's collection.

The Latin Leviathan

1. The 1668 Edition

THOMAE HOBBES | Malmesburiensis | OPERA | PHILOSOPHICA, | Quae Latinè scripsit, | OMNIA. | Antè quidem per partes, nunc autem, post cognitas omnium | Objectiones, conjunctim & accuratiùs Edita. [large printer's ornament: orrery, flanked by two standing figures, with motto INDEFESSVS AGENDO] AMSTELODAMI, | Apud IOANNEM BLAEV, | M DC LXVIII.

This collection consists usually of eight works by Hobbes; Leviathan is usually the last in order. It has its own section title page, as follows:

LEVIATHAN, | SIVE | De Materia, Forma, & Potestate | CIVITATIS | ECCLESIASTICAE | ET CIVILIS. | AUTHORE | THOMA HOBBES, | Malmesburiensi.

Collation: Quarto: $3a^2$, 3b–$3z^4$, 4a–$4z^4$, 5a–$5b^4$, $5c^2$

Contents: 3a1r section title page, as above; 3a1v blank; 3a2 Ad Nobilissimum Virum | DOMINVM | FRANCISCVM | GODOLPHINVM, | Equitem Ordinis Balneorum. ; 3b1–5a3r text (pp. 1–365), divided as follows: pp. 1–82 LEVIATHAN | PARS PRIMA | DE HOMINE. (running title: De Homine.); pp. 83–172 DE CIVITATE | SIVE | REPVBLICA. (running title: De Civitate.); pp. 173–288 DE CIVITATE | CHRISTIANA. (running title: De Civitate Christiana.); pp. 289–327 DE REGNO | TENEBRARVM. (running title: De Regno Tenebrarum.); pp. 328–65 APPENDIX | AD | LEVIATHAN. (running title: Appendix ad

Leviathan.); 5a3v–5a4v INDEX CAPITVM. ; 5a4v ERRATA. ; 5b1r–5c1v INDEX | IN | LEVIATHANEM, | SIVE | De Materia, Forma, & Potestate Civitatis Eccle- | siasticae, & Civilis. (running title: INDEX.); 5c2r SCRIPTVRAE SACRAE | Insigniora loca annotata, in Leviathane explicata aut adducta, quorum indicio | multa alia se ultro oculis offerent. ; 5c2v blank.

Notes: Signed on first, second, and third leaves, with the exception of 3a1 and 5c2, which are unsigned. Ornamented initials as follows: 3a2r: large 'F'; p. 1: small 'N'; p. 83: small 'Q'; p. 173: small 'H'; p. 289: small 'P'; p. 328: small 'E'; p. 82 and sig. 5a4v have an ornament with two semi-naked figures clasping each other back-to-back. Size of volume: approx. 19.5 × 15 cm.

Copies collated and consulted: see the listing at the head of the Register of In-Press Variants (Latin).

1. ii: The Cornelius Bee Issue of the 1668 Edition

This issue differs only in the imprint below the ornament on the general title page, which is as follows:

AMSTELODAMI, | Apud IOANNEM BLAEV. | Prostant etiam LONDINI apud CORNELIVM BEE, sub | Insignibus Regalibus in Vico vulgò vocato Little Brittain. 1668.

Copies collated and consulted: see the listing at the head of the Register of In-Press Variants (Latin).

2. The 1670 Edition

LEVIATHAN, | SIVE | De Materia, Forma, & Potestate | CIVITATIS | ECCLESIASTICAE | ET CIVILIS. | AUTHORE | THOMA HOBBES, | Malmesburiensi. [small printer's ornament: orrery, flanked by two standing figures, with motto INDEFESSVS AGENDO] AMSTELODAMI, | Apud JOANNEM BLAEV. | M. DC. LXX.

Collation: Quarto: *^{2}, A–Z^{4}, Aa–Zz^{4}, Aaa^{4}, Bbb^{2}

Contents: *1r title page, as above; *1v blank; *2 Ad Nobilissimum Virum | DOMINVM | FRANCISCVM | GODOLPHINVM, | Equitem Ordinis Balneorum. ; A1–Zz3r text (pp. 1–365), divided as follows: pp. 1–82 LEVIATHAN | PARS PRIMA | DE HOMINE. (running title: De Homine.); pp. 83–172 DE CIVITATE | SIVE | REPVBLICA. (running title: De Civitate.); pp. 173–288 DE CIVITATE | CHRISTIANA. (running title: De Civitate Christiana.); pp. 289–327

DE REGNO | TENEBRARVM. (running title: De Regno Tenebrarum.); pp. 328–65 APPENDIX | AD | LEVIATHAN. (running title: Appendix ad Leviathan.); Zz3v–Zz4v INDEX CAPITVM. ; Aaa1r–Bbb1v INDEX | IN | LEVIATHANEM, | SIVE | De Materia, Forma, & Potestate Civitatis Eccle- | siasticae, & Civilis. (running title: INDEX.); Bbb2r SCRIPTVRAE SACRAE | Insigniora loca annotata, in Leviathane explicata aut adducta, quorum indicio | multa alia se ultro oculis offerent. ; Erratum; Bbb2v blank.

Notes: Signed on first, second, and third leaves, with the exception of *1 and Bbb2, which are unsigned. Ornamented initials as follows: *2r: large 'F'; p. 1: small 'N'; p. 83: small 'Q'; p. 173: small 'H'; p. 289: small 'P'; p. 328: small 'E'; p. 82 has an ornament with two semi-naked figures clasping each other back-to-back. These initials and this ornament are identical with those in the 1668 edition. On sig. Zz4v there is a different ornament, a hanging cluster of fruit and foliage with pendent ribbons on either side. Size of volume: approx. 19.5 × 15 cm.

Copies consulted: BL, Cup. 406. g. 46; Bodl., 4° N 26 Jur.; a copy in the editor's collection; a copy in the collection of the late Prof. Howard Warrender.

2. ii: The Undated Issue of the 1670 Edition[2]

This issue has, in place of the title page, a page closely imitating the section title page of the 1668 edition:

LEVIATHAN, | SIVE | De Materia, Forma, & Potestate | CIVITATIS | ECCLESIASTICAE | ET CIVILIS. | AUTHORE | THOMA HOBBES, | Malmesburiensi.

Copies consulted: Bodl., Vet. B3 e. 124; a copy in the editor's collection.

2. iii: The 1676 Issue of the 1670 Edition

In this issue, the first half-sheet (*[2]) and the last half-sheet (Bbb[2]) have been reset; the reset pages closely imitate those in the 1670 edition, with the exception of the title page, which is as follows:

LEVIATHAN, | SIVE | De Materia, Forma, & Potestate | CIVITATIS | ECCLESIASTICAE | ET CIVILIS. | AUTHORE | [rule] | THOMA HOBBES, | [rule] | Malmesburiensi. | [rule] | [ornament: coin of Titus][3] | [rule] | LONDINI. | [rule] | Apud JOHANNEM TOMSONI. | M. DC. LXXVI.

[2] Note that no siglum was needed for this issue in the apparatus to the present edn., since it conforms to the copy-text on the title page, and is identical with the 1670 edn. on all other pages.
[3] See above, p. 301.

Copies consulted: Bodl., Vet. A3 e. 1023; BL, C. 123. fff. 11.(1.).

2. iv: The 1678 Issue of the 1670 Edition

In this issue, the first half-sheet (*^{2}) and the last half-sheet (Bbb^{2}) have been reset; the reset pages closely imitate those in the 1670 edition, with the exception of the title page, which is as follows:

LEVIATHAN, | SIVE | De Materia, Forma, & Potestate | CIVITATIS | ECCLESIASTICAE | ET CIVILIS. | AUTHORE | THOMA HOBBES, | Malmesburiensi. | [rule] | [ornament: coin of Titus][4] | [rule] | LONDINI | [rule] | Typis JOANNIS THOMSONII, | [rule] | M. DC. LXXVIII.

Copies consulted: Harvard University (Houghton Library), *EC65 H6525 670la; University of Chicago, JC 153. H65; Herzog August Bibliothek, Wolfenbüttel, M: Li 3809.

[4] See above, p. 301.

LIST OF MANUSCRIPTS

Note: a few printed items are included here, in cases where they bear substantial annotations. However, this listing does not include the annotated auction catalogues (held by the British Library; the Bibliothèque nationale de France; Cambridge University Library; the Houghton Library, Harvard University; Lambeth Palace Library; and Longleat House) cited in Chapter 1 of the Textual Introduction; full references are given there.

Amsterdam

Amsterdam University Library
III E 8[213]: Sorbière to Vossius.

Gemeentelijke Archiefdienst
NA 3206: Blaeu, legal document.

Austin, Texas

University of Texas, Harry Ransom Humanities Research Center printed: pressmark Pforz. 491: Leviathan, with annotations by de Cardonnel.

Bakewell, Derbyshire

Chatsworth House
Hardwick 14: Earl of Devonshire, Privy Purse accounts.
Hardwick 19: Wheldon, account book.
Hardwick 36: Earl of Devonshire's steward's accounts.
Hardwick drawer 145, item 18: Hobbes, text on heresy.
Hardwick drawer 145, item 21: Sorbière, 'Discours contre la fréquente saignée'.
Hobbes A. 3: Hobbes, De cive.
Hobbes A. 4: Hobbes, De corpore, 'Ch. XIX'.
Hobbes A. 5: Hobbes, De homine (fragment).
Hobbes A. 6: Hobbes, verse autobiography.
Hobbes A. 10: Payne, notes on De corpore.
Hobbes C. iv. 2: Payne, notes on De corpore.
Hobbes E. 1. A: Hardwick library catalogue.
Hobbes, unnumbered: Hardwick library catalogue.
Indenture H/301/15: Cleisby messuages indenture.
Indenture H/301/16: Cleisby manor indenture.

Cambridge

Cambridge University Library
7913: Yonge, 'Sidrophel'. printed: pressmark Williams 426: Leviathan, with annotations.

Dijon

Bibliothèque Municipale de Dijon
962: 'Lantiniana'.

Eton

Eton College
Coll/P14/406/5: Steward, letter.
Coll/P14/406/8: Steward, letter.

Hamburg

Staats- und Universitätsbibliothek
Pe 1a (= Sup. ep. 97): Cavendish to Jungius.

Kiel

Schleswig-Holsteinische Landesbibliothek
Tönnies-Nachlass, Correspondence, item 749: Hiersemann to Tönnies.

London

British Library [BL]
Add. 4295: Toland–Darby agreement.
Add. 4416: Descartes to Mersenne (extract).
Add. 4417: Vieta, 'Harmonicon coeleste' (extract).
Add. 78306: Tuke to Evelyn.
Add. 78364: Evelyn, sermon notes.
Add. 78423: Tuke, notes.
Add. 78685: Wheldon to Barker.
Egerton 1910: Hobbes, Leviathan.
Harl. 3360: Hobbes, English treatise on optics.
Harl. 6083: Sir Charles Cavendish, notes on De corpore.
Harl. 6796: de Beaugrand, treatise; Descartes to Mersenne (extract); Le Maire, treatise; van Haestrecht, digest of Descartes; Hobbes, Latin treatise on optics; de Beaune, treatise.
Harl. 6942: Payne to Sheldon.
Harl. 7257: Commons journal.
Lansdowne 841: Payne to Sheldon.

Guildhall Library
9171/55: Commissary Court of London, Register of Wills, 1710–11.

The National Archives [TNA]
PROB 11/199: Godolphin, will.

PROB 11/220: Cotes, will.
PROB 11/268: Ward, will.
PROB 11/328: Thompson, will.
SP 20/8: appeals from sequestrations.
SP 23/36: sequestration records.
SP 29/243/181: survey of printers.
SP 29/278/167: L'Estrange memorandum.
SP 29/279/95: Mearne, note.
SP 29/279/95(I): Redmayne, affidavit.

The Parliamentary Archives
House of Lords papers, 1676/7, item 338: Seymour, accusations; Mearne, reply.

Stationers' Hall
Stationers' Company records [SC] (Chadwyck Healey microfilm edition):
Box A, envelope 3, item vi (reel 97): order for damasking Leviathan.
Box A, envelope 3, item vii (reel 97): Bailey, receipt for damasking Leviathan.
Court Book D (reel 56).
Court Book F (reel 57).
Liber E, Register book, 1645-57 (reel 4).
Wardens' Accounts (reel 76).

Nottingham

Nottingham University Library
Pw. 1. 406 (Cav. Misc. 43): Newcastle and Hobbes, agreement.
Pw. 1. 666: Newcastle, notes on the sciences.

Oxford

Bodleian Library
Aubrey 6: Aubrey, notes.
Aubrey 9: Aubrey, notes.
Aubrey 12: Hollar to Aubrey.
Clarendon 29: Hyde, correspondence and papers.
Clarendon 42: Hyde to Nicholas.
Clarendon 91: Charles I, correspondence.
Rawl. A 328: Cromwell, grant of privilege to Blaeu.
Wood F. 43: Joyner to Wood.

Hertford College
2/4/2: Magdalen Hall, benefactors' book.

The Queen's College printed: pressmark FF. g. 514: Leviathan, with annotations by Barlow.

Paris

Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal
6203: Minim convent library catalogue.

Bibliothèque Mazarine
4146: Minim convent library catalogue.
4147: Minim convent library catalogue.
4149: Minim convent library catalogue.
4150: Minim convent library catalogue.

Bibliothèque nationale de France [BN]
f. fr. 23253: 'Lantiniana'.
f. latin 6566A: Hobbes, refutation of White.
f. latin 10352, part 1: Sorbière to Bartholin.

Bibliothèque Sainte-Geneviève
1060: Roberval, treatises.

Sheffield

Sheffield University Library
Hartlib Papers (electronic edn., 2nd edn. (Sheffield, 2002)):
31/20: bookseller's bill.
62/30: Rand to Hartlib.
62/21: Rand to Worsley.
printed: pressmark Q 320.1 (H): Leviathan, with annotations.

Vienna

Stiftung Fürst Liechtenstein
N-7-6: Hobbes, Historia ecclesiastica.

Washington, DC

Folger Shakespeare Library
X.d.483 (75): Francis Godolphin to Col. Robert Bennet.
X.d.483 (78): Francis Godolphin to Col. Robert Bennet.

Wolfenbüttel

Herzog August Bibliothek
149.22 Extrav.: Toland, Adeisidaemon and Origines judaicae.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

This bibliography is confined to works cited in the text or notes of the Introductions and the edition. However, classical texts referred to in the explication of quotations or allusions in Hobbes's text are not separatedly listed here (with the exception of specific translations, cited as such); the editions used are those of the Loeb, Teubner, or Oxford Classical Texts series. Nor does this bibiography include the works cited in the lists of books issued by particular publishers which appear in the footnotes on pp. 255–6, 264, and 266–9 of the Textual Introduction. It also omits those editions (and issues) of Leviathan that are listed and fully described in Chapter 4 of the Textual Introduction.

Ainsworth, H. Annotations upon the Five Bookes of Moses (London, 1627).

The Alcoran of Mahomet, translated out of the Arabique into French (London, 1649).

Allison, C. F., The Rise of Moralism: The Proclamation of the Gospel from Hooker to Baxter (London, 1966).

Alsted ['Alstedius'], J. H., Encyclopaedia in septem tomos distincta [1st edn., Herborn, 1630], photo-reproduction ed. W. Schmidt-Biggemann, 4 vols. (Stuttgart, 1989).

Althusius, J., Politica, methodice digesta et exemplis sacris et profanis illustrata (Herborn, 1603).

Ames, W., Conscience with the Power and Cases thereof (Leiden and London, 1639).

——Technometry, tr. and ed. L. W. Gibbs (Philadelphia, 1979).

Ammianus Marcellinus, Rerum gestarum . . . libri xviii, ed. H. de Valois ['Valesius'] (Paris, 1636).

Amory, H., 'Chiswell, Richard, the Elder (1640–1711)', ODNB.

The Ancient, Honorable, Famous, and Delightfull Historie of Huon of Bordeaux, tr. J. Bourchier, Lord Berners (London, 1601).

Andrewes, L., The Pattern of Catechistical Doctrine at large (London, 1650).

Anon., Labyrinthe royale de l'Hercule Gaulois triomphant (n.p., n.d [1601]).

Anon., Aphorismes: Or, Certaine Selected Points of the Doctrine of the Jesuits (London, 1609).

Anon., A Declaration of the Parliament of England, expressing the Grounds of their Late Proceedings, and of Setling the Present Government in the way of a Free State (London, 1649).

Anon., The Spirit of Persecution again Broken Loose, by an Attempt to put in Execution against Mr. John Biddle . . . an Abrogated Order of the Lords and Commons for Punishing Blasphemies (London, 1655).

Anon., At the Queen's Head Tavern . . . The Following Lists of Copies belonging to the late Mr. John Nicholson. . . (London, 1718).

Anon., The Following Copies and Parts of Copies of the Late Mr Benjamin Sprint (London, 1738).

Anon., A Catalogue of Books in Quires, and Copies, being the Remaining Part of the Stock of Mr Walthoe, Senior (London, 1739).

Anon., ed., The Thirty Nine Articles . . . together with several Acts of Parliament, and Proclamations, concerning Ecclesiastical Matters (London, 1739).

Anon., A Catalogue of the Copies and Remaining Part of the Quire-Stock of Mr George Conyers, Deceas'd (London, 1740).

Anon., A Catalogue of the Remainder of the Quire-Stock; and also of the Copies belonging to the late Ranew Robinson (London, 1740).

Anon., Books printed by the Booksellers of London and Westminster . . . with the Number of Years an Impression of each is in Selling (London, 1774).

Anon. [A. Ascham], The Bounds & Bonds of Publique Obedience: Or, A Vindication of our Lawfull Submission to the Present Government, or to a Government Supposed Unlawfull, but Commanding Lawfull Things (London, 1649).

Anon. [Sir Robert Filmer], Observations concerning the Originall of Government, upon Mr. Hobs Leviathan, Mr. Milton against Salmasius, H. Grotius De jure belli, Mr. Huntons Treatise of Monarchy (London, 1652) [Wing F 918].

Anon. [C. Herle], A Fuller Answer to a Treatise written by Doctor Ferne (London, 1642).

Anon. [P. Hunton], A Treatise of Monarchie (London, 1643).

Anon. [W. A. Jackson], The Carl H. Pforzheimer Library: English Literature, 1475–1700, 3 vols. (New York, 1940).

Anon. [I. La Peyrère], Praeadamitae, sive exercitatio. . . [with] Systema theologicum, ex praeadamitarum hypothesi (n.p., 1655).

Anon. [N. Pocock], 'Illustrations of the State of the Church during the Great Rebellion', The Theologian and Ecclesiastic, 6 (1848), pp. 165–74, 217–24; 12 (1851), pp. 86–96.

Anon. [F. Rous], The Lawfulnes of Obeying the Present Government (London, 1649).

Anon. [J. Spelman], A View of a Printed Book intituled Observations upon his Majesties Late Answers and Expresses (Oxford, '1642' [1643]).

Anti-White: see Hobbes, Critique . . . (1973).

Aquinas: see Thomas Aquinas, St.

Arber, E., ed., The Term Catalogues, 1668–1709 A.D., 3 vols. (London, 1903–6).

Aristotle, ed. and tr. J. G. de Sepúlveda, De republica libri VIII (Paris, 1548).

Ascham, A., A Discourse wherein is Examined, what is Particularly Lawfull during the Confusions and Revolutions of Government: Or, How farre a Man may Lawfully Conforme to the Powers and Commands of those who with Various Successes hold Kingdomes Divided by Civill or Forreigne Warres (London, 1648).

——Of the Confusions and Revolutions of Goverments: Wherein is Examined, How farre a Man may Lawfully Conforme to the Powers and Commands of those who with Various Successes hold Kingdomes Divided by Civill or Forreigne Warrs (London, 1649) [2nd, enlarged, edn. of A Discourse].
See also Anon. [A. Ascham].

Asgill, J., A Collection of Tracts (London, 1715).

Ashburnham, J., The True Copie of a Letter from Mr Ashburnham (n.p. [London], 1648).
Astbury, R., 'The Renewal of the Licensing Act in 1693 and its Lapse in 1695', The Library, 5th ser., 33 (1978), pp. 296–322.
Aubrey, J., 'Brief Lives', chiefly of Contemporaries, set down by John Aubrey, between the years 1669 & 1696, ed. A. Clark, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1898).
Augustine, St, De civitate Dei, ed. B. Dombart and A. Kalb, 2 vols., Corpus christianorum, series latina, vols. xlvii–xlviii (Turnhout, 1955).
AV: see The Bible (1997).
d'Avity, P., The Estates, Empires, & Principallities of the World, tr. E. Grimstone (London, 1615).
Bacon, Sir Francis, Sylva sylvarum (London, 1627).
——The Advancement of Learning, ed. M. Kiernan (Oxford, 2000).
——The Instauratio magna Part II: Novum organum and Associated Texts, ed. G. Rees and M. Wakely (Oxford, 2004).
de Bado Aureo, J., Tractatus de armis (London, 1654).
Baillie, R., Letters and Journals, ed. D. Laing, 3 vols. (Edinburgh, 1841–2).
de Baillon, C., Henriette-Marie de France, reine d'Angleterre, étude historique (Paris, 1877).
Baker, S., and G. Leigh, A Catalogue of the very valuable Library of Philip Carteret Webb, Esq. (London, 1771).
[Ballard, T.,] Bibliotheca bernardiana: Or, A Catalogue of the Library of the Late Charles Bernard (London, 1711).
——Bibliotheca Antonij Collins . . . Part I (London, 1731).
——Catalogus librorum . . . of the Late Learned Robert Gray, M.D. (London, 1731).
Balteau, J., 'Ablancourt, Jean Jacobé de Frémont d'', in J. Balteau et al., eds., Dictionnaire de biographie française, (Paris, 1933–), i, cols. 148–51.
Baltrušaitis, J., Anamorphic Art, tr. W. J. Strachan (Cambridge, 1977).
Bardon, F., Le Portrait mythologique à la cour de France sous Henri IV et Louis XIII: mythologie et politique (Paris, 1974).
Barleti, M., Historia de vita et gestis Scanderbegi (Rome, c.1510).
Baronius, C., Annales ecclesiastici, 12 vols. (Mainz, 1601–8).
Basire, I., The Correspondence of Isaac Basire, D.D., Archdeacon of Northumberland and Prebendary of Durham, in the Reigns of Charles I and Charles II, ed. W. N. Darnell (London, 1831).
[Bateman, T., and J. Cooper,] A Catalogue of the Library, Antiquities, &c. of the Late Learned Dr. Woodward (London, 1728).
Bates, D., ed., Regesta anglo-normannorum: The Acta of William I (1066–1087) (Oxford, 1998).
Baudier, M., Histoire generale de la religion des turcs (Paris, 1625).
Baumgarten, S. J., Nachrichten von einer hallischen Bibliothek, 8 vols. (Halle, 1748–51).
Baumgold, D., 'The Difficulties of Hobbes Interpretation', Political Theory, 36 (2008), pp. 827–55.

Baxter, R., Humble Advice: Or, The Heads of those Things which were offered to many Honourable Members of Parliament by Mr Richard Baxter at the End of his Sermon, Decemb. 24 at the Abby in Westminster (London, 1655).

Beal, P., ed., Index of English Literary Manuscripts, vol. ii (1625–1700), part 1 (London, 1987).

——'Notions in Garrison: The Seventeenth-Century Commonplace Book', in W. Speed Hill, ed., New Ways of Looking at Old Texts (Binghamton, NY, 1993), pp. 131–47.

Becanus, M., Disputatio theologica de fide haereticis servanda (Mainz, 1607).

Bee, C., et al., The Case of Cornelius Bee and his Partners, Richard Royston, William Wells, Samuel Thompson, Thomas Robinson, and William Morden, Booksellers (London, 1666).

Belanger, T., 'Booksellers' Sales of Copyright: Aspects of the London Book Trade, 1718–1768', Columbia University PhD thesis (1970).

Bell, G. M., A Handlist of British Diplomatic Representatives, 1509–1688 (London, 1990).

Bellarmino ['Bellarminus'], R., Disputationes de controversiis christianae fidei, adversus huius temporis haereticos, 4 vols. (Lyon, 1610).

Beza: see The Bible (1648).

Beza [de Bèze], T., Annotationes maiores in Novum Dn. Nostri Iesu Christi Testamentum (n.p., 1594).

The Bible:

The Holie Bible (London, 1572).

The Bible, Translated according to the Ebrew and Greeke, and Conferred with the best Translations in Diuers Languages (London, 1578).

The Holy Bible, conteyning the Old Testament, and the New, newly translated out of the Originall Tongues (London, 1611).

La Bible, qui est toute la saincte escriture du vieil et nouveau testament. Autrement, l'ancienne et la nouvelle alliance. Le tout reveu & conferé sur les textes hebrieux & grecs [tr. C. Bertram et al.] (Sedan, 1633).

Biblia sacra, sive testamentum vetus, ab Im. Tremellio et Fr. Iunio ex hebraeo latinè redditum. Et testamentum novum, à Theod. Beza è Graeco in latinum versum (Amsterdam, 1648).

Biblia sacra polyglotta, ed. B. Walton, 6 vols. (London, 1657).

Biblia sacra juxta Vulgatam Clementinam, ed. A. Colunga and L. Turrado, 4th edn. (Madrid, 1965).

The Bible: Authorized King James Version, ed. R. Carroll and S. Prickett (Oxford, 1997).

Birch, T., ed., The History of the Royal Society of London, 4 vols. (London, 1756–7).

Birrell, T. A., 'Books and Buyers in Seventeenth-Century English Auction Sales', in R. Myers, M. Harris, and G. Mandelbrote, eds., Under the Hammer: Book Auctions since the Seventeenth Century (London, 2001), pp. 51–64.

Bishops' Bible: see The Bible (1572).

Black, C., The Italian Inquisition (New Haven, Conn., 2009).
Blaeu, P., Lettere ai fiorentini: Antonio Magliabechi, Leopoldo e Cosimo III de' Medici, e altri, 1660–1705, ed. A. Mirto and H. T. van Veen (Florence and Amsterdam, 1993).
Blagden, C., The Stationers' Company: A History, 1403–1959 (London, 1960).
Blum, A., Abraham Bosse et la société française au dix-septième siècle (Paris, 1924).
——L'Oeuvre gravé d'Abraham Bosse (Paris, 1924).
Bonaventure, St, Opera omnia, 10 vols. (Quaracchi, 1882–1902).
Bond, W. H., 'Casting off Copy by Elizabethan Printers', Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America, 42 (1948), pp. 281–91.
Book-Auction Records: A Priced and Annotated Annual Record (London and Folkestone, 1902–97).
Book of Common Prayer: see Church of England.
Borrelli, G., Il lato oscuro del Leviathan*: Hobbes contro Machiavelli* (Naples, 2009).
Bosher, R. S., The Making of the Restoration Settlement: The Influence of the Laudians, 1649–1662, 2nd edn. (London, 1957).
Bosse, A., Moyen universel de pratiquer la perspective sur les tableaux, ou surfaces irregulieres (Paris, 1653).
See also Desargues.
Bouchard, M., De l'humanisme à l'Encyclopédie: l'esprit public en Bourgogne sous l'ancien régime (Paris, 1930).
Boulduc, J. ['I. Bolducius'], De ecclesia ante legem libri tres, 2nd edn. (Paris, 1630) [1st edn., Lyon, 1626].
——De ecclesia post legem, liber analogicus (Paris, 1630).
——Commentaria in librum Iob, 2 vols. (Paris, 1637) [1st edn., Paris, 1619].
——De oggio christiano, libri tres (Lyon, 1640).
Bowers, F., 'Notes on Standing Type in Elizabethan Printing', Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America, 40 (1946), pp. 205–24.
——Bibliography and Textual Criticism (Oxford, 1964).
——Essays in Bibliography, Text, and Editing (Charlottesville, Va., 1975).
Bradford, W., A Relation or Iournall of . . . the English Plantation setled at Plimoth in New England (London, 1622).
Bramhall, J., A Faire Warning to Take Heed of the Scotish Discipline: As being of All Others most Injurious to the Civill Magistrate, most Oppressive to the Subject, most Pernicious to Both (Delft, 1649).
——Castigations of Mr. Hobbes his last Animadversions, in the Case concerning Liberty, and Universal Necessity (London, 1657).
——The Catching of Leviathan, or the Great Whale (London, 1658) [appended to Bramhall, Castigations].
——The Works of the Most Reverend Father in God, John Bramhall, D.D., 5 vols. (Oxford, 1842–5).
Bredekamp, H., Thomas Hobbes visuelle Strategien: der Leviathan, Urbild des modernen Staates (Berlin, 1999).

Brenz ['Brentius'], J., Annotationes in Hiob (n.p., 1529).
Brerewood, E., A Second Treatise of the Sabbath: Or, An Explication of the Fourth Commandement (London, 1632).
von Brockdorff, C., Des Sir Charles Cavendish Bericht für Joachim Jungius über die Grundzüge der Hobbes'schen Naturphilosophie (Kiel, 1934).
Browell, G., 'Steward, Richard, bap. 1595, d. 1651', ODNB.
Brown, K., 'The Artist of the Leviathan Title-Page', The British Library Journal, 4 (1978), pp. 24–36.
Brown, T., ed., Miscellanea aulica: Or, A Collection of State Treatises, never before Publish'd (London, 1702).
Brucker, J., Historia critica philosophiae, 6 vols. (Leipzig, 1744–5).
Brückmann, P. C., 'Cressy, Hugh Paulinus [name in religion Serenus] (1605–1674)', ODNB.
Büchlein ['Fagius'], P., Sententiae vere elegantes . . . veterum sapientum Hebraeorum (Isny, 1541).
[Bullord, J.,] Bibliotheca curiosa, sive catalogus librorum . . . generosi cujusdam doctissimi nuper defuncti (London, 1690).
Buonamici ['Bonamicus'], F., De motu libri X (Florence, 1591).
Burgess, G., 'Usurpation, Obligation and Obedience in the Thought of the Engagement Controversy', The Historical Journal, 29 (1986), pp. 515–36.
——'Contexts for the Writing and Publication of Hobbes's Leviathan', History of Political Thought, 40 (1990), pp. 675–702.
Burnet, G., Some Passages of the Life and Death . . . of Rochester (London, 1680).
——The Abridgment of the History of the Reformation of the Church of England (London, 1682).
Burton, T., Diary, ed. J. T. Rutt, 4 vols. (London, 1828).
Bussi, E., 'La condizione giuridica dei musulmani nel diritto canonico', Rivista di storia del diritto italiano, 8 (1935), pp. 459–94.
Calendar of the Proceedings of the Committee for Compounding, &c., 1643–1660, ed. M. A. E. Green, 5 vols. (London, 1888–92).
Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, 1649–50, ed. M. A. E. Green (London, 1875).
Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, 1650, ed. M. A. E. Green (London, 1876).
Calendar of State Papers, Domestic, 1698, ed. E. Bateson (London, 1933).
Calvin, J., Sermons upon the Booke of Iob, tr. A. Golding (London, 1574).
——A Commentary upon the Prophecie of Isaiah, tr. C. Cotton (London, 1609).
——The Institutes of the Christian Religion, tr. H. Beveridge, 2 vols. (London, 1953).
Camden, W., 'Of the Antiquity, Office and Privilege of Heralds in England', in T. Hearne, ed., A Collection of Curious Discourses, written by Eminent Antiquaries (Oxford, 1720), pp. 85–9.
Campanella, T., De sensu rerum et magia, libri quatuor (Frankfurt, 1620).
Carabelli, G., Tolandiana: materiali bibliografici per lo studio dell'opera e della fortuna di John Toland (1670–1722) (Florence, 1975).
Carion, J., Chronicon, ed. P. Melanchthon and C. Peucer (Geneva, 1610).

Carleton, G., Jurisdiction Regall, Episcopall, Papall (London, 1610).
——Astrologomania: the Madnesse of Astrologers (London, 1624).
Carlton, C., Charles I: The Personal Monarch (London, 1983).
[Carr, S.,] Bibliotheca waltoniana (London, 1683).
Carrier, H., Le Labyrinthe de l'état: essai sur le débat politique en France au temps de la Fronde (1648–1653) (Paris, 2004).
Cartwright, T., A Confutation of the Rhemists Translation, Glosses and Annotations on the New Testament (n.p., 1618).
Casmannus, O., Psychologia anthropologica, sive animae humanae doctrina (Hanau, 1594).
Cau, C., et al., Groot placaet-boek, vervattende de placaten, ordonnantien ende edicten van de . . . Staten Generael van de Vereenighde Nederlanden, 7 vols. (The Hague and Amsterdam, 1658–1797).
Cavendish, Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle, The Life of the Thrice Noble, High and Puissant Prince William Cavendishe (London, 1667).
Center for Editions of American Authors, Statement of Editorial Principles and Procedures, revised edn. (New York, 1972).
Champion, J., Republican Learning: John Toland and the Crisis of Christian Culture, 1696–1722 (Manchester, 2003).
Chapman, R. W., Cancels (London, 1930).
'Charles I, King' [L. Cary, Viscount Falkland, and Sir John Colepeper], His Majesties Answer to the XIX. Propositions of both Houses of Parliament (London, 1642).
Charles I, King, and A. Henderson, The Papers which passed at New-castle betwixt His Sacred Majesty and Mr Alexander Henderson concerning the Change of Church-government (London, 1649).
Charron, P., De la Sagesse (Bordeaux, 1601).
Chifflet, P., ed., Sacrosancti et oecumenici Concilii Tridentini . . . canones et decreta (Antwerp, 1640).
[Chiswell, R.,] Bibliotheca smithiana (London, 1682).
[Church of England,] The Boke of Common Praier and Administration of the Sacramentes, and other Rytes and Ceremonies of the Churche, after the use of the Churche of Englande (London, 1549).
——Ordinatio ecclesiae . . . in florentissimo regno Angliae, tr. A. Alesius (Leipzig, 1551).
——The Boke of Common Praier, and Administracion of the Sacramentes, and other Rites and Ceremonies in the Churche of Englande (1552).
——The Boke of Common Praier, and Administration of the Sacramentes, and other Rites and Ceremonies in the Churche of Englande (London, 1559).
——Liber precum publicarum, seu ministerij ecclesiasticae administrationis sacramentorum, aliorumque rituum et caeremoniarum in ecclesia anglicana (London, 1560).
——[Thirty-nine Articles:] Articles, whereupon it was agreed by the Archbysshops and Bisshops of both the Provinces, and the whole Clergy in the Convocation holden at London in the yere of our Lord God MDlxii (London, 1563?).

[Church of England,] Articuli de quibus in synodo londinensi anno Domini . . . MDLXII ad tollendam opinionum dissensionem . . . inter archiepiscopos episcoposque utriusque provinciae, nec non etiam universum clerum convenit (London, 1563).

Cluverius, P., Germaniae antiquae libri tres (Leiden, 1616).

Cluverus, J., Historiarum totius mundi epitome (Leiden, 1637).

Clyde, W. M., The Struggle for the Freedom of the Press from Caxton to Cromwell (London, 1934).

Coate, M., Cornwall in the Great Civil War and Interregnum, 1642–1660, 2nd edn. (Truro, 1963).

Cocq, G., Hobbesianismi anatome, qua . . . philosophi illius à religione christianâ apostasia demonstratur, & refutatur (Utrecht, 1680).

Codex: see Corpus iuris civilis, ed. Krueger et al.

Coke, Sir Edward, The First Part of the Institutes of the Lawes of England: Or, A Commentarie upon Littleton (London, 1628).

——The Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England (London, 1644).

——The Fourth Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England (London, 1644).

Coleridge, K. A., 'The Printing and Publishing of Clement Walker's History of Independency 1647–1661', Bulletin of the Bibliographical Society of Australia and New Zealand, 8 (1984), pp. 22–61.

Coles, E., An English Dictionary (London, 1676).

Collins, J. R., 'Christian Ecclesiology and the Composition of Leviathan: A Newly Discovered Letter to Thomas Hobbes', The Historical Journal, 43 (2000), 217–31.

——'Thomas Hobbes and the Blackloist Conspiracy of 1649', The Historical Journal, 45 (2002), pp. 305–31.

——The Allegiance of Thomas Hobbes (Oxford, 2005).

——'Silencing Thomas Hobbes: The Presbyterians and Leviathan', in P. Springborg, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Hobbes's Leviathan (Cambridge, 2007), pp. 478–99.

Condren, C., George Lawson's Politica and the English Revolution (Cambridge, 1989).

[Cooper, W.,] Bibliotheca digbeiana (London, 1680).

——A Catalogue of Books, of the several Libraries of the Honorable Sir William Coventry, and the Honorable Mr. Henry Coventry (London, 1687).

Copenhaver, B. P., and C. B. Schmitt, Renaissance Philosophy (Oxford, 1992).

Corbett, M., and R. Lightbown, The Comely Frontispiece: The Emblematic Title-Page in England, 1550–1660 (London, 1979).

Cordier ['Corderius'], B., 'In librum Job commentarium', in J.-P. Migne, ed., Scripturae sacrae cursus completus, vols. xiii, xiv (Paris, 1841).

Corpus iuris civilis, ed. D. Godefroy ['Gothofredus'] et al. (Amsterdam, 1643).

Corpus iuris civilis, ed. P. Krueger et al., 3 vols. (Berlin, 1954).

Cosin, J., The Works, ed. J. Sansom, 5 vols. (Oxford, 1843–55).

de Coste, H., 'La Vie du R. P. Marin Mersenne', in P. Tamizey de Larroque, ed., Les Correspondants de Peiresc, XIX: le père Marin Mersenne (Paris, 1892), pp. 13–73.

CSPD: see Calendar of State Papers, Domestic.
Cuddy, N., 'The Revival of the Entourage: The Bedchamber of James I, 1603–1625', in D. Starkey, ed., The English Court: From the Wars of the Roses to the Civil War (Harlow, 1987), pp. 173–225.
Daillé, J., Traicté de l'employ des saincts peres (Geneva, 1632).
Dallison, C., The Royalist's Defence, Vindicating the King's Proceedings in the Late Warre made against him (n.p. [London], 1648).
Daniel, N., Islam and the West: The Making of an Image (Edinburgh, 1960).
Dapper, O., Naukeurige beschryving van Asie (Amsterdam, 1680).
——Asia, oder genaue und grundliche Beschreibung (Amsterdam, 1681).
Davenant, Sir William, Madagascar: With other Poems (London, 1638).
——The Preface to Gondibert, an Heroick Poem . . . with an Answer to the Preface by Mr Hobbes (Paris, 1650).
——Gondibert, ed. D. F. Gladish (Oxford, 1971).
Davenport, C., Samuel Mearne, Binder to King Charles II (Chicago, 1906).
Davidson, P., 'Fanshawe, Sir Richard, first baronet (1608–1666)', ODNB.
Desargues, G., La Maniere universelle de Mr. Desargues lyonnois, pour poser l'essieu, & placer les heures & autres choses aux cadrans au soleil, ed. A. Bosse (Paris, 1643).
Descartes, R., Discours de la methode pour bien conduire sa raison, & chercher la verité dans les sciences (Leiden, 1637).
——Meditationes de prima philosophia (Paris, 1641).
——Principia philosophiae (Amsterdam, 1644).
——Oeuvres, ed. C. Adam and P. Tannery, revised edn., 11 vols. (Paris, 1974).
Digest: see Corpus iuris civilis, ed. Krueger et al.
Dionigi da Genova ['Dionysius Genensis'], Bibliotheca scriptorum ordinis minorum S. Francisci capucinorum (Genoa, 1691).
Dix, B., Lebensgefährdung und Verpflichtung bei Hobbes (Würzburg, 1994).
von Dobschütz, E., ed., Das Decretum Gelasianum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis (Leipzig, 1912).
Doni, A. F., I mondi e gli inferni, ed. P. Pellizzari (Turin, 1994).
Doolin, P. R., The Fronde (Cambridge, Mass., 1935).
Downame, G., An Abstract of the Duties Commanded, and Sinnes Forbidden in the Law of God (London, 1620).
——A Godly and Learned Treatise of Prayer (London, 1640).
Drage, W., A Physical Nosonomy (London, 1665).
Draxe, T., The Christian Armorie wherein is Contained all Manner of Spirituall Munition (London, 1611).
Drewer, L., 'Leviathan, Behemoth and Ziz: A Christian Adaptation', Journal of the Warburg and Courtauld Institutes, 44 (1981), pp. 148–56.
Duffin, A., Faction and Faith: Politics and Religion of the Cornish Gentry before the Civil War (Exeter, 1996).
——'Godolphin, Sidney (bap. 1610, d. 1643)', ODNB.
[Dunmore, J.,] Bibliotheca bissaeana: sive catalogus librorum (London, n.d. [1680]).

[Dunmore, J., and R. Chiswell,] Catalogus librorum . . . D. Doctoris Worsley (London, 1678).

Dunton, J., The Life and Errors of John Dunton, 2 vols. (London, 1705).

Edmond, M., Rare Sir William Davenant: Poet Laureate, Playwright, Civil War General, Restoration Theatre Manager (Manchester, 1987).

Édouard d'Alençon, P., 'Boulduc (Bolducius)', in A. Vacant et al., eds., Dictionnaire de théologie catholique, 15 vols. (Paris, 1903–50), ii, col. 1093.

van Eeghen, I. H., De Amsterdamse boekhandel 1680–1725, 5 vols. (Amsterdam, 1963–78).

Elichmann, J., Tabula Cebetis graece, arabice, latine, ed. C. Salmasius [de Saumaise] (Leiden, 1640).

Epiphanius, Opera omnia, ed. D. Petau ['Petavius'], 2 vols. (Paris, 1622).

Erasmus, D., Adagiorum chiliades quatuor cum sesquicenturia, ed. H. Étienne ['Stephanus'] (Geneva, 1558).

Étienne ['Stephanus'], R., 'Hebraica, chaldaica, graecáque & latina nomina . . . cum interpretatione latina', appended to his Biblia: breues in eadem annotationes, ex doctiss. interpretationibus, & hebraeorum commentariis (Paris, 1532).

Etymologicon magnum, ed. T. Gaisford (Oxford, 1848).

Eusebius et al., Ecclesiasticae historiae autores (Basel, 1562).

'Eutactus Philodemius', The Original and End of Civil Power (London, 1649).

——An Answer to the Vindication of Doctor Hammond against the Exceptions of Eutactus Philodemius (London, 1650).

Evelyn, J., Diary, ed. E. S. de Beer, 6 vols. (Oxford, 1955).

EW: see Hobbes, The English Works, ed. Molesworth (1839–45).

Eyre, G. E. B., [with H. R. Plomer and C. R. Rivington,] ed., A Transcript of the Registers of the Worshipful Company of Stationers, from 1640–1708 A.D., 3 vols. (London, 1913–14).

Fanshawe, H. C., The History of the Fanshawe Family (Newcastle upon Tyne, 1927).

Fanshawe, Sir Richard, A Critical Edition of Sir Richard Fanshawe's 1647 Translation of Giovanni Battista Guarini's Il pastor fido, ed. W. F. Staton and W. E. Simeone (Oxford, 1964).

Fawne, L., et al., A Beacon set on Fire: Or, The Humble Information of certain Stationers, Citizens of London, to the Parliament and Commonwealth of England (London, 1652).

Feather, J., 'The Publication of James Harrington's Commonwealth of Oceana', The Library, 5th ser., 32 (1977), pp. 262–8.

——'The English Book Trade and the Law, 1695–1799', Publishing History, 12 (1982), pp. 51–75.

Feingold, M., 'A Friend of Hobbes and an Early Translator of Galileo: Robert Payne of Oxford', in J. D. North and J. J. Roche, eds., The Light of Nature: Essays in the History and Philosophy of Science presented to A. C. Crombie (Dordrecht, 1985), pp. 265–80.

Field, R., A Learned Sermon (London, 1606).

——Of the Church, Five Bookes (London, 1606).
Firth, C. H., and R. S. Rait, eds., Acts and Ordinances of the Interregnum, 1642–1660, 3 vols. (London, 1911).
Fischer ['Piscator'], J., In librum Jobi commentarius (Herborn, 1612).
Flacius, M., et al., Ecclesiastica historia, integram ecclesiae Christi ideam . . . secundum singulas centurias, perspicuo ordine complectens, 8 vols. (Basel, 1560–74).
de la Fontaine Verwey, H., 'Het werk van de Blaeu's', in H. de la Fontaine Verwey and W. G. Hellinga, In officina Ioannis Blaev (Amsterdam, 1961), pp. 1–12.
Foot, M. M., The Henry Davis Gift: A Collection of Bookbindings, 2 vols. (London, 1978–83).
Forsyth, N., The Old Enemy: Satan and the Combat Myth (Princeton, NJ, 1987).
Foster, J., Alumni oxonienses: The Members of the University of Oxford, 1500–1714, 4 vols. (Oxford, 1891–2).
Foxe, J., Actes and Monuments of Matters most Speciall and Memorable, 6th edn. (London, 1610).
Franklin, R., 'Sir Richard Steward and the Crisis of the Caroline Regime', in S. J. D. Green and P. Horden, eds., All Souls under the Ancien Régime*: Politics, Learning, and the Arts, c.1600–1850* (Oxford, 2007), pp. 39–54.
de Frémont d'Ablancourt, J. J. (attrib.), Mémoires de Monsieur d'Ablancourt, envoyé de sa Majesté Très-Chrétienne Loüis XIV en Portugal (Paris, 1701).
French Geneva Bible: see The Bible (1633).
Freytag, F. G., Analecta litteraria de libris rarioribus (Leipzig, 1750).
Fukuda, A., Sovereignty and the Sword: Harrington, Hobbes, and Mixed Government in the English Civil Wars (Oxford, 1997).
Gabrieli, V., Sir Kenelm Digby: un inglese italianato nell'età della controriforma (Rome, 1957).
Gaffarel, J., Curiositez inouyes sur la sculpture talismanique des Persans (n.p., 1637).
Gaguin, R., De origine et gestis Francorum (Lyon, 1493).
Gants, D. L., 'The Printing, Proofing and Press-correction of Ben Jonson's Folio Workes', in M. Butler, ed., Re-Presenting Ben Jonson: Text, History, Performance (Basingstoke, 1999), pp. 39–58.
Gardiner, S. R., ed., The Constitutional Documents of the Puritan Revolution, 1625–1660, 2nd edn. (Oxford, 1906).
Gaskell, P., A New Introduction to Bibliography, revised edn. (Oxford, 1979).
Gaudriault, R., Filigranes et autres caractéristiques des papiers fabriqués en France aux XVII^e^ et XVIII^e^ siècles (Paris, 1995).
Gelderblom, A.-J., 'The Publisher of Hobbes's Dutch Leviathan', in S. Roach, ed., Across the Narrow Seas: Studies in the History and Bibliography of Britain and the Low Countries (London, 1991), pp. 162–6.
Geneva Bible: see The Bible (1578).
Gesta romanorum (Lyon, 1555).
Gillett, C. R., Burned Books: Neglected Chapters in British History and Literature, 2 vols. (New York, 1932).

Glapthorne, H., Wit in a Constable (London, 1640).
Goclenius, R., Lexicon philosophicum, quo tanquam clave philosophiae fores aperiuntur (Frankfurt, 1613).
Goldie, M., 'Crooke, Andrew (*c.*1605–1674)', ODNB.
Goulden, R. J., The Ornament Stock of Henry Woodfall, 1719–1747, Occasional Papers of the Bibliographical Society, no. 3 (London, 1988).
Gray, R., A Good Speed to Virginia (London, 1609).
Green, M. A. E., ed., Letters of Queen Henrietta Maria, including her Private Correspondence with Charles the First (London, 1857).
Greg, W. W., Collected Papers, ed. J. C. Maxwell (Oxford, 1966).
Grotius, H., De iure belli ac pacis libri tres (Paris, 1625).
Gruber, J. D., ed., Commercii epistolici Leibnitiani . . . tomus prodromus, qui totus est boineburgicus, 2 vols. (Hanover, 1745).
Gumble, T., La Vie du general Monk, duc d'Albemarle, tr. G. Miège (London, 1672).
Gutmann, J., 'Leviathan, Behemoth and Ziz: Jewish Messianic Symbols in Art', Hebrew Union College Annual, 39 (1968), pp. 219–30.
Hakewill, G., An Apologie of the Power and Providence of God in the Government of the World (Oxford, 1627).
Hall, J. ['J. H.'], The Grounds & Reasons of Monarchy Considered (n.p. [London], 1650).
Hammond, H., Of Resisting the Lawful Magistrate under Colour of Religion (Oxford, 1644).
Hamond, W., A Paradox, proving, that the Inhabitants of . . . Madagascar . . . are the Happiest People in the World (London, 1640).
Hardacre, P. H., The Royalists during the Puritan Revolution (The Hague, 1956).
Harrington, J., Oceana, ed. S. B. Liljegren (Lund and Heidelberg, 1925).
Hatchwell, R., Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury, 1588–1679: A Catalogue of Books offered for sale by Richard Hatchwell (Little Somerford, 1979).
Hayduck, M., ed., Commentaria in Aristotelem graeca, xv (Berlin, 1897).
Hayton, D., 'Moral Reform and Country Politics in the Late Seventeenth-Century House of Commons', Past & Present, 128 (1990), pp. 48–91.
Heawood, E., 'Further Notes on Paper Used in England after 1600', The Library, 5th ser., 2 (1948), pp. 119–49.
——'Paper Used in England after 1600', The Library, 5th ser., 3 (1949), pp. 141–2.
——Watermarks mainly of the 17th and 18th Centuries (Hilversum, 1950).
von Hefele, C. J., Conciliengeschichte, nach den Quellen bearbeitet, 2nd edn., 9 vols. (Freiburg im Breisgau, 1873–90).
Hellinga, W. G., Kopij en druk in de Nederlanden: atlas bij de geschiedenis van de Nederlandse typografie (Amsterdam, 1962).
Hessels van Est, W. ['G. Estius'], Annotationes aureae (Cologne, 1622).
Hetet, J., 'The Wardens' Accounts of the Stationers' Company, 1663–79', in R. Myers and M. Harris, eds., Economics of the British Booktrade 1605–1939 (Cambridge, 1985), pp. 32–59.

——'A Literary Underground in Restoration England: Printers and Dissenters in the Context of Constraints, 1660–1689', Cambridge University PhD thesis (1987).
Hiersemann, K. W., Katalog 458: Autographen, Urkunden, Handschriften, Stammbücher (Leipzig, 1918).
Hinds, P., 'Roger L'Estrange, the Rye House Plot, and the Regulation of Political Discourse in Late-Seventeenth-Century London', The Library, 7th ser., 3 (2002), pp. 3–31.
Hinman, C. The Printing and Proof-Reading of the First Folio of Shakespeare, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1963).
Historical Manuscripts Commission [cited as: HMC], Report on the Pepys Manuscripts preserved at Magdalene College, Cambridge (London, 1911).
Hobbes, T., Elementorum philosophiae sectio tertia de cive (Paris, 1642).
——De corpore politico. Or The Elements of Law (London, 1650).
——Humane Nature: Or, The Fundamental Elements of Policie (London, 1650).
——Of Libertie and Necessitie (London, 1654).
——Elementorum philosophiae sectio prima de corpore (London, 1655).
——The Questions concerning Liberty, Necessity, and Chance (London, 1656).
——Six Lessons to the Professors of Mathematicks (London, 1656).
——ΣΤΙΓΜΑΙ . . . or Markes of the Absurd Geometry, Rural Language, Scottish Church-Politicks, and Barbarismes of John Wallis Professor of Geometry and Doctor of Divinity (London, 1657).
——Elementorum philosophiae sectio secunda de homine (London, 1658).
——Les Elemens de la politique de Monsieur Hobbes, tr. F. du Verdus (Paris, 1660).
——Mr. Hobbes Considered in his Loyalty, Religion, Reputation, and Manners (London, 1662).
——Problemata physica (London, 1662).
——Leviathan: of van de stoffe, gedaente, ende magt van de kerckelycke ende wereltlycke regeeringe, tr. 'A. T. A. B.' [A. van Berkel] (Amsterdam, 1667; 2nd edn., Amsterdam, 1672).
——De eerste beginselen van een burger-staat, tr. anon. (Amsterdam, 1675).
——Thomae Hobbesii malmesburiensis vita (London, 1679).
——An Historical Narration concerning Heresie, and the Punishment thereof (London, 1680).
——Thomae Hobbes angli malmesburiensis philosophi vita (London, 1681).
——An Answer to a Book published by Dr. Bramhall late Bishop of Derry, called The Catching of the Leviathan. Together with an Historical Narration concerning Heresie, and the Punishment thereof (London, 1682).
——Seven Philosophical Problems (London, 1682).
——Historia ecclesiastica (London, 1688).
——Leviathan ['Ornaments' edn.] (London, '1651' [1695–1702]).
——Moral and Political Works (London, 1750).
——The English Works of Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury, ed. Sir William Molesworth, 11 vols. (London, 1839–45).

Hobbes, T., Thomae Hobbes malmesburiensis opera philosophica quae latine scripsit omnia, ed. Sir William Molesworth, 5 vols. (London, 1839–45).
——Leviathan (Oxford, 1881).
——Leviathan, ed. H. Morley (London, 1885).
——Leviathan, ed. A. R. Waller (Cambridge, 1904).
—— Leviathan, ed. W. G. Pogson Smith (Oxford, 1909).
——Leviathan, ed. A. D. Lindsay (London, 1914).
——Léviathan [Part 1], ed. and tr. R. Anthony (Paris, 1921).
——Leviathan, ed. M. Oakeshott (Oxford, 1946).
——'Tractatus opticus', ed. F. Alessio, Rivista critica di storia della filosofia, 18 (1963), pp. 147–228.
——Leviathan, ed. C. B. Macpherson (Harmondsworth, 1968).
——The Elements of Law, Natural and Politic, ed. F. Tönnies, 2nd edn., ed. M. M. Goldsmith (London, 1969).
——Leviathan [photo-reproduction of the 'Head' edn.] (Menston, 1969).
——Léviathan, ed. and tr. F. Tricaud (Paris, 1971).
——Critique du De mundo de Thomas White, ed. J. Jacquot and H. W. Jones (Paris, 1973).
——Leviatano, ed. and tr. G. Micheli (Florence, 1976).
——De cive: The Latin Version, ed. J. H. Warrender (Oxford, 1983).
——Scritti teologici, tr. G. Invernizzi and A. Lupoli, ed. A. Pacchi (Milan, 1988).
——Behemoth: Or, The Long Parliament, ed. F. Tönnies, with an Introduction by S. Holmes (Chicago, 1990).
——Leviathan [photo-reproduction of the 'Head' edn.] (Düsseldorf, 1990).
——'1668 Appendix to Leviathan', tr. G. Wright, Interpretation: A Journal of Political Philosophy, 18 (1991), pp. 323–413.
——Leviathan, ed. R. Tuck (Cambridge, 1991).
——The Correspondence, ed. N. Malcolm, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1994).
——Leviathan, with Selected Variants from the Latin Edition of 1668, ed. E. Curley (Indianapolis, 1994).
——Leviathan, ed. J. C. A. Gaskin (Oxford, 1996).
——Leviathan, tr. J. Schlösser, ed. H. Klenner (Hamburg, 1996).
——Leviatano, ed. and tr. R. Santi (Milan, 2001).
——Leviathan, ed. G. A. J. Rogers and K. Schuhmann, 2 vols. (Bristol, 2003).
——Léviathan, ed. and tr. F. Tricaud and M. Pécharman (Paris, 2004).
——Writings on Common Law and Hereditary Right, ed. A. Cromartie and Q. Skinner (Oxford, 2005).
——Behemoth, or the Long Parliament, ed. P. Seaward (Oxford, 2009).
Hobson, G. D., Bindings in Cambridge Libraries (Cambridge, 1929).
——English Bindings in the Library of J. R. Abbey (London, 1940).
Hoekstra, K., 'The de facto Turn in Hobbes's Political Philosophy', in T. Sorell and L. Foisneau, eds., Leviathan after 350 Years (Oxford, 2004), pp. 33–73.
——'Disarming the Prophets: Thomas Hobbes and Predictive Power', in L. Foisneau and G. Wright, eds., Nuove prospettive critiche sul Leviatano di Hobbes nel 350° anniversario di pubblicazione (Milan, 2004), pp. 97–153.

Holinshed, R., The Third Volume of the Chronicles (London, 1586).
Höltgen, K. J., 'Synoptische Tabellen in der medizinischen Literatur und die Logik Agricolas und Ramus'', Sudhoffs Archiv für Geschichte der Medizin und der Naturwissenschaften, 49 (1965), pp. 371–90.
——'John Drydens "nimble spaniel": zur Schnelligkeit der inventio und imaginatio', in H. Meller and H.-J. Zimmermann, eds., Lebende Antike: Symposion für Rudolf Sühnel (Berlin, 1967), pp. 233–49.
Homeric Hymns, Homeric Apocrypha, Lives of Homer, ed. and tr. M. West (Cambridge, Mass., 2003).
Hood, F. C., The Divine Politics of Thomas Hobbes: An Interpretation of Leviathan (Oxford, 1964).
[Hooke, J.,] Bibliotheca Coppingiana: Or, A Catalogue of Choice and Valuable Books contain'd in the Library of the Reverend Mr. Copping (London, 1704).
Hooker, R., Works, ed. W. Speed Hill, 6 vols. (Cambridge, Mass., 1977–93).
Hornschuch, H., Orthotypographia [Leipzig, 1608], ed. and tr. P. Gaskell and P. Bradford (Cambridge, 1972).
van der Horst, P. W., The Sentences of Pseudo-Phocylides, with Introduction and Commentary (Leiden, 1978).
Hotson, H., Commonplace Learning: Ramism and its German Ramifications, 1543–1630 (Oxford, 2007).
Huarte, J., Examen de Ingenios: The Examination of Mens Wits: In which, by Discovering the Varietie of Natures, is shewed for what Profession each one is Apt, and how far he shall Profit therein, tr. 'R. C.' [R. Carew] [from the Italian tr. by C. Camilli] (London, 1594).
Hughes, P. L., and J. F. Larkin, eds., Tudor Royal Proclamations, 3 vols. (New Haven, Conn., 1964–9).
Huntley, F. L., 'Dr. Thomas Lushington (1590–1661), Sir Thomas Browne's Oxford Tutor', Modern Philology, 81 (1983), pp. 14–23.
Hurt, J. J., Louis XIV and the Parlements: The Assertion of Royal Authority (Manchester, 2002).
Huxley, G., Endymion Porter: The Life of a Courtier, 1587–1649 (London, 1959).
Huygens, L., The English Journal, 1651–1652, ed. and tr. A. G. H. Bachrach and R. G. Collmer (Leiden, 1982).
Hyde, Edward, Earl of Clarendon, Mr Edward Hyde's Speech at a Conference betweene both Houses, on Tewsday the 6th of July, 1641 (London, 1641).
——A Brief View and Survey of the Dangerous and Pernicious Errors to Church and State in Mr. Hobbes's Book, entitled Leviathan (Oxford, 1676).
——The Life of Edward Earl of Clarendon, 3 vols. (Oxford, 1827).
Isidore of Seville, St, Etymologiarum sive originum libri XX, ed. W. M. Lindsay, 2 vols. (Oxford, 1911).
Israel, J., Radical Enlightenment: Philosophy and the Making of Modernity, 1650–1750 (Oxford, 2001).

Jackson, N. D., Hobbes, Bramhall and the Politics of Liberty and Necessity: A Quarrel of the Civil Wars and Interregnum (Cambridge, 2007).
Jackson, T., A Collection of the Works . . . containing his Comments upon the Apostles Creed (London, 1653).
Jacob, J. R., Henry Stubbe, Radical Protestantism and the Early Enlightenment (Cambridge, 1983).
Jaffé, P., ed., Bibliotheca rerum germanicarum, 6 vols. (Berlin, 1864–73).
James I, King, The Kings Maiesties Declaration to his Subiects, concerning Lawfull Sports to be used (London, 1618).
Jerome, St, Opera exegetica, ii, ed. M. Adriaen, Corpus christianorum, series latina, vol. lxxiii (Turnhout, 1963).
Jesseph, D., Squaring the Circle: The War between Hobbes and Wallis (Chicago, 1999).
Johns, A., The Nature of the Book: Print and Knowledge in the Making (Chicago, 1998).
Join-Lambert, S., and M. Préaux, eds., Abraham Bosse, savant graveur (Tours, vers 1604–1676, Paris) (Paris, 2004).
Joly, P. L., Remarques critiques sur le Dictionnaire de Bayle, 2 vols. (Paris, 1752).
Jones, H. W., 'Thomas Hobbes and the Bible: A Preliminary Enquiry', in Arts du spectacle et histoire des idées: recueil offert en hommage à Jean Jacquot (Tours, 1984), pp. 271–85.
Jonson, B., Works, ed. C. H. Herford, P. Simpson, and E. Simpson, 11 vols. (Oxford, 1925–52).
The Journals . . . of the House of Commons (London, 1742–).
Joverius, F., Sanctiones ecclesiasticae tam synodicae quam pontificiae (Paris, 1555).
Juel-Jensen, B., 'Fine and Large-Paper Copies of STC Books', The Library, 5th ser., 19 (1964), pp. 226–30.
——'Fine and Large-Paper Copies of STC Books: A Further Note', The Library, 5th ser., 23 (1968), pp. 239–40.
Julius Caesar, The Commentaries, tr. C. Edmonds (London, 1655).
Junius–Tremellius: see The Bible (1648).
Keckermann, B., Praecognitorum logicorum tractatus III (Hanau, 1599).
Keil, H., and H. Hagen, eds., Grammatici latini, 8 vols. (Leipzig, 1855–80).
Kelsey, S., 'Ashburnham, John (1602/3–1671)', ODNB.
——'"A No-King, or a New": Royalists and the Succession, 1648–1649', in J. McElligott and D. L. Smith, eds., Royalists and Royalism during the English Civil Wars (Cambridge, 2007), pp. 192–213.
Kennet, W., A Sermon preach'd at the Funeral of the Right Noble William Duke of Devonshire (London, 1708).
Kiernan, V. G., The Duel in European History: A Study of the Aristocratic Ascendancy. (Oxford, 1988).
Kirschbaum, L., 'Author's Copyright in England before 1640', The Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America, 40 (1946), pp. 43–80.
Kitchin, G., Sir Roger L'Estrange: A Contribution to the History of the Press in the Seventeenth Century (London, 1913).

Kleerkooper, M. M., and W. P. van Stockum, De boekhandel te Amsterdam voornamelijk in de 17e eeuw, 2 vols. (The Hague, 1914–16).
Klein, E., A Comprehensive Etymological Dictionary of the Hebrew Language for Readers of English (Jerusalem, 1987).
Klosko, G., and D. Rice, 'Thucydides and Hobbes's State of Nature', History of Political Thought, 6 (1985), pp. 405–9.
Knachel, P. A, England and the Fronde: The Impact of the English Civil War and Revolution on France (Ithaca, NY, 1967).
Knuttel, W. P. C., Verboden boeken in de Republiek der Vereenigde Nederlanden, Bijdragen tot de geschiedenis van den Nederlandschen boekhandel, xi (The Hague, 1914).
Koeman, C., Joan Blaeu and his Grand Atlas (London, 1970).
Laeven, A. H., 'The Frankfurt and Leipzig Book Fairs and the History of the Dutch Book Trade in the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries', in C. Berkvens-Stevelinck et al., eds., Le Magasin de l'univers*: The Dutch Republic as the Centre of the European Book Trade* (Leiden, 1992), pp. 185–97.
Land, J. P. N, 'Bibliographische Bemerkungen', Archiv für Geschichte der Philosophie, 7 (1894), pp. 362–75. à Lapide [van den Steen], C., In Pentateuchum Mosis commentaria (Paris, 1630).
de Lavardin, J., Histoire de Georges Castriote, surnommé Scanderbeg (Paris, 1576).
——The Historie of George Castriot, surnamed Scanderbeg, tr. 'Z. I.' [Zachary Jones] (London, 1596).
Lawson, G., An Examination of the Political Part of Mr Hobbs his Leviathan (London, 1657).
Leeman, F., Anamorphosen: ein Spiel mit der Wahrnehmung, dem Schein und der Wirklichkeit (Cologne, 1975).
Leijenhorst, C., 'Motion, Monks and Golden Mountains: Campanella and Hobbes on Perception and Cognition', Bruniana & campanelliana, 3 (1997), pp. 93–121.
Lestringant, F., 'Abraham Bosse, artiste protestant?', in S. Join-Lambert and M. Préaux, eds., Abraham Bosse, savant graveur (Tours, vers 1604–1676, Paris) (Paris, 2004), pp. 21–7.
Lewis, J. M., 'Hobbes and the Blackloists: A Study in the Eschatology of the English Revolution', Harvard University PhD thesis (1976).
Life, P., 'Robertson, William (fl. 1651–1685)', ODNB.
Lightfoot, J., The Harmony of the Four Evangelists (London, 1650).
——The Temple (London, 1650).
van Limborch, P., De veritate religionis christianae amica collatio cum erudito Judaeo (Gouda, 1687).
Linden, D. W., A Treatise on . . . Chalybeat Waters (London, 1748).
Littleton, A., Linguae latinae liber dictionarius quadripartitus (London, 1678).
London Polyglot Bible: see The Bible (1657).

Łubieński, Z., Die Grundlagen des ethisch-politischen Systems von Hobbes (Munich, 1932).
Luckombe, P., A Concise History of Printing, containing an Account of its Origin and Progress (London, 1774).
Lucy, W., Observations, Censures and Confutations of Notorious Errours in Mr. Hobbes his Leviathan, and other his Bookes (London, 1663).
Ludlow, E., A Voyce from the Watch Tower: Part Five, 1660–1662, ed. A. B. Worden, Camden, 4th ser., xxi (London, 1978).
Lynch, B., 'Mr Smirke and "Mr Filth": A Bibliographical Case Study in Nonconformist Printing', The Library, 7th ser., 1 (2000), pp. 46–71.
——'Darby, John (d. 1704)', ODNB.
de Lyra, N., Postilla super biblia. Cum additionibus d. Pauli burgensis (Nuremberg, 1481).
'M., G.' [J. Crellius, tr. attrib. T. Lushington], The Expiation of a Sinner, in a Commentary upon the Epistle to the Hebrewes (London, 1646).
Macdonald, H., and M. Hargreaves, Thomas Hobbes: A Bibliography (London, 1952). de Macedo, F., Tessera romana authoritatis pontificiae (London, 1654).
Machiavelli, N., Il principe e Discorsi sopra la prima deca di Tito Livio, ed. S. Bertelli, 3rd edn. (Milan, 1971).
McGann, J. J., A Critique of Modern Textual Criticism (Chicago, 1983).
McKenzie, D. F., 'The Economies of Print, 1550–1750: Scales of Production and Conditions of Constraint', in S. Cavaciocchi, ed., Produzione e commercio della carta e del libro, secc. XIII–XVIII (Florence, 1992), pp. 389–425.
——Making Meaning: 'Printers of the Mind' and Other Essays, ed. P. D. McDonald and M. F. Suarez (Amherst, Mass., 2002).
——and M. Bell, A Chronology and Calendar of Documents relating to the London Book Trade, 1641–1700, 3 vols. (Oxford, 2005).
McKitterick, D., A History of Cambridge University Press, 3 vols. (Cambridge, 1992–2004).
McLachlan, H. J., Socinianism in Seventeenth-Century England (Oxford, 1951).
Maclean, I., 'Logical Division and Visual Dichotomies: Ramus in the Context of Legal and Medical Writing', in M. Feingold, J. S. Freedman, and W. Rother, eds., The Influence of Petrus Ramus: Studies in Sixteenth and Seventeenth Century Philosophy and Sciences (Basel, 2001), pp. 228–47.
McNeilly, F. S., The Anatomy of Leviathan (London, 1968).
Madan, F., Oxford Books: A Bibliography of Printed Works relating to the University and City of Oxford, 3 vols. (Oxford, 1895–1931).
Madan, F. F., A New Bibliography of the Eikon Basilike of King Charles the First, Oxford Bibliographical Society Publications, n.s., iii, for 1949 (Oxford, 1950).
Malcolm, N., 'The Title Page of Leviathan, seen in a Curious Perspective', The Seventeenth Century, 13 (1998), pp. 124–55.
——Aspects of Hobbes (Oxford, 2002).

——'Thomas Harrison and his "Ark of Studies": An Episode in the History of the Organization of Knowledge', The Seventeenth Century, 19 (2004), pp. 196–232.
——'Hobbes, the Latin Optical Manuscript, and the Parisian Scribe', English Manuscript Studies, 1100–1700, 12 (2005), pp. 210–32.
——'Comenius, Boyle, Oldenburg, and the Translation of the Bible into Turkish', Church History and Religious Culture, 87 (2007), pp. 327–62.
——'The Making of the Bear: Further Thoughts on the Printing of the Second Edition of Leviathan', Hobbes Studies, 20 (2007), pp. 2–39.
——'The Name and Nature of Leviathan: Political Symbolism and Biblical Exegesis', Intellectual History Review, 17 (2007), pp. 21–39.
——'The Making of the Ornaments: Further Thoughts on the Printing of the Third Edition of Leviathan', Hobbes Studies, 21 (2008), pp. 3–37.
——and J. A. Stedall, John Pell (1611–1685) and his Correspondence with Sir Charles Cavendish: The Mental World of an Early Modern Mathematician (Oxford, 2005).
——and M. Tolonen, 'The Correspondence of Thomas Hobbes: Some New Items', The Historical Journal, 51 (2008), pp. 481–95.
Maltby, R., A Lexicon of Ancient Latin Etymologies (Leeds, 1991).
Malvezzi, V., Discorsi sopra Cornelio Tacito (Venice, 1622).
Manceau, J.-P., 'Abraham Bosse, un cartésien dans les milieux artistiques et scientifiques du XVII^{e} siècle', in S. Join-Lambert and M. Préaux, eds., Abraham Bosse, savant graveur (Tours, vers 1604–1676, Paris) (Paris, 2004), pp. 53–63.
Mandelbrote, G., 'Richard Bentley's Copies: The Ownership of Copyrights in the Late Seventeenth Century', in A. Hunt, G. Mandelbrote, and A. Shell, eds., The Book Trade and its Customers, 1450–1900: Historical Essays for Robin Myers (Winchester, 1997), pp. 55–94.
de Marca, P., De concordia sacerdotii et imperii (Paris, 1641).
de Mariana, J., De rege et regis institutione libri III, 2nd edn. (Mainz, 1605).
de Marolles, M., Les Mémoires (Paris, 1656).
——Catalogue de livres d'estampes et de figures en taille douce . . . fait à Paris en l'année 1666 par M. de Marolles abbé de Villeloin (Paris, 1666).
Marsh, C., A Catalogue of a Large and Valuable Collection of Books . . . in which is included, the Library of the Rev. Mr. Cleave Greenhill (London, [1747?]).
Marsh, F. G., The Godolphins (n.p., 1930).
Marshall, A., 'Bennet, Henry, first Earl of Arlington (bap. 1618, d. 1685)', ODNB.
Maslen, K. I. D., The Bowyer Ornament Stock (Oxford, 1973).
Massey, C., Microcosmography . . . a Sermon preached . . . August 11, 1649 (London, 1649).
Masson, D., The Life of John Milton, Narrated in Connexion with the Political, Ecclesiastical, and Literary History of his Time, 2nd edn., 7 vols. (London, 1881).
Matton, S., Le Discours de vraye philosophie demonstrative (1628) de Gabriel Poitevin et la tradition du matérialisme chrétien (Paris, 2007).

Meinsma, K. O., Spinoza en zijn kring, over Hollandse vrijgeesten (The Hague, 1896).
Mendle, M., Dangerous Positions: Mixed Government, the Estates of the Realm, and the Answer to the XIX Propositions (University, Ala., 1985).
——Henry Parker and the English Civil War: The Political Thought of the Public's 'Privado' (Cambridge, 1995).
Menochio, G. S. ['I. S. Menochius'], Brevis explicatio sensus literalis totius S. Scripturae ex optimis quibusque auctoribus per epitomes collecta (Cologne, 1630).
Mercier, J. ['I. Mercerius'], Commentarii in librum Iob (Geneva, 1573).
Mercurius politicus, ed. M. Nedham (London, 1650–52).
Mersenne, M., Quaestiones celeberrimae in Genesim (Paris, 1623).
——De la verité des sciences (Paris, 1625).
——Questions théologiques, physiques, morales, et mathématiques (Paris, 1634).
——Cogitata physico-mathematica (Paris, 1644).
——Universae geometriae synopsis (Paris, 1644).
——Correspondance, ed. C. de Waard et al., 17 vols. (Paris, 1933–88).
Metzger, H.-D., Thomas Hobbes und die Englische Revolution, 1640–1660 (Stuttgart, 1991).
Michault, J. B., Mélanges historiques et philologiques, 2 vols. (Paris, 1754).
Migne, J.-P., ed., Patrologia latina, 221 vols. (Paris, 1844–55).
——ed., Patrologia graeca, 161 vols. (Paris, 1857–66).
Miller, C. W., 'Thomas Newcomb: A Restoration Printer's Ornament Stock', Studies in Bibliography, 3 (1950–51), pp. 155–70.
——'A London Ornament Stock: 1598–1683', Studies in Bibliography, 7 (1955), pp. 125–51.
[Millington, E.,] A Choice Catalogue of the Library of John Parsons, Esquire (London, 1682).
——Bibliotheca lloydiana (London, 1683).
——Catalogus librorum bibliothecae selectissimae Doctiss. Rev. viri D. Joannis Arthurii (London, 1683).
——Bibliotheca oweniana, sive catalogus librorum . . . bibliothecae Rev. Doct. Vir. D. Ioan. Oweni (London, 1684).
——Bibliotheca jacombiana, sive catalogus variorum librorum . . . Rev. Doct. Thomae Jacomb (London, 1687).
——Bibliotheca megottiana (London, 1693).
——Bibliothecae nobilissimae . . . pars posterior . . . una cum bibliotheca selectissima Rev. Doct. V. D. Jo. Scott (London, 1695).
——Catalogus librorum bibliothecae instructissimae Rev. D. V. D. Tim. Puller (London, 1695).
——Bibliotheca skinneriana, & hampdeniana (London, 1699).
——Bibliotheca woodwardiana (London, 1702).
Milton, A., Catholic and Reformed: The Roman and Protestant Churches in English Protestant Thought, 1600–1640 (Cambridge, 1995).

Milton, P., 'Hobbes, Heresy and Lord Arlington', History of Political Thought, 14 (1993), pp. 501–46.
Milward, P., Religious Controversies of the Jacobean Age (London, 1978).
Mintz, S., The Hunting of Leviathan: Seventeenth-Century Reactions to the Materialism and Moral Philosophy of Thomas Hobbes (Cambridge, 1962).
——'Hobbes on the Law of Heresy: A New Manuscript', Journal of the History of Ideas, 29 (1968), pp. 409–14.
Mirbt, C., ed., Quellen zur Geschichte des Papsttums und des römischen Katholizismus, 4th edn. (Tübingen, 1924).
van Moerkerken, P. H., Adriaan Koerbagh, 1633–1669: een strijder voor het vrije denken (Amsterdam, 1948).
du Molinet, C., Le Cabinet de la bibliothèque de Sainte Genevieve (Paris, 1692).
Monkhouse, T., ed., State Papers collected by Edward, Earl of Clarendon, 3 vols. (Oxford, 1767–86).
Montagu, R., Catalogue of Curious Books (London, 1732).
de Montaigne, M., Les Essais (Paris, 1595).
Moore, J. K., Primary Materials relating to Copy and Print in English Books of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (Oxford, 1992).
Moote, A. L., The Revolt of the Judges: The Parlement of Paris and the Fronde, 1643–1652 (Princeton, NJ, 1971).
More, H., The Immortality of the Soul, so far forth as it is Demonstrable from the Knowledge of Nature and the Light of Reason (London, 1659).
More, Sir Thomas, Utopia (Louvain, 1516).
Morice, W., Coena quasi KOINH: The Common Right to the Lords Supper asserted (London, 1660).
Moxon, J., Mechanick Exercises on the Whole Art of Printing, ed. H. Davis and H. Carter, 2nd edn. (London, 1962).
Müller, Tora für die Völker: die noachidischen Gebote und Ansätze zu ihrer Rezeption im Christentum (Berlin, 1994).
Nauta, L., 'Hobbes on Religion and the Church between The Elements of Law and Leviathan: A Dramatic Change of Direction?', Journal of the History of Ideas (2002), pp. 577–98.
Nedham, M., The Case of the Common-wealth of England, Stated, 1st and 2nd edns. (London, 1650).
Niceron, J.-F., La Perspective curieuse (Paris, 1638).
Nixon, H. M., English Restoration Bookbindings: Samuel Mearne and his Contemporaries (London, 1974). de Nostredame, M., Les Propheties (Paris, 1555; another edn., Paris, 1605).
Obrich, W., Hundert Jahre Hiersemann, 1884–1984 (Stuttgart, 1984).
ODNB: see Oxford Dictionary of National Biography.
OED: see Oxford English Dictionary.
OL: see Hobbes, Thomae Hobbes malmesburiensis . . ., ed. Molesworth (1839–45).
Ollard, R., Clarendon and his Friends (London, 1987).

Oman, C. C., and J. Hamilton, Wallpapers: A History and Catalogue of the Collection of the Victoria and Albert Museum (London, 1982).
Ong, W. J., Ramus, Method and the Decay of Dialogue (Cambridge, Mass., 1958).
Osborne, T., A Catalogue (with the Prices Printed) of Several Libraries lately purchased (London, n.d. [1748]).
——A Catalogue of Thirty Thousand Volumes . . . particularly the Library of William Kynaston Esq. (London, 1749).
——A Catalogue of the Libraries of Richard Graham, Esq. . . . Mr. Thomas Day . . . the Rev. Mr. Cawley (London, 1750).
Osorio, J. ['H. Osorius'], De rebus Emmanuelis regis Lusitaniae invictissimi virtute et auspicio gestis libri duodecim (Lisbon, 1571).
The Oxford Dictionary of National Biography, www.oxforddnb.com
The Oxford English Dictionary, www.oed.com
[Oxford University,] The Judgment and Decree of the University of Oxford Past in their Convocation July 21 1683, against Certain Pernicious Books and Damnable Doctrines Destructive to the Sacred Persons of Princes, their State and Government, and of all Humane Society (Oxford, 1683).
Palladini, F., ed., La biblioteca di Samuel Pufendorf: catalogo dell'asta di Berlin del settembre 1697 (Wiesbaden, 1999).
Papillon, P., Bibliothèque des auteurs de Bourgogne, 2 vols. (Dijon, 1745).
Paré, A., Workes, tr. T. Johnson (London, 1634).
Pareus, D., Opera theologica exegetica, 3 vols. (Geneva, 1628–50).
Parker, H., Observations upon some of His Majesties late Answers and Expresses (London, 1642).
Parkin, J., Taming the Leviathan: The Reception of the Political and Religious Ideas of Thomas Hobbes in England, 1640–1700 (Cambridge, 2007).
Pasquier, É., Les Recherches de la France, revised edn. (Paris, 1621).
Patin, G., Lettres, ed. J. H. Reveillé-Parise, 3 vols. (Paris, 1846).
Paulmier, J. ['Palmarius'], De morbis contagiosis libri septem (Paris, 1578).
Payne, T., A Catalogue of Scarce and Useful Books [2nd title page: A Catalogue of the well-chosen Library of Mr. William Chilwell] (London, 1741).
——Catalogue of a Curious Collection of Books: containing Ten Thousand Volumes (London, 1749).
Pennington, R., A Descriptive Catalogue of the Etched Work of Wenceslaus Hollar, 1607–1677 (Cambridge, 1982).
Pepys, S., Diary, ed. R. Latham and W. Matthews, 11 vols. (London, 1970–83).
Perkins, W., A Reformed Catholike (Cambridge, 1598).
——Problema de romanae fidei ementito catholicismo (Cambridge, 1604).
Petrie, Sir Charles, ed., The Letters, Speeches and Proclamations of King Charles I (London, 1935).
PG: see Migne (1857–66).
'Philippus Presbyter', In historiam Job commentariorum libri tres, ed. J. Sichardus (Basel, 1527).

[Phillips, T.,] Bibliotheca angleseiana (London, 1686).
de Pineda, J. ['I.'], Commentariorum in Iob libri tredecim, 2 vols. (Antwerp, 1612–14).
Pintard, R., Le Libertinage érudit dans la première moitié du XVII^e siècle (Paris, 1943; 2nd edn., Geneva, 1983).
PL: see Migne (1844–55).
Plomer, H. R., 'The King's Printing House under the Stuarts', The Library, 2nd ser., 8 (1901), pp. 353–75.
——A Dictionary of the Booksellers and Printers who were at work in England, Scotland and Ireland from 1641 to 1667 (London, 1907).
——A Dictionary of the Booksellers and Printers who were at work in England, Scotland and Ireland from 1668 to 1725, ed. A. Esdaile (Oxford, 1922).
——English Printers' Ornaments (London, 1924).
——G. H. Bushnell, and E. R. M. Dix, A Dictionary of the Printers and Booksellers who were at work in England, Scotland and Ireland from 1726 to 1775 (London, 1932).
Plowden, E., Commentaries (London, 1779).
Pocock, N., Life of Richard Steward, Dean Designate of St Paul's, ed. T. I. Pocock (London, 1908).
Pratt, W. H., Article in the form of a letter to the Editor, The Gentleman's Magazine and Historical Chronicle, 83 (= n.s., vol. 6), part 1 (Jan.–June 1813), pp. 30–31.
Prevost, M., 'Bolduc ou Boulduc (Jacques)', in Dictionnaire de biographie française, ed. J. Balteau et al. (Paris, 1933–), vi, col. 880.
de la Primaudaye, P., The French Academie, wherein is discoursed the institution of maners, and whatsoever els concerneth the good and happie life of all estates and callings, tr. T. B. (London, 1586).
Prothero, G. W., ed., Select Statutes and other Constitutional Documents illustrative of the Reigns of Elizabeth and James I, 4th edn. (Oxford, 1913).
Prynne, W., The Soveraigne Power of Parliaments and Kingdomes (London, 1643).
Purchas, S., Purchas his Pilgrimes . . . The Fourth Part (London, 1625).
Puttenham, G., The Arte of English Poesie, ed. G. D. Willcock and A. Walker (Cambridge, 1970).
Randolph, T., Amyntas: Or, The Impossible Dowry (Oxford, 1638).
Raylor, T., 'Thomas Hobbes and "The Mathematical Demonstration of the Sword"', The Seventeenth Century, 15 (2000), pp. 175–98.
——'The Date and Script of Hobbes's Latin Optical Manuscript', English Manuscript Studies, 1100–1700, 12 (2005), pp. 201–9.
——'The Anglican Attack on Hobbes in Paris, 1651', The Historical Journal, 53 (2010), pp. 153–64.
Rhodes, R., 'Hobbes's unReasonable Fool', The Southern Journal of Philosophy, 30 (1992), pp. 93–101.
Ribera, F., In librum duodecim prophetarum commentarii [1st edn., Salamanca, 1587] (Cologne, 1613).
Rich, R., Love without Dissimulation: Or, The Letter and Direction of R. Rich. to Mr. J. Raynes (n.p. [London?], n.d. [1667]).

Rituale romanum Pauli V Pont. Max. iussu editum (Venice, 1632).
Rivet, A., Critici sacri specimen (Dordrecht, 1619).
Robertson, W., A Gate or Door to the Holy Tongue, opened in English (London, 1653).
——The Second Gate, or Inner Door to the Holy Tongue (London, 1655).
Rogers and Schuhmann: see Hobbes, Leviathan (2003).
Ross, A., Leviathan drawn out with a Hook: Or, Animadversions upon Mr Hobbs his Leviathan (London, 1653).
Rostenberg, L., 'Robert Scott, Restoration Stationer and Importer', The Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America, 48 (1954), pp. 49–76.
——Literary, Political, Scientific, Religious and Legal Publishing, Printing and Bookselling in England, 1551–1700: Twelve Studies, 2 vols. (New York, 1965).
Rutherford, S., Lex, rex (London, 1644).
Sale, W. M., Samuel Richardson: Master Printer (Ithaca, NY, 1950).
Salmasius [de Saumaise], C., Defensio regia, pro Carolo I (Amsterdam, 1649).
Sanchez ['Sanctius'], G., In librum Iob commentarii cum paraphrasi (Lyon, 1625).
Sarasohn, L., 'Was Leviathan a Patronage Artifact?', History of Political Thought, 21 (2000), 606–31.
Scaino, A., Trattato del giuoco della palla (Venice, 1555).
Schieffer, R., 'Der Papst als Pontifex Maximus: Bemerkungen zur Geschichte eines päpstlichen Ehrentitels', Zeitschrift der Savigny-Stiftung für Rechtsgeschichte, kanonistische Abteilung, 57 (1971), pp. 300–310.
Schindler, V., Lexicon pentaglotton, hebraicum, chaldaicum, syriacum, talmudico-rabbinicum, & arabicum (Frankfurt am Main, 1612).
Schmidt-Biggemann, W., Topica universalis: eine Modellgeschichte humanistischer und barocker Wissenschaft (Hamburg, 1983).
Schoneveld, C. W., 'Some Features of the Seventeenth-Century Editions of Hobbes's De Cive Printed in Holland and Elsewhere', in J. G. van der Bend, ed., Thomas Hobbes: His View of Man (Amsterdam, 1982), pp. 125–42.
——Intertraffic of the Mind: Studies in Seventeenth-Century Anglo-Dutch Translation with a Checklist of Books Translated from English into Dutch, 1600–1700 (Leiden, 1983).
Schreiner, S., Where Shall Wisdom be Found? Calvin's Exegesis of Job from Medieval and Modern Perspectives (Chicago, 1994).
Schuhmann, K., 'Hobbes dans les publications de Mersenne en 1644', Archives de philosophie, 58 (1995), no. 2, 'Bulletin hobbesien' (separate pagination), pp. 2–7.
——'Leviathan and De Cive', in T. Sorrell and L. Foisneau, eds., Leviathan after 350 Years (Oxford, 2004), pp. 13–31.
Schwoerer, L. G., "No Standing Armies!" The Antiarmy Ideology in Seventeenth-Century England (Baltimore, Md., 1974).
Scott, D., 'Counsel and Cabal in the King's Party, 1642–1646', in J. McElligott and D. L. Smith, eds., Royalists and Royalism during the English Civil Wars (Cambridge, 2007), pp. 112–35.

Scultetus, A., Medullae theologiae patrum syntagma (Frankfurt, 1634).
Seaver, P. S., 'Downham, John (1571–1652)', ODNB.
Seaward, P.: see Hobbes, Behemoth (2009).
Selden, J., Titles of Honor (London, 1614).
——The Historie of Tithes (n.p. [London], 1618).
——De iure naturali & gentium (London, 1640).
——Opera omnia, ed. D. Wilkins, 3 vols. (London, 1726).
Sergio, E., Contro il Leviatano*: Hobbes e le controversie scientifiche, 1650–1665* (Catanzaro, 2001).
de Serres, J., A Generall Historie of France, tr. E. Grimeston (London, 1624).
Sewel, W., A New Dictionary English and Dutch (Amsterdam, 1691).
Shakespeare, W., The Complete Works, ed. S. Wells and G. Taylor (Oxford, 1988).
Sharpe, K., 'The Image of Virtue: The Court and Household of Charles I, 1625–1642', in D. Starkey, ed., The English Court: From the Wars of the Roses to the Civil War (Harlow, 1987), pp. 226–60.
——Reading Revolutions: The Politics of Reading in Early Modern England (New Haven, Conn., 2000).
Shell, A., A. Emblow, and R. Myers, Index to the Court Books of the Stationers' Company, 1679–1717 (London, 2007).
Shriver, F., 'Orthodoxy and Diplomacy: James I and the Vorstius Affair', English Historical Review, no. 336 (1970), pp. 449–74.
Sidney, Sir Philip, An Apologie for Poetrie (London, 1595).
Siebert, F. S., Freedom of the Press in England, 1476–1776 (Urbana, Ill., 1965).
Siegel, S., Tabula: Figuren der Ordnung um 1600 (Berlin, 2009).
Simeone, W. E., 'Sir Richard Fanshawe: An Account of his Life and Writings', University of Pennsylvania PhD thesis (1950).
Simmons, J., 'An Unpublished Letter from Abraham Cowley', Modern Language Notes, 57 (1942), pp. 194–5.
Simpson, P., Proof-Reading in the Sixteenth, Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries, 2nd edn., ed. H. Carter (London, 1970).
Skinner, Q., 'History and Ideology in the English Revolution', The Historical Journal, 8 (1965), pp. 151–78.
——'The Ideological Context of Hobbes's Political Thought', The Historical Journal, 9 (1966), pp. 286–317.
——'Conquest and Consent: Hobbes and the Engagement Controversy', in G. E. Aylmer, ed., The Interregnum: The Quest for Settlement (London, 1972), pp. 79–98.
——Reason and Rhetoric in the Philosophy of Hobbes (Cambridge, 1996).
——Visions of Politics, 3 vols. (Cambridge, 2002).
——Hobbes and Republican Liberty (Cambridge, 2008).
Smolenaars, M., 'Scott, Robert (b. in or before 1632, d. 1709/10)', ODNB.
Sommerville, J. P., Thomas Hobbes: Political Ideas in Historical Context (Basingstoke, 1992).

Sommerville, J. P. 'Lofty Science and Local Politics', in T. Sorell, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Hobbes (Cambridge, 1996), pp. 246–73.
——'Hobbes and Independency', in L. Foisneau and G. Wright, eds., Nuove prospettive critiche sul Leviatano di Hobbes nel 350° anniversario di pubblicazione (Milan, 2004), pp. 155–73.
Somner, W., Dictionarium saxonico-latino-anglicum (Oxford, 1659).
Sorbière, S., Lettres et discours . . . sur diverses matieres curieuses (Paris, 1660).
Sorell, T., 'Hobbes's Scheme of the Sciences', in T. Sorell, ed., The Cambridge Companion to Hobbes (Cambridge, 1996), pp. 45–61.
Speed, J., The History of Great Britaine under the Conquests of the Romans, Saxons, Danes and Normans (London, 1623).
Spenser, E., The Faerie Queene (London, 1596).
Spinoza, B., Tractatus theologico-politicus ('Hamburg' [Amsterdam], 1670).
Springell, F. C., Connoisseur and Diplomat: The Earl of Arundel's Embassy in Germany in 1636 (London, 1963).
ST: see Thomas Aquinas, St, Summa theologiae.
Stephenson, S., and C. Stephenson, A Specimen of Printing Types and Various Ornaments (London, 1796).
Steuco ['Steuchus Eugubinus'], A., Opera omnia, ed. A. Morandus, 3 vols. (Venice, 1591).
Stevenson, D., Revolution and Counter-revolution in Scotland, 1644–1651, 2nd edn. (Edinburgh, 2003).
Steward, R. ['R. S.'], An Answer to a Letter written at Oxford, and superscribed to Dr. Samuel Turner, concerning the Church, and the Revenue thereof (n.p., 1647).
Stroud, E. C., 'Thomas Hobbes's A Minute or First Draught of the Optiques: A Critical Edition', University of Wisconsin-Madison PhD thesis (1983).
Suárez, F., Varia opuscula theologica (Lyon, 1600).
——Tractatus de legibus ac Deo legislatore (Coimbra, 1612).
Suarez, M. F., and H. R. Woudhuysen, The Oxford Companion to the Book, 2 vols. (Oxford, 2010).
Sutherland, D. W., The Assize of Novel Disseisin (Oxford, 1973).
Talmud, Baba bathra, tr. M. Simon and I. W. Slotki, 2 vols. (London, 1935) (= vols. v, vi of Seder Nezikin, ed. I. Epstein, 6 vols. (London, 1935)).
Tanselle, T., 'Some Principles for Editorial Apparatus', Studies in Bibliography, 25 (1972), pp. 41–88.
——'The Editorial Problem of Final Authorial Intention', Studies in Bibliography, 29 (1976), pp. 167–211.
——'Recent Editorial Discussion and the Central Questions of Editing', Studies in Bibliography, 34 (1981), pp. 23–65.
——'Classical, Biblical, and Modern Textual Criticism and Modern Editing', Studies in Bibliography, 36 (1983), pp. 21–68.
Taylor, J., XXVIII Sermons preached at Golden Grove (London, 1651).
Tenison, T., The Creed of Mr Hobbes Examined (London, 1670).

Terrel, J., Hobbes: vies d'un philosophe (Rennes, 2008).
Thirty-nine Articles: see Church of England.
Thomas Aquinas, St, In librum B. Iob expositio (Rome, 1562).
——Summa theologiae, ed. T. Gilby et al., 61 vols. (London, 1964–81).
——Opera omnia, ed. R. Busi, 7 vols. (Stuttgart, 1980).
——The Division and Methods of the Sciences, tr. A. Maurer, 4th edn. (Toronto, 1986).
Thorne, R., 'Macartney, George, Earl Macartney (1737–1806)', ODNB.
Thucydides, Eight Bookes of the Peloponnesian Warre, tr. T. Hobbes (London, 1629).
Tilley, M. P., A Dictionary of the Proverbs in England in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries (Ann Arbor, Mich., 1950).
Timpler, C., Physicae seu philosophiae naturalis systema methodicum, in tres partes digestum . . . pars prima, complectens physicam generalem (Hanau, 1605).
Todd, W. B., 'An Early MS. of Hobbes's "Leviathan"', Notes and Queries, n.s., 20 (= 218) (1973), p. 181.
Toland, J., Christianity not Mysterious and Apology for Mr. Toland (London, 1702).
——Christianity not Mysterious, ed. P. McGuinness, A. Harrison, and R. Kearney (Dublin, 1997).
Toomer, G. J., John Selden: A Life in Scholarship, 2 vols. (Oxford, 2009).
Tostatus [Tostado Ribera de Madrigal], A., Opera omnia, 23 vols. (Venice, 1596).
Toussaint [Toussain, 'Tossanus'], D., A Synopsis or Compendium of the Fathers, tr. A. S. (London, 1635).
Tractatus universi juris, duce & auspicio Gregorio XIII, 18 vols. (Venice, 1584–6).
Trapp, J., A Commentary or Exposition upon the XII Minor Prophets (London, 1654).
Treadwell, M., 'London Printers and Printing Houses in 1705', Publishing History, 7 (1980), pp. 5–44.
——'London Trade Publishers, 1675–1750', The Library, 6th ser., 4 (1982), pp. 99–134.
Trease, G., Portrait of a Cavalier: William Cavendish, First Duke of Newcastle (London, 1979).
Treasure, G., 'Webb, Philip Carteret (1702–1770)', ODNB.
Tricaud, F., 'Introduction', in T. Hobbes, Léviathan, ed. and tr. F. Tricaud (Paris, 1971), pp. xi–xxxvi.
Tuck, R., Philosophy and Government, 1572–1651 (Cambridge, 1993).
Twisse, W., The Doctrine of the Synod of Dort and Arles, reduced to the Practise (n.p. [Amsterdam], n.d. [c.1631]).
Ussher, J., An Answer to a Challenge made by a Iesuite in Ireland (London, 1624).
Vallance, E., 'Oaths, Casuistry, and Equivocation: Anglican Responses to the Engagement Controversy', The Historical Journal, 44 (2001), pp. 59–77.
Vandenbossche, H., Adriaen Koerbagh en Spinoza (Leiden, 1978).
Van Eerde, K. S., Wenceslaus Hollar: Delineator of his Time (Charlottesville, Va., 1970). de la Vega, G., Primera parte de los commentarios reales, que tratan del origen de los Yncas (Lisbon, 1609).

Verstegan [or Rowland], R., A Restitution of Decayed Intelligence (Antwerp, 1605).
Vilvain, R., Theoremata theologica: Theological Treatises (London, 1654).
Vincent, H. P., 'Three Unpublished Letters of Abraham Cowley', Modern Language Notes, 54 (1939), pp. 454–8.
de Vio, T. ['Caietanus'], Opera omnia quotquot in Sacrae Scripturae expositionem reperiuntur, 5 vols. (Lyon, 1639).
Visscher, V., De waare tempel voorgestelt in een inwyings predicatie van de tweede en nieuwe kerck van de gemeente d'onveranderde Ausburgse belydenis toegedaan in Amsterdam (Amsterdam, 1671).
Vonhoff, G., '"Copy-Text Theory" Revisited: die anglo-amerikanische Textkritik', in H. Kraft, ed., Editionsphilologie (Darmstadt, 1990), pp. 71–88.
Vorstius, C., Tractatus theologicus de Deo, sive de natura & attributis Dei (Steinfurt, 1610).
——Apologetica exegesis sive plenior declaratio locorum aliquot quae ex libro eiusdem de Deo, sive de natura & attributis Dei excerpta, eique pro erroneis imposita, hoc titulo late in vulgus emanaverunt (Leiden, 1611).
Vossius, G. J., Disputationes tres de tribus symbolis, apostolico, athanasiano, et constantinopolitano (Amsterdam, 1642).
Vulg: see The Bible (1965).
W., N., A Discourse concerning the Engagement: Or, The Northern Subscribers Plea opposed to their Dissenting Neighbors Importune Animosities against Engaging to be True and Faithful, &c. (London, 1650).
Wallace, J. M., 'The Engagement Controversy, 1649–1652: An Annotated List of Pamphlets', Bulletin of the New York Public Library, 68 (1964), pp. 384–405.
——Destiny His Choice: The Loyalism of Andrew Marvell (Cambridge, 1968).
Wallis, J., Elenchus geometriae hobbianae (Oxford, 1655).
——Hobbius heauton-timorumenos: Or, A Consideration of M^r^ Hobbes his Dialogues (Oxford, 1662).
——Correspondence, ed. P. Beeley and C. J. Scriba (Oxford, 2003–).
Ward, S., A Philosophical Essay towards an Eviction of the Being and Attributes of God (Oxford, 1652).
——Vindiciae academiarum (Oxford, 1654).
——In Thomae Hobbii philosophiam exercitatio epistolica (Oxford, 1656).
Warner, G. F., ed., The Nicholas Papers: Correspondence of Sir Edward Nicholas, Secretary of State, 4 vols., Camden Society, n.s., xl, l, lvii; 3rd ser., xxi (London, 1886–1920).
Weiser, B., Charles II and the Politics of Access (Woodbridge, 2003).
[Westminster Assembly,] The Confession of Faith; the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, with the Scripture Proofs at large (Inverness, 1976).
Weston, C. C., and J. R. Greenberg, Subjects and Sovereigns: The Grand Controversy over Legal Sovereignty in Stuart England (Cambridge, 1981).
White, T., The Grounds of Obedience and Government, being the Best Answer to all that has been lately written in Defence of Passive Obedience and Non Resistance (London, n.d.).

Whitney, D. W., 'London Puritanism: The Haberdashers' Company', Church History, 32 (1963), pp. 298–321.
Wild, ['Ferus'], J., Iobi historiae docta et catholica explicatio in CXIIII conciones eleganter distributa (Cologne, 1571).
Wilkinson, H., Conciones sex ad academicos oxonienses latinè habitae (Oxford, 1658).
Willet, A., Limbo-mastix: That is, A Canvise of Limbus Patrum, shewing . . . that Christ Descended not in Soule to Hell (London, 1604).
——Synopsis papismi: That is, A Generall View of Papistrie, 5th edn. (London, 1634).
William of Drogheda ['Wilhelmus de Drokeda'], Summa aurea, ed. L. Wahrmund (Innsbruck, 1914).
Williams, W. P., 'Was There a 1670 Edition of Leviathan?', The Papers of the Bibliographical Society of America, 69 (1975), pp. 81–4.
Wilson, J., The English Martyrologie (n.p. [Saint-Omer], 1608).
Wingate, E., Maximes of Reason: Or, The Reason of the Common Law of England (London, 1658).
Wither, G., A Collection of Emblemes, Ancient and Modern (London, 1635).
Wood, A., Athenae oxonienses, ed. P. Bliss, 4 vols. (London, 1813–20).
——Life and Times, ed. A. Clark, 5 vols. (Oxford, 1891–1900).
Woolrych, A., Britain in Revolution, 1625–1660 (Oxford, 2002).
Worden, B., The Rump Parliament, 1648–1653 (Cambridge, 1974).
——'Whig History and Puritan Politics: The Memoirs of Edmund Ludlow Revisited', Historical Research, 75 (2002), pp. 209–37.
Wotton, Sir Henry, A Panegyrick of King Charles (London, n.d. [1649?]).
Wroth, Lady Mary, The Countesse of Mountgomerie's Urania (London, 1621).
Zabarella, J., De rebus naturalibus libri XXX, 10th edn. (Treviso, 1604).
Zeller, H., 'Struktur und Genese in der Editorik: zur germanistischen und anglistischen Editionsforschung', LiLi: Zeitschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Linguistik, 5 (1975), Heft 19–20, pp. 105–26.
Zosimus, ed. I. Bekker (Bonn, 1837).

INDEX

Note: all names are ordered by the first element of the name that bears a capital letter (with the sole exception of The Hague, listed under 'H'). Works referred to in the text are listed under the author's name; anonymous works are listed by title. The following works by Hobbes receive separate entries, under their titles: De cive, De corpore, Elements of Law, Leviathan (multiple entries), and Opera philosophica. Throughout the index, 'TH' stands for Thomas Hobbes.

Aaron 157
Abbot, Robert 46
Aberdeen University 230
d'Ablancourt, Jean Jacobé de Frémont 89 d'Ablancourt, Nicolas Perrot 89 absolutism 147–8
absurdity 49
Act of Oblivion 84, 152
Adam 184, 204, 205, 281
Aeschylus 286
Aesop
  Fabulae 234, 236
Agricola, Rudolph 141
Ailesbury, Robert Bruce, 1st Earl of 225, 232, 261
Allestree, James 277
Alsted (Alstedius), Johann Heinrich
  Cursus philosophici encyclopaedia 142–3
  Encyclopaedia 142
Althusius, Johannes Politica 142
ambassadors 22–3
America 185
Ames, William 143
Amsterdam 88, 164, 166, 177, 191, 240, 256, 275–7
  City Council 276–7
  Classis 297
anamorphosis 136
Andrewes, Lancelot 46, 212
angels 150, 155, 182
  see also incorporeal substance
Anglican Church, Anglicans 27, 29, 37, 38–42, 45–7, 83–4, 115–16, 154, 161
  Thirty-nine Articles 181
Anne of Austria, Queen and Regent of France 88, 90
Answer to a Letter from a Gentleman 266
Antwerp 6, 132
Apostles 157, 162
apparitions 49, 104
Ardennes 89
aristocracy 20, 24
Aristotle 49, 143
Arlington: see Bennet
Arthur, John 231
Ascham, Anthony 66, 68–70, 71, 76
  Confusions and Revolutions 69 Discourse 68
astrology 144, 145
Athanasius, St 194
atheism 149–52, 153–4, 156
Aubrey, John 8, 44, 139, 154, 224
Augustine, St 117, 194 authorization 15–17, 20, 187–8
Ayton, Sir Robert 59

Bacon, Francis, 1st Viscount St Alban Advancement of Learning 143
  Essayes 166–7
Bailey, William 237
Baillie, Robert 53
Baldwin, Abigail 266, 268, 269, 271
Baldwin, Richard 266
Barlow, Thomas 161–2
Basset, Thomas 253–5, 263–4, 316
Basson, Govert 257
Bathurst, Ralph 225
Baumgarten, Siegmund Jakob 286
Baxter, Richard 150, 152
Beacon set on Fire 149–50
de Beaugrand, Jean 199
Bee, Cornelius 277, 280, 285–7, 298, 302 behemoth (biblical term) 115–16, 117

Behmenists: see Böhme
Bell, Andrew 269
Bellarmino ('Bellarmine'), Cardinal Roberto 41, 46, 106–7, 171, 175
  Controversiae (Disputationes) 46, 107, 108
Bennet, Henry, 1st Earl of Arlington 34, 79, 156
Berg Collection 229
Bergen op Zoom 285
van Berkel, Abraham 164–5, 228
Berkeley, Sir Charles 34
Bernard, Charles 232
Bible
  Authorized Version 109–13, 171–2, 245, 324
  Beza Latin New Testament 112, 190–91
  Bishops' 111, 113
  Coverdale's translation 111
  French Geneva 111, 113
  Geneva (English) 111, 113
  Greek New Testament 109, 112
  Hebrew Old Testament 109
  Junius–Tremellius Latin Old Testament 112, 114, 190–91
  London Polyglot 190, 191, 192
  Septuagint 113, 192
  TH's use of in English Leviathan 109–14
  TH's use of in Latin Leviathan 189–91, 192, 321
  Vulgate 110, 112–14, 172, 189–91
Bibliothèque nationale de France 225
Biddle, John 151
Bill against Atheism and Profaneness 153
Blackloist movement 42–3
Blaeu family business 275–8, 280–85, 286, 294–6, 299–302
Blaeu, Joan (or Johan) 166, 167, 256, 257, 274, 277, 286–7, 299 printing-houses 275–6, 296, 297, 298, 300, 302
Blaeu, Pieter 166–8, 189, 191, 256, 274, 276–7, 279–80, 283–4, 285, 287, 298, 299, 313
Blaeu, Willem Janszoon 275 blasphemy 149, 151
Blasphemy Act 262
Bloemgracht, Amsterdam 275, 298, 300, 302
Bloomsbury Book Auctions 230, 231 body-state analogy 14, 58
Boethius 143
Bohemia 132
Böhme, Jakob, and Behmenists 149, 256 von Boineburg, Johann Christian 163
Bonhams 230, 232
Book of Common Prayer 111
Borrelli, Gianfranco 324, 325 du Bosc, Charles 88, 90, 163, 225
Bosse, Abraham 133–4, 140
Boulduc (or Bolduc), Jacques 124–8
  Commentaria in librum Iob 124–5, 127–8
  De ecclesia ante legem 126, 127
  De oggio christiano 126, 127
Bowers, Fredson 317
Bramhall, John 4, 44, 50, 82, 99, 107
  Castigations 156
  Catching of Leviathan 40, 147, 156, 228 criticism of De cive 39–41 criticism of Leviathan 115, 147, 148, 151, 155–6, 158, 178, 179–80 criticism of presbyterians 35–6 dispute with TH on liberty and necessity 4, 17, 19, 47, 82, 107, 156 Faire Warning 35–6
Breda 31, 34
Bredekamp, Horst 133
Brenz, Johann 118
British Library 197
British Museum 198
Browne, Sir Thomas
  Pseudodoxia epidemica 164
  Religio medici 92, 164
Buckingham, George Villiers, 2nd Duke of 4, 34, 55
Burgos, Paul of 120
Burhill, Robert 46
Butter, Nathaniel 257
Bysshe, Sir Edward 231

Caen 159
Cajetan: see de Vio
Calvinism 148, 161
Calvin, Jean 118, 324
Cambridge University
  Cambridge University Library 159, 224
  Magdalene College 229
  Trinity College 229, 230, 231
Campanella, Tommaso
  De sensu rerum 103
cancellation 300
canon of Scriptures 15, 45, 109
Canterbury, Archbishop of 153
Capuchin convent in Paris 126 de Cardonnel, Pierre 159–61

Carisbrooke Castle 28
Carleton, George 46
On Jurisdiction 46
de las Casas, Bartolomé 268
Casaubon, Isaac 46
Case Western Reserve University 230, 232
'casting off' 213–14
Cavendish family 153, 164
see also Devonshire
Cavendish, Sir Charles 4, 5, 6, 8, 28, 52, 76, 96, 199–200
Cavendish, William: see Devonshire and Newcastle
Charles I, King of England, Scotland, and Ireland 21, 22, 23, 26–9 execution of 28, 66, 90
see also Eikon basilike
Charles II, King of England, Scotland, and Ireland 5, 22, 32, 79, 133, 135, 139, 186 in Scotland 79, 95–6 intended reader of Leviathan 52, 57–8 negotiations with Scots 30–31, 34, 58 opinion of TH 146
rebuffs TH 38
receives MS of Leviathan 97–9, 197 resumes relations with TH 152 return to Paris after Worcester 96–7 ruler after 1660 84 tuition by TH 5, 10–12, 52–4, 55–6, 57
Charleton, Walter 160
Chatsworth 190, 191
Chillingworth, William 161
Religion of Protestants 45
Chilwell, William 232
Chiswell, Richard advertises Leviathan 229, 255
auction catalogue 228
co-organizes completion of Bear 255–6, 316 co-organizes Ornaments 263–4, 270 owns share of Leviathan copyright 253–5, 263 Christ: see Jesus Christ
'Christian liberty' 61, 63
Christie's 229, 230, 232
Church, early 155–6 see also General Councils Church government
by sovereign 27–8, 29, 35–7, 40, 42–3, 50, 64, 80, 130, 150, 183–4
'jure divino' 27, 34, 36–7, 39, 62
see also Erastianism
Church of England: see Anglican Church
Cicero 171
Cleaver, Mr 234
Cleisby 77
Cluverius (Clüwer, Klüwer), Philip
Germaniae antiquae libri tres 108, 204
Cobbett, William 48
Coke, Sir Edward 159, 177
First Part of the Institutes 108
Institutes 193
Colbert, Jean-Baptiste 133
Colepeper, John, 1st Baron Colepeper 27, 29, 31
Collegiants 256
Collins, Anthony 232
Cologne 299
Elector of 297
van Colster, Joost 257
Common Law 24, 159, 177
'commonwealth' 189
Compagnie, the 296
competition 18
composition: see compounding compound imagination 103, 104
compounding 75–7, 85, 96
Condé, Louis II de Bourbon, prince de 90
Congregationalism: see Independency conquest 32–4, 67, 68–71
Conring, Hermann 163
contractarian theory 147
Conyers, George 254, 264
copyright auctions 253–4
copyright of Leviathan 91, 252–6, 263–4
Cordier, Balthasar 123, 124, 127
Cornwall 93–4
corporate bodies: see 'systems'
Corpus iuris civilis 193
Cosin, John 38–9, 44, 96, 99, 157, 206, 224
Coste, Hilarion 127
Cotes, Richard 211–13, 221
Council of State 72, 80, 92, 100, 186 counsel, counsellors 14, 54–6, 57 covenant 16
with God 22
Covenanters, Scottish 27, 79, 96
see also Scottish National Covenant
Coventry, Sir William and Henry 232
Cowley, Abraham 28, 34, 79
Cressy, Hugh 45
Exomologesis 45, 59 crimes 14

Cromartie, Alan 154
Cromwellian religious settlement 149, 152
Cromwell, Oliver 79, 81, 84–5, 277
Crooke, Andrew 228, 255, 277, 286, 306, 316 career 92, 236 death 252
  organizes printing of Leviathan 95, 209–11, 213, 215, 225–6, 240 organizes reprinting of Leviathan 234, 236, 241 registers Leviathan 9, 91, 209–11
Crooke, Elizabeth 252–3, 255
Cunradus, Christoffel 240–47, 252, 256, 257–8, 316
Curley, Edwin 303, 307, 308
Cyprian, St 194

'damasking' 236–7
  defined 236
Damrak, Amsterdam 276
Daniel 162
Daniel, Roger 234, 257
Darby, John, junior 270
Darby, John, senior 266–70
Davenant, Sir William 28–9, 44
  Gondibert 6–7
  reads draft material of Leviathan 7, 59
Dawks, Thomas 255
De cive 4, 41
  1st edn. 2, 60, 128, 169
  2nd edn. 2, 40, 43, 52, 53–4, 169, 174 admired by Tuke 158 criticized by Bramhall 10, 39–41
  Dutch translation 297
  English translation 1, 3, 91
  French translation 88, 163, 164, 275 not used in Latin Leviathan 171 praised by Filmer 147 presentation MS of 98, 199, 200 relation to contents of Leviathan 9, 12, 13–24, 25, 33, 41–3, 50, 66, 82, 101, 187, 203 requested by Hyde 53, 94 used in Dutch translation of Leviathan 164 use of Vulgate in 112 writing of 2
De corpore 141, 200
  English translation of 161
  preparation of 1, 4–6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 58, 174
  relation to contents of Leviathan 49, 104–5, 143–4 de factoist theory 65–71
Degge, Sir Simon 224
Delft 35
democracy 16–17, 20–21, 24 demonic possession 48, 49
  see also madness
Desargues, Girard 134
Descartes, René 3, 143, 159, 199, 324
Devonshire, William Cavendish, 2nd Earl of 38, 88
Devonshire, William Cavendish, 3rd Earl of 77, 78, 98, 160, 164, 190, 191, 198, 225, 231 dichotomous tables 141–2
Digby, George, 2nd Earl of Bristol 231
Digby, Sir Kenelm 42–3, 45, 77
  Two Treatises 59
Dijon 88–9
de Dominis, Marc'Antonio 46
Doni, Anton Francesco 325
Downham (or Downame), John 91–2
Drage, William 216
Drake, Sir William 158
duels 56, 186
Dunbar, battle of 79, 95, 98
Durham University Library 224
Dyer, William 235

Earles (or Earle), John 5, 38, 53, 94
  Microcosmographie 92
Edinburgh 79
Edinburgh University 229
egalitarianism, TH's absolutist 186
'van Egmond, Balthazar' 299
Eikon basilike 60
Elements of Law 2, 50, 82, 169 circulation of 2, 51
  cites Bellarmino 46
  French translation of 2nd half 163
  read by Hyde 53
  relation to contents of Leviathan 9, 13, 14–15, 18–19, 33, 48–50, 66, 82, 101–3, 104
Elisha 158
Elizabeth I, Queen of England and Ireland 183
Elzevier, Louis, 2, 53, 163, 275
Engagement, Engagement controversy 67–8, 74, 75, 96, 100
'enthusiasm' 42

Epicureanism, Epicurus 151
Epiphanius, St 194
episcopacy 7, 34, 36–7, 39, 59, 61–2, 82–3, 86–7 Erastianism 80, 149–50
  see also Cromwellian religious settlement eschatology 150, 155, 156, 160, 179–80, 233, 315 eternal punishment: see hell ethics 144, 145
Étienne, Robert 120
Eusebius 194
'Eutactus Philodemius' 71, 72
Eve 204
Evelyn, John 96, 108, 158 excommunication 154 factions 21, 293

'factotum', defined 265
Falkland, Lucius Cary, 2nd Viscount 45, 161
  Discourse of Infallibility 45
Family of Love 149
Fanshawe, Sir Richard 135–6, 139–40
Fawne, Luke 150 fear 19, 155, 292
Feather, John 262
Ferne, Henry 50
Filmer, Sir Robert 178
  Observations 146–7
Finland 299
'first philosophy' 143–4
Fischer, Johann 122
Flesher, Mr 234
'fleuron', defined 265
'forme', defined 214
France 4, 44, 79, 81, 88, 90, 163–4, 166, 296, 299
Franco-Dutch war of 1672–8 296–7, 300–301
Frankfurt book fair 301 freedom of will 17–18, 20, 148, 151, 223
'free state' 23, 66
French Reformed Church 35
Freytag, Friedrich Gotthilf 286
Fronde 90–91

Gaskin, J. C. A. 303, 308
Gassendi, Pierre 43, 78, 79
General Councils of Church 154, 176, 180 geometry 55–6, 143, 145
Germany 299, 301
ghosts 48, 155 glory 18
God
  corporeal 155, 156, 180–81
  no idea of 49
Godolphin, Francis 93–5, 198
Godolphin, Sidney 77, 93–5
Godolphin, Sir William 93
golden mountain 103
Goodwin, Thomas
  History of the Reign of Henry V 268
Gravenstraat, Amsterdam 276, 296, 297
Gray, Robert 232
Great Tew circle 45, 93, 161
Greenhill, Cleave 233
Greg-Bowers method 317
Gregory the Great, St 117, 120
Greg, Sir Walter 317
Grotius, Hugo 68, 69, 70
Gruter, Isaac 167
Guesdon (or Guédon), Richard 224
Guildhall Library 230
Gumble, Thomas 256

Haak, Theodore 199
The Hague 30, 35, 99
Hale, Sir Matthew 262
Ha-Levi, Solomon 120
Hall, John 71, 72
Hall, Joseph 46
Hammond, Henry 38, 69, 161
Hardwick Hall 190, 191, 192 library 46, 108, 190, 193, 194
Hargreaves, Mary 304
Hartlib, Samuel 148, 231
Hatton, Christopher, 1st Baron Hatton 100 Hebrew, knowledge of de Cardonnel's 160
  Robertson's 152, 193
  TH's 192–3
hell 15, 41, 150, 160, 179
Henchman, Humphrey, Bishop of London 236
Henderson, Alexander 92
Henrietta Maria, Queen 6, 27, 29, 30, 44, 90, 93, 99
Hercules gallicus 135
heresy 150, 151, 154, 156, 176, 193
Herle, Charles 24
Hermias Sozomenos 194
Herodian 108
Heyrick, Samuel 255
Hezekiah 183

Hiersemann, Karl W. 272–3
Hilary of Poitiers, St 194
Hinde, Samuel
England's Prospective-Glasse 241
Hinman, Carlton 214 history
excluded from sciences 143
Hobbes, Thomas ['TH']
absolutist egalitarianism 186
Answer to a Book 156, 168
'Answer' to Davenant 6–7, 106, 135, 140
Anti-White 3, 4, 47, 102–3, 104, 144, 201 autobiographies 10–11, 44, 52, 86, 99–100 banned from court in exile 97, 99
Behemoth 116, 154, 194
Briefe of the Art of Rhetorique 92 contributions to Mersenne compilations 3 correspondence with Payne 1, 7, 34, 59, 78–9
correspondence with Sorbière 5–6, 53–4, 78, 166–7, 274, 286
De cive: see separate entry under 'D'
De corpore: see separate entry under 'D'
De corpore politico 70, 163
De homine 4, 9, 104, 139, 161, 200
defends theological claims 154–6, 158, 180–83
'Demonstration of the Sword' 4, 52, 201
Dialogue of the Common Laws 154, 193, 194
Dialogus physicus 194
Elements of Law: see separate entry under 'E'
'Elements of philosophy' 4, 6, 102, 144
English Optical MS 4, 52, 201
Examinatio et emendatio 194, 284
Historia ecclesiastica 116, 194, 274
Historical Narration 86, 154, 156, 193 illnesses 5, 10, 38, 44, 96 income in exile 77
Latin Optical MS 3, 201
Leviathan: see separate entries under 'L'
'Minute of the Optiques': see English Optical MS
Moral and Political Works 271, 303
Mr. Hobbes Considered 84–5, 152–3, 181, 182
MS treatise on liberty and necessity 4, 52
'Objections' to Descartes's Meditationes 3
Of Libertie and Necessitie 105–6
Opera philosophica: see separate entry under 'O'
Problemata physica 84, 152, 194, 284
Quadratura circuli 285
Questions concerning Liberty 82 reasons for return to England 77–80 submission to Council of State 100 theological views 148–58, 176, 179–83, 184, 195 translation of Thucydides 59 tuition of Buckingham 4 tuition of Prince Charles 5, 10–11, 28, 52–4, 145 working methods 8
Hobbs, Thomas, of Westerleigh 77
van Hoeve, Justus 257
Holden, Henry 45
Holland 31, 186–7, 286, 300
Court of 297
stadhouder of 297
States of 297
Synods of South and North 297
see also Netherlands
Hollar, Wenceslaus (Wenzel, Václav) 132–3, 134
Holles, Denzil, 1st Baron Holles
Memoirs 268
Homer 153
House of Lords Library 229, 231
Huarte, Juan
Examination of Mens Wits 103, 324
Huntington Library 230, 232
Hunton, Philip 24, 146
Huygens, Lodewijk 100
Hyde, Edward (later 1st Earl of Clarendon) 5, 37, 39, 58, 93–5, 100, 152, 197 advice to TH about Godolphin legacy 94–5 Brief View 228
conversations with TH in Paris 77–8, 93, 95, 211, 215, 218 hostility towards TH 53, 96, 99, 147 objections to compounding 75–6 political advice 27, 30, 32

idolatry 162
Île de la Cité 134
immortality of soul 109–10, 150, 155, 182
incorporeal substance 150, 153, 155, 181–2
Independency, Independents 61–4, 80, 203

Injunctions of 1559 183 inspiration 48
Ireland 30, 31
Irish House of Commons 263
Isaiah 183
Isidore of Seville, St 120
'ius zelotarum' 69–70

Jackson, W. A. 211
Jacomb, Thomas 232
James I, King of England and Ireland (James VI, King of Scotland) 46, 181, 213
Jermyn, Henry, 1st Baron Jermyn (later 1st Earl of St Albans) 6, 27–9, 31, 34, 58
Jerome, St 117, 120
Jersey 30, 94, 133
Jesus Christ 15, 150, 157, 179
  as 'Word' 173, 183
  denial of 155, 156, 158
John Damascene, St 194
John Rylands Library 229
Johnson, Richard
  Famous History 263
Johnson, Samuel 269
Jonson, Ben 59
Joshua 157
Jungius, Joachim 8
Juniata College 230
'jure divino' Church government: see Church government Justinian 177

Keckermann, Bartholomäus
  Praecognitorum logicorum tractatus 142
'Kingdome of Fairies' 173
Kingdom of God 15, 36, 41, 178
Klenner, Hermann 308
Klosko, George 325
Klüwer: see Cluverius
Knaplock, Robert 254
Koerbagh, Adriaen 164
Koran 92
Kuyper, Frans 257
Kynaston, William 233

land, distribution of 26
Lantin, Jean-Baptiste 44, 88–9
La Peyrère, Isaac 118
Latimers (Bucks house of Earl of Devonshire) 160, 190, 191 laws 24, 176–7
laws of nature 15, 24, 72, 185–6, 203
Lawson, George 148, 151, 155, 157
  Examination 148, 151
Leeke (Leake), Mr 234
Leiden 164
Leipzig 272 book fair 301
Le Maire, Jean 199
L'Estrange, Sir Roger 235
leviathan (biblical term)
  'additamentum' interpretation 120, 121–2, 123, 124–5
  'devil' interpretation 116, 117–18, 123–4 in Isaiah 117
  in Jewish traditions 115–16, 119
  in Job 114–15
  in other works by TH 115–16 in Psalms 117
  'king' interpretation 125
  'society' interpretation 120–23, 124–5
Leviathan, English, Bear edn. bear ornament 226, 227, 240, 256–8
  bibliographical description 327–8
  compositorial practices, English and Dutch 241–2 confiscated sheets 234–8, 252, 253 copyright, transmission of 252–5 correction of errors, English and Dutch 243–5 corrections and improvements, English and Dutch 244–7 dated ownership inscriptions 229–30 distribution between typefaces 238–40 duration in print 258, 260–61 earliest evidence of existence 228–9 engraved title page, worn 228 fewer copies than Head 238
  misprints 243–4, 245, 247–52 organizers of Cunradus printing 255–6 orthography 242–3
  paper stock 240
  prices 231–3, 260–61
  printing by Cunradus 240–41 printing by Redmayne 233–5 printing simultaneous with Head, alleged 306 raid on Redmayne 233–4 reprinting of two sheets 238, 251–2 revisions to text 233, 315–16
  St Christopher ornament 240, 241
  skeleton formes 247–52
  timescale of production 252

Leviathan, English, copy-MS (non-extant) errors not corrected in it by TH 202 hand different from TH's 201
preparation of 205–7 relation to fair-copy MS 200–204 revisions of 204–5, 207–9
Leviathan, English, fair-copy MS based on non-extant copy-MS 200–204, 314 binding 197
drawn title page 130–34
errors corrected in it by TH 202–3, 208–9, 314–15 errors not corrected in it by TH 202
French scribe of 199–201 ownership history 197–8 physical description 198–9
preparation of 98
presented to Charles II 97–8
'Review, and Conclusion' in 98 revisions in it by TH 203, 207–9
Leviathan, English, Head edn.
bibliographical description 326–7 cancel slips 218, 223–4 capitalization 219–20, 221–2
'casting off' 213–14
correction of sheets by TH 93, 215–16 costs of production 225–6
dated ownership inscriptions 229
Errata 216–18
errors, uncorrected 218–19 first reference to publication 95, 211 folding table 223–4 in-press variants 221, 223
italicization 219–20 large-paper copies 222–3, 224–6 licensed 91
ornaments 212–13
orthography 220–22
physical description 211
presented to friends by TH 224–5
prices 231–3
printed by Norton and Cotes 211–13 print-run 225, 238 process of production 214–15
punctuation 219–20
registered with Stationers' Co. 9, 91, 209–11
skeleton formes 215
timescale of production 211
typefaces 211
use of in 1650s, 1660s 228
see also Leviathan, engraved title page Leviathan, English, modern edns.
by Curley 303, 307, 308
by Gaskin 303, 308
by Lindsay 303, 305
by Macpherson 303, 304, 305
by Molesworth 303
by Morley 303
by Oakeshott 303
by Pogson Smith 303
by Rogers and Schuhmann 305–6
by Thornton 303
by Tuck 304, 305, 308
by Waller 303, 304, 305
photo-reproduction of BL copy 303
photo-reproduction of Handelsblatt copy 303–4 Leviathan, English, Moral and Political Works edn. characteristics 303
publishers 271
Leviathan, English, Ornaments edn.
authorial corrections in, alleged 306 changes to text 260
copyright, owners of 263–4
dated ownership inscriptions 230
date of, other evidence for 261–2, 264–71
duration in print 271
engraved title page 228 factotum 265
fleurons 265–6, 269
paper stock 264–5, 268–9
physical description 264–5
prices 232–3, 261
printer of 264–71
publishers of 263–4
TH's responsibility for, alleged 258
typefaces 265, 266–8
Leviathan, English text 'advice to princes' elements 56–7 autobiographical accounts of composition 10–111, 52, 82–7 dedicatory epistle 93, 95
de-psychologizing of argument in 18–19 first reference to composition 1–2 process of composition 8, 10–111, 57–9
'Review, and Conclusion' 8, 51, 65–77, 81, 85, 87, 95, 98, 146–7, 206 stylistic faults in 208, 310 stylistic qualities of 175
table of the sciences 141–5 timescale of composition 8–12, 57–9

title, reasons for 114–16, 124–5, 127–8 use of earlier material by TH 12–13, 101–6, 174–5, 322 Leviathan, engraved title page by Abraham Bosse 133–4, 140
colossus based on anamorphosis 135–41 components of design 129–30 divergence from drawn title page 130–31
Leviathan, Latin, 1668 edn.
bibliographical description 328–9 cancel slip 280
Errata-list 277–8, 279–81
inadequate correction 189, 278
Index 273, 280–83, 309
in-press correction, lack of 277 list of biblical citations 282 list of contents 273
time of publication 274, 286
timescale of preparation 167–8, 274, 283–4 see also Opera philosophica
Leviathan, Latin, 1670 edn.
asterisked passages 291–4
bibliographical description 329–30 corrections, justified 289–90, 311 corrections, unjustified 290–91, 311 distribution in England 294
Erratum 287
first dated copy 287
ornaments 287
Pardoe advertisement 302
punctuation 289
quire used in 1668 copy 294
TH's involvement doubtful 294
Leviathan, Latin, 1670 edn., undated issue
bibliographical description 330 possible explanation of 295, 297–8
title page 295, 297, 299
Leviathan, Latin, 1676 issue of 1670 edn.
bibliographical description 330–31
distribution 299
fictitious imprint 298–9
ornament 301–2 reasons for 300–301
title page 298
Leviathan, Latin, 1678 issue of 1670 edn.
bibliographical description 331
distribution 299
fictitious imprint 298–9
ornament 301–2
reasons for 300–301
title page 298
Leviathan, Latin, copy-MS (non-extant) possible errors in 279 possible misreadings of 279 probable fate 273
Leviathan, Latin, modern edns.
by Molesworth 306
by Santi 306–7
Leviathan, Latin, MS (unlocated) later copy, reasons for presuming 273–4 physical description 272
Leviathan, Latin text added material 175–6, 180–83
anachronistic references in 169–71
Appendix 154, 176, 307
corrects theological claims 155, 157–8, 179–80
defends theological claims 154–6, 158, 180 dictated to amanuensis 167, 273, 279 omitted material 175–80
origins of plan for 166
priority of, alleged 168–74, 184–5 strengthens theological claims 180–83, 184 stylistic faults of 169, 174, 189, 278–9, 289–90
TH's responsibility for 167
timescale of composition 154, 167–8
Leviathan, present edn.
assumptions 317
conventions for MS material 318
emendations 309–10, 311 end-of-line hyphenations 308 explanatory notes 311, 321–5
Latin, correction of 311
misprints, correction of 309 page numbers 308–9 promotion of textual variants 314–16 textual apparatus 312–13 translation apparatus 318–21 typographical features 308
Leviathan, reactions to by anonymous lawyer 159
by Barlow 161–2
by Baxter 152
by Bramhall 115, 147, 148, 151, 155–6, 158, 178, 179–80 by de Cardonnel 159–61
by Charles II 146
by Cosin 157
by Drake 158
by Filmer 146–7

Leviathan, reactions to (cont.)
by Hyde 96, 147
by Lawson 148, 151, 155, 157
by Lucy 151, 153, 157
by Oxford University 261
by Parliament 153–4
by presbyterian booksellers 149–50, 151
by Rand 148
by Rich 149
by Robertson 152
by Ross 147–8, 150, 155, 157, 181 by Steward 96–7
by Tuke 158
by Vilvain 150, 155, 157
by Wallis 84–5, 147, 149, 150–51, 152–3, 178 by Ward 149, 150–51, 155
first recorded 146
Leviathan, translations (other than TH's Latin)
Dutch, by van Berkel 164–5, 282–3, 297
French, by du Prat 163–4
French, by du Verdus 163
French, by Tricaud 307, 308
French, contemporaneous 2, 7–8, 58–9, 87–90, 163
French (from Latin), by Tricaud and Pécharman 307
German, by Schlösser 308
Italian, by Micheli 308
Italian, by Santi 306
Latin, by Stubbe 165–6, 174 liberty 13–14, 17–18, 19, 20, 23, 223 Licensing Act attempt to replace 261–2 expiry of 261–2
terms of 153
licensing of press 60, 91–2, 153 see also Licensing Act du Lieu, Charles 139
Lightfoot, John 212–13
Lindsay, A. D. 303
Littleton, Adam
Linguae latinae liber 255
Livy 108
Lloyd, John 231
London 60, 100, 166, 190, 191, 216, 228, 298
Bishop of 153, 236
City of 213
Great Fire of 153, 230, 298
Guildhall Library 230
Long, Robert 31, 34
Lord Chancellor 153
Louis XIII, King of France 139
Louis XIV, King of France 88, 90, 133
Low Countries: see Netherlands
Łubieński, Zbigniew 168–9, 171, 174, 184
Lucian 150
Lucy, William 151, 153, 157
Observations 151, 153
Ludlow, Edmund
Memoirs 269
Lupoli, Agostino 307
Lutheranism 148
Lyon 139
de Lyra: see Nicholas

Macartney, George, 1st Earl Macartney 198
Macdonald, Hugh 304
McKenzie, D. F. 214, 252
Macpherson, C. B. 303, 304
madness 49
Magliabechi, Antonio 277, 299
Maire, Joannes 257
Malvezzi, Virgilio
Discorsi 324
Manchester University 229
Mandeville, Sir John Voyages 263
de Marolles, Michel 133
de Martel, Thomas 163
Mason, Francis 46
Masoyer-Deshommeaux, Baptiste 43
Massey, Christopher 212
materialism 149
mathematics, pure and mixed 145
Mazarin, Cardinal Jules 88, 90
Mearne, Samuel 234–5
Megott, Richard 232
memory 101–2
Menochio, Giovanni Stefano 123, 127 mental discourse 101–2
Mercier, Jean 118
Mersenne, Marin 2, 3, 43, 52, 60, 107–8, 127–8, 139, 199, 324 van Meurs, Jacob 240
Micheli, Gianni 308
Migne, Jacques-Paul
Patrologia graeca 324
Patrologia latina 324

Militia Ordinance 26 militia, right to command 25–9
Milton, John 92, 146
  History of Britain 302
Minim convent in Paris 107–8, 127–8, 139 ministers 14, 57
miracles 15
'Mischtext' 317
'mixed monarchy' 24, 146
Molesworth, Sir William 303, 306 monarchy 16–17, 20–22
  see also 'mixed monarchy'
de Montaigne, Michel 324
Montagu, Richard 232
Montagu, Walter 99
Montrose, James Graham, 5th Earl and 1st Marquess of 30
Morley, Henry 303
Mornay, Philippe du Plessis 46
Morton, Thomas 46
Moses 15, 41, 157–8, 173, 179, 206, 246
du Moulin, Peter Vindication 241 du Moulin, Pierre 46 multitude 17, 128
Münster, Archbishop of 297

Naaman 156, 158
natural laws: see laws of nature natural rights 147, 291–2
Nayler, James 149
Nedham, Marchamont 67, 70, 74, 75
  Case of the Common-wealth 70–71, 81
  Mercurius politicus 98–9
Negative Oath 75
Netherlands 23, 170, 189, 257, 295–7, 301, 306 see also Holland
Newcastle 27
Newcastle, William Cavendish, 1st Marquess (later 1st Duke) of 4, 5, 28, 34, 52, 76, 77, 145, 201
Newcomb, Thomas 255
New York Public Library 229
Nicaea, Council of 176
Nicene Creed 176
Niceron, Jean François 136–9, 140
  Perspective curieuse 136–9
Nicholas, Sir Edward 53, 97, 99, 100
Nicholas of Lyra 120, 123, 127
Nicholson, John 254
Nimitz Library, US Naval Academy 265
Noenart, Cornelis 257
Norman Conquest 33, 73
Norman kings 67
Norton, Bonham 213
Norton, Roger 211–13, 221, 222, 234

Oakeshott, Michael 303
Oath of Allegiance 46
Oath of Supremacy 183
Opera philosophica 280
  copy with 1670 Leviathan 294
  Cornelius Bee issue 285–7
  distribution in England 285 division into volumes 283–5 late changes by TH 283–4 later addition by TH 280, 285
  origins of plan for 166 publication planned in instalments 167–8, 283
  time of publication 274, 286
optics 3, 4, 52, 53, 136–40
Ordinance for Regulation of Printing 91 ordination 39–40, 64
Origen 117
Ormonde, James Butler, 12th Earl (later 1st Duke) of 99
orthography 200, 220–22, 242–3
Osborne, Thomas 233
Owen, John 161, 166
Oxford 93, 95
Oxford University 1, 166
  All Souls College 1
  Bodleian Library 161, 224
  condemnation of Leviathan 261
  Magdalen Hall 284
  Queen's College 161
  St Edmund Hall 298

Pagnino, Sante 192
Papers which passed at New-castle 92
Pardoe, Mark 302
Pareus, David 122
Paris 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 10, 27, 30–31, 38, 44, 51–2, 60, 77, 79, 88–9, 93, 96–7, 99, 102, 124, 126, 133, 157, 164, 216, 274
  see also Parlement of Paris
Parisian scribe 199–201
Parker, Henry
  Observations 23
Parlement of Paris 90
Parliament 24, 28, 151–2, 153–4, 261–2
  Committee for Bibles 152

Parliament (cont.)
Committee on atheism and profaneness 153, 233
Declaration 23
House of Lords enquiry into Stationers' Co. 235
House of Lords Library 230, 231
propaganda 23
Rump 67, 72, 73, 80
Parsons, John 231
Patin, Gui 79, 96
'patrimonial kingdom' 33
Paul of Burgos: see Burgos
Paul, St 162, 183
Payne, Robert 200
correspondence with TH 1, 7, 34, 59, 78–9 correspondence with Sheldon 1, 37, 38, 58–9, 79, 87–8, 95, 146, 231 defence of episcopacy 7, 59 notes on De corpore draft 105
Payne, Thomas 233
Pearson, John
Critici sacri 286–7
Pécharman, Martine 307
Pell, John 4, 5, 6, 199
Pentateuch 173
Pepys Library 229, 231
Pepys, Samuel 230, 231
Percy, Henry, 1st Baron Percy of Alnwick 31, 34
Perkins, William 46 person, personhood 16–17, 179, 187
Petty, Sir William 302
Pforzheimer Library 159, 229, 231 philosophy definition of 105, 144
see also scholasticism physics 144
de Pineda, Juan 118, 119, 121–2, 123, 127
Pinkney, Miles 44
Plutarch 108 poetry 145
Pogson Smith, W. G. 303
Pontificio Collegio Scozzese 230
Pope, Papacy 42–3, 61–2
Porphyry, tree of 141
Porter, Endymion 77, 103
du Prat, François 163–4 presbyterian booksellers 149–50, 151 presbyterianism, presbyterians 27–31, 35–6, 47, 61–2, 64, 80, 82–3, 97, 149, 177
Proclamation for Preventing Profaneness 262
Propositions of Newcastle 28
'protection and obedience' 65–6, 67–8, 70, 85–6, 97, 147, 178
Pufendorf, Samuel 165
Puller, Timothy 232 punishments 14, 22

Quakers 149, 256

Racovian Catechism 151
Rainolds, John 46
Ramus, Petrus (Pierre de la Ramée) 141–2
Rand, William 148
Ranters 151
Redmayne, John 234–8, 241–7, 251–2, 257–8, 316 religion 14–5, 35–51, 61–5, 80, 148–51, 160–61, 162 derived from fear 155 representation 15–16, 20, 187 resistance: see right of resistance de Ribera, Francisco 121–2
Rice, Daryl 325
Richardson, John 266–7, 268
Rich, Robert 149
right of resistance 19, 147
'right of zealots': see 'ius zelotarum'
Rivet, André 127
Robertson, William 152
Gate or Door to the Holy Tongue 193
Roberval, Gilles Personne de 3–4, 55
Robinson, Ranew 254
Rochester University 229
Rogers, G. A. J. 305
Roman Catholicism, Roman Catholics 15, 36, 37, 41–7, 50, 62, 83–4, 99–100, 177 liturgy of 171
Rome, Romans (ancient) 208
Roper, Abel 234
Ross, Alexander 160
Leviathan drawn out 147–8, 150, 155, 157, 181
Rous, Francis 66
royalists
community in Paris 38, 44–5, 53, 58, 79 defeated, in England 65, 73, 75–7, 85
defined 25
political debate among 24–34
Royston, Mr 235
Rye House Plot 261

sacraments performed by sovereign 155, 183
Sadducees 151
Saint-Michel, pont 89, 134
Salmasius, Claudius (Claude de Saumaise) 70, 71
Sanchez, Gaspar 119, 122, 127
Santi, Raffaella 306–7
Sawbridge, George 255
Sawbridge, Thomas 237
Schlösser, Jutta 308
scholasticism, scholastic philosophy 47–9, 56, 160–61
Schoolmen: see scholasticism
Schroder, Johann
Compleat Chymical Dispensatory 266
Schuhmann, Karl 305–6, 307 science, definition of 144 sciences, division of 141–5
Scilly Isles 94
Scotland 30–31
Scott, John 232
Scott, Robert 255–6, 263, 316
Scottish alliance 27, 28, 29, 30–31, 34, 78, 96
Scottish National Covenant 22, 30, 34
Secretaries of State 153
Séguier, Pierre 139
Selden, John 69, 126–7, 224, 256
De synedriis 286
Titles of Honor 108
Seventh-Day Baptists 151
Sheffield University Library 159
Sheldon, Gilbert 1
correspondence with Hammond 38
correspondence with Payne 1, 37, 38, 58–9, 79, 87–8, 95, 146, 231
'singulis major' argument 23
'skeleton formes' 214, 247–52
defined 214
Skinner, Mr 232
Smidt, Henrik 257
Smith, Richard 231
Socinianism, Socinians 92, 151, 183, 256
Socrates Scholasticus 194 soldiers 72–3
Solemn League and Covenant 22, 30, 34, 66, 67, 75
Somner, William 287
Sorbière, Samuel 2, 5–6, 53–4, 78, 166–7, 274–5, 286 translation of De cive 88, 275
Sotheby's 229, 231
sovereign, sovereignty 15–16, 21–2, 24, 33, 81, 147, 160 duties of 26, 50–51
essential rights or powers of 25–6, 50
Latin terms for 188
see also Church government
'species' 48–9
Spinoza, Baruch 164
Tractatus theologico-politicus 256, 297
Sprint, Benjamin 253
Staffordshire 1
State Library of Victoria 229, 231
state of nature 18, 325
Stationers' Company 91–2, 209, 234–7, 252–3, 263, 270
Register 9, 91, 209, 253, 255, 270
Stephens, Philemon 91–2
Steuco, Agostino 121
Steward, Richard 39, 59, 96–7
Stubbe, Henry 161, 165–6, 174
Suárez, Francisco 171
Varia opuscula theologica 107
Sutcliffe, Matthew 46
Switzerland 23, 299
'systems' 13–14, 58

tailed letter 243
Taylor, Randall 237 teaching of population 50–51, 56–7, 80 telescopes 53, 77
Temple University 230
Tenison, Thomas 228
Term Catalogue 286, 302
Tertullian 176, 180, 194
De carne Christi 153, 180 theology
excluded from sciences 143
TH's 148–58, 176, 179–83, 184, 195
'Thing' 48, 80, 87
Thirty-nine Articles: see Anglican Church
Thomas Aquinas, St, and Thomism 118, 120, 123, 143, 324
Thompson, John 298
'Thomson, John': see 'Tomson, John'
Thomson, Richard 46
Thomson (or Thompson), Samuel 277, 298–9
Thornton, James 303
Thucydides 324, 325
Timpler, Clemens
Physicae systema 142

tithes 37, 47
Titus, Emperor 298, 301
Toland, John 263, 268, 270
  Adeisideimon and Origines judaicae 274
  Anglia libera 269
  Apology for Mr. Toland 267
  Christianity not Mysterious 263, 267
'Tomson, John' 298–9
Tönnies, Ferdinand 273
trading bodies: see 'systems'
Tricaud, François 168–9, 171, 174, 184, 187, 307, 308
Trinity 262
  TH's doctrine of 148, 155, 157–8, 179, 183
Tuck, Richard 304, 305, 308
Tuke, Samuel 108, 228
Tyler, Mr 234
typefaces 211, 238–40, 265, 266–8 tyranny 75

uniformity, religious 63
United Provinces: see Netherlands universities 49, 51, 56–7, 83
University of Colorado 229
University of Southern California 229
University of Texas 229
Utrecht 164, 296

Venice 23
du Verdus, François Bonneau, sieur 163, 228
Vergil 108
'verifying' laws 90
Vespasian, Emperor 302
Vilvain, Robert 150, 155, 157, 228
de Vio, Tommaso 121, 127
Vorstius, Conrad
  Tractatus de Deo 181
Vossius, Gerardus 127

Wagenaar, Jacobus 164
Walford, Benjamin 263, 264
Waller, A. R. 303, 304, 305
Waller, Edmund 160
Wallis, John 83, 180, 182, 194
  criticism of Leviathan 84–5, 147, 149, 150–51, 152–3, 178
Walthoe, John 253, 254
Ward, Gilbert 224
Ward, Seth 83, 149
  criticism of Leviathan 149, 150–51, 155, 228, 316
Webb, Philip Carteret 197–8
Wheldon, James 191–2, 193, 279
White, Francis 46
White, John 46
White, Mr (Robert) 234
White, Thomas 3, 42, 45, 102, 144
  Grounds of Obedience 270
Wilkins, John 149
Willet, Andrew 46
William I, King of England 73, 177
William II, Prince of Orange 79
Williams, John 234, 236–7, 241
Williamson, Joseph 156, 235
Wood, Anthony
  Athenae oxonienses 229
Woodward, John 232
Woodward, Robert 232
Worcester, battle of 96
Wotton, Anthony 46
Wotton, Matthew 264
Wright, George 307
Wright, John 235, 252–3, 255, 263, 264, 316

Yonge, James 216

THE CLARENDON EDITION OF
THE WORKS OF THOMAS HOBBES

VOLUME IV

LEVIATHAN
TEXTS (i)

CLARENDON HOBBES EDITORIAL BOARD

Noel Malcolm Quentin Skinner Keith Thomas

Bibliographical adviser
David McKitterick

SCHEME OF VOLUMES

1: Elements of Law
2: De cive
3, 4, 5: Leviathan
6, 7: Correspondence
8: Autobiographical and occasional writings
9: Writings on rhetoric and literature
10: Behemoth
11: Writings on common law and hereditary right
12: Writings on religion, heresy, and church history
13: Writings on liberty and necessity
14, 15: Anti-White (with 'Objections' to Descartes)
16, 17: De corpore (with related manuscripts)
18: Later writings on physics
19: Writings on optics (including De homine)
20, 21, 22: Writings on mathematics
23: Translations of Thucydides
24, 25: Translations of Homer
26: Cavendish-related writings
27: Index

THOMAS HOBBES

LEVIATHAN

EDITED BY

NOEL MALCOLM

VOLUME 2

THE ENGLISH AND LATIN TEXTS (i)

CLARENDON PRESS · OXFORD

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, OX2 6DP,
United Kingdom

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide. Oxford is a registered trademark of Oxford University Press in the UK and in certain other countries

© Noel Malcolm 2012

The moral rights of the author have been asserted

First edition published in 2012
First published in paperback in 2014

Impression: 1

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted, in any form or by any means, without the prior permission in writing of Oxford University Press, or as expressly permitted by law, by licence or under terms agreed with the appropriate reprographics rights organization. Enquiries concerning reproduction outside the scope of the above should be sent to the Rights Department, Oxford University Press, at the address above

You must not circulate this work in any other form
and you must impose this same condition on any acquirer

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Data available

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Data available

ISBN 978-0-19-870908-4 (3 vol. pack)
ISBN 978-0-19-872396-7 (2 vol. pack)
ISBN 978-0-19-870909-1 (Vol. 1)
ISBN 978-0-19-870910-7 (Vol. 2)
ISBN 978-0-19-870911-4 (Vol. 3)

Typeset in Ehrhardt
by Peter Kahrel Ltd, Lancaster
Printed in Great Britain
on acid-free paper
by CPI Group (UK) Ltd,
Croydon, CR0 4YY

Links to third party websites are provided by Oxford in good faith and for information only. Oxford disclaims any responsibility for the materials contained in any third party website referenced in this work.

CONTENTS

VOLUME 1

Preface xi
A Note on Dates and References xv
List of Abbreviations xvi
List of Figures xvii

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

THE WRITING OF LEVIATHAN 1
Chronology 1
Changes and Developments in Hobbes's Argument 12
Royalist Political Debate 24
Religious Issues 35
Intended Readership 51
Late Adjustments: (i) Independency 61
Late Adjustments: (ii) Obedience to the New Régime 65
Hobbes's Retrospective Accounts 82
The Contemporaneous French Translation 87
The Year of Publication 91

SOME FEATURES OF THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN 101
Materials used in the Composition of Leviathan 101
The Title 114
The Engraved Title Page 128
The Table of the Sciences 141

FROM THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN TO THE LATIN 146
Critical Responses, 1651–1668 146
Some Individual Responses 158
Vernacular Translations 162
The Latin Translation and the Question of Priority 165
Changes in the Latin Translation 175

TEXTUAL INTRODUCTION

THE ENGLISH LEVIATHAN 197
The Manuscript 197
The Head Edition 209
The Bear Edition 226
The Ornaments Edition 258

THE LATIN LEVIATHAN 272
A Manuscript 272
The 1668 Edition 274
The 1670 Edition 287
The Undated Issue of the 1670 Edition 295
The 1676 and 1678 Issues of the 1670 Edition 295
The Pardoe Advertisement of 1682 302

THE PRESENT EDITION 303
Previous Modern Editions 303
Basic Features of the Present Edition 308
The Recording of Textual Variants 312
The Promotion of Textual Variants 314
Conventions used in the Presentation of Manuscript Material 318
The Translation Apparatus 318
The Explanatory Notes 321

A BIBLIOGRAPHICAL DESCRIPTION OF
THE EDITIONS USED IN THE PRESENT EDITION 326
The English Leviathan 326
The Latin Leviathan 328

List of Manuscripts 333
Bibliography 337
Index 367

VOLUME 2

Abbreviations and Conventions Used in this Edition x
Leviathan 2
The Epistle Dedicatory 4
The Contents of the Chapters 8
The Introduction 16

PART 1

Chapter 1 22
Chapter 2 26
Chapter 3 38
Chapter 4 48
Chapter 5 64
Chapter 6 78
Chapter 7 98
Chapter 8 104
Chapter 9 124
Chapter 10 132
Chapter 11 150
Chapter 12 164
Chapter 13 188
Chapter 14 198
Chapter 15 220
Chapter 16 244

PART 2

Chapter 17 254
Chapter 18 264
Chapter 19 284
Chapter 20 306
Chapter 21 324
Chapter 22 348

Chapter 23 376
Chapter 24 386
Chapter 25 398
Chapter 26 414
Chapter 27 452
Chapter 28 482
Chapter 29 498
Chapter 30 520
Chapter 31 554

VOLUME 3

PART 3

Chapter 32 576
Chapter 33 586
Chapter 34 610
Chapter 35 634
Chapter 36 650
Chapter 37 682
Chapter 38 698
Chapter 39 730
Chapter 40 736
Chapter 41 760
Chapter 42 774
Chapter 43 928

PART 4

Chapter 44 956
Chapter 45 1012
Chapter 46 1052
Chapter 47 1104
A Review, and Conclusion 1132

APPENDIX

Chapter 1 1142
Chapter 2 1190
Chapter 3 1226

Index to the Latin Leviathan 1244

Register of In-Press Variants (English) 1293
Register of Literal Faults (English) 1298
Ambiguous End-of-Line Hyphenations (English) 1303
Register of In-Press Variants (Latin) 1305
Register of Literal Faults (Latin) 1306
Index of Biblical Citations 1311
General Index 1323

ABBREVIATIONS AND CONVENTIONS USED IN THIS EDITION

68	the 1668 edition of the Latin
68-Errata	the Errata-list printed in 68
70	the 1670 edition of the Latin
70-Erratum	the erratum printed in 70
76	the 1676 issue of 70 (for those pages where it differs from 70)
76-Erratum	the erratum printed in 76
78	the 1678 issue of 70 (for those pages where it differs from 70)
78-Erratum	the erratum printed in 78
AV	the Authorized Version of the Bible
B	the 2nd edition (published 1675–8) of the English (the 'Bear')
Beza	Theodore Beza's Latin translation of the New Testament
Codex	'Codex Justinianus', in Corpus iuris civilis, ed. Krueger et al.
corr.	corrected
del.	deleted
Digest	'Digesta', in Corpus iuris civilis, ed. Krueger et al.
edn.	edition
EW	Hobbes, English Works, ed. Molesworth
H	the 1st edition (1651) of the English (the 'Head')
H-Errata	the Errata-list printed in H
illeg.	illegible material
Junius–Tremellius	the Latin translation by Franciscus Junius and Immanuel Tremellius of the Old Testament
marg.	marginal note
MS	the presentation manuscript of the English (BL, MS Egerton 1910)
OED	Oxford English Dictionary
OL	Hobbes, Opera philosophica quae latine scripsit, ed. Molesworth
om.	omitted or absent
para.	paragraph
PG	J.-P. Migne, ed., Patrologia graeca
PL	J.-P. Migne, ed., Patrologia latina
ST	(Aquinas,) Summa theologiae

TH	Hobbes
Vulg	the 'Vulgate' Latin translation of the Bible

For the books of the Bible, standard abbreviations are used.

For full details of the works cited here, and for publication details of all the works cited by short title in the notes, see the Bibliography at the end of the introductory volume.

A full account of the conventions used in this edition is given in the Textual Introduction; the key points are summarized here. Generally, Hobbes's English and Latin versions are placed on facing pages. (The exceptions to this are the table accompanying Chapter 9 and the 'Review, and Conclusion', neither of which was translated by Hobbes into Latin; the Appendix, which appeared for the first time in the Latin; and the Index to the Latin edition. In the last two cases, translations into modern English are supplied.)

Significant textual variants (i.e., substantive variants, plus all changes called for in the printed Errata-lists of H and 68) are presented in the textual apparatus at the foot of each page, and keyed to line numbers. (Only in the table accompanying Chapter 9, where line-numbering would be problematic, is the textual apparatus keyed to superscript numbers in the text.) Non-substantive variants arising from the collation of exempla of the copy-texts are presented in lists at the end of the edition, keyed to page numbers and line numbers. Similar lists at the end of the edition record literal faults present in all exempla of the copy-texts.

The first set of footnotes, keyed to the English text, is the translation apparatus, which records, and translates, significant changes made in the Latin version of the text. These notes use a numerical series of superscripts (beginning again with each chapter). Where Hobbes makes an addition in the Latin, the superscript number stands at the relevant place in the English, and the footnote, which gives a translation of that added passage, begins with the symbol '^'. In these cases, if the superscript number stands between two words, it has a space on either side of it; if it stands between a word and a punctuation mark, it has no space on either side of it. Where Hobbes omits a passage in the Latin, the superscript symbol 'º' is placed at the start and finish of that passage. Where Hobbes substitutes a new passage in the Latin for a passage in the English, a superscript number is similarly placed twice, at the start and finish of the English passage, and the footnote gives a translation of the new passage.

In three cases (Chapters 9, 46, and 47) the Latin diverges so extensively from the English that it has been necessary to provide a complete translation of the Latin into modern English. In these cases Hobbes's original English is placed on the left-hand page, and the right-hand page contains both Hobbes's Latin and, below it, the modern English translation of it. And in the case of the Latin Appendix, where no Hobbesian English equivalent exists (and the Index to the Latin edition, which was not by Hobbes), a complete translation into modern English has been placed on the pages facing the Latin text.

The second set of footnotes, keyed to the English and the Latin, consists of explanatory and editorial notes. These use an alphabetic series of superscripts, running from 'a' to 'z', then 'aa' to 'az', then 'ba' to 'bz', and so on. (Note that in all chapters except those that have no translation apparatus, the series omits 'o' in the first alphabet, to avoid confusion with the 'omission' sign in that apparatus.) The series begins again with each chapter. It runs continuously through both the English and the Latin; some notes apply to both, but some to only one of them; some notes to the Latin apply both to the original Latin and to the translation appearing in the translation apparatus, but some may apply only to the Latin text itself. Works referred to in these notes are cited by short title; full details will be found in the Bibliography (printed at the end of the introductory volume). For all biblical references and citations the Authorized Version is used, unless otherwise stated.

[A1r]

LEVIATHAN, OR
The Matter, Forme, & Power
OF A COMMON-WEALTH
ECCLESIASTICALL
AND CIVILL.

By THOMAS HOBBES of Malmesbury.

LONDON,
Printed for ANDREW CROOKE,[a] at the Green Dragon in St. Pauls Church-yard, 1651.

[A1v:
blank]

[a] On Andrew Crooke (d. 1674) see the General Introduction, p. 92.

[3a1r]

LEVIATHAN,
SIVE
De Materia, Forma, & Potestate
CIVITATIS
ECCLESIASTICAE
ET CIVILIS.

AUTHORE
THOMA HOBBES,
Malmesburiensi.

[3a1v:
blank]

9 Malmesburiensi.] Malmesburiensi. AMSTELODAMI, Apud JOANNEM BLAEV. M. DC. LXX. 70; Malmesburiensi. LONDINI. Apud JOHANNEM TOMSONI. M. DC. LXXVI. 76; Malmesburiensi. LONDINI Typis JOANNIS THOMSONII, M. DC. LXXVIII. 78

[1] TO
MY MOST HONOR'D FRIEND
Mr FRANCIS GODOLPHIN
of Godolphin.[b]

Honor'd Sir,

Your most worthy Brother Mr Sidney Godolphin,[c] when he lived, was pleas'd to think my studies something, and otherwise to oblige me, as you know, with reall[d] testimonies of his good opinion, great in themselves, and the greater for the worthinesse of his person. For there is not any vertue that disposeth a man, either to the service of God, or to the service of his Country, to Civill Society,[e] or private Friendship, that did not manifestly appear in his conversation,[f] not as acquired by necessity, or affected upon occasion, but inhaerent, and shining in a generous[g] constitution of his nature.[1] Therefore in honour and gratitude to him, and with devotion to your selfe, I humbly Dedicate unto you this my [2]discourse of Common-wealth. I know not how the world will receive it, nor how it may reflect on those that shall seem to favour it. For in a way beset with those that contend, on one side for too great Liberty, and on the other side for too much [A2v] Authority, 'tis hard to passe between the points of both unwounded. But yet, me thinks, the endeavour to advance the Civill Power, should not be by the Civill Power condemned; nor private men, by reprehending it, declare they think that Power too great. Besides, I speak not of the men, but (in the Abstract) of the Seat of Power, (like to those simple and unpartiall creatures in the Roman Capitol, that with their noyse defended those within it, not because they were they, but there,)[h] offending none, I think, but those without, or such within (if there be any such) as favour them.[2] That which perhaps may most offend, are certain Texts of Holy Scripture, alledged[i] by me to other purpose than ordinarily they use

---

[1] To the most noble man Mr Francis Godolphin, Knight of the Order of the Bath. You yourself, most noble Sir, have known how much your brother Sidney Godolphin liked my studies; how much honour he did to me among good men by the authority of his judgement; and, finally, with how much help he assisted me in the most difficult times. But I call this to mind, not to pretend that the favour of friends is any virtue of mine, but because I delight in the testimonies of excellent men, such as he was. For that man excelled in every virtue that is required either by divine worship, or the good of one's country, or civil society,[e] or personal friendship; he was pious towards God, accomplished in the arts of peace, valiant in war, pleasant in social gatherings, and firm in his friendships.

[2] treatise on civil and ecclesiastical power. It is not clear, in the present state of things, how our people will judge those who seem to favour the doctrine which it contains. For it is not easy to pass between the sword-points of those who fight over sovereignty, without being wounded. Yet I see no reason why either side should be angry with me. For am I doing nothing other than exalting, as much as I can, the civil power (and whoever possesses that, will want it to be as great as possible). And I am arguing not about the rights of men, but about right in itself; I merely sound an alarm, as the geese once did on the Capitol, at the sound of assailants.

[3a2r]

Ad Nobilissimum Virum DOMINVM FRANCISCVM
GODOLPHINVM,[b] Equitem Ordinis Balneorum.

Fratri tuo Sidneo Godolphino[c] (Nobilissime Domine) quantum placuerint studia mea; quantum ille Authoritate Judicii sui apud viros bonos me ornaverit; quanto denique, durissimis temporibus, beneficio me adjuverit, ipse nôsti. Commemoro autem, non ut favorem, amicorum virtutem faciam meam, sed quia virorum excellentium, qualis ille erat, delector testimoniis. Excelluit enim vir ille virtute omni quam postulat, aut cultus Divinus, aut commodum Patriae, aut Societas Civilis,[e] aut Amicitia singularis; pius erga Deum, eruditus ad Pacem, fortis ad Bellum, in congressibus jucundus, in Amicitiis firmus. Honoris igitur & gratitudinis causa erga illum, & devotionis erga teipsum, Tractatum hunc de Potestate Civili, & Ecclesiastica, humiliter tibi Offero, Dedicoque. De illis, qui Doctrinae, quam continet, [3a2v] favere videbuntur, homines nostri quid sensuri sint, ut nunc sunt tempora, incertum est. Nam inter mucrones pugnantium de Potestate Summa, non facile est incedere sine vulnere. Causam tamen cur pars utravis succenseret mihi, nullam video. Quid enim facio, praeterquam quod Potestatem Civilem, (quam quicunque possidebit, maximam esse volet) quantum possum magnifico. Neque de Jure hominum, sed de Jure simpliciter disputo; quemadmodum Anseres quondam Capitolini ad scandentium strepitum, tantùm clango.[h] Displicebit etiam fortasse non paucis, quod loca quaedam Scripturae Sacrae, aliter interpretari ausus sim, quam ab aliis explicari soleant. Id

7 delector 70] dilector 68 16 sine] sint 78

[b] On Francis Godolphin (1605–67) see the General Introduction, pp. 93–5.

[c] On Sidney Godophin (1610–43) see ibid, p. 93.

[d] 'reall' is probably used here in contrast to 'verbal' (OED, 'real', *adj.*², *n.*², and adj., 4.c), to imply gifts of money, and thereby to remind Francis Godolphin of Sidney's bequest to Hobbes: see the General Introduction, pp. 93–5.

[e] 'Civil society' was a standard term in 17th-century English for life in a political community or community of citizens (as opposed to the 'natural society' of the family).

[f] = social behaviour (OED, 'conversation', 1–2, 4–6).

[g] = noble, high-spirited (OED, 'generous', a., 1–2).

[h] Livy recounts (Ab urbe condita, V.47) that in 390 BC the geese which were kept on the Capitol alerted the garrison there to a silent nocturnal assault by the besieging Gauls.

[i] = cited or: adduced (OED, 'allege', *v.*², 2, 3).

to be by others. But I have done it [3]with due submission,[3] and also (in order to my Subject) necessarily; for they are the outworks of the Enemy, from whence they impugne the Civill Power. If notwithstanding this, you find my labour generally decryed, you may be pleased to excuse your selfe[4], and say I am a man that love my own opinions, and think all true I say, that I honoured your Brother, and honour you, and have presum'd on that, to assume the Title (without your knowledge) of being, as I am,

SIR,

Your most humble, and most obedient servant,

THO. HOBBES.

Paris. Aprill 15/25. 1651.

11 Entire text of epistle dedicatory om. MS

[3] taking care not to write anything against the public doctrine of our Church (for it is permitted to disagree with individuals), [4] ^ correctly and easily quod non modo (in ordine ad opus institutum) necessariò feci, (quia loca illa Potestatem Civilem oppugnantibus, quasi Inimicorum, moenibus Civitatis quam obsident, admotae turres sunt) sed etiam ne quid contra Doctrinam Ecclesiae nostrae publicam scriberem (dissentire enim à singularibus licitum est) diligenter cavi. Sin neque ad haec mitescant reprehensores mei, teipsum tamen rectè & facilè excusabis; Dices enim (si vis) hominem esse me, qui mea amem, & quicquid dicam verum esse putem, quod fratrem tuum coluerim, & te colam, eoque fretus, inconsulto te, subscripserim

Servus tuus humilimè devotus

THOMAS HOBBES.

2 oppugnantibus 70] oppugnantia 68

[A3r]

The Contents of the Chapters.

The first part, Of MAN.

Chap.		Page.
	Introduction.	1[k]
1.	Of Sense.	3
2.	Of Imagination.	4
3.	Of the Consequence or Train of Imaginations.	8
4.	Of Speech.	12
5.	Of Reason and Science.	18
6.	Of the interiour Beginnings of Voluntary Motions, commonly called the Passions; °And the Speeches by which they are expressed.°	23
7.	Of the Ends [5]or Resolutions of [5] Discourse.	30
8.	Of the [6]Vertues, commonly called Intellectuall, and their contrary Defects.[6]	32
9.	Of the [7]severall Subjects of Knowledge.[7]	40
10.	Of Power, °Worth,° Dignity, Honour, °and Worthinesse.°	41
11.	Of the Difference of Manners.	47
12.	Of Religion.	52
13.	Of the °Naturall° Condition of Mankind as concerning their Felicity [8]and Misery.[8]	60
14.	Of the first and second Naturall Lawes, °and of Contract.°	64
15.	Of other Lawes of Nature.	71
16.	Of Persons, Authors, °and things Personated.°	80

1–2 The Contents . . . first part,] om. MS 4 Chap.] placed before 1. Of Sense MS 5 Introduction.] Preface MS 6 3] This and all subsequent page numbers om. MS 11–12 Of the interiour . . . are expressed.] Of the passions MS 13 Resolutions] Resultes MS 14 commonly called] om. MS 16 Knowledge] Science MS 17 Worth, Dignity, Honour] Honor, Worth, dignity MS 20–21 their Felicity and Misery] Misery and Felicity MS 22 and second Naturall Lawes] Naturall law MS

[5] of mental [6] intellectual virtues. [7] distribution of the sciences. [8] in the present life.

[5a3v]

INDEX CAPITVM.[j]

PARS PRIMA.
DE HOMINE.

Cap.		Pag.
Introductio.
I.	De Sensu.	3[k]
II.	De Imaginatione.	4
III.	De Consequentia sive Serie Imaginationum.	9
IV.	De Sermone.	13
V.	De Ratione & Scientia.	20
VI.	De Principiis internis, Motus Voluntarii, quae vulgo vocantur Passiones.	25
VII.	De Discursuum animi Determinationibus.	32
VIII.	De Virtutibus Intellectus.	34
IX.	De Scientiarum distributione.	42
X.	De Potentia, Dignitate, & Honore.	43
XI.	De Varietate Morum.	49
XII.	De Religione.	54
XIII.	De Conditione Generis Humani, quatenus ad Foelicitatem Vitae praesentis attinet.	63
XIV.	De Duabus primis Legibus Naturalibus.	66
XV.	De Legibus Naturae aliis.	72
XVI.	De Personis & Authoribus.	79

19 quatenus] quantum 70

[j] In this edition, the 'Index Capitum' and 'Errata' have been moved from the end of the Latin text (sigs. 5a3v–5a4r), so that they may face the English pages to which they correspond.

[k] The page-numbers given in these listings are those of the original editions (presented in bold, within square brackets, in the text of the present edition). Note also that the typography of the Latin has been emended here: in 68 and 70, the first line has 'Cap.', followed (after a gap) by 'Introductio.', and the second line, beginning with 'I. De Sensu.', terminates in 'Pag. 3'. It is assumed here that both 'Cap.' and 'Pag.' were intended as headings, as in the English.

The second Part, Of COMMON-WEALTH.

17. Of the [9]Causes,[9] Generation, and Definition of a Common-wealth. 85
18. Of the Rights of Soveraignes [10] by Institution. 88
19. Of °severall° Kinds of Common-wealth by Institution; and of Succession to the Soveraign Power. 94
20. Of Dominion Paternall, and Despoticall. 101
21. Of the Liberty of [11]Subjects.[11] 107
22. Of Systemes [12]Subject, Politicall, and Private[12]. 115
23. Of the Publique Ministers of Soveraign Power. 123
24. Of the [13]Nutrition, and Procreation[13] of a Common-wealth. 127
25. Of Counsell. 131
26. Of Civill Lawes. 136
27. Of Crimes, Excuses, and Extenuations. 141
28. Of Punishments, and Rewards. 161
29. Of those things that Weaken, °or tend to the Dissolution of° a Common-wealth. 167
30. Of the Office of [14]the Soveraign Representative.[14] 175
31. Of the Kingdome of God by Nature. 186

[A3v]

The third Part. Of A CHRISTIAN COMMON-WEALTH.

32. Of the Principles of Christian Politiques. 195
33. Of the Number, Antiquity, Scope, Authority, and Interpreters of the Books of Holy Scripture. 199
34. Of the signification, of Spirit, Angell, and Inspiration in the Books of Holy Scripture. 207
35. Of the signification in Scripture of the Kingdome of God, of Holy, Sacred, and Sacrament. 216
36. Of the Word of God, and of Prophets. 222
37. Of Miracles, and their use. 233

1 The second Part,] om. MS 5–6 Institution; and . . . Soveraign Power] Institution MS 11 a Common-wealth] Commonwealthes MS 21 The third Part.] om. MS 24 Books of Holy Scripture] scripture MS 25–6 in the . . . Holy Scripture] om. MS 27–8 in Scripture . . . and Sacrament] of Kingdome of God, of Holy, of Sacred, and of Sacrament MS

---

[9] cause, [10] ^ in a commonwealth [11] citizens. [12] of citizens.
[13] nutritive and generative faculty [14] sovereign rule.

PARS SECUNDA.
DE CIVITATE.

XVII. De Causa, Generatione, & Definitione Civitatis. 83
XVIII. De Iure habentium Summam Potestatem in Civitate per Institutionem. 86
XIX. De Generibus Civitatum per Institutionem, & de Successione ad Summam Potestatem. 92
XX. De Dominio Paterno & Despotico. 98
XXI. De Libertate Civium. 103
XXII. De Systematibus Civium. 111
XXIII. De Potestatis Summae Ministris Publicis. 119
[5a4r]
XXIV. De Civitatis Facultate Nutritiva & Generativa. 121
XXV. De Consilio. 124
XXVI. De Legibus Civilibus. 128
XXVII. De Criminibus, Excusationibus, & Extenuationibus. 137
XXVIII. De Poenis & Praemiis. 146
XXIX. De iis rebus quae Civitatem labefactant. 151
XXX. De Officio Summi Imperii. 157
XXXI. De Regno Dei Naturali. 166

PARS TERTIA.
DE CIVITATE CHRISTIANA.

XXXII. De Politicae Christianae Principiis. 173
XXXIII. De Numero, Antiquitate, Scopo, Authoritate, & Interpretibus Librorum Sacrorum. 176
XXXIV. De Significatione quam habent in Scripturis Sacris Vocabula Spiritus, Angelus, Inspiratio. 182
XXXV. De significatione in Scripturis Sacris Vocabulorum, Regnum Dei, Sanctum, Sacrum, & Sacramentum. 190
XXXVI. De Verbo Dei, & Prophetis. 194
XXXVII. De Miraculis, & eorum usu. 203

38. Of the signification in Scripture of Eternall life, Hel, Salvation, the World to come, and Redemption. 238
39. Of the Signification in Scripture of the word Church. 247
40. Of the Rights of the Kingdome of God, in Abraham, Moses, the High Priests, and the Kings of Judah. 249
41. Of the Office of our Blessed Saviour. 261
42. Of Power Ecclesiasticall. 267
43. Of what is Necessary for a mans Reception into the Kingdome of Heaven. 321

The fourth Part.
Of THE KINGDOME OF DARKNESSE.

44. Of Spirituall Darknesse from Misinterpretation of Scripture. 333
45. Of Daemonology, and other Reliques of the Religion of the Gentiles. 342
46. Of Darknesse from Vain Philosophy, and Fabulous Traditions. 367
47. Of the Benefit proceeding from such Darknesse; [15] and to whom it accreweth. 381

[16]A Review and Conclusion.[16] 389

1 in Scripture] om. MS 3 in Scripture of the word] of MS 10 The fourth Part.] om. MS
12 Misinterpretation of] misinterpreting the MS 13 the Religion of the Gentiles] Gentilisme MS
14 Fabulous] false MS 17 A] The MS

[15] ^ what it is,
[16] Appendix, containing three chapters.
The first, on the Nicene Creed.
The second, on heresy.
The third, on certain objections to Leviathan.
The End.

XXXVIII. De Significatione quam habent in Scripturis Sacris Vocabula Vita Aeterna, Infernum, Salvatio, Mundus Venturus, & Redemptio. 208
XXXIX. De significatione quam habet in Scripturis Sacris, Vocabulum Ecclesia. 217
XL. De Jure Regni Dei in Abrahamo, Mose, Summis Sacerdotibus, & Regibus Iudaeae. 219
XLI. De Servatoris nostri benedicti Officio. 226
XLII. De Potestate Ecclesiastica. 231
XLIII. De iis quae ad Receptionem in Regnum Coelorum sunt necessaria. 279

PARS QUARTA.
DE REGNO TENEBRARVM.

XLIV. De Tenebris Spiritualibus à non recta Interpretatione Scripturarum. 289
XLV. De Daemonologia, aliisque Reliquiis Religionum Ethnicarum. 305
[5a4v]
XLVI. De Tenebris à vana Philosophia, & Traditionibus fabulosis. 314
XLVII. De Lucro ab hujusmodi Tenebris quid sit & quibus accrescat. 323

APPENDIX.
Continens tria Capita.

Primum, de Symbolo Niceno. 328
Secundum, De Haeresi. 346
Tertium, De quibusdam Objectionibus contra Leviathan. 359

FINIS.

Errata.

Page 48. In the Margin, for love Praise, read love of Praise. p. 75. 1. 5. for signied, r. signified. p. 88. 1. 1. for performe, r. forme. 1. 35. for Soveraign, r. the Soveraign. p. 94. 1. 14. for lands, r. hands. p. 100. 1. 28. for in, r. in his. p. 102. 1. 46. for in, r. is. p. 105. in the margin, for ver. 10. r. ver. 19. &c. p. 116. 1. 46. for are involved, r. are not involved. p. 120. 1. 42. for Those Bodies, r. These Bodies. p. 137. 1. 2. for in generall. r. in generall. p.139. 1. 36. for were, r. where. p. 166. 1. 18. for benefit. r. benefits. p. 200. 1. 48. dele also. 1. 49. for delivered, r. deliver. p. 203. 1. 35. for other, r. higher. p. 204. 1. 15. for and left, r. if left. 1. 39. for write, r. writt. p. 206. 1. 19. for of the, r. over the. p. 234. 1. 1. for but of, r. but by mediation of. 1. 15. dele and. 1. 38. for putting, r. pulling. p. 262. 1. 19. for tisme, r. Baptisme. p. 268. 1. 48. for that the, r. that. p. 271. 1. 1. for observe, r. obey. 1. 4. for contrary the, r. contrary to the. p. 272. 1. 36. for our Saviours of life, r. of our Saviours life. p. 275. 1. 18. for if shall, r. if he shall. 1. 30. for haven, r. heaven. 1. 45. for of Church, r. of the Church. p. 276. 1. 38. dele inter. 1. 46. dele are. p. 285. 1. 11. for he had, r. he hath. p. 287. 1. 10. dele of. p 298 1. 36. for to ay, r. to Lay. p. 361. 1. 36. for him, r. them.

1–17 Errata-list om. MS

[1] These instructions are self-explanatory, with the use of the following terms: 'finali' = 'last'; 'ultima' = 'last'; 'antepenult' = 'antepenultimate'; 'dele' = 'delete'; 'post' = 'after'; 'à fine' = 'from the end'. The final sentence is: 'Other lesser errata will easily be corrected by the reader.'

ERRATA.

Pag. 35 lin. 8 animadvertunt, 39 l. 22 Passione antepenult. Morbi & Sanitas, 49 l. 8 tempora 55 finali Motorem, 58 l. 8 cognominem; 63 ultima ipsi 65 l. 20 suum 70 antepenult. naturale 72 antepenult. dele , post voluntas 76 l. 7 molestus l. 8 vicino 77 l. 5 Natura 84 l. 6 & tam 86 l. 8 appellantur. 90 l. 19 coërcitione 91 l. 11 nullam esse, 93 l. 2 absolutè 114 l. 15 contracta 122 ultima certorum 128 penult. Civilis 139 l. 19 definita, poenae l. 34 metu 143 l. 27 incertitudine, 144 l. 26 quovis, 145 l. 11 fraudibus 159 l. 5 à fine convenire debeant 164 l. 21 lacessiti, l. 26 praesertim si partim Civitati 168 l. 31 sententia 170 antepenult. sensu, 172 antepenult. Civibus 181 l. 7 Testamenti, 194 lin. 4 à fine Actor. 13. 199 l. 9 à fine apportaret 201 l. 8 quas l. 4 à fine Testamento, 205 l. 11 Pharaonis, 209 l. 6 restituturus 214 l. 22 judicabantur 235 l. 31 nobis 239 l. 23 quam qua l. 27 Regnaturum, judicaturumque 240 l. 30 dele si 243 l. 4 à fine aliaque 245 l. 7 à fine 4 Esdr. 250 l. 23 vocabantur. 255 l. 7 à fine Regum 259 ultima totam 260 l. 17 vim 261 l. 6 à fine esset 262 l. 22 Discipulis 264 l. 15 Infallibilitate, 275 l. 16 demonstrasse; 279 l. 18 perpetrata 312 l. 8 à fine jussum 315 l. 21 Persis 319 l. 4. à fine Hypostasis, 324 l. 8 à fine spissiores, 325 l. 5 dele ut 327 l. 13 Religione & Honestate l. 16 perpetrabantur 329 l. 8 à fine non fuit, 336 l. 8 nongentos 344 l. 18 praeter ea,
Reliqua minora Lector facile corriget.[1]

1–20 Errata-list om. 70

[1]

[17]THE INTRODUCTION.[17]

NATURE (the Art whereby God hath made and governes the World) is by the Art of man, as in °many° other things, so in this also imitated, that it can make an Artificial Animal. For seeing life is but a motion of Limbs, the beginning whereof is in some principall part [18] within; why may we not say, that all Automata (Engines that move themselves by springs and wheeles [19] as doth a watch) have an artificiall life? For what is the Heart, but a Spring, and the Nerves, but so many Strings; and the Ioynts, but so many Wheeles, giving motion to the whole Body, such as was intended by the Artificer? Art [20]goes yet further, imitating that Rationall and most excellent worke of Nature,[20] Man. For by Art is created that great LEVIATHAN called a COMMON-WEALTH, or STATE, (in latine CIVITAS) which is but an Artificiall Man; though of [21] greater stature and strength than the Naturall, for whose protection and defence it was intended; and in which, [22] the Soveraignty is an Artificiall Soul, as giving life and motion to the whole body; The Magistrates, and other Officers °of Judicature and Execution,° artificiall Joynts; Reward and Punishment (by which fastned to °the seate of° the Soveraignty, every °joynt and° member is moved to performe his duty) are the Nerves, that do the same in the Body Naturall; The Wealth and Riches of all the particular members, are the Strength; Salus Populi (the peoples safety) its Businesse; Counsellors, by whom all things needfull for it to know, are suggested unto it, are the Memory; Equity and Lawes, an artificiall Reason °and Will;° Concord, Health; Sedition, Sicknesse; and Civill war, Death. Lastly, the Pacts °and Covenants,° by which the parts of this Body Politique [23]were at first made, set together, and united,[23] resemble that Fiat, or the Let us make man, pronounced by God in the Creation.[m] [2]

To describe the Nature of this Artificiall man, I will consider

1 THE INTRODUCTION] THE PRAEFACE MS

17 LEVIATHAN. PART ONE: OF MAN 18 ^ of the body 19 ^ arranged within 20 imitates not only an animal, but also the noblest of animals, 21 ^ much 22 ^ he who has 23 are stuck together,

m Gen. 1: 26.

[1]

LEVIATHAN

PARS PRIMA
DE HOMINE.

Naturam, id est, illam, qua Mundum Deus condidit & gubernat, divinam Artem, eatenus imitatur Ars humama, ut possit inter alia producere artificiale Animal. Cum enim vita nihil aliud sit quam artuum motus, cujus principium est internum in parte aliqua Corporis principali, Quid obstat quo minus dicamus, Automata omnia, sive machinas omnes quae ab Elastris Rotulisque intus dispositis motum habent, ut Horologia in seipsis, habere etiam artificialem vitam? Quid est cor, nisi Elastrum, quid Nervi, nisi chordae, quid articuli, nisi totidem rotulae, motum, qualem voluit artifex, toti corpori impertientes? Neque animal tantùm imitatur Ars, sed etiam nobilissimum animalium, Hominem. Magnus ille Leviathan, quae Civitas appellatur, opificium Artis est, & Homo artificialis, quanquam Homine naturali (propter cujus protectionem & salutem excogitatus est) & mole & robore multo major. In quo Is qui summam habet Potestatem, pro Anima est, corpus totum vivificante & movente. Magistratus & Praefecti, artificiales [2] Artus. Praemia & Poenae summae Potestati appensae, & à quibus Membra ad suum quodque opus perficiendum incitantur, Nervi sunt, qui idem faciunt in corpore naturali. Divitiae singularium hominum sunt pro robore. Salus populi, pro Negotio. Consiliarii per quos ea, quae cognitu necessaria illi sunt, suggeruntur pro Memoria sunt. Aequitas Legesque pro artificiali Ratione. Concordia, sanitas est. Seditio, Morbus. Bellum civile, Mors. Postremò Pacta quibus partes corporis hujus politici conglutinantur, imitantur divinum illud verbum Fiat, sive Faciamus Hominem, à Deo prolatum in principio cùm crearet Mundum.[m]

Hominis hujus Artificialis naturam describens, considerabo

18 quodque 70] cujusque 68 26 describens] descripturus 70

First, the Matter thereof, and the Artificer; both which is Man.

Secondly, How, and by what Covenants it is made; what are [24]the Rights and just Power or Authority of a Soveraigne; and what it is that preserveth and dissolveth it.[24]

Thirdly, what is a Christian Common-wealth.

Lastly, what is the Kingdome of Darkness.

Concerning the first, there [25]is a saying much usurped[n] of late,[25] That Wisedome is acquired, not by reading of Books, but of Men.[p] Consequently whereunto, those persons, that for the most part can give no other proof of being wise, take great delight to shew what they think they have [26]read in men,[26] by uncharitable censures of [27]one another[27] behind their backs. But there is another [28] saying °not of late understood,° by which they might learn truly to read one another, if they would take the pains; and that is, Nosce teipsum, Read thy self:[q] which was not meant, as it is now used, to countenance, either the barbarous state[r] of men in power, towards their inferiors; or to encourage men of low degree, to a sawcie behaviour towards their betters; But to teach us, that for the similitude of the thoughts, and Passions of one man, to the thoughts, and Passions of another, whosoever looketh into himself, and considereth what he doth, when he does think, opine, reason, hope, feare, &c, and upon what grounds; he shall thereby read and [29]know,[29] what are the thoughts, and Passions of all other men, upon the like occasions. I say the similitude of Passions, °which are the same in all men, desire, feare, hope, &c;° not the similitude of the objects of the Passions, °which are the things desired, feared, hoped, &c:° for these the constitution individuall, and particular education do so vary, and they are so easie to be kept from our knowledge, that the characters of mans heart, blotted and confounded as they are, with [30]dissembling, lying, counterfeiting, and erroneous doctrines,[30] are legible onely to him that searcheth hearts.[s] And though by mens actions wee do discover

1 thereof] om. MS 2–4 How, and . . . dissolveth it] the manner of his Creation the power he hath after he is created and the causes of his dissolutione MS 5 what is a Christian Common-wealth] The power and Rights of the Kingdome of God, {or corr. to and by TH} common-wealth Christian MS
6 Lastly, what . . . of Darkness] And lastly, The Kingdome of Darknesse {mentioned in the Holy scripture del. by TH} MS 15 or] nor MS 19 considereth] considered B 25 they] om. MS

[24] its rights and its power or authority; and in what the sovereignty resides.
[25] are very many who say [26] accomplished by inspection, [27] their neighbours [28] ^, older, [29] understand, [30] simulation, dissimulation, and false opinions,

1. Materiam ejus, & Artificem, id est Hominem.
2. Quo modo, & quibus Pactis factus est; quae Iura, quae Potestas sive Authoritas ejus est; & in quo residet Potestas summa.
3. Quid est Civitas Christiana.
4. Quid est Regnum Tenebrarum. [2]

Quod ad primum attinet, permulti sunt qui sapientiam dicunt non legendo libros, sed legendo Homines acquiri;[p] & sententiae huic consequenter illi, qui sapientiae suae nullum aliud specimen proferre possunt, valde sibimetipisis tunc placent, cum quantum profecerint inspiciendo, censuris in proximos contra charitatem patefecerint. Extat autem praeceptum aliud antiquius, per quod intelligere possent, si vellent, Homines alios rectiùs legere, nempe Nosce teipsum.[q] Quod praeceptum non ita intelligendum est, ut nonnulli putant, quasi aut Potentiorum erga vulgus fastui barbarico, aut humilium erga Potentiores procacitati incivili indulgeret, sed ut doceamur cogitationes passionesque hominum diversorum adeo similes inter se esse, ut quicunque in seipsum inspexerit, consideraveritque quid faciat ipse, & quare, quando cogitat, opinatur, ratiocinatur, sperat, timet, &c. idem simul leget intelligetque cogitationes passionesque aliorum omnium hominum à similibus causis orientes, similes (inquam) passiones, non similia passionum objecta, quae à Constitutione & Educatione hominum singularium ita variantur, & absconduntur, ut Cordium suorum characteres, simulatione, dissimulatione, falsisque opinionibus scribillati & confusi, soli scrutatori Cordium sint legibiles.[s] Quanquam autem consilia hominum cognoscere aliquando possu-

2 est] sit 70 3 est] sit 70 3 residet] resideat 70 4 est] sit 70 5 est] sit 70
7 consequenter] consequenter favent 70 9 placent] placentes 70
11 Homines alios this edn.] Homines. Alios 68; alios Homines 70 14 erga] ergo 70
19 orientes this edn.] orientium 68, 70

[n] = adopted, used (possibly, but not necessarily, with the connotation 'misused') (OED, 'usurp', v., 4.c).

[p] See, e.g., Glapthorne, Wit in a Constable, sig. B2r: 'Would you study? As does young Thorowgood your noble Cosen, Not bookes, but men which are true living volums'; Wotton, Panegyrick of King Charles, p. 107: 'To delight you sometime you read a book . . . but for the most part you read men.'

[q] The Latin version of γνῶθι σεαυτόν ('know yourself'), a saying inscribed at the Temple of Apollo at Delphi, and attributed to various Greek sages.

[r] 'state' here may have the meaning 'pomp', 'display (of rank, wealth, or power)' (OED, 'state', n., 17.a).

[s] Cf. Luke 16: 15 ('God knoweth your hearts'), and the Collect for the Lord's Supper in the 1559 Book of Common Prayer ('Almighty God, unto whom al hartes be open').

their designe sometimes; yet to do it without comparing them with our own, and distinguishing °all° circumstances, by which the case may come to be altered,[t] is to decypher without a key, and be °for the most part° deceived, by too much trust, or by too much diffidence;[u] as he that reads, is himself a good or evil man.

But let one man read [31]another by his actions[31] never so perfectly, it serves him onely with his acquaintance, which are but few. He that is to govern a whole Nation, must read in himself, not this, or that particular man; but Man-kind: which though it be hard to do, harder than to learn any Language, or Science; yet, when I shall have set down [32]my own reading[32] orderly, and perspicuously, the pains left another, will be onely to consider, if he also find not the same in himself. For this kind of Doctrine, admitteth no other Demonstration.

1 designe] designes MS

[31] individual men [32] the firm conclusions which I possess about this subject

[t] 'The case is altered' was a proverbial saying (with humorous connotations, deriving from an anecdote about the Elizabethan lawyer Edmund Plowden), used when an argument was changed by the discovery of a new fact; see Tilley, Dictionary of Proverbs, p. 84 (C111).

[u] = mistrust (OED, 'diffidence', 1).

mus per ea quae faciunt, difficile tamen est sine comparatione cum consiliis propriis, & sine distinctione circumstantiarum quae effectus singulos mutare solent, tanquam si quis literas ignoto charactere legere tentaret sine scriptoris alphabeto. Errabit ergo, aut simplicitate, aut suspitione nimia, prout is qui legit vir probus est vel improbus.

Verum in cognoscendis hominibus singularibus, ut peritissimus sit quis, solos cognoscet eos quibuscum vivit familiariter, qui pauci sunt. At is qui gentem aliquam universam recturus est, ex seipso cognoscere debet non hunc & illum hominem, sed Humanum genus. Quod etsi factu difficile sit, difficilius quam addiscere novam Linguam, aut scientiam quamlibet acquirere, si tamen ea quae ego de hac re explorata habeo, recto ordine, & perspicue explicavero, minuetur difficultas aliis, quibus solus incumbet labor examinandi, an ea quae dico, ipsorum cogitationibus congruant. Nam harum rerum alia non est Demonstratio.

[3]

°OF MAN.°

CHAP. I.

Of SENSE.

Concerning the Thoughts of man, I will consider them first Singly, and afterwards in Trayne, or dependance upon one another. Singly, they are every one a Representation or Apparence, of some quality, or other Accident of a body without us; which is commonly called an Object. Which Object worketh on the Eyes, Eares, and other parts of mans body; and by diversity of working, produceth diversity of Apparences.

The Originall of them all, is that which we call SENSE; (For there is no conception in a mans mind, which hath not at first, totally, or by parts, been begotten upon the organs of Sense.) The rest are derived [1]from that originall.[1]

To know the naturall cause of Sense, is not very necessary to the business now in hand; and I have else-where written of the same at large.[a] Nevertheless, to fill each part of my present method, I will briefly deliver the same in this place.

The cause of Sense, is the Externall Body, or Object, which presseth the organ proper to each Sense, either immediatly, as in the Tast and Touch; or mediately, as in Seeing, Hearing, and Smelling: which pressure, by the mediation of Nerves, and other strings, and membranes of the body, continued inwards to the Brain, and Heart, causeth there a resistance, or counter-pressure, [2] or endeavour of the heart, to deliver [3]it self: which endeavour because Outward, seemeth to be some matter without.[3] And this seeming, or fancy, is that which men call Sense; and [4]consisteth, as to the Eye, in[4] a Light, or Colour °figured;° To the Eare, in a Sound; To the Nostrill, in an Odour; To the °Tongue and° Palat, in a Savour; And to the rest of the body, in Heat, Cold, Hardnesse, Softnesse, and [5]such other qualities, as we discern by Feeling.[5] All

1 OF MAN.] om. MS 5 upon] on MS

---

[1] , however, from these first conceptions. [2] ^ or ἀντιτυπία [resistance, repercussion],
[3] itself from the pressure by means of an outward-going motion, which motion therefore appears as if it were something external. [4] so far as it pertains to the eye, is called [and omit 'in' in following phrases]
[5] the other things that pertain to the sense of touch.

[3]

CAPVT I.

De Sensu.

Cogitationes hominum primo sigillatim, deinde alias ab aliis dependentes, ut in serie considerabo. Ipsarum unaquaeque, alicujus qualitatis vel accci-
5 dentis in Corpore externo, quod appellari solet Objectum, est Apparitio sive Representatio. Quod Objectum agendo in corporis humani Organa, nempe Oculos, Aures, &c. pro diversitate Actionis diversas producit Apparitiones.

Origo omnium nominatur Sensus. Nulla enim est Animi conceptio quae non fuerat ante genita in aliquo Sensuum, vel tota simul, vel per partes. Ab 10 his autem primis conceptibus omnes postea derivantur.

Cognitio causae Sentiendi naturalis praesenti instituto non est absolutè necessaria; etiam alio loco de illa satis ampliter tractavimus.[a] Veruntamen, ut praesentis Methodi partes impleantur, de eadem re iterum sed breviter disseremus.

15 Causa Sensionis est Externum Corpus sive Objectum quod premit unius cujusque Organum proprium, vel immediatè, ut in sensu Tactus & Gustus, vel mediatè, ut in Visu, Auditu, Olfactu, & premendo (mediantibus Nervis & Membranis) continuum efficit motum introrsum ad Cerebrum, & inde ad Cor; unde nascitur Cordis resistentia, & contrapressio seu ἀντιτυπία, sive
20 conatus Cordis deliberantis se à pressione per motum tendentem extrorsum; qui motus propterea apparet tanquam aliquid externum. Atque Apparitio haec sive Phantasma est id quod vocamus Sensionem. Et quantum ad Oculum, Lumen dicitur vel Color; Quod attinet ad Aurem, Sonus; ad Nares, Odor; ad Palatum, Sapor; & ad reliquum Corpus, Calor, Frigus, Durities, Mollities, 25 & caetera pertinentia ad Sensum Tactus. Quae qualitates omnes nominari so-

18 motum] totum 70 20 deliberantis] liberantis 70

[a] This may refer to Elements of Law, I.ii; the text had circulated in manuscript since 1640, and the relevant part was printed as Humane Nature in 1650. Otherwise Hobbes may have had in mind De corpore (esp. XXV, XXVII, XXIX), which, when he wrote Leviathan, he expected to be published shortly.

which qualities called Sensible, are in the object [6]that causeth them, but so many several motions[6] of the matter, by which it presseth our organs diversly. Neither in us °that are pressed,° are they any thing else, but divers motions; (for motion, produceth nothing but motion.) But their apparence to us is Fancy, the same waking, that dreaming.[b] And as pressing, rubbing, or striking the Eye, makes us fancy a light; and pressing the Eare, produceth a dinne; so do the bodies also we see, or hear, produce the same by their [7]strong, though unobserved action.[7] For if those Colours, and Sounds, were in the [8]Bodies, or Objects that cause them,[8] they could not bee [4] severed from them, [9]as by glasses, and in Ecchoes by reflection, wee see they are;[9] where we know the thing we see, is in [10]one place; the apparence, in another.[10] And though [11]at some certain distance,[11] the reall, and very object seem invested with [12]the fancy it begets in us;[12] Yet still the object is one thing, the image °or fancy° is another. So that Sense in all cases, is nothing els but originall fancy, caused (as I have said) by the pressure, °that is, by the motion,° of externall things upon our Eyes, Eares, and other organs °thereunto ordained.°

But the Philosophy-schooles, through all the Universities of Christendome, grounded upon certain Texts of Aristotle, teach another doctrine; and say, [13]For the cause of Vision, that the thing seen, sendeth forth on every side a visible species (in English) a visible shew, apparition, or aspect, or a being seen; the receiving whereof into the Eye, is Seeing.[c] And for the cause of Hearing, that the thing heard, sendeth forth an Audible species, that is, an Audible aspect, or Audible being seen; which entring at the Eare, maketh Hearing. Nay for the cause of Understanding also, they say the thing Understood sendeth forth intelligible species, that is, an intelligible being seen; which comming into the Understanding, makes us Understand.[13] I say not this, as disapproving the use of [14]Universities:[14] but because I am to speak hereafter of their office in a Common-wealth,[d] I [15] must let you see on [16]all occasions[16] by the way, what things would be amended in them; amongst which °the frequency of° insignificant Speech is one.

25 forth] forth an B 29–30 the frequency … Speech] too frequent non-sense MS

---

[6] itself nothing other than motion [7] pressure, although it is unobservable. [8] object itself,
[9] . But they are severed from them, as is clear in the case of the reflections of visible things by mirrors, and of audible things by mountainous terrain;
[10] only one place; the appearances, in several. [11] sometimes, at small distances, [12] its image;
[13] vision is caused by 'species' (that is, appearances) which are visible, sent out by the object to the eye;[c] likewise 'species' (that is, appearances) which are audible, sent out by the object to the ear, are the cause of hearing; and finally the cause of understanding is some 'species' (that is, appearances) which are intelligible, sent out by the thing understood. [14] philosophy-schools: [15] ^thought I [16] this occasion lent Sensibiles, & sunt in ipso Objecto nihil aliud, praeter materiae motum, quo Objectum in Organa Sensuum diversimodè operatur. Neque in nobis aliud sunt quam diversi motus. Motus enim nihil generat praeter Motum, & Apparitiones illae, tum vigilantibus, tum dormientibus mera sunt Phantasmata. Praeterea, ut pressio, frictus, pulsio Oculi excitat Phantasma Lucidi, & pressio Auris sonum, ita etiam Objecta quae videmus vel audimus eadem Phantasmata generant per pressionem sed inobservabilem. Nam si colores illi & soni in ipso Objecto essent, separari ab illis non possent. Separantur autem, ut manifestum est in reflexionibus visibilium [4] per specula, & audibilium per loca montana. Scimus autem corpus quod videmus in uno tantum loco esse, sed apparentias in plurimis. Quanquam autem aliquando in distantiis parvis ipsum Objectum verum investitum videatur Imagine sua, semper tamen aliud est Objectum, aliud Objecti Imago. Sensio ergo & Phantasma originale omnino idem sunt, facta (ut dixi) pressione Oculi vel alîus Organi ab objecto externo.

Philosophi autem Scholastici locis quibusdam freti Aristotelis, aliud docent, nempe, Species (id est Apparitiones) Visibiles emissas ab Objecto in Oculum efficere Visionem;[c] item Species (id est Apparitiones) Audibiles emissas ab Objecto in Aurem causam esse Auditionis; causam denique Intelligendi esse quasdam Species (id est Apparitiones) Intelligibiles emissas à re Intellecta. Non hoc dico ut Scholarum Philosophicarum usum improbans, sed quia de earum in Civitate usu inferiùs locuturus sum,[d] ostendere etiam quae in illis emendari debent (quorum unum est sermo insignificans) non putavi ne obiter quidem negligendum esse.

5 pressio,] pressio Tactus 70 5 excitat] om. 70 6 sonum] sonum excitat 70
6–7 eadem Phantasmata] Phantasma 70 9 est] om. 70 16 Scholastici 70] Scholiastici 68
22 ostendere] ostensurus 70 23–4 insignificans) non putavi ne obiter quidem] insignificans), id non putavi obiter hîc mihi 70

[b] = in the same way when we are awake as when we are dreaming (OED, 'wake', v., 1; and for this 'same … that' construction see 'that', rel. pron., B.4; 'same', a. (pron., adv.) A.1.c).

[c] Hobbes's reference to Aristotle here is a general one, in view of the Aristotelian influence on scholastic philosophy. The scholastic theory of 'species' was not drawn directly from Aristotle, though it had some warrant in his On the Soul, III.12 (424a16–24), where it was claimed that perception took place when the 'sensible forms' of things were received by the senses.

[d] See below, Ch. 30, pp. 532–5; also the 'Review, and Conclusion', p. 1140.

CHAP. II.

Of IMAGINATION.

That when a thing lies [1] still, unlesse somewhat els stirre it, it will lye still for ever, is a truth that no man doubts of. But that when a thing is in motion, it will eternally be in motion, unless somewhat els stay it, though the reason be the same, (namely, that nothing can [2]change[2] it selfe,) is not so easily assented to. For men measure, not onely other men, but all other things, by themselves: and because they find themselves subject after motion to pain, and lassitude, think every thing els growes weary of motion, and seeks repose of its own accord; little considering, whether it be not some other motion, wherein that desire of rest °they find in themselves,° consisteth. From hence it is, that the Schooles say, Heavy bodies fall downwards, out of an appetite to rest, and to conserve their nature in that place which is most proper for them; ascribing appetite, and Knowledge of what is good [3]for their conservation,[3] (which is more than man has) to things inanimate, absurdly.

When a Body is once in motion, it moveth (unless something els hinder it) eternally; and whatsoever hindreth it, cannot in an instant, but in time, and by degrees quite extinguish it: And as wee see in the water, though the wind cease, the waves give not over rowling [4]for a [5] long time after;[4] so also it happeneth in that motion, which is made in the internall parts of a man, then, when he Sees, Dreams, &c. For after the object is removed, or the eye shut, wee still retain an image of the thing seen, though more obscure than when we see it. And this is it, the Latines call Imagination, from the image °made in seeing;° and apply the same, though improperly, to all the other senses. But the Greeks [5]call it Fancy; which signifies apparence, and is as proper to one sense, as to another.[5] IMAGINATION therefore is nothing but decaying sense[6]; and is found in men, and [7]many[7] other living Creatures, aswell sleeping, as waking.[a]

18 And] om. MS 23 marg.: Imagination MS

[1] ^ completely [2] move [3] or bad for them [4] immediately,
[5] even more aptly call it 'fancy', from whatsoever sense it arises; 'image', however, is proper only to visible things. [6] ^ or a diluted and evanescent fancy [7] almost all

[a] Here and throughout this chapter, 'waking' has the sense of 'being awake' (OED, 'wake', v., 1).

CAPVT II.

De Imaginatione.

Id quod omnino quiescit, nisi ab alio moveatur, perpetuò quieturum esse nemini puto dubium esse. Caeterùm quod corpus si moveatur; nisi motus ejus ab alio extinguatur, semper promotum iri, quanquam ratio utrobique eadem sit (nempe nihil posse movere seipsum) non tam facile concedi solet. Mensurant enim homines corpora omnia alia per sua, videntesque seipsos per motum dolori & lassitudini obnoxios esse, idem judicant de aliis motis omnibus; quasi defessa cuperent tandem sua sponte requiescere; neque considerant an non sit motus aliquis in quo consistit quietis desiderium. Atque hinc oritur doctrina illa Scholarum, Descendere corpora gravia propter appetitum quiescendi & conservandi naturam suam in iis locis qui sibi maximè conveniunt, appetitum & Scientiam boni & mali sui (qua homines plerumque carent) rebus inanimatis imperitè ascribentium.

Simul ac corpus movetur movebitur (nisi aliud corpus obstet) in aeternum. Neque id quod obstat motum hunc in instante, sed in tempore & gradatim extinguit. Sicut in mari videmus fieri ut cessante vento, non statim cessant fluctus, ita quoque in motu illo contingit qui est in partibus internis hominis tunc cum videt, somniat &c. [5] Postquam enim Objectum remotum est, vel Oculus clausus, imaginem tamen rei visae retinemus, quanquam aliquanto obscuriorem. Atque haec est imago à qua facultatem appellamus Imaginationem. Phantasiam Graeci & melius vocant à quocunque Sensu oriatur; Imago autem propria est rerum visibilium. Imaginatio ergo nihil aliud est quam Sensio deficiens sive Phantasma dilutum & evanidum, & est hominibus cum animalibus caeteris ferè omnibus communis, sive vigilant sive dormiunt.

3 esse] om. 70 4 quod] om. 70 10 sit 70] fit 68 14 ascribentium this edn.] ascribentes 68, 70 16 instante] instanti 70

[8]The decay of Sense in men waking, is not the decay of the motion made in sense; but an obscuring of it,[8] in such manner, as the light of the Sun obscureth the light of the Starres; which starrs do no less exercise their vertue by which they are visible, in the day, than in the night. But because amongst many [9] stroaks, which our eyes, eares, and other organs receive [10]from externall bodies,[10] the predominant onely is sensible; therefore the light of the Sun being predominant, we are not affected with the action of the starrs. And any object being removed °from our eyes,° though the impression it made in us remain; yet other objects °more present° succeeding, and working on us, the Imagination of the past is obscured, and made weak; as the voyce of a man is in the noyse of the day. From whence it followeth, that the longer the time is, after the sight, or Sense of any object, the weaker is the Imagination[11]. For the continuall change of mans body, destroyes in time [12]the[12] parts which in sense were moved: So that distance of time, and of place, hath one and the same effect in us. For as at a great distance of place, that which wee look at, appears dimme, and without distinction of the smaller parts; and as Voyces grow weak, and inarticulate: so also after great distance of time, our imagination of the Past is weak; and wee lose (for example) of Cities wee have seen, many particular Streets; and of Actions, many particular Circumstances. This decaying sense, when wee would express the thing it self, (I mean fancy it selfe,) wee call Imagination, as I said before: But when we would express the decay, °and signifie that the Sense is fading, old, and past,° it is called Memory. So that Imagination and Memory, are but one thing, which for divers considerations hath divers names.

Memory.

°Much memory, or° memory of many things, is called Experience.[b] Againe, Imagination being only of those things which have been formerly perceived by Sense, either all at once, or by parts at severall times; The former, (which is the imagining the whole object, as it was presented to the sense) is simple Imagination; as when one imagineth a man, or horse, which he hath seen before. The other [13] is Compounded; as when from the sight of a man at one time, and of a horse at another, we conceive in our mind a Centaure. So when a man

3–4 no less … in the day, than in the night] no more … in the night, than in the day MS
20 fancy] the fancy MS

[8] The reason why the fancy becomes more diluted when the object is removed is not some weakness of the motion made in the act of sensation, but the fact that the organs are preoccupied by other objects, [9] ^and various [10] in the course of the day from external agents, [11] ^or fancy [12] some [13] ^, which arises from the sensation of several parts,

[b] Cf. Rhetorica ad Herennium, III.ii.3: 'the memory of many things is called "prudence"' ('appellatur prudentia rerum multarum memoria').

Quod amoto Objecto Phantasma fit dilutius, causa non est debilitas aliqua motus facti in actu Sentiendi, sed praeoccupatio Organorum ab Objectis aliis; quemadmodum praedominans fulgor solis Stellarum lumen obscurum facit; quae tamen Stellae virtutem illam, qua videri se faciunt, non minus de die exercent, quam noctu. Verùm quia inter multos & varios ictus quos Oculi, Aures, & caetera Sensuum Organa ab externis Agentibus de die patiuntur, solus ictus praedominans est sensibilis, lux Solis praedominans causa est, quod à Stellarum actionibus minus afficiamur. Amoto autem Objecto, etsi remaneat quae facta fuerat impressio, succedentibus tamen Objectis, & operantibus, praeteriti Imaginatio diluitur & obscuratur, sicut vox hominis à strepitu diei. Itaque quanto à Visione, vel Sensione alicujus Objecti, longius est tempus, tanto dilutior est Imaginatio sive Phantasma. Etiam continua Organorum corporis mutatio progrediente tempore partes aliquot quae in Sensione motae erant, destruit; atque inde contingit eundem in nobis Effectum producere distantiam temporis & distantiam loci. Sicut enim in magna loci distantia obscuriora apparent, quae aspicimus, & sine minutiorum partium distinctione; & Voces debiliores apparent, & inarticulatae; ita quoque post magnam temporis distantiam Imaginatio Praeteriti debilior fit, perdimusque (exempli causa) earum quas vidimus Vrbium multas plateas, & actionum multas circumstantias. Sensionis dilutionem hanc, rem ipsam indicaturi, nempe ipsum Phantasma, nominamus, ut ante dictum est, Imaginationem; quando autem significare volumus dilutionem, appellamus Memoriam, adeò ut eadem sit res Imaginatio & Memoria, sed propter diversas considerationes, diversis nominibus significata. Memoria.

Memoria multarum rerum, Experientia dicitur.[b] Porrò, cum Imaginatio earum rerum tantùm sit, quas antè, vel simul, vel per partes sensu perceperimus, Imaginatio illa, quae est simul totius Objecti, Imaginatio simplex est, ut quando quis imaginatur hominem, vel equum, quem antè viderat. Imaginatio autem, quae oritur ex sensione [6] plurium partium, ut quando à visione hominis uno tempore, & à visione equi alio tempore, concipimus animo Centaurum, Composita dicitur. Itaque quoties quis componit Phantasma suae compoundeth the image of his own person, with the image of the actions of an other man; as when a man imagins himselfe a Hercules, or an Alexander, (which happeneth often to them that are much taken with reading of [14]Romants[c])[14] it is a compound imagination, and properly but a Fiction [6] of the mind. There be also other Imaginations that rise in men, (though waking) from the great impression made in sense: As from gazing upon the Sun, the impression leaves an image of the Sun before our eyes a long time after[15]; and from being long and vehemently attent upon[d] Geometricall Figures, a man shall in the dark, (though awake) have the Images of Lines, and Angles before his eyes: which kind of Fancy [16]hath no particular name;[16] as being a thing that doth not commonly fall into mens discourse.

Dreams. The imaginations of them that sleep, are those we call Dreams. And these also (as all other Imaginations) have been before, either totally, or by parcells in the Sense. And because in sense, the Brain, and Nerves, which are the necessary Organs of sense, are so benummed in sleep, as not easily to be moved by the action of Externall Objects, there can happen in sleep, no Imagination; and therefore no Dreame, but what proceeds from the agitation of the inward parts of [17]mans[17] body; which inward parts, for the connexion they have with the Brayn, and other Organs, when they be distempered, do keep the same in motion; whereby the Imaginations there formerly made, appeare as if a man were waking; saving that the Organs of Sense being now benummed, so as there is no new object, which can [18]master and obscure them with a more vigorous impression,[18] a Dreame must needs be more cleare, in this silence of sense, than are our waking [19]thoughts.[19] And hence it cometh to passe, that it is a hard matter, and by many thought impossible to distinguish exactly between Sense and Dreaming. For my part, when I consider, that in Dreames, I do not often, nor constantly think of the same Persons, Places, Objects, and Actions that I do waking; nor remember so long a trayne of coherent thoughts, Dreaming, as at other times; And because waking I often observe the absurdity of Dreames, but never dream of the absurdities of my waking Thoughts; I am well satisfied, that being awake, I know I dreame not; though when I dreame, I think my selfe awake.[e]

4 marg.: fiction MS 8 a man] one MS 21 waking] {working corr. to waking by TH} MS 30 absurdity] absurdities MS

[14] heroic deeds) [15] ^, like a spot [16] , whether it has its own name or not, I do not know;
[17] the sentient [18] obscure them, [19] imaginations.

ipsius personae cum Phantasmate actionum alterius hominis, ut facit is, qui seipsum imaginatur esse Herculem aut Alexandrum (id quod illis aliquando accidit, qui multum versantur in lectione actionum Heroicarum) Imaginatio illa composita est; & nihil aliud est praeter Figmentum animi. Multae etiam aliae Imaginationes in hominibus, etiam vigilantibus, oriuntur à magna impressione facta sentiendo; nam ab intento aspectu in solem relinquitur ante oculos longo post tempore Imaguncula solis, quasi macula; & à longa & vehemente attentione ad Figuras Geometricas apparebunt etiam in tenebris, & vigilantibus ante oculos Lineae Angulique. Quod genus Phantasiae an nomen proprium habeat necne nescio; cum sit res de qua homines non saepe disserunt.

Somnia.

Imaginationes dormientium sunt Somnia. Atque haec quoque, sicut Imaginationes caeterae, ante extiterunt vel integrae, vel per partes in sensu. Et quoniam in somno Cerebrum & Nervi, quae sunt sensionis Organa necessaria, ita stupefiunt, ut ab actione externorum Objectorum moveri facile non possint, dormientibus contingere Imaginatio nulla potest, adeoque somnium nullum, nisi quod procedat ab agitatione partium internarum corporis sentientis; quae partes internae (propter connexionem cum Cerebro aliisque Organis) intemperie sua aliquando commovent Organa, faciuntque ut Phantasmata ante facta appareant tanquam vigilanti. Sed quoniam Organa sensuum occlusa nunc in somno supponuntur, ita ut objectum aliud novum non sit, quod ea offuscare posset, necesse est, ut Somnium, clarius sit in hoc sensuum silentio, quam sunt Imaginationes vigilantium. Atque hinc est, quod difficile sit & multis videatur impossibile, inter sensum & somnium distinguere accuratè. Ego, quoties considero, quod in somniis, neque saepe neque constanter, eadem Objecta, loca, personas, actionesque, imaginor, quae vigilans; neque tam longam seriem cogitationum cohaerentium reminiscor somnians, quam aliâs; & quoniam vigilans absurditatem somniorum meorum saepe video, somnians autem cogitationum mearum vigilantis absurditates non video, satis persuasus sum vigilantem me scire, quòd non somniem, quanquam somnians videor mihi vigilare.[e]

10 habeat] habebat 70

[c] = romances (OED, 'romaunt', n. and a.). [d] = attentive to (OED, 'attent', ppl. a.).

[e] Cf. Mersenne, Verité des sciences, p. 145: 'We judge very well after we have woken that what we thought while asleep was false, ridiculous, or impossible; but we never judge while asleep that what we saw when we were awake was false and imaginary' ('Nous jugeons fort bien après être éveillés que ce que nous avons pensé en dormant, était faux, ridicule, ou impossible, mais nous ne jugeons point en dormant que ce que nous avons vu en veillant, soit faux et controuvé').

And seeing dreames are caused by the distemper of some of the inward parts of the Body; divers distempers must needs cause different Dreams. And hence it is, that lying cold breedeth Dreams of Feare, and raiseth the thought and Image of some fearfull object (the motion from the brain to the inner parts, and from the inner parts to the Brain being reciprocall:) And that as Anger causeth heat in some parts of the Body, when we are awake; so when we sleep, the over heating of the same parts causeth Anger, and raiseth up in the brain the Imagination of an Enemy. In the same manner; as [20]naturall kindness,[f] when we are awake causeth desire; and desire makes heat in certain other parts of the body; so also, too much heat in those parts, while wee sleep, raiseth in the brain an imagination of some kindness shewn.[20] In summe, our Dreams are the reverse of our waking Imaginations; The motion when we are awake, beginning at one end; and when we Dream, at another.

°Apparitions or Visions.°

The most difficult discerning of a mans Dream, from his waking [7] thoughts, is then, when by some accident we observe not that we have slept: which is easie to happen to a man [21]full of fearfull thoughts;[21] and whose conscience is much troubled; and that sleepeth, without the circumstances, of going to bed, or putting off his clothes, as one that noddeth in a chayre. For he that °taketh pains, and° industriously layes himself to sleep, in case any uncouth and exorbitant fancy come unto him, cannot easily think it other than a Dream. We read of Marcus Brutus, (one that had his life given him by Iulius Caesar, °and was also his favorite,° and notwithstanding murthered him,) how at Philippi, the night before he gave battell to Augustus Caesar, hee saw a fearfull apparition, which is commonly related by Historians as a Vision: but considering the circumstances, one may easily judge to have been but a short Dream.[g] For sitting in his tent, pensive and troubled with the horrour of his rash act, it was not hard for him, [22]slumbering[22] in the cold, to dream of that which most affrighted him; which feare, as by degrees it made him wake; so also it must needs make the Apparition by degrees to vanish: And having no assurance that he slept, he could have no cause to think it a Dream, or any

8–9 as naturall kindness] as {the illeg. word del. by TH} kindnesse MS 17 that] om. MS

[20] love, in those who are awake, causes love, and heat in some internal parts of the body; so also, heat in those same parts, while they are asleep, causes an imagination of love.

[21] aware of some crime he has committed, or is going to commit;

[22] not properly asleep but only dozing

[f] OED records 'kindness' in the sense of 'affection, tenderness' ('kindness', 5), and 'natural' in the sense of 'feeling spontaneous affection' ('natural', adj. and adv., 16.b); but since Hobbes is writing about sexual attraction, or the expression of it, 'natural' here may refer to mankind's physical nature.

[g] Plutarch, Life of Brutus, 48, and Life of Caesar, 69.

Quoniam autem somnia pro causa habent aliquarum partium Corporis internarum intemperiem, necesse est ut variae intemperies varia [7] efficiant somnia. Atque hinc est, quod saepe accidit, ut illi, qui cubantes algent, saepissimè in somniis timeant, videanturque sibi Imagines videre terrificas (motus enim à Cerebro ad partes alias corporis internas & ab illis ad Cerebrum est reciprocus.) Hinc etiam accidit, quòd, sicut Ira calorem efficit in partibus aliquibus corporis, dum vigilamus; ita etiam dum dormimus, nimius earundem partium calor efficiat Iram, excitetque in Cerebro Phantasma alicujus hostis. Eodem modo, ut amor in vigilantibus amorem efficit, & calorem in partibus corporis aliquibus internis; ita etiam earundem partium calor in dormientibus imaginem efficit amoris. Somnia denique & vigilantium Phantasmata altera alterius sunt inversa; nimirum motu incipiente dum vigilamus ab uno termino, & ab altero dum Somniamus.

Inter Somnium & cogitationes vigilantium distinguere difficilimum tunc est, quando casu aliquo factum est ut minimè animadvertamus, nos dormiisse; id quod facile contingit illi, qui facinoris alicujus facti, vel faciendi conscius, & sollicitus dormit sine circumstantiis exuendi vestes, & eundi cubitum; ut qui in cathedra dormit sedens vel reclinatus. Qui enim ad dormiendum se componit, si forte Phantasma aliquod insolitum aut mirandum videri contingat, non aliud illi videri potest quam Somnium. Marcum Brutum legimus (qui cum amicus fuisset Julii Caesaris, & ab eo vitam condonatam acceperat, illum tamen ingratè occiderat) nocte illa quae praecessit diem, in quo pugnatum est contra Augustum Caesarem apud Philippos, Phantasma habuisse horribile, quod ab historicis vulgo narratur ut Visio vera; sed ab eo qui consideraverit singulas ejus circumstantias non Visionem sed Somnium fuisse breve judicabitur.[g] Sedenti enim in Tentorio, & (propter horrorem facti sui temerarii) tristi & cogitabundo, nec bene sopito, sed dormitanti tantùm, propter aërem non satis calidum, Somniare facilimum erat de ea re, qua maximè terrebatur, & propter eundem terrorem, paulatim rursus evigilare, & simul existimare spectrum illud, quod apparuerat, paulatim evanescere, & quia dormiisse se nesciebat, nescire etiam fuisse Somnium, aut aliud quicthing but a Vision. And this is no very rare Accident: for even they that be perfectly awake, if they be timorous, and superstitious, possessed with fearfull tales, and alone in the dark, are subject to the like fancies; and believe they see spirits and dead mens Ghosts walking in Church-yards; whereas it is either their Fancy onely, or els the knavery of such persons, as make use of such superstitious feare, to passe disguised [23]in the night, to places they would not be known[23] to haunt.

21 Julii 70] Julius 68 26 judicabitur this edn.] judicabit 68, 70

From this ignorance of how to distinguish Dreams, and other strong Fancies, from Vision and Sense, did arise the greatest part of the Religion of the Gentiles in time past, that worshipped Satyres, Fawnes, Nymphs, and the like; and now adayes the opinion that rude people have of Fayries, Ghosts, and Goblins; and of the power of Witches. For as for Witches, I think not that their witchcraft is any reall power; but yet that they are justly punished, for the false beliefe they have, that they can do such mischiefe, joyned with their purpose to do it if they can: their trade being neerer to a [24]new Religion, than to a[24] Craft or Science. And for Fayries, and walking Ghosts, the opinion of them [25] has I think been on purpose, either taught, or not confuted, to keep in credit the use of Exorcisme, of Crosses, of holy Water, and other such inventions of Ghostly[h] men. Neverthelesse, there is no doubt, but God can make [26]unnaturall[26] Apparitions: But that he does it so often, as men need to feare such things, more than they feare the stay, or change, of the course of Nature, which he also can stay, and change, is no point of Christian faith. But evill men under pretext that God can do any thing, are so bold as to say any thing when it serves their turn, though they think it untrue; It is the part of a wise man, to believe them no further, than right reason makes that which they say, appear credible. If this [27]superstitious fear of Spirits[27] were taken away, and with it, Prognostiques from Dreams, °false Prophecies,° and many other things depending thereon, by [8] which, crafty ambitious persons abuse the simple people, men would be much more fitted than they are for civill Obedience.

12 that] {that del. by TH} MS 13 is] om. MS 20 does it] does it {not del. by TH} MS
24 when it serves] if it serue MS 26 If this] This MS 26 were] om. MS

[23] in dead men's clothes through churchyards and other consecrated places, to places which it would seem too wicked for them [24] religion peculiar to themselves, than to a true power, whether [25] ^ which has prevailed till now [26] supernatural [27] fear of ghosts

[h] 'Ghostly' means spiritual (in the sense of religious or ecclesiastical, as opposed to 'lay') (OED, 'ghostly', a., 3); but Hobbes plays here also on the literal sense of 'ghost'.

quam praeter rem visam. Neque sunt hujusmodi accidentia valde rara; nam etiam qui perfectè vigilant, si meticulosi, superstitiosi, fabulis rerum terribilium occupati sint, & in tenebris soli, ejusdem generis imaginationibus obnoxii sunt, creduntque se umbras & mortuorum Spiritus ambulantes videre in Coemiteriis; cum tamen revera nihil videant praeter mera Phantasmata, vel decepti sunt ab hominibus improbis, qui timore eorum superstitioso [8] abutuntur, eo fine ut possint ipsi amicti vestibus defunctorum noctu per Coemiteria aliaque loca consecrata, ad loca transire quae nimium à se frequenter adiri videretur inhonestum.

Ab ignoratione hac disctinctionis Somniorum, aliorumque Phantasmatum vividorum, à Visione & Sensione, maxima ex parte orta est antiquorum Gentilium Religio, Satyras, Faunos, Nymphas, & similia colentium Spectra; hodieque Opinio, quam habent populi rudes de Lamiis & Lemuribus, & de potentia sorcilegorum. Nam etsi sorcilegium Potentiam aliquam realem esse non putem, puto tamen sorcilegos puniri jure posse, cum mala facinora & facere posse credant, & conentur quantum possunt. Sed ipsum sorcilegium ego non tam potentiam veram esse credo, aut Artem, aut Scientiam, quam Religionem ipsis peculiarem. Quod autem ad Lemures & Spiritus ambulantes attinet, Opinio quae de illis hactenus valuit, de industria (puto) tradita fuit vel non confutata ad usum Exorcismorum, & signationum signo Crucis, & Aquae Benedictae, aliarumque similium inventionum, hominum Spiritualium sustinendum. Dubium tamen non est, quin Phantasmata supernaturalia fieri possint à Deo; quod tamen id ita saepe facit ut timenda sint, magis quam cessatio mutatiove Naturae, quam Deus etiam sistere vel mutare potest, Fidei Christianae Articulus non est; sed homines improbi ex eo, quod Deus potest omnia, etiam omnia dicere audent quae sibi utilia fore ducunt, etsi falsa esse putent. Sapientis autem est non ulterius illis credere, quam recta ratio, ea, quae dicunt, facit videri credibilia. Si metus hic Spectrorum sublatus esset, simulque Prognostica à Somniis, aliaque multa quae inde dependent, & quibus homines ambitiosi astutique populo simplici abutuntur, Cives in omni Civitate ad Obedientiam multo magis eruditi essent, quàm nunc sunt.

8–9 frequenter adiri] frequentari 70 16 facere] facere se 70 31 essent] forent 70

And this ought to be the work of the Schooles: but they rather nourish such doctrine[28]. For (not knowing what Imagination, or the Senses are), what they receive, they teach: some saying, that Imaginations rise of themselves, and have no cause: Others that they rise most commonly from the Will; and that Good thoughts are blown (inspired) into a man, by God; and Evill thoughts by the Divell: or that Good thoughts are powred (infused) into a man, by God, and Evill ones by the Divell. Some say the Senses receive the Species of things, and deliver them to the Common-sense; and the Common Sense delivers them over to the Fancy, and the Fancy to the Memory, and the Memory to the Judgement, °like handing of things from one to another,° with many words making nothing understood.

Understanding.

The Imagination that is raysed in man (or any other [29]creature indued with the faculty of imagining)[29] by words, or other voluntary signes, is that we generally call Understanding; and is common to Man and Beast. For a dogge by custome will understand the call, or the rating[i] of his Master; and so will many other Beasts. That Understanding which is peculiar to man, is the Understanding not onely [30]his will; but his[30] conceptions and thoughts, by the sequell[j] and contexture[k] of the names of things into Affirmations, Negations, and other formes of Speech: And of this kinde of Understanding I shall speak hereafter.

3 some saying,] As MS 8 and the] and then the MS

[28] ^ than confute it [29] animal) [30] other men's wills, but their

[i] = scolding (OED, 'rate', v., 1.b). [j] = sequence, order of succession (OED, 'sequel', n., 5).
[k] = weaving together (OED, 'contexture', 5).

Est autem hoc Scholarum opus, quae tamen hujusmodi doctrinas saepius promovent, quam confutant. Nescientes enim Imaginationis & Sensionis naturam, docent quae didicerunt, alii Imaginationes oriri à seipsis, id est sine causa, alii oriri plerumque à voluntate; cogitationesque bonas inspirari in hominem à Deo; & malas à Diabolo; vel cogitationes bonas infundi in hominem à Deo; malas à Diabolo. Dicunt alii, Sensus cum recipiunt rerum species, eas communi Sensui tradere, communem Sensum Phantasiae, Phantasiam Memoriae, Memoriam Iudicio, multis verbis nihil intelligi facientes.

Intellectus.

Imaginatio, quae in homine, aliove animali, à sermone, vel aliis signis voluntariis nascitur, appellatur Intellectus; communisque est [9] hominibus cum bestiis. Canis enim, consuetudine doctus, vocari se vel abigi à Domino intelliget; quod facient etiam alia multa animalia. Intellectus qui homini peculiaris est, est Intellectus non solum voluntatis, sed etiam conceptuum & cogitationum aliorum hominum, per sequelas & contextum Appellationum rerum, in Affirmationes, Negationes, aliasque formulas loquendi conceptio. Atque de hoc genere Intellectus dicemus infra.

CHAP. III.

Of the Consequence or TRAYNE of Imaginations.

By Consequence, or TRAYNE of [1]Thoughts,[1] I understand that succession of one Thought to another, which is called (to distinguish it from Discourse in words) Mentall Discourse.

When a man thinketh on any thing whatsoever, His next Thought after, is not altogether so casuall[a] as it seems to be. Not every Thought to every Thought succeeds indifferently. But as wee have no Imagination, whereof we have not formerly had Sense, in whole, or in parts; so we have no Transition from one Imagination to another, whereof we never had the like before in our Senses. The reason whereof is this. All Fancies are Motions within us, reliques of those made in the Sense: And those motions that immediately succeeded one another in the sense, continue also together after Sense: In so much as the former [2] comming again to take place, and be praedominant, the later followeth, by coherence of the matter moved, in such manner, as water upon a plain Table is drawn which way °any one part of it° is guided by the finger. But because °in sense,° to one and the same thing perceived, sometimes one thing, sometimes another succeedeth, it comes to passe [3]in time, that in the Imagining of any thing, there is [9] no certainty what we shall Imagine next;[3] Onely this is certain, it shall be something that succeeded the same before, at one time or another.

Trayne of Thoughts unguided.

This Trayne of Thoughts, or Mentall Discourse, is of two sorts. The first is Vnguided, without Designe, and inconstant; Wherein there is no Passionate Thought, to govern and direct those that follow, to it self, as the end and scope of some desire, °or other passion:° In which case the thoughts are said to wander, and seem impertinent[b] one to another, as in a Dream. Such are Commonly the thoughts of men, that are not onely without company, but also without care of any thing; though even then their Thoughts are as bu-

[1] imaginations, [2] ^ thought [3] after many thoughts, that it is uncertain which thought shall follow which.

[a] = fortuitous (OED, 'casual', a. (n.), 1.a). [b] = irrelevant, inappropriate (OED, 'impertinent', a. (n.), 2–3).

CAPVT III.

De Consequentia sive Serie Imaginationum.

Per Seriem Imaginationum intelligo Successionem unius Cogitationis ad aliam; quam (ut distinguatur à Discursu verborum) appello Discursum mentalem.

Quando aliquis de re quacunque cogitat, proxima ejus Cogitatio non tam fortuita est, quam videtur esse; neque omni Cogitationi omnis Cogitatio pariter succedit. Sed ut nullam habemus Imaginationem quae non antè fuit in Sensione vel tota vel per partes, ita nulla est transitio ab una cogitatione ad aliam cujus similis non extiterat antè in Sensione. Cujus rei causa haec est. Phantasmata omnia Motus sunt interni, nempe motuum in Sensione factorum reliquiae. Motus autem qui alii aliis succedunt in Sensione immediatè, remanent etiam simul, etiam post Sensionem. Adeò ut, quoties redit Cogitatio prior, praedominaturque, sequatur posterior, propter cohaesionem materiae motae, quemadmodum aqua super tabulam planam & levem trahitur per viam, quà ducit digitus. Sed quoniam eidem rei conceptae sequitur modo una, modo alia res, post multa cogitata fit, ut incertum sit, quae Cogitatio, cui Cogitationi successura sit. Hoc tantum certum est, successuram esse aliquam earum, quae antè successerant aliquando.

Series Cogitationum irregularis.

Series Cogitationum, sive Discursus mentalis duplex est, altera irregularis, sine ullo Fine proposito, adeoque inconstans, ut in qua nulla est Passio quae gubernet & dirigat Cogitationes caeteras ad finem desideratum. Tunc autem vagari videntur, & videri aliae ad alias non pertinere, ut in Somnio. Tales plerumque sunt eorum Cogitationes, qui sunt non solum sine comitatu, sed etiam sine omnium rerum sollicitudine, quanquam etiam tunc non sie as at other times, but without harmony; as the sound which a Lute °out of tune° would yeeld °to any man; or in tune,° to one that could not play. And yet in this wild ranging of the mind, a man may oft-times perceive the way of it, and the dependance of one thought upon another. For in a Discourse of our °present° civill warre, what could seem more impertinent, than to ask (as one did) what was the value of a Roman Penny? Yet the Cohaerence to me was manifest enough. For the Thought of the warre, introduced the Thought of the delivering up the King [4] to his Enemies;[c] The Thought of that, brought in the Thought of the delivering up of Christ; and that again the Thought of the 30 pence, which was the price of that treason:[d] and thence easily followed that °malicious° question; and all this in a moment of time; for Thought is quick.

Trayne of Thoughts regulated.

The second is more constant; as being regulated by some desire, and designe. For the impression made by such things as wee desire, or feare, is strong, and permanent, or, (if it cease for a time,) of quick return: so strong it is sometimes, as to hinder and break our sleep. From Desire, ariseth the Thought of some means we have seen produce the like of that which we ayme at; and from the thought of that, the thought of means to that mean; and so continually, till we come to some beginning within our own power. And because the End, by the greatnesse of the impression, comes often [5] to mind, in case our thoughts begin to wander, they are [6]quickly again[6] reduced[e] into the way: which observed by one of the seven wise men, made him give men this praecept, which is now worne out,[f] Respice finem;[g] that is to say, in all your actions, look often upon what you would have, as the thing that directs all your thoughts in the way to attain it.

The Trayn of regulated Thoughts is of two kinds; One, when of an effect imagined, wee seek the causes, or means that produce it: and this is common to Man and Beast. The other is, when imagining any thing whatsoever, wee seek all the possible effects, that can by it be produced; that is to say, we im-

1–2 Lute . . . any man;] Lute would yeild out of tune, MS 13 marg. at start of next para. MS 18 from] om. MS

4 ^ by his subjects 5 ^ and easily 6 easily

[c] The discussion may have been about either John Ashburnham or the Scots. Ashburnham was the courtier who accompanied Charles I during his abortive escape from captivity in Nov. 1647, and who was widely blamed by royalists for having betrayed him to the parliamentarian governor of the Isle of Wight (see Ashburnham, True Copie, p. 1; Kelsey, 'Ashburnham'). In Jan. 1647 the Scots had handed Charles I to the English parliamentarian authorities, receiving £100,000 as a first instalment of an agreed payment of cessant Cogitationes, sed sine harmonia sunt, quales sunt pulsus lyrae homini imperito. Veruntamen in hac vagatione animi animadvertere aliquando [10] possumus methodum quandam, & quo modo una Cogitatio ab altera oriatur. Etenim in colloquio quodam circa bellum nostrum civile, quid impertinentius videri poterat quam interrogare (ut interrogatum erat) Denarii Romani quantus valor esset. Cohaesio tamen illa satis mihi manifesta videbatur. Nam à Cogitatione Belli introducta est Cogitatio de Rege à subditis suis tradito hostibus;[c] Cogitatio illa Cogitationem genuit de proditione Iesu Christi ad Iudaeos, illa rursus peperit cogitationem de 30 denariis proditionis illius pretio;[d] inde denique facile sequuta est praedicta interrogatio. Atque haec omnia propter celeritatem cogitationis in momento ferè temporis.

Series Cogitationum regularis.

Secunda constantior est, ut quae ab aliquo fine desiderato regulata est. Nam impressio facta ab iis rebus, quas cupimus vel metuimus, vivida est & permanens, vel (si paulùm forte cesset) cito redit; adeoque est aliquando fortis, ut Somnum non modo impediat, sed etiam abrumpat. A Desiderio oritur Cogitatio medii ad rem desideratam obtinendam, quale medium videramus ante similem effectum produxisse. Eodem modo Cogitatio medii ad Finem producit Cogitationem medii ad illud medium, & sic deinceps, donec veniatur ad principium aliquod in potestate nostra. Quoniam autem Finis (propter magnitudinem impressionis) saepe & facile recurrit animo, si caeperint forte Cogitationes evagari, facile rursus in viam reducuntur. Cujus rei observatio fecit, ut septem sapientium celebrium unus praeceptum daret, quod hodie tritum est, Respice Finem;[g] per quod, in omnibus actionibus saepius respectandum esse monet ad Finem, ut ad id quod Cogitationes omnes in via ad Finem obtinendum dirigit.

Series Cogitationum regulata etiam duplex est. Altera quando alicujus effectus concepti Causas & Media quaerimus quibus producitur. Atque haec hominibus cum caeteris animalibus communis est. Altera est, quando imaginati rem quamcunque, effectus omnes quaerimus possibiles qui inde produci

5 videri 70] videre 68

£400,000 (ostensibly for arrears of pay for the Scots army, and for its removal from England). References to this in Behemoth (ed. Seaward, pp. 287–8 [fo. 64v]) and in Hobbes's verse autobiography ('Meanwhile the Scots sell the King, and the English kill him' (Chatsworth, MS Hobbes A. 6, l. 209 (OL i, p. xcii): 'Interea Regem vendit Scotus, et necat Anglus') suggest that it was the Scots that he had in mind here; so too does the addition in the Latin.

[d] Matt. 26: 15. [e] = led back, brought back (OED, 'reduce', v., 2).

[f] = much used, trite (cf. the Latin: 'tritum').

[g] = 'consider the end'. A similar phrase, meaning 'consider the end of your life', was attributed to Solon, one of the seven sages of Greece; but 'respice finem' appears to derive from the advice 'quicquid agas, prudenter agas, respice finem' ('whatever you do, do it prudently, and consider the end') in Gesta romanorum, ch. 103, p. 361.

agine what we can do with it, when wee have it. Of which I have not at any time seen any signe, but in man onely; for this is a curiosity hardly incident to the nature of any living creature that has no other Passion but sensuall, such as are hunger, thirst, lust, and anger. In summe, the Discourse of the Mind, when it is governed by designe, is nothing but Seeking, or the faculty of Invention, which the Latines call Sagacitas, and [10] Solertia; a [7]hunting out of the causes, of some effect, present or past; or of the effects, of some present or past cause.[7] Sometimes a man seeks what he hath lost; and from that place, and time, wherein hee misses it, his mind runs back, from place to place, and time to time, to find where, and when he had it; that is to say, to find some certain, and limited time and place, in which to begin a method of seeking. Again, from thence, his thoughts run over the same places and times, to find what action, or other occasion might make him lose it. [8]This we call Remembrance, or Calling to mind: the Latines call it Reminiscentia, as it were a Reconning of our former actions.[8]

Remembrance.

Sometimes a man knows a place determinate, within the compasse whereof he is to seek; and then his thoughts run over all the parts thereof, in the same manner, as one would sweep a room, to find a jewell; or as a Spaniel ranges the field, till he find a sent; or as a man should run over the Alphabet, to start a rime.

Prudence.

Sometime a man desires to know the event[h] of an action; and then he thinketh of some like action past, and the events thereof one after another; [9]supposing like events will[9] follow like actions. As he that foresees what wil become of [10]a Criminal,[10] re-cons what he has seen follow on the like Crime before; having this order of thoughts, The Crime, the Officer, the Prison, the Judge, and the Gallowes. Which kind of thoughts, is called Foresight, and Prudence, or Providence; and sometimes Wisdome; though such conjecture, through the difficulty of observing all circumstances, be [11]very[11] fallacious. But this is certain; by how much one man has more experience of things past, than another; by so much also he is more Prudent, and his expectations the seldomer faile him. The Present onely has a being in Nature; things Past have a being in the Memory onely, but things to come have no being at all; the Fu-

32 at] yet at MS

[7] sort of hunting, as it were, by following the tracks of some cause or effect, present or past.
[8] And this is that faculty of the mind which is called 'remembrance'.
[9] because like events mostly [10] someone guilty of a capital crime, [11] rather [h] = outcome (OED, 'event', n., 3.a).

possunt; id est usum ejus quaerimus quis esse possit. Hujus generis Cogitationis signum, praeterquam in homine nunquam vidi; curiositas enim haec in naturam incidere vix potest Animalis cui nullae insunt passiones praeter sensuales, quales sunt Fames, Sitis, Amor, & Ira. Discursus denique animi quando à designato Fine aliquo regitur, nihil aliud est praeter Investigationem, sive facultatem Inveniendi quae sagacitas quoque & solertia appellatur, & est quasi venatio quaedam per sua vestigia alicujus Causae vel Effectus praesentis aut praeteriti. Investigat aliquis id quod perdidit? Ab [11] eo loco & tempore ubi id se perdidisse animadvertit, recurrit animo à loco ad locum, & à tempore ad tempus, ut reperiat ubi & quando rem perditam habuerat, id est ut tempus aliquod & locum certum & definitum reperiat, ubi Investigationis statuere initium possit. Inde rursus Cogitatione per eadem loca & tempora revertitur, ut actionem aliquam vel occasionem aliam inveniat, quae causa esse poterat ut rem quaesitam perdiderit. Atque haec est facultas illa animi quae vocatur Reminiscentia.

Reminiscentia.

Accidit aliquando ut quis locum definitum habeat intra quem Investigatio instituenda est. Tunc autem Cogitationes ejus partes omnes illius loci determinati percurrunt, eo modo, ut si quis cubiculum everreret, ut perditam inveniret gemmam; vel quemadmodum canis venaticus campum pervagatur, donec ferae alicujus odorem sentiat, vel ut qui percurrit animo Alphabetum, ut syllabam finalem inveniat homophonam.

Scire quis cupit actionis alicujus futurum eventum? Cogitat ille praeteritae actionis similis eventus, ordine, quo illos antè viderat; quia similes actiones, similes eventus plerumque consequuntur. Ut qui scire vult, quid Reo criminis capitalis eventurum est, reminiscitur ea quae consecuta sunt ante in pari crimine, tali ordine cogitationum, Crimen, Minister, Carcer, Iudex, Patibulum, Genus hoc cogitationum, Praevisio dicitur, & Prudentia & Providentia, & quandoque Sapientia; quanquam Conjectura tantum sit, & propter difficultatem circumstantias omnes observandi, satis fallax. Hoc tamen dubium non est, quin, quanto alius alio majorem habet rerum praeteritarum experientiam tanto magis sit Prudens, & ab expectatione sua rarius decipiatur. Praesentia tantùm existunt in rerum natura; Praeterita in Memoria sola; sed ture being but a fiction of the mind, applying the sequels[i] of actions Past, to the actions that are Present; which with most certainty is done by him that has most Experience; but not with [12]certainty enough.[12] And though it be called Prudence, when the Event answereth our Expectation; yet in its own nature, it is but Presumption. For the foresight of things to come, which is Providence, belongs onely to him by whose will they are to come. From him onely, and supernaturally, proceeds Prophecy. The best Prophet °naturally° is the best guesser; and the best guesser, he that is most versed and studied in the matters he guesses at: for he hath most Signes to guesse by.

Prudentia.

23 similis this edn.] similes 68, 70

Signes. A Signe, is the Event Antecedent, of the Consequent; and contrarily, the Consequent of the Antecedent, when the like Consequences have been observed, before: And the oftner they have been observed, the lesse uncertain is the Signe. And therefore he that has most experience in any kind of businesse, has most Signes, whereby to guesse at the Future time; and consequently is the most prudent: And so much more prudent than he that is new in that kind of business, as not to be equalled by him by any advantage of naturall and extemporary wit: though perhaps many young men think the contrary.

Neverthelesse it is not Prudence that distinguisheth man from [11] beast. There be beasts, that at a year old observe more, and pursue that which is for their good, more prudently, than a child can do at ten.

Conjecture of the time past. As Prudence is a Praesumtion of the Future, contracted from the Experience of time Past: So there is a Praesumtion of things Past taken from other things (not future but) past also. For he that hath seen by what courses and degrees, a °flourishing° State hath first come into civil warre, and then to ruine; upon the sight of the ruines of any other State, will guesse, the like warre, and the like courses have been there also. But this conjecture, has the same incertainty °almost° with the conjecture of the Future; °both being grounded onely upon Experience.°

There is no other act of mans mind, that I can remember, naturally planted in him, so, as to need no other thing, to the exercise of it, but to be born a man, and live with the use of his five Senses. Those other Faculties, of which I shall speak by and by, and which seem proper to man onely, are acquired, and encreased by study and industry; [13]and of most men learned by[13] instruction,

16 by him MS] om. H, B 31 it] them MS

[12] complete certainty. [13] having their beginning in

[i] = sequences, orders of succession (OED, 'sequel', n., 5).

Futura omnino non existunt, ut quae nihil aliud sunt, praeter Figmenta animi, consequentias actionis Praeteritae ad actionem Praesentem applicantis; id quod fit maxima certitudine ab eo, cujus maxima est Experientia, quanquam certitudine non plena. Etsi autem quoties Expectationi respondet Eventus vocetur Prudentia, revera tamen Praesumptio tantum est. Praevisio enim rerum futurarum, quae est Providentia, ad illum solum pertinet, cujus consilio futurae sunt. Et ab illo solo, & supernaturaliter, proficiscitur. Alioqui optimus conjector, optimus est Propheta; optimus autem conjector is est, qui maximè versatus est in illis rebus, de quibus conjecturam facit; is enim plura habet conjicienda Signa.

Signum est Antecedenti Eventui Eventus consequens, & contra, consequenti [12] Antecedens, quando similes consequentiae observatae antè fuerint: & quanto saepius observatum est, tanto Signum minus est incertum. Itaque is qui in quolibet genere negotii maximam habet Experientiam, plurima habet Signa quibus possit de futuro tempore conjecturam facere, & per consequens est Prudentissimus; & tanto Prudentior est, quam qui ad Negotium idem novus accedit, ut nulla naturalis & extemporarii ingenii ope hic illi aequari possit, quanquam forte multi sint juvenes, qui hoc concessuri non sint. Signa.

Quod autem inter hominem & brutum differentiam facit essentialem, Prudentia non est. Sunt enim animalia alia quae earum rerum, quae ad finem suum conducunt plura observant & prudentius persequuntur, unicum annum nata, quam puer decennis.

Sicut Prudentia est praesumtio Futuri contracta à Praeteriti temporis Experientia: ita etiam alia est praesumtio quaedam rerum Praeteritarum sumpta à rebus aliis (non Futuris) sed Praeteritis. Nam qui vidit quibus moribus, & gradibus Civitas aliqua inciderit in bellum civile, & quomodo inde profligata fuerit; si viderit alterius cujuscunque Civitatis ruinas, conjecturam faciet, similes mores & bellum simile illic quoque praecessisse. Sed conjectura haec eandem habet incertitudinem, quam conjectura temporis Futuri. Conjectura temporis praeteriti.

Humani animi actus alius nullus est, quod sciam, naturaliter insitus, talis ut ad exercitium ejus nulla alia re indigeat, praeterquam nasci hominem & usum habere quinque ejus Sensuum. Facultates illae, de quibus paulo post sermo erit, quaeque hominis videntur propriè, Acquisitae sunt, & studio industriaque auctae, habentes initium in instructione & disciplina, proand discipline; and proceed all from the invention of Words, and Speech. For besides Sense, and [14]Thoughts,[14] and the Trayne of thoughts, the mind of man has no other motion; though by the help of Speech, and Method, the same Facultyes may be improved to such a height, as to distinguish men from all other living Creatures.

10 conjicienda] conjiciendi 70

Whatsoever we imagine, is Finite. Therefore there is no Idea, or conception [15]of any thing we call Infinite.[15] No man can have in his mind an Image of infinite magnitude; nor conceive infinite swiftness, infinite time, or infinite force, or infinite power. When we say any thing is infinite, we signifie onely, that we are not able to conceive the ends, and bounds of the thing named; having no Conception of the thing, but of our own inability. And therefore the Name of God is used, not to make us conceive him; (for he is Incomprehensible; and his greatnesse, and power are unconceivable;) but that we may honour him. Also because whatsoever (as I said before,) we conceive, has been perceived first by sense, °either all at once, or by parts;° a man can have no thought, representing any thing, not subject to sense. No man therefore can conceive any thing, but he must conceive it in some place; and indued with some determinate magnitude; and which may be divided into parts; nor that any thing is all in this place, and all in another place at the same time; nor that two, or more things can be in one, and the same place at once: For none of these things ever have, or can be incident to Sense; but are absurd speeches, taken upon credit °(without any signification at all,)° from deceived Philosophers, and °deceived, or° deceiving Schoole-men.

6 marg. Obiects of Imagination MS 13 are] all MS 21 or] nor B [14] imagination, [15] that can arise from this word 'infinite'.

cedentesque ab inventione Vocabulorum & sermonis. Nam praeter Sensum & Imaginationem, & Cogitationum Seriem, humano animo nullus alius inest motus; quanquam Sermonis & Ordinis beneficio, eaedem facultates promoveri in tantum possunt, ut per eas homo à caeteris animalibus omnibus distingui possit.

Quicquid imaginamur Finitum est. Nulla ergo est idea neque conceptus qui oriri potest à voce hac, Infinitum. Animus humanus Imaginem infinitae magnitudinis capere non potest; neque concipere infinitam velocitatem, infinitam vim, infinitum tempus, aut infinitam potentiam. Quando dicimus rem aliquam esse Infinitam, hoc tantùm significamus non posse nos illius rei terminos & limites concipere; neque aliud concipere praeter nostram impotentiam propriam. Itaque nomen Dei non usurpatur, ut illum concipiamus (est enim Incomprehensibilis, & magnitudo potentiaque ejus inconceptibilis) [13] sed ut honoremus. Et quoniam quicquid (ut dixi suprà) concipimus, perceptum est, antè in Sensione, nulla inesse homini potest imaginatio rei, quae non sit percipienda Sensibus. Nemo itaque concipere aliquid potest, nisi ut in loco, & finita aliqua magnitudine praeditum, & divisibile in partes; neque aliquid esse totum in uno loco, & totum in altero, tempore eodem; neque duas vel plures res eodem tempore esse posse in eodem loco. Nihil enim horum fuit aut esse potuit in Sensione; sed sunt orationes insignificantes, admissae propter authoritatem quorundam Philosophorum errantium, vel scholasticorum fallentium.

20 fuit aut esse potuit 70] fuere aut esse potuere 68

CHAP. IV.

Of SPEECH.

Originall of Speech.

The Invention of Printing, though ingenious, compared with the invention of Letters, is no great matter. But who was the first that found the use of Letters, is not known. He that first brought them into Greece, men say was Cadmus, the sonne of Agenor, King of Phaenicia.[a] A profitable Invention for continuing the memory of time past, and the conjunction of mankind, dispersed into so many, and distant regions of the Earth; and with all difficult, as proceeding from a watchfull observation of the divers motions of the Tongue, Palat, Lips, and other organs of Speech; whereby to make as many differences of characters, to [1]remember[1] them. But the most noble and profitable invention of all other, was that of SPEECH, consisting of Names or Appellations, and their Connexion; whereby men register their Thoughts; recall them when they are past; and also declare them one to another for mutuall utility and conversation;[b] without which, there had been amongst men, neither Common-wealth, nor Society, nor Contract, nor Peace, no more than amongst Lyons, Bears, and Wolves. The first author of Speech was [2]God himself, that instructed Adam how to name such creatures as he[2] presented to his sight; For the Scripture goeth no further in this matter.[c] But this was sufficient [3]to direct him to adde more names,[3] as the experience and use of the creatures should give him occasion; and to joyn them in such manner by degrees, as to make himself understood; and so by succession of time, so much language might be gotten, as he [4]had found use for;[4] though not so copious, as an Orator or Philosopher has need of. For I do not find any thing in the Scripture, out of which, directly or by consequence can be gathered, that Adam [5]was taught[5] the names of all Figures, Numbers, Measures, Colours, Sounds, [6]Fancies,[6] Relations; much less the names of Words and Speech, as Generall, Speciall, Affirmative, Negative, Interrogative, Optative, Infinitive, all which are usefull; and least of all, of Entity, Intentionality, Quiddity, and other insignificant words of the School.

12 other] others MS 29 Entity,] Essence, Entity, existence, reality, MS 30 insignificant] senselesse MS

---

[1] distinguish [2] Adam, who named such creatures as God
[3] for that time. For in the same way, he was able to impose different names on different things,
[4] needed; [5] imposed [6] thoughts,

CAPVT IV.

De Sermone.

Sermonis origo.

Inventio Artis Typographicae quanquam ingeniosa, collata tamen cum inventione Literarum non magna res est. Literas autem quis invenit ignoratur. Qui primus illas intulit in Graeciam, Cadmum esse ferunt, filium Agenoris Regis Phoeniciae.[a] Excogitatum, ad perpetuationem memoriae temporis praeteriti, & ad conjunctionem generis humani in tot & tam distantibus orbis terrarum regionibus, utilissimum, idemque simul difficilimum, utpote profectum ab observatione diligentissima motuum Linguae, Palati, Labrorum, aliorumque loquendi organorum, ita ut totidem essent characterum differentiae, quibus distinguerentur. Nobilissima autem & omnium utilissima fuit inventio Sermonis, ex Nominibus sive Appellationibus & eorum Connexione consistentis, quibus cogitata hominum conscribi, revocari in memoriam, & ab uno ad alium patefieri possunt, ad eorum conversationem & utilitatem mutuam. Nam absque eo, fuisset inter homines, neque Respublica, neque Societas, neque Pactum, neque Pax magis quam inter Leones, Ursos, & Lupos. Sermonis author primus fuit Adam, qui creaturas, quas ad conspectum ejus adduxit Deus, Nominavit. Hactenus tantum de ea re Scriptura Sacra;[c] sed sufficiebat hoc pro illo tempore. Nam eodem modo rebus aliis alia nomina imponere, prout experientia & creaturarum usus postularet, potuit, eaque paulatim ita connectere, ut intelligeretur; atque hoc modo succedente tempore tanta Sermonis copia acquiri potuit, quanta indigeret; quanquam non tanta, quanta Oratori vel Philosopho opus esset. Non enim invenio in Scripturis Sacris ex quo directè, vel per consequentiam colligi potest, imposuisse [14] Adamum varietati omni Figurarum, Numerorum, Mensurarum, Colorum, Sonorum, Cogitationum, Relationum nomina, multo minus imposuisse illum nomina Nominibus & Orationibus, qualia sunt Generale, Speciale, Affirmativum, Negativum, Interrogativum, Optativum, Infinitivum, quae omnia sunt utilia; minime autem omnium Entitatem, Intentionalitatem, Quidditatem, aliaque posuit verba Scholastica insignificantia.

7–8 distantibus orbis terrarum regionibus 70] distantes orbis terrarum regiones 68
8 utpote 70] & utpote 68 15 fuisset this edn.] non fuisset 68; si fuisset 70
16 Lupos] Lupos vigerent 70 18 tantum] om. 70 24 potest] possit 70

---

[a] Diodorus Siculus, Library of History, III.67; V.57.
[b] = social behaviour (OED, 'conversation', 1–2, 4–6). [c] Gen. 2: 19–20.

But all this language gotten, and augmented by Adam and his posterity, was again lost at the tower of Babel, when by the hand of God, every man was stricken for his rebellion, with an oblivion of his former language.[d] And being hereby forced to disperse themselves into severall parts of the world, it must needs be, that the diversity of Tongues that now is, proceeded by degrees from them, in such manner, as need (the mother of all inventions) taught them; and in tract of time grew every where more copious.

The use of Speech.

The generall use of Speech, is to transferre our Mentall Discourse, into Verbal; or the Trayne of our Thoughts, into a Trayne of Words; and that for two commodities;[e] whereof one is, the Registring [13] of °the Consequences of° our Thoughts; which being apt to slip out of our memory, °and put us to a new labour,° may again be recalled, by such words as they were marked by. So that the first use of names, is to serve for Markes, or Notes of remembrance. Another is, when many use the same words, to signifie (by their connexion and order,) one to another, what they conceive, or think of each matter; and also what they desire, feare, [7]or have any other passion for.[7] And for this use they are called Signes. Speciall uses of Speech are these; First, to Register, what by cogitation, wee find to be the cause of any thing, present or past; and what we find things present or past may produce, or effect: which in summe, is acquiring of Arts. Secondly, to shew to others that knowledge which we have attained; which is, to Counsell, and Teach one another. Thirdly, to make known to others our wills, and purposes, that we may have the mutuall help of one another. Fourthly, to please and delight our selves, and others, by playing with our words, for pleasure or ornament, innocently.

Abuses of Speech.

To these Uses, there are also foure correspondent Abuses. First, when men register their thoughts wrong, by the inconstancy of the signification of their words; by which they register for their conceptions, that which they never conceived; and so deceive themselves. Secondly, when they use words metaphorically; that is, in other sense than that they are ordained for; and thereby deceive others. Thirdly, when by words they declare that to be their will, which is not. Fourthly, when they use them to grieve one another: for seeing nature hath armed [8] living creatures, some with teeth, some with horns, [9]and some[9] with hands, to grieve an enemy, it is but an abuse of Speech, to grieve him with the tongue, unlesse it be one whom wee are obliged to govern; and then it is not to grieve, but to correct and amend.

14 when . . . words,] (when . . . words), MS 17 they are] {their corr. to they be by TH} MS
27 conceptions] conception B 30 when by words] by words, when B

[7] etc. [8] ^ other [9] but man

Veruntamen copia haec omnis sive acquisita, sive aucta ab Adamo & posteris ejus, interiit penitus ad Turrem Babel, quo tempore Deus omnem hominem Sermonis sui, propter rebellionem, oblivione percussit.[d] Itaque dispergere se coactis in diversas mundi partes, necessarium erat, ut Linguarum varietas, quae nunc est, gradatim ab illis processerit, prout necessitas (Inventionum omnium mater) illos docuerat; itaque tractu temporis Lingua unaquaeque in majorem copiam verborum aucta est.

Sermonis usus.

Sermonis usus generalissimus, est conversio Discursus Mentalis in Verbalem, sive Seriei Cogitationum nostrarum in Seriem Verborum, idque ad duos fines, quorum alter est conscriptio cogitatorum; quae cum è memoria elabi apta sint, per verba illa quibus conscribuntur, revocari possint. Primus ergo usus nominum est, ut sint pro Notis ad memoriam. Alter est (postquam multi eundem calluerint Sermonem) ut (ordine & connexione sua) possint alter alteri quid concipiunt & de unaquaque re cogitant; quidque etiam cupiunt, metuunt, &c. significare. Propter hunc usum vocantur Signa. Vsus Sermonis speciales sunt hi, primò quas cogitando rerum praeteritarum vel praesentium causas esse reperimus, vel quae à rebus praesentibus vel praeteritis produci possunt, conscribere; namque hinc oriuntur Artes. Secundò, ut ostendamus aliis scientiam à nobis acquisitam, consulendo & docendo. Tertiò ut patefaciamus alii aliis consilia & voluntates nostras, quo mutuo possimus alius alii auxiliari. Quartò Sermone aliquando uti possumus ad delectationem vel ornamentum innocenter.

Sermonis abusus.

His Vsibus respondent totidem Abusus. Primus est quando homines cogitationes suas, propter inconstantiam significationis verborum suorum, perperam conscribunt; ut quando pro cogitato ponunt id, quod non cogitarant; atque ita seipsos fallunt. Secundus est, quando verbis utuntur metaphoricis, id est alio sensu quam ad quem ordinata sunt; atque ita decipiunt alios. Tertius, quando voluntatem suam eam esse declarant verbis, quae revera non est. Quartus, quando Sermone utuntur ad laedendum proximum. Caetera animalia [15] armavit natura alia dentibus, alia cornibus, hominem autem manibus, ut quando opus est laedant hostem. Sed lingua laedere Sermonis abusus est, nisi quando aliquem regere obligamur. Id vero laedere non est, sed corrigere & emendare.

4 erat] fuit 70 6 docuerat] docuit 70 9 Seriei this edn.] Seriem 68, 70
11 apta sint] possint 70 11 possint] apta sint 70 32 sed] seu 70

[d] Gen. 11: 6–9. [e] = advantages, benefits (OED, 'commodity', 2–3).

The manner how Speech serveth to the remembrance of [10]the consequence of causes and effects,[10] consisteth in the imposing of Names, and the Connexion of them.

Names Proper & Common.

Of Names, some are Proper, and singular to one onely thing; as Peter, Iohn, This man, this Tree: and some are Common to many things; as Man, Horse, Tree; every of which though but one Name, is nevertheless the name of divers particular things; in respect of all which °together,° it is called an Universall; there being nothing in the world Universall but Names; for the things named, are every one of them Individuall and Singular.

Universall.

One Universall name is imposed on many things, for their similitude in some quality, or other accident: And wheras a Proper Name bringeth to mind one thing onely; Universals recall any one of those many.

And of Names Universall, some are of more, and some of lesse extent; the larger comprehending the less large: and some again of equall extent, comprehending each other reciprocally. As for example, the Name Body is of larger signification than the word Man, and comprehendeth it; and the names Man and Rationall, are of equall extent, comprehending mutually one another. But here wee [14] must take notice, that by a Name is not alwayes understood, as in Grammar, one onely Word; but sometimes by circumlocution many words together. For all these words, Hee that [11]in his actions observeth the Lawes of his Country,[11] [f] make but one Name, equivalent to this one word, Just.

By this imposition of Names, some of larger, some of stricter signification, we turn the reckoning of the consequences of things imagined in the mind, into a reckoning of the consequences [12]of[12] Appellations. For example, a man that hath no use of Speech at all, (such, as is born °and remains° perfectly deafe and dumb,) if he set before his eyes a triangle, and by it two right angles, (such as are the corners of a square figure,) he may by meditation compare and find, [13] that the three angles of that triangle, are equall to those two right angles that stand by it. °But if another triangle be shewn him different in shape from the former, he cannot know without a new labour, whether the three angles of that also be equall to the same.° But he that hath

4–5 & Common] om. MS 26 as is . . . remains] as are . . . remayne MS 28 he] om. MS

[10] consequences, [11] observes the decrees of the fathers, the laws and rights, [12] in [13] ^ eventually,

[f] The English alludes to, and the Latin quotes, Horace, Epistulae, I.xvi.41.

Modus quo Sermo inservit memoriae consequentiarum consistit in nominum impositione & connexione.

Nominum alia sunt Propria, significantia rem unam singularem; ut Petrus, Iohannes, hic homo, haec arbor. Alia autem multis rebus sunt Communia; ut Homo, Equus, Arbor; nam unumquodque eorum, etsi unicum sit, multarum tamen rerum particularium nomen est. Respectu autem omnium illorum particularium, vocatur universale. Nihil enim in rerum natura universale est praeter rerum vocabula; nam res nominatae sunt omnes Individuae & Singulares. Nomina Propria, Communia, Vniversalia.

Pluribus rebus nomen Vniversale impositum unicum est, propter alicujus Qualitatis vel Accidentis similitudinem. Itaque ut nomen Proprium revocat ad animum rem unam certam, nomen Vniversale revocat rem ex multis unam quamcunque.

Nominum autem Vniversalium, alia amplioris, alia strictioris significationis sunt, ita ut nomen Amplius, nomen Strictius contineat. Alia rursus sunt amplitudinis aequalis, & comprehendunt se mutuò. Exempli causa, nomen Corpus comprehendit nomen Hominem, & praeterea aliquid; nomina autem Homo & Rationale aequalia sunt, comprehendentia se mutuò. Sed notandum hic est, quod per Nomen non semper intelligimus vocabulum unicum, ut Grammatici, sed aliquando per circumlocutionem multis vocabulis nomen unum; ut verba haec, Qui consulta patrum, qui Leges Iuraque servat[f] unicum nomen est, & nomini Iusto aequivalens.

Per impositionem hanc nominum amplioris & strictioris significationis computationem consequentiarum in cogitationibus, convertimus in computationem consequentiarum in nominibus. Exempli causa, is qui omni Sermonis usu caret (qualis est qui mutus & surdus natus est) si positum ante oculos triangulum viderit, & juxta triangulum duos angulos rectos (quales sunt anguli figurae quadratae) potest tandem meditatione, contemplando comparandoque invenire tres illius trianguli angulos, aequales esse duobus illis angulis rectis juxta positis. Ille autem, qui sermone praeditus est, cum ani-the use of words, when he observes, that such equality was consequent, not to the length of the sides, nor to any other particular thing in his triangle; but onely to this, that the sides were straight, and the angles three; and that that was all, for which he named it a Triangle; will boldly conclude Universally, °that such equality of angles is in all triangles whatsoever; and register his invention in these generall termes,° Every triangle hath its three angles equall to two right angles.[g] And thus the consequence found in one particular, comes to be registred and remembred, as an Universall rule; and discharges our mentall reckoning, of time and place; and delivers us from all labour of the mind, saving the first; and makes that which was found true here, and now, to be true in all times and places.

25 is] om. 70 28 potest tandem this edn.] potest tamen 68; potest 70

But the use of words in registring our thoughts, is in nothing so evident as in Numbring. A naturall foole that could never learn by heart the order of numerall words, as one, two, and three, may observe every stroak of the Clock, and nod to it, or say one, one, one; but can never know what houre it strikes. And it seems, there was a time when those names of number were [14]not[14] in use; and men were [15]fayn[15] to apply their fingers [16]of one or both hands,[16] to those things they desired to keep account of; and that thence it proceeded, that now our numerall words are but ten, in [17] any Nation, and in some but five, and then they begin again. And he that can tell ten, if he recite them out of order, [18]will lose himselfe, and not know when he has done:[18] Much lesse will he be able to adde, and substract, and performe all other operations of Arithmetique. So that without words, there is no possibility of reckoning of Numbers; much lesse of Magnitudes, of Swiftnesse, of Force, and other things, the reckonings whereof are necessary to the being, or well-being of man-kind.

When two Names are joyned together into a Consequence, or Affirmation; as thus, A man is a living creature; or thus, if he be a man, he is a living creature, If the later name Living creature, signifie all that the former name Man signifieth, then the affirmation, or consequence [15] is true; otherwise false. For True and False are attributes of Speech, not of Things. And where Speech is not, there is neither Truth nor Falshood. Errour there may be, as when wee expect that which shall not be; or suspect what has not been: but in neither case can a man be charged with Untruth.

[14] few [15] obliged [16] first of one hand, and then of both, [17] ^ almost [18] is not able to count as far as ten:

[g] Euclid, Elements, I.32.

madverterit aequalitatem illam consequentem esse, non longitudini laterum, neque cuiquam rei speciali in triangulo, sed huic tantùm, quod latera sunt recta, & anguli tres, propter quod figurae nomen inditum est trianguli, Vniversaliter audacterque pronuntiabit, Trianguli angulos [16] tres aequales esse duobus rectis.[g] Atque hoc modo consequentia inventa in re singulari conscribitur ad memoriam, ut regula universalis, computationemque mentalem omni loci & temporis consideratione exonerat; atque animum omni labore liberat praeter primum; facitque ut quod verum inventum est hic & nunc, pro vero omni alio tempore & loco agnoscatur.

Verborum autem usus in cogitationibus conscribendis nusquam ita manifestus est, ut in numeris. Stultus enim naturalis qui ordinem verborum numeralium, unum, duo, tria, &c. memoriter pronuntiare non potest, observare tamen potest singulos ordine ictus horologii, & annuens dicere unum, unum, unum, sed quota hora sonuit scire non potest. Videtur autem fuisse aliquando tempus in quo nomina numeralia pauca extabant, cogebanturque homines, quando numerarent, numeratis digitos, primo unius manus, deinde ambarum applicare; atque inde natum esse, ut verba numeralia in omni ferè gente non excederent denarium; & in aliquibus plura non esse quam quinque, & à quinto eadem repeterent. Etiam is qui decem verba habet numeralia, nisi ordine ea recitet numerare usque ad decem non potest. Multo minus Addere, Substrahere, & caeteras perficere Operationes Arithmeticas. Itaque absque verborum usu Numerorum computatio est impossibilis, multo magis Magnitudinum, graduum velocitatis, virium, aliarumque rerum, quarum computationes ad generis humani necessitatem vel adjumentum necessariae sunt.

Quando duo nomina conjunguntur ut fiat Affirmatio, vel Consequentia, ut cum dicimus, Homo est Animal, vel sic Si est Homo tum est Animal, & nomen posterius Animal significet omnia quae significat prius nomen Homo, Affirmatio illa sive Consequentia Vera est, alioqui Falsa. Nam Verum & Falsum attributa sunt non rerum sed Orationis. Vbi autem Oratio non est, ibi neque Verum est neque Falsum, quanquam Error potest, ut quando expectamus id quod non erit, vel suspicamur quod non fuit; sed Falsi accusari non potest.

2 huic this edn.] hoc 68; ob hoc 70 3 quod] quod etiam 70 7 omni loci] omnis loci 70 16 numeratis digitos this edn.] numerata digitis 68, 70 24–5 necessariae sunt] requiruntur 70 31 potest] possit 70

[19]Necessity[19] of Definitions.

Seeing then that truth consisteth in the right ordering of names in our affirmations, a man that seeketh precise truth, had need to remember what every name he uses stands for; and to place it accordingly; or else he will find himselfe entangled in words, as a bird in lime-twiggs; the more he struggles, the more belimed. And therefore in Geometry, (which is [20] the onely Science that it hath pleased God hitherto to bestow on mankind,) men begin at settling the significations of [21]their words;[21] which settling of significations, they call Definitions; and place them in the beginning of their reckoning.

By this it appears how necessary it is for any man that aspires to true Knowledge, to examine the Definitions of former Authors; and either to correct them, where they are negligently set down; or to make [22]them[22] himselfe. For the errours of Definitions multiply themselves, according as the reckoning [23] proceeds; and lead men into absurdities, which at last they see, but cannot avoyd, without reckoning anew from the beginning; in which lyes the foundation of their errours. From whence it happens, that they which trust to [24]books,[24] do as they that cast up many little summs into a greater, without considering whether those little summes were rightly cast up or not; and at last finding the errour visible, and not mistrusting their [25] first grounds, know not which way to cleere themselves; but spend time in fluttering over their bookes; as birds that entring by the chimney, and finding themselves inclosed in a chamber, flutter at the false light of a glasse window, [26]for want of wit to consider which way they came in.[26] So that in the right Definition of Names, lyes the first use of Speech; which is the Acquisition of Science: And in wrong, or no Definitions, lyes the first abuse; from which proceed all false and senslesse Tenets[27]; which make those men that take their instruction from the authority of books, and not from their own meditation, to be as much below the condition of ignorant men, as men endued with true Science are above it. For between true Science, and erroneous Doctrines, Ignorance is in the middle. Naturall sense and imagination, are not subject to absurdity. Nature it selfe cannot erre: and as men abound in copiousnesse of language; so they become more wise, or more [28]mad[28] than ordinary. Nor is it possible without Letters for any man to become either excellently wise, or (unless his

8 them] om. MS 17 those] these MS 19 fluttering] flattering B
19–20 spend time . . . over their] ly fluttering in MS 20 finding themselves] om. MS
21 flutter] lye fluttering MS 26 meditation] mediation B

---

[19] Use [20] ^ almost [21] the words which they are going to use; [22] new ones
[23] ^ in each science [24] other authors too much, [25] ^ masters'
[26] having forgotten which way they came in, and labour in vain. [27] ^ of the philosophers
[28] foolish

Definitionum usus.

Quoniam ergo in ordinatione recta nominum quando aliquid affirmamus consistit Veritas, is qui Veritatem accuratam quaerit, meminisse debet, quid in quoque loco unumquodque Nomen valet, & nomina, quibus utitur, rectè collocare. Alioqui enim impeditum se inveniet verborum tricis, sicut avicula inviscata, quae quanto magis liberare se certat, tanto magis inviscatur. Itaque in Geometria, quae sola fere est Scientia accurata, incipere Magistri solent à constitutione significationum Nominum quibus usuri sunt, id est à Definitionibus, & in principio operis illas collocare. [17]

Atque hinc apparet, quam sit illi opus qui ad Scientiam veram tendit, Authorum Antiquiorum Definitiones examinare, negligentiusque scriptas corrigere, vel sibi ipsi novas constituere. Prout enim in unaquaque Scientia procedit computatio, multiplicantur etiam, qui in Definitionibus sunt Errores; unde paulatim ducuntur lectores in conclusiones absurdas; quas etsi tandem videant, extricare tamen se non possunt, nisi denuo ab initio computare incipiant, in quo initio eorum errores fundati erant. Illi ergo qui Authoribus aliis nimium credunt, idem faciunt, quod qui multas summas minores in majorem colligunt, summulis illis non antè rectè examinatis, & perspecto tandem errore, nec suspectis Magistrorum Principiis, expedire se non possunt; sed tempus consumunt librorum folia motitantes, quemadmodum faciunt aviculae, quae postquam in cubiculum aliquod intraverint per caminum, inclusasque se viderint, ad fenestrae vitreae lumen falsum, motitando alas, oblitae qua via ingressae sint, laborant frustra. Primus ergo Sermonis usus, quae acquisitio est Scientiarum, consistit in recta nominum Definitione, primusque abusus in Definitione falsa vel nulla; atque inde procedunt falsae & absurdae Philosophorum Opiniones, quae illos qui instructionem non à propria meditatione, sed ab Authoritate librorum accipiunt, tanto hominum ignorantium conditione inferiores reddunt, quanto homines vera Scientia praediti, eâdem conditione superiores sunt. Nam inter veram Scientiam, & doctrinam erroneam, ignorantia in medio est. Sensus & Imaginatio naturales absurditatibus obnoxiae non sunt. Natura ipsa errare non potest. Quanto autem quis Sermonis copia abundat magis, tanto aut sapientior vel stultior est quam vulgus. Neque sine literis fieri solent homines insigniter sapientes, neque (nisi cui forte morbo vel prava constitutione Organorum animus lae-

15 Illi 70] Illis 68 22 oblitae this edn.] obliti 68, 70 26–7 hominum ignorantium] ignorantes hominum 70

[29]memory[29] be hurt by disease, or ill constitution of organs) excellently foolish. For words are wise mens counters, they do but reckon by them: but they are the mony of fooles, that value them by the [30]authority of an Aristotle, a Cicero, or a Thomas,[30 h] or any other Doctor whatsoever, if but a man.

[31]Subject to Names.[31]

[32]Subject to Names,[32] is whatsoever can [33]enter into,[33] or be considered in an account; and be added one to another to make a summe; or substracted one from another, °and leave a remainder.° The Latines called [16] Accounts of mony Rationes, and accounting, Ratiocinatio: and that which we in bills or books of account call Items, they called Nomina; that is, Names: and thence °it seems to proceed, that° they extended the word Ratio, to the faculty of Reckoning in °all° other things. The Greeks have but one word λόγος, for both Speech and Reason; not that they thought there was no Speech without Reason; but no Reasoning without Speech: And the act of reasoning they called Syllogisme; which signifieth [34]summing up of the consequences[34] of one saying to another. And because the same things may enter into account for divers accidents; their names are (to shew that diversity) diversly wrested, and diversified. This diversity of names may be reduced to foure generall heads.

First, a thing may enter into account for Matter, or Body; as living, sensible, rationall, hot, cold, moved, quiet; with all which names the word Matter, or Body is understood; °all such, being names of Matter.°

Secondly, it may enter into account, °or be considered,° for some accident or quality, which we conceive to be in it; as for being moved, for being so long, for being hot, &c; and then, [35]of the name of the thing it selfe, by a little change or wresting, wee make a name for that accident, which we consider;[35] and for living put into the account life; for moved [36], motion; for hot, heat; for long, length, and the like: And all such Names, are the names [37] of the accidents and properties, by which one Matter, and Body is distinguished from another. These are called names Abstract; because severed (not from Matter, but) from the account of Matter.

Thirdly, we bring into account, the Properties [38]of our own bodies, whereby we make such distinction:[38] as when any thing is Seen by us, we reckon not [39] the thing it selfe; but the sight, the Colour, the Idea [40]of it in the fancy:[40] and when any thing is heard, wee reckon it not; but the hearing, or sound onely, [41]which is our fancy or conception of it by the Eare: and such are names of fancies.[41]

5 be] om. MS 6 be added . . . or substracted] added . . . or be substracted MS
9 it] om. MS 15 things] thing B 20 being] are MS

[29] mind [30] stamp of some famous name, such as Aristotle, or Cicero, or Aquinas, [31] A named thing. [32] A named thing [33] be thought, [34] joining together the consequence sus sit) insigniter stulti. Vocabula enim sapientium quidem calculi sunt quibus computant; stultorum autem Nummi, aestimati impressione alicujus nominis celebris ut Aristotelis, vel Ciceronis, vel Aquinatis, alîusve Doctoris cujuscunque humani.

Res nominata.

Res Nominata est, quaecunque cogitari vel in ratiocinatione considerari potest, sive alteri addi ad conficiendam summam, vel alteri substrahi. Latini Rationes vocant libellos pecuniae computatae, & Computationem ipsam ratiocinationem, & id quod nos in rationibus appellamus Item, illi Nomen vocant. Atque inde vox Ratio extensa est ad facultatem Computandi in rebus caeteris. Graecis vocabulum unum λόγος significat & Sermonem & Rationem; non eò, quod putarent, nullum esse Sermonem sine Ratione, sed nullam Rationem sine [18] Sermone. Actum autem Ratiocinandi dixerunt Syllogismum, quae vox significat consequentiae Dicti unius ad alterum conjunctionem. Sed quia eaedem res in Rationes inferuntur propter diversa accidentia, earum Nomina (ad diversitatem illam significandam) diversimodò variari & torqueri solent. Diversitas autem Nominum ad quatuor capita generalia reduci potest.

Primò, res aliqua in Rationes ingredi potest ut Materia, sive Corpus, sub nomine viventis, sensibilis, rationalis, calidi, frigidi, moti, quiescentis, quae Nomina significant Materiam, sive Corpus.

Secundò, res aliqua intrare in Rationes potest propter accidens vel qualitatem, quam illi rei inesse cogitamus; ut quia movetur, vel quantitatem habet, vel quia calet, &c. tum vero nomen ipsius rei mutamus aliquantulum, & loco viventis ponimus vitam; loco moti corporis ponimus motum; loco calidi, calorem; loco longi, longitudinem & similiter in caeteris. Quo facto nomina illa non sunt nomina Materiae sive Corporis, sed Accidentium & Proprietatum quibus Corpus à Corpore distinguitur. Appellantur autem hujusmodi nomina Abstracta, non quod abstrahantur à Materia, sed à Materiae Computatione.

Tertiò, in Rationes inferimus proprietates illas quibus ipsi res distinguimus: sicut quando videmus, aliquid, non Computamus semper rem visam, sed visionem, colorem sive Ideam, sive rei visae Phantasma: similiter quando audimus, pro re ipsa quae sonum facit, sonum sive auditionem tantum consideramus. Et sic de caeteris Phantasmatibus.

1 stulti 70] stultus 68 3 nominis celebris this edn.] nomine celebri 68, 70
28 ipsi] ipsis 70 30 sive rei] reique 70

35 we make a little change in the name of the thing itself; 36 ^ body 37 ^ , not of the matter or body, but 38 by means of which we ourselves distinguish things: 39 ^ always 40 , or the fancy of the thing seen: 41 and likewise in the case of the other fancies.

h Aquinas.

Fourthly, we [42]bring into account, consider, and give names, to Names themselves, and to[42] Speeches: For, generall, universall, speciall, [43] aequivocall, are names of Names. And Affirmation, Interrogation, Commandement, Narration, Syllogisme, °Sermon,° Oration, and many other such, are names of Speeches. And this is all the variety of Names Positive; which are put to mark somewhat which is in Nature, or may be feigned by the mind of man, as Bodies that are, or may [44]be conceived[44] to be; or of bodies, the Properties that are, or may [45]be feigned[45] to be; or Words and Speech.

°Use of° Names Positive.

There be also other Names, called Negative; which are notes to signifie that a word is not the name of the thing in question; as these words Nothing, no man, infinite, indocible, three want foure,[i] and the like; which are nevertheless of use in reckoning, [46]or in correcting of reckoning; and call to mind our past cogitations,[46] though they be not names of any thing; because they make us refuse to admit of Names not rightly [47] used.

Negative Names °with their Vses.°

All other Names, are but insignificant sounds; and those of two [17] sorts. One, when they are new, and yet their meaning not explained by Definition; [48]whereof there have been aboundance[48] coyned by Schoole-men, and pusled Philosophers.

Words insignificant.

Another, when men make a name of two Names, whose significations are contradictory and inconsistent; as this name, an incorporeall body, or (which is all one) an incorporeall substance, and a great number more. For whensoever any affirmation is false, the two names of which it is composed, put together and made one, signifie nothing at all. For example, if it be a false affirmation to say a quadrangle is round, the word round quadrangle signifies nothing; but is a meere sound. So likewise if it be false, to say that vertue can be powred, or blown up and down; the words In-powred vertue,[j] In-blown vertue, are [49]as absurd and insignificant, as a round quadrangle.[49] And therefore you shall hardly meet with a senslesse and insignificant word, that is not made up of [50]some Latin or Greek names. A Frenchman seldome hears our Saviour called by the name of Parole, but by the name of Verbe often; yet Verbe and Parole differ no more, but that one is Latin, the other French.[50]

5–6 marg. om. MS 8 Words] of words MS 9 There be also other] 5. There be other MS 12 reckoning;] {reckoninge corr. to reckoninges by TH} MS 13 though . . . thing;] (though . . . thing); MS 23 signifie . . . all] is senselesse, and signifyes nothing MS 29 seldome] {neuer corr. to seldome by TH} MS

[42] sometimes bring into account the names of names themselves and of [43] ^ univocal, [44] appear [45] appear [46] either in correcting or in recalling, [47] ^ imposed or [48] such as have been [49] insignificant.
[50] names that cannot be understood by the common people.

Quartò, in Rationes inferimus quandoque nomina ipsorum nominum & Sermonum, dicentes, generale, universale, speciale, univocum, aequivocum, quae sunt Nomina Nominum. Item affirmationem, interrogationem, praeceptum, narrationem, syllogismum, orationem, aliaque ejusmodi multa, quae sunt nomina Orationum. Atque haec varietas omnis est nominum Positivorum significantium aliquid eorum quae sunt in natura rerum, vel eorum quae animo possunt fingi, ut corpora quae sunt vel esse videri possunt, vel ut proprietates corporum quae sunt vel esse videri possunt; vel Verba & Sermones.

Nomina Positiva.

Sunt & alia Nomina, Negativa, quae significant, nomen aliquod, nomen rei propositae non esse, qualia sunt Nihil, Nemo, Infinitum, Indocile, tria minus quatuor, & similia quae tamen in Rationibus usum suum habent, vel in corrigendo vel revocando; quia faciunt ut nomina non rectè imposita vel usurpata recusemus.

Nomina Negativa.

Caetera Nomina omnia soni sunt sine significatione; & duorum [19] generum. Alterum, quae nova sunt nec tamen Definitione explicata; qualia à laborantibus Philosophis & Scholasticis excogitata sunt.

Nomina Insignificantia.

Alterum est quando Nomen aliquod à duobus nominibus componitur, quorum significationes sunt inconsistentes; ut nomen hoc, corpus incorporeum, (vel quod idem est) substantia incorporea; aliaque similia. Quandocunque enim affirmatio aliqua falsa est, ex duobus nominibus quibus constat si fiat nomen unum, illud erit insignificans; exempli causa si falsum sit dicere quadratum est rotundum, nomen illud quadratum rotundum sonus merus est, nihil significans. Similiter si falsum sit dicere virtutem fundi vel flari posse, verba haec infusa virtus, inflata virtus, nomina sunt insignificantia. Itaque in verbum absurdum & insignificans non facile inciditur quod non compositum sit à nominibus quae intelligi à vulgo hominum non possunt.

5 haec 70] hac 68 7 ut om. 70 26 sit à] sit ex 70

[i] = three wanting four, sc. three minus four.

[j] 'Virtus infusa', 'infused virtue', was a term used by Aquinas for virtue supernaturally induced in man by God, as opposed to 'virtus acquisita', '[naturally] acquired virtue' (ST Ia IIae, qu. 55, resp., and qu. 63, ad 4).

Understanding.

When [51]a man upon the hearing of any Speech, hath those thoughts which the words of that Speech, and their connexion, were ordained and constituted to signifie; Then he[51] is said to understand it: Understanding being nothing else, but conception caused by Speech. And therefore if Speech be peculiar to man (as for ought I know it is,) then is Understanding peculiar to him also. And therefore of °absurd and° false affirmations, in case[k] they be universall, there can be no Understanding; though many think they understand, then, when they do but repeat the words softly, or con them in their mind.

What kinds of Speeches signifie the Appetites, Aversions, and Passions of mans mind; and of their use and abuse, I shall speak when I have spoken of the Passions.

°Inconstant names.°

The names of such things as [52]affect us, that is, which please, and displease[52] us, because all men be not alike [53]affected[53] with the same thing, nor the same man at all times, are °in the common discourses of men,° of inconstant signification. For seeing all names are imposed to signifie our conceptions; and all our affections are but conceptions; when we conceive the same things differently, we can hardly avoyd different naming of them. For though the nature of that we conceive, be the same; yet the diversity of our reception of it, in respect of different constitutions of body, and prejudices of opinion, gives every thing a tincture of our different passions. And therefore in reasoning, a man must take heed [54]of words; which besides the signification of what we imagine of their nature, have[54] a signification also of the nature, disposition, and interest of the speaker; such as are the names of Vertues, and Vices; For one man calleth [55]Wisdome,[55] what another calleth feare; and one cruelty, what another justice; one prodigality, what another magnanimity;[l] and one gravity, what another stupidity,[m] &c. And therefore such names can never be true grounds of any ratiocination. No more can Metaphors, and Tropes of speech: but these are less dangerous, because they profess their inconstancy; °which the other do not.°

12 as] w^ch MS

[51] the thought of some thing arises from hearing a suitably ordered speech, the hearer
[52] please [53] pleased [54] lest he admit, besides the signification of the thing itself,
[55] prudence,

Intellectus.

Quando cogitatio alicujus rei oritur à sermone audito, & ut oportuit ordinato, tunc qui audit, verba illa dicitur Intelligere; Intellectus enim aliud non est praeter conceptum natum à Sermone. Itaque si sermo homini peculiaris sit (ut videtur esse) etiam homini soli proprius Intellectus est. Vnde sequitur Affirmationes falsas, easdemque universales intelligi non posse; quanquam nonnulli sunt qui putant se intelligere tunc quando verba audita tacitè apud se animo recitant.

Quae orationum genera significant Appetitum, Aversionem, caeterasque animi humani Passiones; quisque sit eorum usus & abusus tunc dicam, quando dicam de Passionibus.

Nomina rerum quae placent, quia non omnibus similiter placent res eaedem, neque eidem homini, idem omni tempore, inconstantis sunt significationis.

Cum enim nomina omnia ad conceptus significandos imposita fuerint, necesse est cum easdem res non similiter sentiamus, ut easdem etiam saepenumero dissimiliter nominemus. Etsi rei conceptae natura non mutetur, diversitas tamen receptionis (orta à diversitate naturarum individuarum, & à praejudiciis Opinionum) facit ut unusquisque nomina illis imponat propria sua affectione aliquatenus tincta. Quamobrem in omni ratiocinatione cautela opus est, ne praeter significationem ipsius rei, admittamus etiam aliquid de natura ingenio & affectibus hominis qui loquitur. Nomina autem hujusmodi plerumque sunt Virtutum & Vitiorum nomina. Nam quam alius Prudentiam, alius vocat Metum; quam alius Crudelitatem, alius vocat Iustitiam; quam hic Proluvium ille Magnificentiam appellat; quae huic Gravitas alteri videtur Stupor, &c. Itaque ex hujusmodi nominibus [20] Principia ratiocinandi constitui non possunt. Neque ex Metaphoris, aliisque orationis tropis. Sed minus sunt haec periculosa, quia inconstantiam suam profitentur.

8 significant {see Register of Literal Faults}] significent 70 14 fuerint] sint 70 16 Etsi] Etsi verò 70 17 orta this edn.] ortae 68, 70

[k] =in the event that, if (OED, 'case', n.[1], 10).
[l] = liberality (see the definition of liberality in Ch. 6, p. 86).
[m] = incapacity for emotion, insensibility to pain or sorrow (OED, 'stupidity', 3).

[18]

CHAP. V.

Of REASON, and SCIENCE.

Reason °what it is.°

When a man Reasoneth, hee does nothing else but conceive a summe totall, from Addition of parcels; or conceive a Remainder, from Substraction of one [1]summe[1] from another: which (if it be done by Words,) is conceiving of the consequence from the [2]names of all the parts,[2] to the name of the whole; or from the names of the whole and one part, to the name of the other part. And though in some things, (as in numbers,) besides Adding and Substracting, [3]men name[3] other operations, as Multiplying and Dividing; yet they are the same; for Multiplication, is but Adding together of things equall; and Division, but Substracting of one thing, as often as we can. These operations are not incident to Numbers onely, but to all manner of things that can be added together, and taken one out of another. For as Arithmeticians teach to adde and substract in numbers; so the Geometricians teach the same in lines, figures °(solid and superficiall,)° angles, proportions, times, degrees of swiftnesse, force, power, and the like; The Logicians teach the same in Consequences of words; adding together two Names, to make an Affirmation; and two Affirmations, to make a Syllogisme; and many Syllogismes to make a Demonstration; and from the summe, or Conclusion of a Syllogisme, they substract one Proposition, to finde the other. Writers of Politiques, adde together Pactions, to find mens duties; and Lawyers, Lawes, and facts,[a] to find what is right and wrong in the actions of private men. In summe, in what matter soever there is place for addition and substraction, there also is place for Reason; and where these have no place, there Reason has nothing at all to do.

°Reason defined.°

Out of all which we may define, (that is to say determine,) what that is, which is meant by this word Reason, when wee reckon it amongst the Faculties of the mind. For REASON, in this sense, is nothing but Reckoning (that is, Adding and Substracting) of °the Consequences of° generall names agreed upon, for the marking and signifying of our thoughts; I say marking them, when we reckon by our selves; and signifying, when we demonstrate, °or approve° our reckonings to other men.

7 from this edn.; {of corr. to from by TH} MS] of H, B 25–6 marg. om. MS

[1] part [2] name of the part [3] there are

[a] = actions, deeds; possibly also with the connotation 'evil deeds, crimes' (OED, 'fact', n., 1.a, 1.c).

CAPVT V.

De Ratione & Scientia.

Qui ratiocinatur, vel Totum quaerit Additione partium; vel Residuum, Subtractione partis à parte: id quod (si verbis fiat) nihil aliud est, praeter Conceptionem consequentiae Nominis partis ad Nomen totius, vel Nominum totius & partis ad Nomen partis reliquae. Quanquam autem in rebus quibusdam (ut in numeris) aliae sint operationes, praeter Additionem & Subtractionem, ut Multiplicatio & Divisio, in idem tamen recidunt; nam Multiplicatio est aequalium inter se Additio; & Divisio aliud non est, quam ejusdem rei, quoties possumus, Subtractio. Neque Numeris solis operationes illae conveniunt, sed omni rerum generi, quarum una alteri addi vel auferri potest. Sicut enim Arithmetici Addere & Subtrahere solent in Numeris; ita Geometrae facere idem docent in Lineis, Figuris, Angulis, Proportionibus, Temporibus, Gradibus velocitatis, Virium, Potentiae, & caeteris. Idem etiam Logici faciunt in consequentiis verborum, Addentes duo nomina ad faciendam propositionem, & duas propositiones ad faciendum Syllogismum, & plures Syllogismos ad faciendam Demonstrationem; & à summa sive conclusione Syllogismi subtrahunt unam propositionem, ad inveniendam alteram. Etiam Scriptores Politici addunt simul plura pacta, ad inveniendum hominis Officium; & Iuris Consulti addunt simul Leges & Facta ad inveniendum, quid sit in actionibus hominum privatorum Ius & Injuria. Vbicunque locus est Additioni, & Subtractioni, ibi etiam locus est Rationi; & ubi illis locus non est, ibi neque rationi locus est. Ratio.

Ex iis quae dicta sunt Rationem Definire, id est vocis ejus quatenus sumitur pro Facultate animi, significationem determinare possumus. Ratio enim, hoc sensu, nihil aliud est, praeter Computationem sive Additionem & Subtractionem Nominum generalium, quae ad notationem sive significationem cogitationum nostrarum recipiuntur. Notationem, inquam, quando computamus soli; significationem, quando aliis computationem nostram Demonstramus.

22 illis] illi 70

Right Reason °where.°

And as in Arithmetique, unpractised men [4]must,[4] and Professors themselves [5]may often erre, and[5] cast up false; so also in any other subject of Reasoning, the ablest, most attentive, and most practised men, may deceive themselves, and inferre false Conclusions; Not but that Reason it selfe is alwayes Right Reason, as well as Arithmetique is a certain and infallible Art: But no one mans Reason, nor the Reason of any one number of men, makes the certaintie; no more than an [6] account is therefore well cast up, because a great many men have unanimously approved it. And therfore, as when there is a controversy in [19] an account, the parties must by their own accord, set up for right Reason, the Reason of some Arbitrator, or Judge, to whose sentence they will both stand, or their controversie must either come to blowes, or be undecided, for want of a right Reason constituted by Nature; so is it also in all debates of what kind soever: And when [7] men that think themselves wiser than all others, clamor and demand right Reason for judge; yet seek no more, but that things should be determined, by no other mens reason but their own, it is as intolerable in the society of men, as it is in play °after trump is turned,° to use for trump °on every occasion,° that suite whereof they have most in their hand. For they do nothing els, that will have every of their passions, as it comes to bear sway in them, to be taken for right Reason, and that in their own controversies: bewraying[b] their want of right Reason, by the claym they lay to it.

The use of Reason.

The Use and End of Reason, is not the finding of °the summe, and truth of° one, or a few consequences, remote from the first definitions, °and settled significations° of names; but [8]to begin at these; and proceed from one consequence[8] to another. For there can be no certainty of the last Conclusion, without a certainty of all those Affirmations and Negations, on which it was grounded, and inferred. As when a master of a family, in [9]taking an account,[9] casteth up the summs of all the bills of expence, into one sum; and not regarding how each bill is summed up, by those that give them in account; °nor what it is he payes for;° he advantages himself no more, than if he [10]allowed the account in grosse, trusting to every of the accountants[10] skill and honesty: so also in Reasoning of all other things, he that takes up conclusions on the trust of Authors, and doth not fetch them [11]from the first Items in every Reckoning, (which are the significations of names settled by definitions),[11] loses his labour; and does not know any thing; but onely beleeveth.

12 is it] om. MS 13 And] om. MS 14 clamor] vse to clamor MS 14 yet] they MS
16 it is as] w^ch^ is as MS 28 casteth] should cast MS 28–9 regarding] regard MS
30 what] {for del. by TH} what MS 30 allowed] had allowed MS
32–3 he that takes . . . doth] they that take . . . do MS 35 onely beleeveth.] belieue only MS

Recta Ratio.

Sicut autem in Arithmetica imperiti saepe et Professores aliquando falsò computant; ita etiam in Rationibus aliarum rerum, peritissimi, [21] versatissimi attentissimique falli possunt, & falsas inferre Conclusiones; non quod Ratio non sit ipsa semper Recta Ratio, aequè, ut Arithmetica certa est Ars, sed quod nullius unius Ratio, neque verò plurium, faciat certitudinem, magis quam Computatio aliqua recta numerorum rectè facta est, ideo quia consensu multorum est approbata. Quoties igitur in computatione sive Ratiocinatione oritur controversia, illi quibus controversia est, pro recta Ratione, Arbitri alicujus vel Iudicis Rationem constituere debent voluntariè; qua uterque obligandus sit; alioqui controversia eorum aut non omnino, aut armis dijudicanda est, defectu rectae Rationis à natura constitutae. Idem contingit in omni genere certaminis. Quando enim homines arrogantes sapientiores se caeteris omnibus esse credunt, clamantesque pro Iudice rectam Rationem postulant, nihil aliud quaerunt, quam ut res suâ ipsorum Ratione judicetur; id quod in Societate humana intolerabile aequè est, ac si quis ludens cartis pro carta dominante uti vellet ea, cujus haberet ipse maximum numerum. Quid enim aliud faciunt, qui suas quasque dominantes passiones pro recta Ratione valere certant, etiam in suis ipsorum litibus, defectum rectae Rationis ipsa postulatione ostendentes.

Rationis usus.

Vsus Scopusque Rationis non est unius vel paucarum consequentiarum, à primis nominum Definitionibus remotarum, inventio. Ratio à primis incipit Definitionibus, inde ad plurium Definitionum consequentiam aliquam procedit, & inde ad aliam. Nam conclusionis ultimae certitudo nulla est sine certitudine Affirmationum & Negationum à quibus composita & illata est. Sicut enim Pater familias Villici sui Rationes inspiciens, summularum singulorum generum summas in unam totalem colligat, nec an illae summulae rectè confectae ab iis sint, qui Rationem reddituri sunt, examinat, nihilo plus proficit, quam si peritiae probitatique villici sui fidens, Rationes omnino non requireret. Eodem modo in Rationibus quarumcunque rerum qui illas admittit authorum aliorum fide, nec à nominibus singulis ipse deducit, ille operam ludit, nil sciens, sed tantum credens.

1 saepe et this edn.] saepe 68, 70 1 marg. one para. earlier in 70 5 unius] om. 70
16 ea, cujus haberet ipse] ejus sortis, cujus ipse haberet 70 25 enim] enim si 70
27 ab iis sint, qui Rationem reddituri sunt, examinat] ab eo sint, qui Rationem reddit, examinet 70

---

[4] often, [5] sometimes [6] ^ accurate [7] ^ arrogant [8] reason begins from first definitions, then proceeds to some consequence of several definitions, and then [9] inspecting his steward's accounts, [10] did not require accounts at all, trusting to his steward's [11] himself from the individual names,

---

[b] = exposing, revealing (OED, 'bewray', v., 3–6).

Of Error and Absurdity.

When a man reckons without the use of words, which may be done in [12]particular things,[12] (as when upon the sight of any one thing, wee conjecture what was likely to have preceded, or is likely to follow upon it;) if that which he thought likely to follow, followes not; or that which he thought likely to have preceded it, hath not preceded it, this is called ERROR[13]; to which even the most prudent men are subject. But when we Reason in Words of generall signification, and fall upon a generall inference which is false; though it be commonly called Error, it is indeed an ABSURDITY, or senslesse Speech. For Error is but a deception, in presuming that somewhat is past, or to come; of which, though it were not [14]past, or not to come; yet there was no impossibility discoverable.[14] But when we make a generall assertion, unlesse it be a true one, °the possibility of° it is unconceivable. And words whereby we conceive nothing but the sound, are those we call Absurd, Insignificant, and Non-sense. And therefore if a man should talk to me of a round Quadrangle; or °accidents of Bread in Cheese; or° Immateriall Substances; or of A free Subject; °A free-Will; or any Free, but free from being hindred by opposition,° I should not say he were in an Errour; but that his words were without meaning; that is to say, Absurd. [20]

I have said before, °(in the second chapter,)° that a Man did excell all other Animals in this faculty, that when he conceived any thing whatsoever, he was apt to enquire the consequences of it, and [15]what effects he could do with[15] it.[d] And now I adde this other degree of the same excellence, that he can by [16]words reduce the consequences he findes to[16] generall Rules, called Theoremes, or Aphorismes; that is, he can Reason, or reckon, not onely in numbers; but in all other things, whereof one may be added unto, or substracted from another.

But this priviledge, is allayed[e] by another; and that is, by the priviledge of Absurdity; to which no living creature is subject, but man onely. And of men, those are of all most subject to it, that professe Philosophy. For it is most true that Cicero sayth of them somewhere; that there can be nothing so absurd, but may be found in the books of Philosophers.[f] And the reason is manifest. For there is not one of them that begins his ratiocination from the Definitions, or Explications of the names they are to use; which is a method that hath been used onely in Geometry; °whose Conclusions have thereby been made indisputable.°

3 preceded] proceded B 5 preceded it, hath not preceded] proceded it, hath not proceded B
15 or of] om. MS 24 numbers MS] number H, B 28 man] men B
30 be nothing] nothing be MS

Error & Absurdum.

Quando aliquis Ratiocinatur sine usu verborum, quod fieri potest in nominibus[c] Individuis (ut quando rem aliquam videntes conjicimus, quid praecessisse, vel secuturum esse verisimile sit,) si id quod verisimile est neque praecessit neque sequitur, id in Ratiocinante appellatur Error. Errori autem obnoxii sunt homines etiam prudentissimi. Sed quando in verbis ratiocinamur Vniversalibus, si incidamus in conclusionem universalem eamque falsam, etsi vulgo Error appelletur, revera tamen est absurditas, id est oratio insignificans. Est [22] enim Error deceptio praesumentis tantum de Praeterito vel Futuro, quae etsi vera non erat, non tamen visa est impossibilis. Verum quando Conclusio universalis est, nisi & vera sit, conceptibilis non est. Verba autem quibus nihil concipimus praeter sonum, insignificantia dici solent & absurda; qualia sunt, quadratum est rotundum; substantiae sunt immateriales; subditus est liber, quod si quem ita loquentem sentirem, non illum Errasse, sed Absurde locutum esse dicerem.

Hominem caeteris animalibus praestare dixi ante, eo quod cum de re quacunque cogitaverit, in ejus rei consequentias inquirere & quomodo ea re uti potest, aptus natus sit;[d] ejusdem praestantiae gradum alium hic addo, quod per consequentias verborum reperire potest Regulas Generales, quae Theoremata, & Aphorismi vocari solent, id est computare potest non solùm in Numeris, sed etiam in Rebus aliis omnibus, quarum una alteri Addi, vel Auferri potest.

Sed privilegium hoc ab alio quodam temperatur. Solius enim Hominis privilegium est absurditas, cui alia creatura nulla est obnoxia. Hominum autem maximè obnoxii sunt illi qui vocari solent Philosophi. Id enim dictum est à Cicerone verissimè, nihil tam esse posse absurdum, quin inveniri possit in Libris Philosophorum.[f] Cujus rei Ratio manifesta est. Eorum enim nemo est, qui Ratiocinationes suas à Definitionibus ordiatur, sive Explicationibus nominum, quibus usuri sunt. Methodus enim haec Geometrarum peculiaris est.

8 insignificans] significans 70 16–17 inquirere & quomodo . . . uti potest,] & quomodo . . . uti possit, inquirere 70 28 enim] om. 70

12 individual names,[c] 13 ^ in the reasoner 14 true, yet it did not seem impossible.
15 how he could use 16 the consequences of words find

[c] 'nominibus' ('names') makes little sense here; this may be an error for 'rebus' ('things').
[d] See above, Ch. 3 (not Ch. 2, as stated incorrectly here in the English), pp. 40–43.
[e] = debased, contaminated (OED, 'allay', *v.*², 5). [f] Cicero, De divinatione, II.58.

°Causes of absurditie.°

1. The °first° cause of Absurd conclusions I ascribe to the want of Method; in that they begin not their Ratiocination from Definitions; °that is, from settled significations of their words:° as if they could cast account, without knowing the value of the numerall words, [17]one, two, and three.[17]

And whereas all bodies enter into account upon divers considerations, (which I have mentioned in the precedent chapter;) [18]these considerations being diversly named, divers absurdities proceed from the confusion, and[18] unfit connexion of their names into assertions. And therefore [19]2.[19] The [20]second[20] cause of Absurd assertions, I ascribe to the giving of names of bodies, to accidents; or of accidents, to bodies; As they do, that say, Faith is infused,[g] or inspired; when nothing can be powred, or breathed into any thing, but body; and that, extension is body;[h] that phantasmes are spirits, &c.

3. The third I ascribe to the giving of the names of the accidents of bodies without us, to the accidents of our own bodies; as they do that say, the colour is in the body; the sound is in the ayre, &c.

4. The fourth, to the giving of the names of bodies, to names, or speeches; as they do that say, that there be things universall; that a living creature is Genus, °or a generall thing, &c.°

5. The fifth, to the giving of the names of accidents, to names and speeches; as they do that say, the nature of a thing is its definition; a mans command is his will; and the like.

6. The sixth, to the use of Metaphors, Tropes, and other Rhetoricall figures, in stead of words proper. For though it be lawfull to say, (for example) in common speech, the way goeth, or leadeth hither, or thither, The Proverb sayes this or that °(whereas wayes cannot go, nor Proverbs speak;)° yet in reckoning, and seeking of truth, such speeches are not to be admitted.

1–2 absurditie] absurdityes MS 2 Definitions;] the Definitions MS
4 two, and three.] Two, Three, &c. MS 6–7 these . . . being] w^ch^ . . . are MS
8 their] these MS 12 &c.] om. MS 15 &c.] om. MS
18 or a generall thing] (a general thing) MS

[17] . And this is the general cause. [18] many absurdities proceed from the lack of distinction between those considerations; from which follows the [19] 1. [and subsequent numbers changed accordingly]
[20] first [and subsequent numbers changed accordingly]

Conclusionum Absurditas in caeteris scientiis defectui Methodi imputanda est; propterea quod Ratiocinationes suas non incipiunt à Definitionibus Nominum. Quasi numerare vellent antequam numeralium Nominum valorem intelligerent. Atque haec causa generalis est. Quoniam autem Corpora in Rationes propter varias considerationes (sicut in praecedente capite dictum est) inferuntur; multae Absurditates procedunt à defectu distinctionis inter considerationes illas; unde fit ut nomina in propositiones perperam connectantur.

Ut primo, cum nomina Corporum indant Accidentibus, vel nomina Accidentium Corporibus; quemadmodum faciunt qui dicunt, Fidem esse infusam,[g] vel Inspiratam; cum nihil neque fusile, sit neque spirabile praeter corpus; & quemadmodum faciunt illi qui extensionem dicunt esse Corpus,[h] & Phantasma esse Spiritum, &c. 1.

Secundo, quando nomina Accidentium quae sunt in corporibus extra nos, Accidentibus tribuunt corporum nostrorum. Quod faciunt qui dicunt colorem esse in Objecto; sonum esse in Aëre, &c. 2.

Tertio, cum Corporum nomina nominibus tribuunt vel orationibus; ut qui dicunt esse res universales, vel animal esse genus. [23] 3.

Quartò, cum nomina Accidentium imponunt nominibus, & orationibus; ut qui dicunt Definitionem esse rei naturam, vel mandatum cujuspiam ipsius esse voluntatem. 4.

Quinto, quando utuntur loco verborum propriorum, metaphoris, aliisque Tropis orationis. Quanquam enim liceat (exempli causa) cum vulgo dicere, via huc vel illuc tendit vel ducit; Proverbium hoc vel illud dicit, inter ratiocinandum tamen hujusmodi orationes, ab iis qui veritati student, admittendae non sunt. 5.

9 indant] indunt 70 9 marg. in this edn.; in the text (at start of line) in 68, 70

[g] 'Infused faith' ('fides infusa') was a term used in Roman Catholic theology: according to the decree on justification of the Council of Trent, faith, hope, and love are infused into a person at the moment of justification (Chifflet, ed., Sacrosancti Concilii canones et decreta, sessio 6, decretum, ch. 7, p. 30).

[h] Cf. Descartes, Principia philosophiae, part 2, princ. 4–9 (Oeuvres, viii (1), pp. 42–5).

7. The seventh, to names that signifie nothing; but are taken up, [21]and [21] learned by rote from the Schooles,[21] as °hypostatical,° [i] transubstantiate, consubstantiate,[j] eternal-Now,[k] and the like canting of Schoole-men.

To him that can avoyd these [22]things,[22] it is not easie to fall into any absurdity, unlesse it be by the length of an account; wherein he may perhaps forget what went before[23]. For all men by nature reason alike, and well, when they [24]have good[24] principles. For who is so stupid, as both to mistake in Geometry, and also to persist in it, when another detects his error to him?

Science. By this it appears that Reason is not as Sense, and Memory, borne with us; nor gotten by Experience onely, as Prudence is; but attayned by Industry; first in apt imposing of Names; and secondly by getting a good and orderly Method in proceeding from [25]the Elements, which are Names, to Assertions made by Connexion of one of them to another; and so to Syllogismes, which are the Connexions of one Assertion to another,[25] till we come to a knowledge of all the Consequences of names appertaining to °the subject in hand; and that is it, men call° SCIENCE. And whereas Sense and Memory are but knowledge of Fact, °which is a thing past, and irrevocable;° Science is the knowledge of Consequences, and dependance of one fact upon another: by which, out of that we can presently[l] do, we know how to do something else [26]when we will, or the like,[26] another time: Because when we see how any thing comes about, upon what causes, and by what manner; when the like causes come into our power, wee [27]see how to make it[27] produce the like effects.

3 of] of the of MS

[21] rashly, [22] dangers, [literally: rocks] [23] ^ some proposition [24] set out from true and perspicuous [25] names to assertions and from assertions to syllogisms, [26] that is similar, when we will, [27] learn to

[i] = pertaining to substance; the doctrine of 'hypostatical union' taught that Christ's divine nature and human nature were united in him in one substance. For Hobbes's views on the use and misuse of the term 'hypostasis' see below, Appendix, Ch. 1. His decision to omit this word from his Latin version here may be explained by the comment (made in 1668) in his Answer to a Book, p. 38 (EW iv, p. 311) that 'the word Hypostatical Union is rightly retained and used by Divines'.

[j] 'Consubstantiation' was a term used (e.g., by Hooker, Lawes of Ecclesiastical Politie, V.lxvii.10, in his Works, ii, p. 338) to describe the Lutheran doctrine of the Real Presence of the body and blood of Christ in the Eucharist; the substance of the bread or wine was not changed into that of Christ (as in the doctrine of transubstantiation), but was joined in a common substance with it.

[k] See below, Ch. 46, note bg [l] = at the present time (OED, 'presently', adv., 2.a).

[m] The Latin construction in 68 and 70 is grammatically possible (meaning: 'we learn that like causes produce like effects'), but it fails to convey the point of the English. It is emended here on the assumption that a scribal misplacing of the closing parenthesis led the compositor to change 'causae' to 'causas'. Alternatively, Hobbes may have intended 'per causas similes' ('we learn to produce like effects by means of like causes').

Sexto, quando nominibus temerè receptis, nec quicquam significantibus utuntur, quales sunt Transubstantiatio, Consubstantiatio,[j] Nunc stans,[k] similesque voces Scholasticorum. Qui scopulos vitare hos potest, haud facile incidet in absurdum, nisi forte in Ratiocinatione longa. Oblivisci enim potest alicujus propositionis quam praemiserat. Naturaliter enim homines bene & similiter ratiocinantur, si à veris & perspicuis Principiis ordiantur. Vix enim invenies hominem adeo stupidum, quin si in Geometria erraverit, erroremque ejus ipsi ostenderit alius errorem suum illico agnoscet. 6.

Apparet hinc Rationem non esse, sicut Sensus & Memoria, nobiscum natam; neque sola (ut prudentia) Experientia acquisitam, sed Industria; scilicet apta in primis impositione Nominum; deinde methodo recta procedendo à Nominibus ad Propositiones, & à Propositionibus ad Syllogismos, donec veniatur ad cognitionem Consequentiarum Nominum omnium quae ad Scientiam pertinent. Sensus & Memoria, Facti tantum Cognitio est; Scientia autem Cognitio est Consequentiarum unius Facti ad alterum. Per eam autem aliquis ex eo quod nunc facere potest, docetur aliquid aliud simile facere, si velit, alio tempore. Quia quoties videmus effectuum ortum & causas, & quomodo generantur, docemur (quoties in nostra potestate sunt causae similes),[m] similes producere effectus. Scientia.

7 erraverit] erret 70 8 ejus] om. 70 8 agnoscet] agnoveri {misprint for agnoverit} 70
18–19 sunt causae similes) this edn.] sunt) causas similes 68, 70

Children therefore [28]are not endued with Reason at all,[28] till they have attained the use of Speech: but are called Reasonable Creatures, for the [29]possibility apparent of having the use of Reason in time to come.[29] And the most part of men, though they have the use of Reasoning a little way, as in numbring to some degree; yet it serves them to little use in common life; in which they govern themselves, some better, some worse, according to [30]their differences of experience, quicknesse of memory, and inclinations to severall ends;[30] but specially according to good or evill fortune, and the errors of one another. For as for Science, or certain rules of their actions, they are so farre from it, that they know not what [31]it is.[31] Geometry they have thought Conjuring:[n] But for other Sciences, they who have not been taught the beginnings, and some progresse in them, that they may see how they be acquired and generated, are in this point like children, that having no thought of generation, are made believe by the women, that their brothers and sisters are not born, but found in the garden.

But yet they that have no Science, are in better, and nobler condition with their naturall Prudence; than men, that by mis-reasoning, or by trusting them that reason wrong, fall upon false and absurd generall rules. For ignorance of causes, and of rules, does not set men so farre out of their way, as relying on false rules, and [32]taking for causes of what they aspire to, those that are not so, but rather causes of the contrary.[32]

°To conclude,° The Light of humane minds is Perspicuous Words, [22] but by exact definitions first snuffed,[p] and purged from ambiguity; Reason is the pace; [33]Encrease of Science, the way;[33] and the Benefit of man-kind, the end[34]. And on the contrary, Metaphors, and senslesse and ambiguous words, are like ignes fatui;[q] and reasoning upon them, is wandering amongst innumerable absurdities; and their end, contention, and sedition, or contempt.

19 men . . . their] a man . . . his MS 24 pace] place B

[28] do not have reason in actuality [29] mere potentiality.
[30] how they differ among themselves in experience, memory, and appetite;
[31] a rule of life is, apart from their own desires. [32] causes.
[33] method is the way to science; [34] ^ of science

Infantes igitur actum Rationis, antequam Sermonis usum aquisierint non habent; vocantur autem animalia Rationalia propter potestatem tantùm. Plerique autem homines etsi aliquousque ratiocinari possunt, ut forte in Numeris; non tamen multum inde adjumenti accipiunt ad vitam communem; in qua seipsos regunt alii melius, alii pejus, prout Experientia, Memoria vel appetitu inter se differunt; maximè autem fortuna bona vel adversa, & unus alterius erroribus gubernantur. Quod enim ad Scientiam attinet & actionum suarum Regulas certas, ita ab ea longè absunt, ut quid sit, praeter suas ipsorum cupiditates vitae Regula non intelligant. Geometriam aliqui pro Arte Magica habuerunt. Quod autem attinet ad Scientias alias, [24] illi qui non didicerunt Principia ejus, nec tantum in illis progressum fecerunt, ut viderint quomodo generatae & acquisitae fuerint, ita ad eas se habent ut pueri ad Cognitionem generationis; qui fratres suos & sorores non natos, sed in horto repertos esse, credunt mulieribus.

Veruntamen qui sine omni sunt Scientia, sola Prudentia naturali, nobiliore conditione sunt, quam illi qui ratiocinando malè, vel malè ratiocinantibus credendo, incidunt in Regulas generales falsas & absurdas. Causarum enim & Regularum ignoratio non tantos errores generat, quantos Regulae & Causae falsae.

Animi humani Lux est oratio perspicua justis definitionibus antè emuncta, ambiguitatibusque purgata. Ratio est gressus; Methodus, ad Scientiam via est; Scientiae autem finis, Bonum humanum; Metaphorae autem & verba nihil significantia aut ambigua, sunt ignes fatui;[q] in quibus qui versatur, inter absurditates innumerabiles vagatur quae terminantur tandem in contentione, vel seditione, vel contemptu.

8 ea] his 70 9 Regula 70] Regulâ 68

[n] = practising conjuration (effecting something supernatural by means of a spell or the invoking of a sacred name) (OED, 'conjuring', vbl. n., 3; 'conjure', v., 6; 'conjuration', 3; cf. the use of the word 'Diabolicall' below, p. 1076).

[p] = clarified, with impurities removed (OED, 'snuff', v.[1], 1.b).

[q] = will-o'-the-wisps (lights that lead people astray in marshland).

Prudence & Sapience, °with their difference.°

As, much Experience, is Prudence; so, is much Science, Sapience. °For though wee usually have one name of Wisedome for them both; yet the Latines did alwayes distinguish between Prudentia and Sapientia; ascribing the former to Experience, the later to Science.°[r] But to make their difference appeare more cleerly, let us suppose one man endued with an excellent naturall use, and dexterity in handling his armes; and another to have added to that dexterity, an acquired Science, [35]of[35] where he can offend, or be offended by his adversarie, in every possible posture, or guard: The ability of the former, would be to the ability of the later, as Prudence to Sapience; both usefull; but the later infallible. But they that trusting onely to the authority of books, follow the blind blindly, are like him that trusting to the false rules of a master of Fence, ventures praesumptuously upon an [36]adversary, that either [37]kills, or disgraces him.[37]

Signes of Science.

The signes of Science, are some, certain and infallible; some, uncertain. Certain, when he that pretendeth the Science of any thing, can teach the same; that is to say, demonstrate the truth thereof perspicuously to another: Uncertain, when onely some particular events[s] answer to his pretence, [38]and upon many occasions prove not as he sayes they must.[38] Signes of prudence are all uncertain; because to [39]observe by experience, and remember all circumstances that may alter the successe,[39] is impossible. But in any businesse, whereof a man has not infallible Science to proceed by; to forsake his own naturall judgement, and be guided by generall sentences[t] read in Authors, [40]and subject to many exceptions, is a signe of folly, and generally scorned by the name of Pedantry.[40] And even of those men themselves, that in Councells of the Common-wealth, love to shew [41]their reading of[41] Politiques and History, very few do it in their domestique affaires, where their particular interest is concerned; having Prudence enough for their private affaires: but in publique they study[u] more the reputation of their owne wit, than the successe of [42]anothers[42] businesse.

1–3 Prudence & . . . difference] Sapience MS 2 usually] {vse del. by TH} MS 18 prove not this edn.] prove so MS, H, B 21 his] ones MS 23 a] om. MS 24 those] these MS 26–7 few do it in . . . concerned] few in . . . concerned, euer do it MS

35 by which he has perfectly learned 36 ^ experienced 37 kills him, or strips him of his arms. 38 but many others do not.
39 see the circumstances essential to the outcome of all the things one has experienced, or to remember them when one has seen them, 40 is imprudence.
41 what, and how much, they have mastered in 42 public

Sicut Experientia multa, fit Prudentia; ita Scientia multa, Sapientia est. Verum ut differentia quae inter illas est, manifestiùs appareat, supponamus Hominem aliquem qui habeat dexteritatem arma sua tractandi naturaliter excellentem; alterum autem qui dexteritatem quidem aequalem, sed habeat praeterea armorum Scientiam acquisitam, qua quo modo & qua parte corporis, in quacunque positione, hostem offendere vel ab eo offendi possit, perfectè didicit. Horum duorum facultates ita ad se invicem habent, sicut Prudentia & Sapientia; utraque utilis, posterior autem infallibilis. Ille autem qui confidet soli Librorum authoritati, caecos caecè sequitur, similis illi est, qui fidens Lanistae alicujus Regulis falsis, hostem peritum aggressus, vel interficitur, vel armis exuitur. Prudentia & Sapientia.

Scientiae signa sunt alia certa & infallibilia; alia incerta. Certa sunt, quando qui Scire se dicit, idem alterum docere, & veritatem perspicuè demonstrare potest. Incertum, quando in quibusdam tantum rebus, id quod dicit verum est, sed in multis aliis non item. Itaque signa Prudentiae Incerta omnia sunt. Nemo enim rerum omnium quas expertus est circumstantias eventui essentiales vidisse potest, aut visarum meminisse. Caeterum in omni negotio cujus nulla est Scientia infallibilis, proprio judicio diffidere, Sententiisque Librorum ducendum se permittere, Imprudentia est. Etiam illorum hominum qui in Conciliis Rerumpublicarum, quid in Politicis, & Historiis, & quantum profecerint ostentare amant, pauci tamen, ubi suae ipsorum res [25] domesticae aguntur, id faciunt; cum in sua ipsius re unusquisque satis Prudens est. In publico autem negotio magis proprii ingenii existimationi student quam negotio publico. Scientiae signa.

3 sua] om. 70 7 ad] om. 70 19 hominum] hominum pauci 70 20 in Politicis, & Historiis, & quantum] & quantum in Politicis, ac Historiis 70 21 pauci tamen] om. 70 22–3 est. In] sit: in 70

[r] Cicero distinguished them, but on the grounds that 'sapientia' was concerned with knowledge of divine and human things, whereas 'prudentia' was concerned with knowledge of what was to be done or avoided in human conduct (De officiis, I.153).

[s] 'Events' here may have the sense of 'outcomes' (OED, 'event', n., 3.a).

[t] = maxims (OED, 'sentence', n., 4.a). [u] = aim at (OED, 'study', v., 11).

[23]

CHAP. VI.

Of the Interiour Beginnings of Voluntary Motions; commonly called the PASSIONS. And the Speeches by which they are expressed.

Motion Vitall and Animal.

There be in Animals, two sorts of Motions peculiar to them: One called Vitall; begun in generation, and continued without interruption through their whole life; such as are the course of the Bloud, the Pulse, the Breathing, the Concoction,[a] Nutrition, Excretion, &c; to which Motions there needs no help of Imagination: The other is Animall motion, otherwise called Voluntary motion; as to go, to speak, to move any of our limbes, in such manner as is first fancied in our minds. That Sense, is Motion in the organs and interiour parts of mans body, caused by the action of the things we See, Heare, &c; And that Fancy is but the Reliques of the same Motion, remaining after Sense, has been already sayd in the first and second Chapters. And because going, speaking, and the like Voluntary motions, depend alwayes upon a precedent thought of whither, which way, and what; it is evident, that the [1]Imagination[1] is the first internall beginning of all Voluntary Motion. And although [2]unstudied men, doe not conceive[2] any motion at all to be there, where the thing moved is invisible; or the space it is moved in, is (for the shortnesse of it) insensible; yet that doth not hinder, but that such Motions are. For let a space be never so little, that which is moved over a greater space, whereof that little one is part, must first be moved over that. These small beginnings of Motion, within the body of Man, before they appear in walking, speaking, striking, and other visible actions, are commonly called ENDEAVOUR.

Endeavour.

Appetite. Desire. Hunger. Thirst. Aversion.

This Endeavour, when it is toward something which causes it, is called APPETITE, or DESIRE; the [3]later,[3] being the generall name; and the other, often-times restrayned to signifie [4]the Desire of Food, namely[4] Hunger and Thirst. And when the Endeavour is fromward something, it is generally called AVERSION. These words Appetite, and Aversion [5]we have from the Latines; and they both of them signifie the motions, one of approaching, the other of retiring. So also do the Greek words for the same, which are[5] ὁρμή, and ἀφορμή. For Nature it selfe does often presse upon men those truths, which

4–5 marg. om. MS 5 their] his MS 23 marg. om. MS

---

[1] fancy [2] there are people who deny [3] first [4] some particular appetite, such as [5] the Greeks render by

CAPVT VI.

De Principiis internis Motus Voluntarii, quae vulgò Passiones appellantur. Et de Orationibus quibus declarantur.

Motus Vitalis & Animalis.

Duo sunt Motuum in Animalibus genera ipsis propria. Quorum unus est Vitalis, in generatione inceptus, & sine interruptione per totam vitam continuatus; qualis est Motus Sanguinis, Pulsus, Spirationis, Concoctionis,[a] Nutritionis, Excretionis, qui Imaginationis Auxilio non indigent. Alter dicitur Animalis, & Voluntarius; qualis est incessus, locutio, & artuum Motus, qualem prius animo cogitaveramus. Sensum, Motum esse in Organis, & Partibus internis corporis humani, factum ab Objectis Visis, Auditis, &c. Phantasiam autem esse ejusdem Motus post Sensionem reliquias, dictum antè est in Cap. primo & secundo. Quoniam autem incessus, loquela, & similes Motus Voluntarii, semper dependent ab aliqua praecedente cogitatione, Quo, qua via, & Quid, manifestum est Phantasiam Motuum omnium voluntariorum Principium internum primum esse. Etsi autem sint qui Motum omnino ullum esse negant, ubi res mota invisibilis, aut spatium in quo movetur, propter brevitatem, insensibile est, illud tamen non impedit, quo minus hujusmodi Motus sint. Quantulumcunque enim spatium sit, id quod Movetur per spatium majus, cujus parvum illud spatium pars est, per illud etiam necessariò movebitur. Principia haec Motus parva, intra humanum corpus sita, antequam incedendo, loquendo, percutiendo, caeterisque actionibus visibilibus appareant, vocantur Conatus.

Conatus.

Conatus hic, quando fit versus causam suam vocatur Appetitus, vel Cupido; quarum vox prima generalis est; altera saepe restringitur ad significandum Appetitum aliquem particularem, ut Famem vel Sitim; quando autem Conatus est recedendi à re aliqua, tunc vocatur Aversio. Has duas voces Appetitum & Aversionem, Graeci significant per ὁρμήν, & ἀφορμήν. Natura enim homines ad veritatem aliquando ipsa urget, in quam offendunt saepe illi qui Appetitus. Fames & Sitis. Aversio.

[a] = a physiological term for the process by which food is digested, and the resulting substance turned into blood (OED, 'concoction', 1).

afterwards, when they look for somewhat beyond Nature, they stumble at. For the Schooles find in [6]meere Appetite to go, or move, no actuall[6] Motion at all: but because some Motion they must acknowledge, they call it Metaphoricall Motion;[b] which is but an absurd speech: for though Words may be called metaphoricall; Bodies, and Motions cannot.

Love. Hate. That which men Desire, they are also sayd to LOVE: and to HATE those things, [7]for which they have Aversion.[7] So that Desire, and [24] Love, are the same thing; save that by Desire, we alwayes signifie the Absence of the Object; by Love, most commonly [8] the Presence of the same. So also by Aversion, we signifie the Absence; and by Hate, the Presence of the Object.

Of Appetites, and Aversions, some are born with men; as Appetite of food, Appetite of excretion, and exoneration,[c] (which may also [9]and more properly be called Aversions, from somewhat they feele in their Bodies;) and some other Appetites, not many.[9] The rest, which are Appetites of particular things, proceed from Experience, and triall of their effects upon themselves, or other men. For of things wee know not at all, or believe not to be, we can have no further Desire, than to tast and try. But Aversion wee have for things, not onely which we know have hurt us; but also that we do not know whether they will hurt us, or not.

Contempt. Those things which we neither Desire, nor Hate, we are said to Contemne: CONTEMPT being nothing else but an immobility, or contumacy[d] of the Heart, in resisting the action of certain things; and proceeding from that the Heart is already moved otherwise, by other more potent objects; or from want of experience of [10]them.[10]

And because the constitution of a mans Body, is in continuall mutation; it is impossible that all the same things should alwayes cause in him the same Appetites, and Aversions: much lesse can all men consent, in the Desire of °almost any° one and the same Object.

Good. Evill. But whatsoever is the object of any mans Appetite or Desire; that is it, which he for his part calleth Good: And the object of his Hate, and Aversion, Evill; And of his Contempt, Vile °and Inconsiderable.° For these words of Good, Evill, and Contemptible, are ever [11]used[11] with relation to the person that useth them: There being nothing simply and absolutely so; nor any common Rule of Good and Evill[12], to be taken from the nature of the objects

11 men] a man MS

---

[6] appetite no [7] from which they flee. [8] ^ and properly [9] in another respect be called aversions, because they consist in fleeing from some evil in the replete and overburdened body).
[10] the nature of the objects of our contempt. [11] understood [12] ^ and contemptible ultra Naturam docti esse cupiunt. Scholae enim in Appetitu Motum nullum omnino esse censent, [26] & quia Motus aliquis necessariò admittendus est, Appetitum Motum esse dicunt Metaphoricum;[b] id quod est Absurdum, cum (etsi verba possint) Corpora, Motusque Metaphorica esse non possint.

Quae Cupiunt homines eadem & Amare dicuntur; Odioque habere ea quae Fugiunt. Itaque Cupere, & Amare idem sunt, nisi quod in Cupidine objectum semper abesse intelligitur; in Amore plerumque & proprie adesse dicitur. Similiter per Aversionem, absentiam; per Odium praesentiam objecti significamus.

Appetituum, & Aversionum, aliae nobiscum natae sunt; ut Appetitus edendi, excernendi, & exonerandi; quae Aversiones etiam alio respectu dici possunt, quia Fugae sunt alicujus mali in corpore pleno & onerato. Appetitus caeteri rerum particularium oriuntur ab experientia effectuum quos in nobis vel aliis hominibus produxerunt. Rerum enim quas non omnino cognoscimus, vel quas non credimus existere, appetitum alium habere praeterquam experiendi impossibile est. Aversionem autem habemus etiam ab iis rebus, non solum quas cognovimus nos laesisse; sed etiam ab iis rebus quae an laesurae sint necne, nescimus.

Contemptus.

Quae neque Cupimus neque Odimus, ea dicimur Contemnere. Contemptus enim nihil aliud est quam Cordis, actionibus quarundem rerum resistentis, immobilitas quaedam sive Contumacia, orta ab eo quod Cor ab aliis objectis fortioribus occupatum est; vel ab eo quod qualia sint ea quae contemnimus, experti non simus.

Et quoniam in perpetua mutatione versatur humani corporis consistentia, impossibile est, ut eaedem res producerent eosdem semper Appetitus, & Aversiones; multo minùs poterunt omnes homines consentire in Appetitu unius & ejusdem Objecti.

Bonum. Malum.

Quicquid autem Appetitus in homine quocunque Objectum est, eidem illud est quod ab ipso appellatur Bonum. Similiter id quod Aversionis in ipso & Odii causa est, ab ipso nominatur Malum; atque id Vile appellat, quod ipse contemnit. Voces enim Bonum, Malum, Vile, intelliguntur semper cum relatione ad personam quae illis utitur; cum nihil sit simpliciter ita; neque ulla

1 enim] namque 70 17 quas this edn.] quae 68, 70 17 quae this edn.] quas 68, 70
25 producerent] producant 70

[b] The distinction was commonly made between 'true' motion, which was physical, and 'metaphorical' or 'analogical' motion, which pertained to the mind (see, e.g., Buonamici, De motu, p. 65; Goclenius, Lexicon philosophicum, p. 719). Cf. William Twisse's comment that an object of desire works on the will as a final cause, 'the motion wherof is commonly called motus metaphoricus ['metaphorical motion']' (Doctrine of the Synod, p. 115). [c] = unburdening, sc. of the bowels or bladder (OED, 'exonerate', v., 2).
[d] = obstinate resistance (OED, 'contumacy', 1.b).

themselves; but from the [13] Person of the man (where there is no Common-wealth;) or, (in a Common-wealth,) from [14] the Person that representeth it; or from an Arbitrator or Judge, whom men [15]disagreeing shall by consent set up, and make his sentence the Rule thereof.[15]

Pulchrum. Turpe.

The Latine Tongue has two words, whose significations approach to those of Good and Evill; but are not precisely the same; And those are Pulchrum and Turpe. Whereof the former signifies that, which by some apparent signes promiseth Good; and the later, that, which promiseth Evil. But [16]in our Tongue we have not so generall names to expresse them by. But[16] for Pulchrum, we say in some things, Fayre; in others, °Beautifull, or° Handsome, °or Gallant,° or Honourable, or Comely, or Amiable; and for Turpe, °Foule,° Deformed, °Ugly,° Base, Nauseous, °and the like, as the subject shall require;° All which words, °in their proper places° signifie nothing els, but [17]the Mine,[e] or Countenance,[17] that promiseth Good and Evil. So that of Good there be three kinds; [18]Good in the Promise, that is Pulchrum; Good in Effect, as the end desired, which is called Jucundum, Delightfull; and Good as the Means, which is called Vtile, Profitable; and as many of Evil: For Evill, in Promise, is that they call Turpe; Evil in Effect, and [25] End, is Molestum, Vnpleasant, Troublesome; and Evill in the Means, Inutile, Unprofitable, Hurtfull.[18]

°Delightfull.° °Profitable.° °Unpleasant.°
°Unprofitable.°

As, in Sense, [19]that which is really within us, is (as I have sayd before) onely Motion, caused by the action of externall objects, but in apparence;[19] to the Sight, Light and Colour; to the Eare, Sound; to the Nostrill, Odour, &c: so, when the action of the same object is continued from the Eyes, Eares, and other organs [20]to the Heart; the reall effect there[20] is nothing but Motion, or Endeavour; which consisteth in Appetite, or Aversion, to, or from the object °moving°. But the apparence, °or sense° of that motion, is that wee either call DELIGHT, or TROUBLE OF MIND.

°Delight.°
°Displeasure.°

This Motion, [21]which is called Appetite, and for the apparence of it[21] Delight, and Pleasure, seemeth to be, a [22]corroboration of Vitall motion, and a help thereunto;[22] and therefore such things as caused [23]Delight,[23] were not improperly called Jucunda, (à Juvando,)[f] from helping or fortifying; and the contrary, Molesta, Offensive, °from hindering, and troubling the motion vitall.°

°Pleasure.°

°Offence.°

Pleasure therefore, (or Delight,) is the apparence, °or sense° of Good; and Molestation or Displeasure, the apparence, °or sense° of Evill. And consequently all Appetite, Desire, and Love, is accompanied with some Delight °more or lesse;° and all Hatred, and Aversion, with [24]more or lesse[24] Displeasure and Offence.

14 Evil. So] Evil or the lustre and glosse of some ability to do Good. {So that pulchritude in gen{eral page cut} may be sayd to be the Color, {of page cut} vertue, and added by TH} {So del. by TH}
19 marg. om. MS 29 marg. om. MS

Boni, Mali, & Vilis, communis regula, ab ipsorum objectorum naturis derivata, sed à natura (ubi Civitas non est) personae loquentis, vel (si est) personae Civitatem repraesentantis; vel ab Arbitro vel Iudice constituto.

Pulchrum & Turpe prope quidem idem significant, quod Bonum & Malum, sed non adaequatè. Pulchrum enim id significat quod signis apparentibus Bonum promittit, sicut & Turpe id quod Malum promittit. [27] Utriusque autem sunt diversae Species, ut Formosum, Honestum, Decorum, Iucundum, sunt species Pulchri; Deforme, Inhonestum, Molestum, species Turpis. Quae omnia vocabula nihil aliud significant praeter promissionem quandam vel Boni, vel Mali. Itaque Boni tres sunt species, altera in promissione quae Pulchritudo, Altera in re, & dicitur Bonitas, Tertia in Fine, quae est Iucunditas. Praeterea Bonum quod in Fine Iucundum dicitur, in Medio vocatur Vtile. Similiter Malum ut promissum, Turpe; ut in Fine Molestum appellatur. Pulchrum. Turpe.

Ut in Sensione, solus (intra corpus sentiens) Motus est, ortus ab actione Objectorum, qui tamen ad Visum, Lux & color; ad Auditum, Sonus; ad Olfactum, Odor, &c. ita objecti actio continuata ad Oculos, Aures, aliaque Sensuum organa nihil aliud est praeter Motum, vel Conatum, consistentem in Appetitu vel Fuga objecti. Apparitio tamen illius Motus, illa est quae vocatur aut voluptas, aut molestia animi.

Quoniam autem Motus hic (propter voluptatem) videtur esse Motus Vitalis adjutor; ea quae Motum hunc efficiunt vocari solent, nec impropriè (nimirum à juvando) jucunda;[f] & eorum contraria Molesta.

Jucundum ergo, est apparens Bonum; & Molestum apparens Malum. Itaque Appetitus omnis, amorque conjunctus est cum voluptate aliqua; & Odium & Fuga, cum Molestia aliqua.

15 ad . . . ad . . . ad] quoad . . . quoad . . . quoad 70 16 &c.] &c. est. 70 19 aut] om. 70

13 ^ nature of the 14 ^ that of 15 have set up. 16 there are various kinds of each: thus 17 something 18 one in the promise, which is 'pulchritude'; the second in the thing, and it is called 'goodness'; the third in the end, which is 'delight'. Moreover the good which, in the end, is called 'delightful', is called 'profitable' in the means. Similarly evil as promise is called 'turpe' [foul, base], and in the end it is called 'unpleasant'. 19 there is (within the sentient body) only motion, arising from the action of objects, which is, however, 20 of sense, it 21 on account of the 22 help to vital motion; 23 this motion 24 some

[e] = mien, the look or bearing of a person (OED, 'mien', n.[1], 1–3). [f] This etymology, deriving 'jucundus' (delightful) from 'juvo' (to help), is given in Cicero, De finibus, II.14.

Pleasures of sense. Of Pleasures, or Delights, some arise from the sense of an object Present; And those may be called Pleasures of Sense, (The word sensuall, [25]as it is used by those onely that condemn them, having no place till there be Lawes.)[25] Of this kind are all Onerations[g] and Exonerations[h] of the body; as also all that is pleasant, in the Sight, Hearing, Smell, Tast, or Touch; Others arise from the Expectation, that proceeds from foresight of the End, or Consequence of things; whether those things in the Sense Please or Displease: And these are Pleasures of the Mind of him that draweth those consequences; and are generally called JOY. In the like manner, Displeasures, are some in the Sense, and called PAYNE; others, in the Expectation °of consequences,° and are called GRIEFE.

Pleasures of the Mind. Joy. Paine. Griefe.

These simple Passions called Appetite, Desire, Love, Aversion, Hate, Joy, and Griefe, have their names for divers considerations [26] diversified. As first, when [27]they one succeed another, they are diversly called from the opinion men have of the likelihood of attaining what they desire.[27] Secondly, from the object [28]loved or hated.[28] Thirdly, from the consideration of many of them together. Fourthly, from the [29]Alternation or succession it selfe.[29]

Hope. For Appetite with an opinion of attaining, is called HOPE.

Despaire. The same, without such opinion, DESPAIRE.

Feare. Aversion, with opinion of Hurt [30]from the object,[30] FEARE.

Courage. The same, with hope of [31]avoyding[31] that Hurt by resistence, COURAGE.

Anger. Sudden Courage, ANGER.

Confidence. Constant Hope[32], CONFIDENCE of our selves.

[33]Diffidence.[33] Constant Despayre, [34]DIFFIDENCE of our selves.[34] [26]

Indignation. Anger for °great° hurt done to another, °when we conceive the same to be° done by Injury, INDIGNATION.

Benevolence. Desire of good to another, BENEVOLENCE, GOOD WILL, CHARITY. °If to man generally, GOOD NATURE.°

°Good Nature.°

Covetousnesse. Desire of Riches, COVETOUSNESSE: a name used [35] alwayes in signification of blame; because men [36]contending for them, are displeased with one anothers attaining them;[36] though the desire in it selfe, be to be blamed, or allowed, according to the [37] means by which those Riches are sought.

Ambition. Desire of [38]Office, or precedence,[38] AMBITION: a name used also [39]in the worse sense, for the reason before mentioned.[39]

2 called Pleasures] called Pleasure B 2 it is] being MS 5 Sight,] om. MS 17 Alternation MS] Alteration H, B 30 them] it MS 31 anothers] another B 31 them] it MS 32 those] these B

[25] before those pleasures are condemned by the law, signifies nothing culpable.)
[26] ^ sometimes [27] it seems that some will succeed others. [28] which we seek or flee.

Voluptatum aliae ab Objecti praesentis Sensione oriuntur, quae vocari possunt voluptates Sensuales; quae vox, antequam lege condemnentur, nihil culpabile consignificat. Hujus generis sunt Onerationes & Exonerationes corporis; quicquid item ad Visum, Auditum, Olfactum, Gustum, vel Tactum jucundum est; aliae ab Expectatione oriuntur, id est à Praevisione Finium, vel Consequentiarum rerum, sive illa ad Sensum jucunda, sive injucunda sint. Atque animi voluptates hae sunt illis, qui consequentias illas praevident; vocanturque uno nomine Gaudium; similiter Molestiarum aliae in Sensu sunt, vocanturque Dolores corporis; aliae in Expectatione, & appellantur Dolores animi. Voluptates Sensuales, & Voluptates Animi. Gaudium.

Passiones autem istae simplices Appetitus, Cupido, Amor, Aversio, Odium, Gaudium, & Dolor à diversis considerationibus quandoque variantur etiam nominibus. Vt primò, prout videntur aliae aliis successurae. Secundo, prout objectum appetimus, aut fugimus. Tertio, prout multae simul considerantur. Postremo, pro modo successionis unius ad alteram. Appetitus enim si conjunctus sit cum opinione obtinendi, Spes dicitur. [28] Spes.

Idem sine opinione obtinendi, Desperatio. Desperatio.

Aversio cum opinione damni secuturi, Metus. Metus.

Eadem cum Spe damni per resistentiam superandi, Fortitudo. Fortitudo.

Subita Fortitudo, est Ira. Ira.

Spes in propria virtute, si constans sit, Fiducia; desperatio continuata Animi Abjectio. Fiducia.

Ira ex laesione alterius injusta, Indignatio. Indignatio.

Alii bonum Cupere, Benevolentia vel Charitas. Charitas.

Cupido divitiarum, Avaritia. Quae vox, quia de divitiis certare homines inter se solent, accipitur semper ferè in malo sensu, etsi Cupido ipsa, aut culpanda aut probanda sit, prout Media sunt quibus quaeruntur Divitiae, bona vel mala. Cupido Dignitatum publicarum, Ambitio. Vox haec quoque propter contentionem hominum, in deterius saepissimè accipitur. Avaritia. Ambitio.

1 vox] quidem 70 3 consignificat] significant 70 6 illa ad Sensum jucunda, sive injucunda] illae ad Sensum jucundae, sive injucundae 70 7 animi voluptates hae sunt illis] hae animi voluptates sunt illorum 70

29 manner in which one succeeds another. 30 to follow, 31 overcoming 32 in our own virtue 33 Despondency. 34 despondency. 35 ^ almost 36 habitually contend for them; 37 ^ good or bad 38 public dignities, 39 very often in the worse sense, because of the contention of men.

---

g = actions of filling, sc. with food or drink (OED, 'oneration', n., 2).

h See above, note c. Possibly the terms 'oneration' and 'exoneration' here may also have sexual meanings: cf. Hobbes, Anti-White, XXXVII.5, p. 415 (fo. 427r).

Pusillanimity. Desire of things that conduce but a little to our ends; And fear of things that are but of little hindrance, PUSILLANIMITY.

Magnanimity. Contempt of little helps, and hindrances, MAGNANIMITY.

[40] Valour. Magnanimity, in danger of [41]Death, or Wounds, VALOUR, FORTITUDE.[41]

Liberality. Magnanimity, in the use of Riches, LIBERALITY.

[43]Miserablenesse.[43] Pusillanimity, in the [42]same WRETCHEDNESSE, MISERABLENESSE; or[42] PARSIMONY; °as it is liked, or disliked.°

°Kindnesse.° °Love of Persons for society, KINDNESSE.°

°Naturall Lust.° °Love of Persons for Pleasing the sense onely, NATURALL LUST.°

°Luxury.° °Love of the same, acquired from Rumination, that is, Imagination of Pleasure past, LUXURY.°

°The passion of Love.° °Jealousie.° °Love of one singularly, with desire to be singularly beloved, THE PASSION OF LOVE. The same, with fear that the love is not mutuall, JEALOUSIE.°

Revengefulnesse. Desire, by doing hurt to another, to make him condemn some fact[i] of his own, REVENGEFULNESSE.

Curiosity. Desire to know why, and how, CURIOSITY; such as is in no living creature but Man: so that Man is distinguished, not onely by his Reason; but also by this [44]singular Passion[44] from other Animals; in whom the appetite of food, and other pleasures of Sense, by praedominance, take away the care of knowing causes; which is a Lust of the mind, that by a perseverance of [45]delight in the continuall and indefatigable[45] generation of Knowledge, exceedeth the short vehemence of any carnall Pleasure.

Religion. Superstition. Feare of power invisible, [46]feigned by the mind, or imagined from tales publiquely allowed,[46] RELIGION; not allowed, SUPERSTITION. And when True Religion. the power imagined, is truly such as we imagine, TRUE RELIGION.

Panique Terrour. Feare, without the apprehension of why, or what, PANIQUE TERROR; called so from the Fables, that make Pan the author of them;[j] whereas in truth, there is alwayes in him that so feareth first, some apprehension of the cause, though the rest run away by Example; every one supposing his fellow to know why. [47]And therefore[47] this Passion happens to none but in a throng, or multitude of people.

Admiration. Joy, from apprehension of novelty, ADMIRATION;[k] proper to Man, because it excites the appetite of knowing the cause.

8 for] om. B 28 feareth first MS] feareth, first H, B

[40] ^ Military [41] violent death, military valour. [42] use of the same, [43] Parsimony.
[44] passion, which I call 'curiosity', [45] continual and indefatigable delight in the [46] whether feigned, or publicly allowed from histories, [47] For Cupido rerum parum ad institutum nostrum conducentium; item Metus rerum institutum nostrum parum impedientium, Pusillanimitas. Pusillanimitas.

Adjumentorum, & Impedimentorum Exiguorum Contemptus, Magnanimitas. Magnanimitas.

Magnanimitas in periculo mortis violentae, aut vulnerum, Virtus bellica. Virtus bellica.

Magnanimitas in divitiarum usu, Liberalitas. Liberalitas.

Pusillanimitas in usu earundem, Tenacitas. Tenacitas.

Cupido laedendi aliquem, eo fine, ut factum aliquod suum condemnet, Vindicta. Vindicta.

Cupido sciendi quid & quomodo, Curiositas; quae Passio soli inest Homini. Distinguitur ergo à caeteris animalibus Homo, non solum Ratione, sed etiam Passione hac, quam voco Curiositatem. Caetera enim animalia, in quibus Appetitus cibi, aliaeque voluptates Sensuales praedominantur, causarum cognoscendarum cura carent, quae Animi concupiscentia quaedam est, conjuncta cum voluptate perpetua, & infatigabili, generationis scientiarum, vehementiam voluptatum sensualium brevem longè superans. Curiositas.

Metus Potentiarum invisibilium, sive Fictae illae sint, sive ab Historiis acceptae sint publicè, Religio est; si publicè acceptae non sint, Superstitio. Quando autem Potentiae illae revera tales sunt, quales accepimus, Vera Religio. Religio. Superstitio. Vera Religio.

Metus sine conceptione periculi unde & quale sit, Terror Panicus; ita vocatus à Pane, quem talium metuum authorem faciunt Fabulae.[j] Revera tamen, qui primus metuit, metuendi causam vidit aliquam; [29] caeteri autem illius primi exemplo fugiunt, credentes causam fugiendi fugientibus caeteris satis esse cognitam. Nam passio haec, nisi in coacta multitudine nunquam accidit. Terror Panicus.

Gaudium à cognitione nova, Admiratio; & homini propria est, quia excitat Appetitum sciendi causam. Admiratio.

[i] = action, deed; probably also with the connotation 'evil deed, crime' (OED, 'fact', n., 1.a, 1.c).
[j] Pausanias, Description of Greece, X.xxiii.7.
[k] = wonder, surprise (OED, 'admiration', 1).

Glory. Joy, arising from imagination of a mans own power and ability, [27] is that exultation of the mind which is called GLORYING: which if grounded upon the experience of his own former actions, is the same with Confidence: but if grounded on the flattery of others; or onely supposed by himself, for delight Vain-glory. in the consequences of [48]it,[48] is called VAINE-GLORY: °which name is properly given; because a well grounded° Confidence begetteth Attempt; whereas [49]the supposing of power does not, and is therefore rightly called Vaine.[49]

Dejection. Griefe, from opinion of want of [50] power, is called DEIECTION of mind.

The vain-glory which consisteth in the feigning or supposing of abilities in our selves, which we know are not, is most incident to young men, and nourished by the [51]Histories, or Fictions of Gallant Persons;[51] and is corrected oftentimes by Age, and Employment.

°Sudden Glory.° Laughter. Sudden Glory, is the passion which maketh °those Grimaces called° LAUGHTER; and is caused either by some sudden act of their own, that pleaseth them; or by the apprehension of some deformed thing in another, by comparison whereof they suddenly applaud themselves. And it is incident most to them, that are conscious of the fewest abilities in themselves; who are forced to keep themselves in their own favour, by observing the imperfections of other men. And therefore much Laughter °at the defects of others,° is a signe of Pusillanimity. For of great minds, one of the proper workes is, to help and free others from scorn; and compare themselves onely with the most able.

°Sudden Dejection.° Weeping. On the contrary, Sudden Dejection, is the passion that causeth WEEPING; and is caused by such accidents, as suddenly take away some vehement hope, or some prop of their power: And they are most subject to it, that rely principally on helps externall, such as are Women, and Children. Therefore some Weep for the losse of Friends; Others for [52]their unkindnesse;[52] others for the sudden stop made to their thoughts of revenge, by Reconciliation[53]. But in all cases, both Laughter, and Weeping, are sudden motions; Custome taking them both away. For no man Laughs at old jests; or Weeps for an old calamity.

13 marg. om. MS 21 themselves] himselfe MS 22 marg. om. MS

[48] great actions, [49] vain-glory cannot do so. [50] ^ one's own [51] histories of great things, or fictitious stories; [52] ingratitude; [53] ^ with those people[1]

[1] 'illis' ('with those people') seems clumsy here, as it appears to refer to friends, whereas Hobbes's theory concerns enemies (cf. Elements of Law, I.ix.14). Possibly some words went missing from the Latin draft: 'with those people who have harmed them'.

Gaudium quod in homine oritur ab Imaginatione Potentiae aut Virtutis propriae, animi exultatio quaedam est, quam vocant Gloriam: quae si fundetur in experientia actionum suarum, eadem est cum Fiducia. Sin fundata sit in adulatione hominum; vel à seipso ficta propter voluptatem quae magnas actiones solet consequi, Gloria inanis vel vana dicitur. Fiducia enim gignit Aggressum; id quod inanis Gloria producere non potest. Gloria. Gloria inanis.

Dolor natus à propriae impotentiae opinione, Demissio animi dicitur. Demissio animi.

Inanis Gloria, quae consistit in ficta suppositione virtutum, quas nobis scimus non inesse, propria fere est Iuvenum, aliturque à rerum magnarum Historiis, vel à narrationibus fictis; corrigitur autem magna ex parte Aetate & Negotiis.

Gloriatio subita Passio illa est, quae producit Risum; habet autem pro causa, vel subitam aliquam actionem propriam, in qua, qui eam fecit, sibi placet, vel conceptum Turpitudinis vel facti alieni indecori, comparatione cujus subito sibimet ipsi commendatur. Contingit autem hoc illis maximè, qui cum virtutum paucissimarum conscii sibi sint, bonam de seipsis opinionem conservare non possunt, nisi infirmitates aliorum hominum observando. Itaque multus Risus signum est Pusillanimitatis. Animi enim magni opus proprium est auxiliari, & à contemptu alios liberare; seipsos autem cum maximis hominibus solis comparare. Risus.

Contra, Demissio animi subita passio est, quae producit Fletum; cujus causa sunt accidentia illa, quae magnam spem aliquam, vel potentiae suae statumen aliquod subitò destruit. Fletus.

Fletui autem subjecti sunt illi qui auxiliis externis maximè indigent, quales sunt foeminae & pueri. Alii itaque jacturam deflent amicorum; alii ingratitudinem; alii etiam flent quando cum illis[l] conciliantur, propterea quod inde oritur vindictae speratae obstructio subita. Semper autem tum Risus, tum Fletus motus sunt subiti; & consuetudine minuuntur. Nemo enim aut veteres jocos ridet, aut calamitates deflet veteres.

Shame. Griefe, [54]for the discovery[m] of some defect of ability,[54] is SHAME, or the pas-°Blushing.° sion that discovereth it selfe in BLUSHING; °and consisteth in the apprehension of some thing dishonourable;° and in young men, is a signe of the love of good reputation; and commendable: In old men [55]it is a signe of the same; but because it comes too late,[55] not commendable.

Impudence. The Contempt of good Reputation is called IMPUDENCE.

Pitty. Griefe, for the Calamity of another, is PITTY; and ariseth from the imagination that the like calamity may befall himselfe; and therefore is called also COMPASSION, °and in the phrase of this present time a FELLOW-FEELING:°
And therefore for Calamity arriving from great wickedness, [56]the best men have the least[56] Pitty; and for the same Calamity, those have least Pitty, that think themselves least obnoxious[n] to the same.

Contempt, °or little sense° of the calamity of others, is that which [28] men Cruelty. call CRUELTY; proceeding from [57]Security of their own fortune.[57] For, that any man should take pleasure in other mens °great° harmes, without other end of his own, I do not conceive it possible.

Griefe, for the successe of a Competitor in wealth, honour, or other good, if it be joyned with Endeavour to [58]enforce[p] our own abilities to equall or ex-
Emulation. ceed him,[58] is called EMULATION: But joyned with Endeavour to supplant,[q]
Envy. or hinder a Competitor, ENVIE.

When in the mind of man, Appetites, and Aversions, Hopes, and Feares, concerning one and the same thing, arise alternately; and divers good and evill consequences of the doing, or omitting the thing propounded, come successively into our thoughts; so that sometimes we have an Appetite to it; sometimes an Aversion from it; sometimes Hope to be able to do it; sometimes °Despaire, or° Feare to attempt it; the whole summe of [59]Desires, Aversions, Hopes and Fears,[59] continued till the thing be either done, or [60]thought Deliberation. impossible,[60] is that we call DELIBERATION.

2 marg. om. MS 2 consisteth] consisted B 4 is a signe of the] signe of MS 11 have least] hate B 16 his] their MS 19 him] them MS 20 a] our MS 22 alternately; and] alternately. So that as MS 24 so that sometimes] sometime MS 25 Aversion from it;] Auersion. MS 26 the] That MS

[54] when we think that something we have done is unseemly, [55] , because they are less worthy of pardon, it is [56] there is so much the less [57] the opinion of their own security.
[58] increase our own diligence, [59] passions, [60] abandoned,

[m] = manifestation (OED, 'discovery', 2.c).
[n] = liable, exposed, subject (OED, 'obnoxious', adj., 1–2).
[p] = strengthen, impart fresh vigour to (OED, 'enforce', v., 2–3).
[q] 'Supplant' had a range of meanings, including 'trip up', 'cause the downfall of', 'root out', and 'get rid of', in addition to its modern sense of 'dispossess and take the place of' (OED, 'supplant', v., 1–5).

Dolor ille qui oritur ab eo, quod indécorum aliquod nostrum admissum putamus, Pudor dicitur, ostenditurque per Erubescentiam. [30] Passio haec in Adolescentibus laudatur, ut signum cupientis nihil facere, nisi quod sit laudabile. In senibus non laudatur, propterea quod minus Venia digni sunt senes. Pudor.

Contemptus bonae existimationis appellatur Impudentia. Impudentia.

Dolor ob calamitatem alienam, dicitur Misericordia, oriturque à consideratione, quod sibimet ipsi contingere potest calamitas similis; Et ob eam rem vocari etiam solet Compassio. Calamitas itaque aliena, si à magno oriatur ipsius cui contingit scelere, tanto minus producit Misericordiam. Item in eadem calamitate minùs Misericordes sunt illi, qui calamitati simili minimè obnoxios se esse judicant. Misericordia.

Alienae calamitatis contemptus, nominatur Crudelitas, proceditque à propriae securitatis opinione. Nam ut aliquis sibi placeat in malis alienis, sine alio fine, videtur mihi impossibile. Crudelitas.

Dolor ob successum Competitoris alicujus circa honorem, aut divitias, aut aliud bonum, si conjunctus sit cum conatu diligentiam propriam augendi, Aemulatio dicitur; sin conjungatur cum conatu Competitorem fallendi vel impediendi, Invidia est. Aemulatio. Invidia.

Quando in animo humano Appetitus, Aversio, Spes, Metus, circa rem eandem oriuntur alternatim, veniuntque in animum Faciendi, Omittendique bonae malaeque consequentiae successivè; adeo ut interdum appetamus, interdum fugiamus; interdum speremus, interdum metuamus; tunc totum illud passionum aggregatum, eatenus durans dum res effecta sit, vel rejecta, vocatur Deliberatio. Deliberatio.

22 malaeque] malaeve 70 24 eatenus durans dum] tamdiu durans quousque 70

Therefore of things past, there is no Deliberation; because °manifestly° impossible to be changed: nor of things known to be impossible, or thought so; because [61]men know, or think such Deliberation[61] vain. But of things impossible, which we think possible, we may Deliberate; not knowing it is in vain. And it is called Deliberation; because it is a putting an end to the Liberty we had of doing, or omitting, °according to our own Appetite, or Aversion.°

This alternate Succession of Appetites, Aversions, [62]Hopes and Fears,[62] is no lesse in other living Creatures then in Man: [63]and therefore[63] Beasts also Deliberate.

Every Deliberation is then sayd to End, when that whereof they Deliberate, is either done, or [64]thought[64] impossible; because till then wee retain the liberty of doing, or omitting, according to our [65]Appetite, or Aversion.[65]

The Will.

In Deliberation, the last Appetite, or Aversion, immediately adhaering to the action, °or to the omission thereof,° is that wee call the WILL; the Act, (not the faculty,) of Willing. And Beasts that have Deliberation, must necessarily also have Will. The Definition of the Will, given commonly by the Schooles, that it is a Rationall Appetite,[s] is not [66]good.[66] For if it were, then could there be no Voluntary Act against Reason. For a Voluntary Act is that, which proceedeth from the Will, and no other. But if in stead of a Rationall Appetite, we shall say an Appetite resulting from a precedent Deliberation, then the Definition is the same that I have given here. Will therefore is the last Appetite in Deliberating. And though we [67] say in common Discourse, a man had a Will once to do a thing, that neverthelesse he [68] forbore to do; yet that is properly but an Inclination, which makes no Action Voluntary; because the action depends not of [69]it,[69] but of the last Inclination, or Appetite. For [70]if the intervenient Appetites, make any action Voluntary; then by the same Reason all intervenient Aversions, should make the same action Involuntary; and so one and the same action, should[70] be both Voluntary & Involuntary. [29]

By this it is manifest, that not onely actions that have their beginning from [71]Covetousnesse, Ambition, Lust, or other Appetites to the thing propounded;[71] but also those that have their beginning from Aversion, or Feare of those consequences that follow the omission, are voluntary actions.

19 a] om. MS 25 last . . . Appetite.] last. MS 30 Lust,] om. B

---

[61] deliberation about such things is [62] etc., [63] for [64] rendered[r] [65] choice.
[66] legitimate. [67] ^very often [68] ^later [69] every, [70] the intervening appetites or inclinations are not wills; for if they were, all actions would at the same time [71] an appetite for something;

---

[r] 'redditum' ('rendered') here may perhaps be a scribal or typographical error for 'creditum' ('believed'). [s] E.g., Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, qu. 77, resp.

Itaque de rebus praeteritis Deliberatio nulla est, quia praeteritum immutabile est; neque rerum quas scimus vel putamus esse impossibiles, quia talium Deliberatio vana est. Impossibilium autem quae possibilia esse arbitramur, Deliberatio datur, ut quam vanam esse nescimus. Deliberatio autem ideo dicitur, quia libertatis quam habemus faciendi, omittendive finis est. Alterna haec successio Appetitus, Aversionis, &c. communis est homini cum animalibus caeteris. Nam Deliberant etiam bestiae.

Deliberatio finiri tunc dicitur, quando id, de quo Deliberatum est, factum est vel redditum[r] impossibile; propterea quod eatenus libertatem faciendi vel non faciendi pro arbitrio retinemus.

In Deliberatione, Appetitus ultimus vel Aversio, actioni de qua Deliberatum est immediatè adhaerens, est Voluntas; Actus, inquam, non potentia Volendi. Vnde sequitur bestias, quia Deliberant, etiam Voluntate praeditas esse. Definitio Voluntatis Scholastica, nempe Voluntatem Appetitum esse rationalem[s] legitima non est. Nam si esset, nulla omnino esse posset actio Voluntaria contra Rationem. Actio enim Voluntaria [31] est ea, quae à Voluntate proficiscitur, nec ulla alia. Quod si pro Appetitu Rationali dicamus Appetitum, qui oritur à Deliberatione antecedente, tunc Definitio eadem est quam dixi, nempe ultimus in Deliberando Appetitus. Quanquam autem vulgo saepissimè dicamus habuisse aliquem Voluntatem faciendi id, quod facere postea noluit; id tamen non Voluntas propriè est, sed Inclinatio, quae actionem non facit, ut sit Voluntaria, quae dependere debet non ab omni, sed ab ultimo Appetitu. Intervenientes enim Appetitus sive Inclinationes non sunt Voluntates; si enim essent, omnes actiones simul essent & Voluntariae & Involuntariae.

Voluntas.

Manifestum hinc est Voluntarias actiones esse non modò eas, quae incipiunt ab Appetitu alicujus rei, sed etiam illas, quae proficiscuntur ab Aversione, vel à Metu eventuum qui consequuntur Facti alicujus omissionem.

Forms of Speech, in Passion.

The formes of Speech by which the Passions are expressed, are partly the same, [72]and partly different from[72] those, by which wee expresse our [73] Thoughts. And first, generally all Passions may be expressed Indicatively; as I love, I feare, I joy, I deliberate, I will, °I command:° but some of them have particular expressions by themselves, which neverthelesse are not affirmations, unlesse it be when they serve to make other inferences, °besides that of the Passion they proceed from.° Deliberation is expressed Subjunctively; which is a speech proper to signifie suppositions, with their consequences; as, If this be done, then this will follow; and differs not from the language of Reasoning, save that Reasoning is in generall words; but Deliberation for the most part is of Particulars. The language of Desire, and Aversion, is Imperative; as Do this, forbeare that; which when the party is obliged to do, or forbeare, is Command; otherwise Prayer; or els Counsell. The language of Vain-Glory, of Indignation, Pitty and [74]Revengefulness,[74] Optative: But of the Desire to know, there is a peculiar expression, called Interrogative; as, What is it, when shall it, how is it done, and why so? Other language of the Passions I find none: For Cursing, Swearing, Reviling, °and the like,° do not signifie [75] as Speech; but as the actions of a tongue [76] accustomed.

These formes of Speech, I say, are °expressions, or° voluntary significations of our Passions: but certain signes they be not; because they [77]may be used arbitrarily, whether they that use them, have such Passions or not.[77] The best signes of Passions present, are in the countenance, motions of the body, actions, [78]and ends, or aimes, which we otherwise know the man to have.[78]

And because in Deliberation, the Appetites, and Aversions are raised by foresight of the good and evill consequences, and sequels of the action whereof we Deliberate; [79]the good or evill effect thereof dependeth on the foresight of [79] a long chain of consequences, of which very seldome any man is able to see to the end. [80]But for so farre as a man seeth, if the Good in those consequences,[80] be greater than the Evill, the whole chaine is °that which Writers call° Apparent, or Seeming Good. And contrarily, when the Evill exceedeth the Good, the whole is Apparent or Seeming Evill: so that he who hath by Experience, or Reason, the [81]greatest and surest[81] prospect of Consequences, Deliberates best himselfe; and is able °when he will,° to give the best counsell unto others.

Good and Evill apparent.

22 are this edn.; are {eyther del. by TH} MS] are either H, B 33 the] om. MS

---

[72] as [73] ^ other [74] many other desires, [75] ^ passions [76] ^ ill-
[77] are voluntary. [78] ends, and business of men. [79] and are alternate, making [80] ; if the good consequences in that chain seem to [81] longest Formulae loquendi in Passionibus.

Formulae Sermonis quibus Passiones declarantur, partim eaedem sunt quibus alias significamus Cogitationes. Et primo generatim Passiones omnes proferri possunt Indicativè; ut Amo, Metuo, Gaudeo, Delibero, Volo, &c. Sunt autem aliquae quae suas habent prolationes sibi proprias; quae tamen Affirmationes non sunt, nisi quando inserviunt Illationibus. Deliberatio profertur Subjunctivè, qui modus proprius est Suppositionum à quibus ducimus Consequentias; ut, si hoc fiat, tunc sequetur illud; nec differt à Sermone ratiocinandi, nisi quod in ratiocinatione nominibus utimur Vniversalibus; in Deliberatione plerumque Singularibus. Sermo Cupiditatis & Aversionis est Imperativus; ut, hoc fac, ab hoc abstine; quae verba ad illum qui ad faciendum vel abstinendum obligatur, mandatum dicitur; alioqui Precatio; vel Consilium. Sermo vanae Gloriae, item Indignationis, & Misericordiae, aliarumque multarum cupiditatum sermo est Optativus. Cupiditatis autem cognoscendi sermo peculiaris est Interrogativus; ut Quid est; Quando erit; Quomodo factum est; Quid ita. Passionum sermones alios non reperio. Iurationes enim maledictionesque & convitia Passiones non significant ut Verba, sed ut Actiones male moratae linguae.

Formulae hae significationes quidem sunt Passionum Voluntariae; signa autem certa non sunt; idque, quia Voluntaria sunt. Passionis Praesentis certissima signa sunt illa, quae à Vultu, Gestu, Actionibus, Finibus, Negotiisque hominum capiuntur.

Bonum & Malum apparens.

Quoniam in Deliberatione, Appetitus & Aversiones à prospectu Bonorum & Malorum, consequentium actionem de qua deliberamus, alternae sunt, & catenam longam faciunt consequentiarum, cujus [32] finem saepenumero non videmus; si in catena illa visa sint consequentia plura Bona quam Mala, totum aggregatum Bonum est apparens; si plura Mala quam Bona, tunc totum Malum apparens est. Is igitur qui Ratiocinatione vel Experientia longissimum sibi consequentiarum prospectum acquisivit, is optimè deliberat, & optimus aliis Consiliarius esse potest.

22–3 marg. one para. earlier in 70

Felicity

Continuall successe in obtaining those things which a man °from time to time° desireth, °that is to say, continuall prospering,° is that men call FELICITY; I mean the Felicity of this life. For there is no such thing as perpetuall Tranquillity of mind, while we live here; because Life it selfe is but Motion, and can never be without Desire, [30] nor without Feare, [82] no more than without Sense. °What kind of Felicity God hath ordained to them that devoutly honour him, a man shall no sooner know, than enjoy; being joyes, that now are as incomprehensible, as the word of Schoole-men Beatificall Vision[t] is unintelligible.°

°Praise.°

°Magnification.°

°μακαρισμός.°

The forme of Speech whereby men signifie their opinion of the Goodnesse of any thing, is PRAISE. That whereby they signifie the power and greatnesse of any thing, is MAGNIFYING. And that whereby they signifie the opinion they have of a mans Felicity, is by the Greeks called μακαρισμός,[u] °for which wee have no name in our tongue.° And thus much is sufficient for the present purpose, to have been said of the PASSIONS.

3 marg. om. MS

[82] ^ and the other passions,

[t] = the immediate knowledge of God enjoyed by the souls of the righteous after death (see Aquinas, ST III, Supp., qu. 92).

[u] = the action of pronouncing a person happy or blessed.

Perpetuus in rebus Cupitis bonus successus, illud ipsum est quod vocari solet Felicitas; Felicitatem intelligo praesentis vitae. Nulla enim est animi dum vivimus perpetua Tranquillitas; quia vita ipsa Motus est, neque sine cupiditate, metuque, aliisque passionibus vivere homo potest, magis quam sine sensu.

Formula sermonis, qua quis opinionem suam significat de alicujus rei Bonitate, Laus est. Formula qua significat potentiam & magnitudinem rei, est Magnificatio. Forma qua significat opinionem quam habet de alicujus Felicitate, à Graecis vocatur μακαρισμός.[u] Atque haec de Passionibus, quatenus ad Institutum praesens, dicta sufficiant.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Ends, °or Resolutions° of DISCOURSE.

Of all Discourse, governed by desire of Knowledge, there is at last an End, either by attaining, or by giving over. [1]And in the chain of Discourse, wheresoever it be interrupted, there is an End for that time.[1]

If the Discourse be meerly Mentall, it consisteth of thoughts that the thing will be, and will not be; or that it has been, and has not been, alternately. So that wheresoever [2]you break off the chayn of a mans Discourse, you leave him in[2] a Praesumption of it will be, or, it will not be; or it has been, or, has not been; [3]All which[3] is Opinion. And that which is alternate Appetite, in Deliberating concerning Good and Evil; the same is alternate Opinion, in the Enquiry of the truth of Past, and Future. And as the last Appetite in Deliberation, is called the Will; so the last Opinion in search of the truth of Past, and Future, is called the JUDGEMENT, or [4]Resolute and Finall Sentence of him that discourseth.[4] And as the whole chain of Appetites alternate, in the question of Good, or Bad, is called Deliberation; so the whole chain of Opinions alternate, in the question of True, or False, is called DOUBT.

Judgement, °or Sentence final.°

Doubt.

No Discourse whatsoever, can End in absolute knowledge of Fact,[a] past, or to come. For, as for the knowledge of Fact, it is originally, Sense; and ever after, Memory. And for the knowledge of Consequence, which I have said before is called Science, it is not Absolute, but Conditionall. No man can know by Discourse, that this, or that, is, has been, or will be; which is to know absolutely: but onely, that if This be, That is; if This has been, That has been; if This shall be, That shall be: which is to know conditionally; and not the consequence of [5]one thing to another; but of one name of a thing, to another name of the same thing.[5]

And therefore, when the Discourse is put into Speech, and begins with the Definitions of Words, and proceeds by Connexion of the same into generall Affirmations, and of these again into Syllogismes; [31] [6]the End or last summe is called the Conclusion; and the thought of the mind by it signified, is that conditionall Knowledge, or Knowledge of the consequence of words, which is commonly called SCIENCE.[6] But if the first ground of such Dis-

Science.

7 be; or] be, alternately; or MS; befor B 11 in the] in MS
17 called] called dubitation, and MS 24 and not MS] and that not H, B

CAPVT VII.

De Discursuum Determinationibus.

Omnis Discursus, si à Cupiditate Cognitionis gubernetur, vel in Adeptione terminatur, vel in Rejectione. Quod si Cogitationum series pro tempore tantum interrumpatur, non ideo Determinata dicenda est.

Si discursus in solis fiat Cogitationibus, tunc consistit in cogitationibus Quod fiet, vel Quod non fiet; vel Quod fuit, vel Quod non fuit, alternis. Itaque ubicunque Discursus desinit, relinquitur Praesumtio quod erit, vel non erit; vel fuit, vel non fuit. Quae Determinatio appellatur Opinio. Atque id quod in Deliberando de Bono & Malo, Appetitus est alternus, in inquisitione veritatis facti Praeteriti vel Futuri, est alterna Opinio. Sicut autem in Deliberatione, Appetitus ultimus est Voluntas; ita in quaestione Praeteriti vel Futuri, Opinio ultima est Iudicium, sive Sententia finalis. Et sicut tota series Appetituum alternorum in quaestione Boni vel Mali Deliberatio dicitur; ita in quaestione Veri vel Falsi series tota Opinionum alternarum dicitur Dubitatio. Iudicium. Dubitatio.

Discursus nullus in Cognitione perfecta Praeteriti vel Futuri terminare potest. Nam Cognitio Facti originaliter Sensio est, & deinde Memoria. Et Cognitio Consequentiarum, quae ut ante dixi, [33] Scientia appellatur, Scientia Absoluta non est, sed tantum Conditionalis. Nemo per Discursum scire potest hoc vel illud esse, fuisse, vel futurum esse; id quod est perfectè scire; sed tantum, si hoc sit, tum illud est; si hoc fuit, tum fuit illud; si hoc erit, tum illud erit; id quod est scire conditionaliter; & scire non rei ad rem, sed nominis ad nomen consequentiam. Si Discursus ergo sit in verbis, incipiatque à Definitionibus Verborum, procedatque per Connectionem eorum in Propositiones, & rursus Propositionum in Syllogismos, determinabitur in aliqua Conclusione, quae summa est omnium antecedentium Propositionum. Atque haec Scientia est, sive Cognitio Consequentiarum unius verbi ad aliud. Verum si Scientia.

13 marg. at start of previous para. in 68, 70 15 marg. at start of this para. in 68, 70
16 terminare] terminari 70 23 incipiatque] incipiens 70

---

[1] But if the chain of discourse is interrupted only temporarily, it should not be described, on that account, as ended. [2] a discourse breaks off, there is left [3] . This resolution [4] final sentence.
[5] thing to thing, but of name to name. [6] it ends in some conclusion, which is the sum of all the previous general affirmations. And this is science, or the knowledge of the consequences of one word to another.

---

[a] Throughout this chapter, the basic sense of 'fact' is 'thing done', either in the general sense of a physical event, or in the particular sense of a deed committed by a person (OED, 'fact', n., 1.a).

course, be not Definitions; or if the Definitions be not rightly joyned together into Syllogismes, then the End or Conclusion, is again [7]OPINION, namely of the truth of somewhat said, though sometimes in absurd and senslesse words, without possibility of being understood.[7] When two, or more men, know [8] of one and the same fact, they are said to be CONSCIOUS of it °one to another; which is as much as to know it together.° And because such are fittest witnesses of the facts of one another, °or of a third;° it was, and ever will be reputed a very Evill act, for any man to speak against his Conscience; or to [9]corrupt, or force[9] another so to do: [10]Insomuch that the plea of Conscience, has been alwayes hearkened unto very diligently in all times. Afterwards, men made use of the same word metaphorically,[10] for the knowledge of their own secret facts, and secret thoughts; °and therefore it is Rhetorically said, that the Conscience is a thousand witnesses.°[b] And last of all, men, vehemently in love with their own [11] new opinions, (though never so absurd,) and obstinately bent to maintain them, gave those their opinions also that [12]reverenced[12] name of Conscience, as if [13]they would have it seem unlawfull, to change or speak against them;[13] and so pretend to know they are true, when they know at most, but that they think so.

°Opinion.°

Conscience.

When a mans Discourse beginneth not at Definitions, it [14]beginneth either at some other contemplation of his own, and then it is still called Opinion; Or[14] it beginneth at some saying of another, of whose [15]ability to know the truth,[15] and of whose honesty in not deceiving, he doubteth not; [16]and then the Discourse is not so much concerning the Thing, as the Person; And the Resolution is called[16] BELEEFE, and FAITH: Faith, in the man; Beleefe, [17]both of the man, and of the truth of what he sayes. So that in Beleefe are two opinions; one of the saying of the man; the other of his vertue.[17] To have faith in, or trust to, or beleeve a man, signifie [18] the same thing; namely, an opinion of the veracity of the man: But to beleeve what is said, signifieth onely an opinion of the truth of the saying. But wee are to observe that this Phrase, I beleeve in; as also the Latine, Credo in; and the Greek, πιστεύω εἰς, are never used but in the writings of Divines. °In stead of them,° in other writings are put, I beleeve him; I trust him; I have faith in him; I rely on him: °and in Latin, Credo illi; fido illi: and in Greek, πιστεύω αὐτῷ: and that this singularity of the Ecclesiastique use of the word hath raised many disputes about the right object of the Christian Faith.°

Beliefe. Faith.

5 Conscience] Conscious B 20 still called] called still MS 31 other] all other MS
33 that] {gap with a line through it} MS

Discursus non incipiat à Definitionibus, vel si Definitiones illae non rectè connectantur in Syllogismos, tunc rursus Discursus terminatur in Opinione tantùm, veritatis conclusionis, utcunque absurdae & insignificantis. Quando duo vel plures idem simul sciunt, Conscii dicuntur; & quia illi factorum suorum mutuo testes maximè idonei sunt, maxima semper fuit & erit existimata improbitas, testimonium contra conscientiam dicere, vel alium ut dicat inducere. Vsurpatur autem vox Conscientia saepissimè pro sua cujusque facti vel cogitati secreta cognitione. Sunt etiam qui proprias Opiniones suas privatas novasque, propter amorem ingenii proprii (etsi aliquando absurdissimas) obstinatè sustinent, sub nomine illo Conscientiae favorabili; tamquam illas mutare peccatum maximum esset. Itaque veritatem illarum scire se videri volunt, quando nihil sciunt nisi quod ipsi ita opinantur. Conscientia.

Quando Discursus non incipit à Definitione, terminatur semper in Opinione. Quod si incipit ab alicujus alterius hominis Affirmatione, de cujus hominis neque Cognitione neque Veracitate dubitamus, quia quaestio est non tam de Re, quam de Persona; tunc determinatur in Creditione, & Fide; Fide, inquam, Homini habita; creditione Rei. Credere in hominem, & credere homini, idem plerumque significant; nempe opinionem de veracitate ejus; sed credere aliquod dictum, significat opinionem tantùm veritatis ipsius dicti. Notandum autem est dictionem hanc credo in, ut & Graecam πιστεύω εἰς, rarissimè usurpari praeterquam in libris Theologicis. Scriptores caeteri dicunt credo illi; confido illi; fidem illi habeo. Credere. Fides.

[7] merely opinion of the truth of the conclusion, however absurd and senseless it may be.
[8] ^ at the same time [9] induce [10] . However, men very often use the word 'conscience'
[11] ^ private and [12] favourable [13] it were the greatest sin to change them;
[14] always ends in opinion. For if [15] thinking [16] since it is a matter not so much of the thing as of the person, in that case it ends in [17] in the thing. [18] ^ generally

[b] Quintilian, Institutio oratorica, V.xi.41.

But by Beleeving in, as it is in the [19] Creed, is meant, not trust in the Person; but Confession and acknowledgement of the Doctrine[20]. For not onely Christians, but all manner of men do so believe in God, as to hold all for truth [21]they heare him say,[21] whether they understand it, or not; which is all the Faith and trust can possibly be had °in any person whatsoever:° But they do not all believe the Doctrine of the Creed[22]. [32]

From whence we may inferre, that when wee believe [23]any saying whatsoever it be,[23] to be true, from arguments taken, not from the thing it selfe, or from the principles of naturall Reason, but from the Authority, and good opinion wee have, of him that hath sayd it; then is the speaker, [24]or person we believe in, or trust in, and whose word we take, the object of our Faith; and the Honour done in Believing, is done to him onely.[24] And consequently, when wee Believe that the [25] Scriptures are the word of God, having no immediate revelation [26]from God himselfe, our Beleefe, Faith, and Trust is in the Church; whose word we take, and acquiesce therein.[26] And they that believe that which a Prophet relates unto them in the name of God, [27]take the word of [27] the Prophet, do honour to him, and in him trust, and believe, °touching the truth of what he relateth,° whether he be a true, or a false Prophet. And so it is also with all other History. For if I should not believe all that is written by Historians, of the [28]glorious acts[28] of Alexander, or Caesar; I do not think °the Ghost of° Alexander, or Caesar, had any just cause to be offended; or any body else, but the Historian. If Livy say [29]the Gods made once a Cow speak,[29] and we believe it not; wee distrust not God therein, but Livy.[d] So that it is evident, that whatsoever we believe, upon no other reason, then what is drawn from authority of men onely, °and their writings; whether they be sent from God or not,° is Faith in men onely[30].

1 by] om. MS 16 take] {taketh with th smudged} MS 17 do] {does with s smudged} MS 17 trust] {trusteth with th smudged} MS 17 believe] {beleeueth with th smudged} MS 18–20 And so] So MS

[19] ^ Christian [20] ^ propounded in several articles [21] that he has said or will say, [22] ^ ; only Christians do so [23] anything [24] the principal and proper object of our faith. [25] ^ Holy [26] , our faith is in the Church, in whose authority we have acquiesced. [27] must be said to have faith in [28] virtues [29] that a cow spoke, [30] ^ , not in God

[c] The construction of this sentence, even with its two most glaring errors emended here (with 'eorum' for 'ejus', and the omission of 68's second 'objectum'), is defective, but the sense is nevertheless clear.

[d] Livy, Ab urbe condita, III.10 and XLI.12 (where, however, Livy does not endorse the claim: he describes it as having been 'believed' in the first passage, and 'announced' in the second).

Sed credere in, in Symbolo Fidei Christianae, non propriè significat Fidem quae habetur Personae, sed doctrinae pluribus articulis propositae agnitionem sive Confessionem. Etenim non Christiani soli, sed etiam homines omnes ita in Deum credunt, ut quicquid dixerit vel dicturus sit pro vero agnoscant; idque sive intelligant, sive non [34] intelligant. Qua Fide major esse nulla potest. Doctrinam autem Symboli non omnes credunt, sed soli Christiani.

Manifestum hinc est, quod qui verum aliquid esse putant, non propter argumenta sumpta ex ipsa re, aut ex principiis Rationis naturalis, sed ab authoritate & ab existimatione bona personae loquentis, Fidei eorum[c] objectum principaliter & propriè esse personam loquentem. Itaque quando credimus Scripturas Sacras esse Verbum Dei, Fides nostra, nisi specialem aliquam habeamus Revelationem, terminatur in Ecclesia, in cujus authoritate acquievimus. Etiam illi, qui credunt id, quod narratur Dei nomine à Propheta, Fidem Prophetae habere, illumque honorare, illi credere & fidere dicendi sunt, sive verus, sive falsus sit Propheta. Etiam circa caeteras Historias eodem modo se res habet. Nam si omnia ea quae de virtutibus dicta sunt Alexandri aut Caesaris credere recusarem, non puto illos merito mihi succensuros esse, aut alium quemlibet praeter Historiae conscriptorem. Si Livio non credamus locutam esse bovem, non Deo sed Livio diffidimus.[d] Perspicuum ergo est, si quid credamus, nullo alio argumento, quam quod ducitur ab authoritate humana, Fidem nostram non Deo, sed in Homine tantùm determinari.

10 eorum this edn.] ejus 68, 70 11 propriè 70] propriè objectum 68

CHAP. VIII.

Of the VERTUES °commonly called° INTELLECTUALL*; and their contrary* DEFECTS.

°Intellectuall Vertue defined.°

VERTUE generally, in all sorts of subjects, is somewhat that is valued for eminence; and consisteth in comparison. For if all things were equally in all men, nothing would be prized. And by Vertues INTELLECTUALL, are °alwayes° understood such abilityes of the mind, as men praise, value, and desire should be in themselves; and go commonly under the name of a good wit; though the same word WIT, be used also, to distinguish one certain ability from the rest.

Wit, Naturall, °or Acquired.°

These Vertues are of two sorts; Naturall, and Acquired. By Naturall, I mean not, that which a man hath from his Birth: for that is nothing else but Sense; wherein [1]men differ so little one from another, and from brute Beasts, as it is not to be reckoned amongst Vertues.[1] But I mean, that Wit, which is gotten [2] by Use onely, and Experience; without Method, Culture, or Instruction.

°Naturall Wit.°

This NATURALL WIT, consisteth °principally° in two things; Celerity of Imagining, (that is, [3]swift[3] succession of one thought to another;) and steddy direction to some [4]approved[4] end. On the Contrary a slow Imagination, maketh that Defect, or fault of the mind, which is commonly called [5]DULNESSE,[5] Stupidity, and sometimes by other names that signifie slownesse of motion, °or difficulty to be moved.° [33]

And this difference of quicknesse, is caused by the difference of mens passions; that love and dislike, some one thing, some another: and therefore some mens thoughts run one way, some another; and are [6]held to, and observe differently the things that passe through their imagination.[6] And whereas in this succession of mens thoughts, there is nothing to observe °in the things they think on,° but either in what they be like one another, or in what they be unlike, or what they serve for, or how they serve to such a purpose; Those that [7] observe their similitudes, in case they be such as are but rarely observed by others, are sayd to have a Good Wit; by which, °in this occasion,° is meant a Good Fancy. But they that [8] observe their differences, and dissimilitudes; which is called Distinguishing, and Discerning, and Judging [9] between thing and thing; in case, such discerning be not easie, are said to have a good Judgement: and particularly in matter of conversation[a] and businesse; wherein, times, places, and persons are to be discerned, this Vertue is [10] called DISCRETION. °The °Good Wit, or Fancy.°

°Good° Judgement.

°Discretion.°

4–5 marg. om. MS 4 that is] om. MS 10–11 marg. om. MS

CAPVT VIII.

De Virtutibus Intellectualibus; Defectibusque Oppositis.

Virtus in omni re aliquid est propter eminentiam spectabile, consistitque in comparatione. Nam si omnia omnibus aequaliter adessent, nihil esset, quod haberetur pro eximio. Per Virtutes intellectuales intelliguntur Facultates animi illae, quas laudare, magnifacere, & sibimet ipsis inesse cupere homines solent; & vulgò nomine Boni Ingenii comprehenduntur; quanquam Ingenium significet aliquando etiam Facultatem certam à caeteris distinctam.

Ingenium naturale.

Virtutes autem hae duorum sunt generum; Naturales, & Acquisitae. Per Ingenium naturale non intelligo illud tantum quod cum homine nascitur, quod aliud non est quam Sensus, in quo unus homo alii non multo magis praestat quam bestiae; sed intelligo Ingenium, quod usu solo & experientia, sine Methodo, Cultu vel Doctrina accedit hominibus aetate. Consistit autem in duabus rebus, Celeritate imaginandi (id est unius cogitationis ad aliam successione facili) & prosecutione constanti Finis alicujus propositi. Contrà, imaginatio tarda Defectum animi [35] illum facit, qui Tarditas vocari solet vel Stupor, aliisve nominibus quibus significari solet Motus Tardus.

Differentia autem Celeritatis à differentibus oritur hominum Passionibus, quorum alii aliud amant & fugiunt; unde cogitationes diversorum hominum diversae procedunt, & diversimodè rebus applicantur. Cum autem in successione cogitationum nihil observari solet, nisi similitudo vel dissimilitudo; vel cui rei inservire & quomodo possunt; illi qui similitudines maximè animadvertunt, aliis rarò animadversas, bonum dicuntur habere Ingenium, id est bonam Phantasiam. Illi vero qui rerum cogitatarum differentias, dissimilitudinesque maximè observant; id est qui inter rem & rem bene Distinguunt, Discernunt, & Dijudicant, nisi Dijudicatio illa facilis sit, habere dicuntur bonum Iudicium. Speciatim autem in conversatione civili, negotiisque agendis (ubi tempora, loca, & personae discernenda sunt,) virtus haec communit-

Iudicium.

22 solet] soleat 70 23 possunt] possint 70 24 animadvertunt 68-Errata] adnimadvertunt 68

[1] one man excels another little more than he does a beast. [2] ^ with age [3] easy
[4] proposed [5] slowness, [6] applied to things in different ways. [7] ^ most of all
[8] ^ most of all [9] ^ well [10] ^ commonly

[a] = social behaviour (OED, 'conversation', 1–2, 4–6).

former, that is,° Fancy, without the help of Judgement, is [11]not commended as a Vertue:[11] but the later which is Judgement, and Discretion, is commended for it selfe, without the help of Fancy. Besides the Discretion of times, places, and persons, [12]necessary to a good Fancy,[12] there is required also an often application of his thoughts to their End; that is to say, to some use to be made of them. [13]This done; he that hath this Vertue, will be easily fitted with[13] similitudes, that will please, not onely by illustration of his discourse, [14]and[14] adorning it with new and apt metaphors; [15]but also,[15] by the rarity of their invention. But without Steddinesse, and Direction [16] to some End, a great Fancy is one kind of Madnesse; such as they have, that entring into any discourse, are snatched from their purpose, by [17] every thing that comes in their thought, into so many, and so long digressions, and Parentheses, that they [18]utterly lose themselves: Which kind of folly, I know no particular name for: but[18] the cause of it is, sometimes want of experience; whereby that seemeth to a man new and [19]rare, which doth not so to others: sometimes Pusillanimity; by which that seems great to him, which other men think a trifle:[19] and whatsoever is new, or great, and °therefore thought° fit to be told, [20] withdrawes a man by degrees from the intended way of his discourse.

In [21]a good Poem, whether it be Epique, or Dramatique; as also in Sonnets, Epigrams, and other Pieces,[21] both Judgement and Fancy are required: But the Fancy must be more eminent; because [22]they please[22] for the Extravagancy; but ought not to displease by Indiscretion.

In a good History, the Judgement must be eminent; because the goodnesse consisteth, in the Method, in the Truth, and in the Choyse of the actions °that are most profitable to be known.° Fancy has no place, but onely in adorning the [23]stile.[23]

In Orations of Prayse, and in Invectives, the Fancy [24]is[24] praedominant; because the designe is not truth, but to Honour or Dishonour; which is done by noble, or by vile [25] comparisons. The Judgement does but suggest what circumstances make an action laudable, or culpable. [34]

In Hortatives, and Pleadings, as Truth, or Disguise serveth best to the Designe in hand; so is the Judgement, or the Fancy most required.

6 be easily fitted] be fitted first MS 19–20 Dramatique; . . . Pieces] Dramatique, sonnet, Epigramme, or satyre MS 31 as] om. B er Discretio appellatur. Phantasia sine Iudicio laudari rarò solet; sed Iudicium, sive Discretio laudatur per se sine ope Phantasiae. Praeter Discretionem temporum, locorum, & personarum quae laudari faciat Phantasiam, requiritur etiam cogitationum ad finem suum frequens applicatio; ita enim occurrent similitudines, non solum illustraturae, sed etiam novis & aptis Metaphoris ornaturae sermonem, atque insuper raritate inventionis placiturae. Caeterum nisi constans adsit cogitationum ad aliquem finem regulatio, Phantasia magna species quaedam est Insaniae, qualis est illorum, qui cum dicere inceperint, ab unaquaque fere cogitatione aliena, à proposito fine in tot & tantas digressiones & Parentheses abripiuntur, ut reverti non possint. Causa cujus rei aliquando est, quod experientia careant ita, ut videatur sibi novum & dignum dictu, id quod aliis vilescit; vel magnum sibi, quod aliis non item. Nam quicquid novum, magnum & dictu dignum est, seducere homines ab instituta sermonis serie saepe solet.

Poëtis in unoquoque genere operis tum Iudicium tum Phantasia requiritur; eminere tamen debet Phantasia, quia placent Poëmata praecipuè propter novitatem; displicere autem non debent per Indiscretionem.

In Historia legitima eminere Iudicium debet; quia Virtus Historiae in Methodo, in Veritate, in electione Narrandorum consistit, neque locus hic est Phantasiae praeterquam in ornanda narratione.

In Laudationibus, & in Invectivis praedominari debet Phantasia; quia pro fine habent non Veritatem, sed laudem vel vituperium; quae perficiuntur comparationibus illustribus vel vilibus vel ridiculis. [36] Iudicium circumstantias tantùm suggerit quibus actio laudabilis vel illaudabilis efficitur.

In Hortativis & Causarum dictionibus, prout veritas vel simulatio maximè inservit rei quae agitur; ita Iudicium, vel Phantasia maximè postulatur.

3 faciat this edn.] faciant 68; commendant 70 10–11 Causa cujus rei] Cujus rei causa 70 11 sibi] ipsis 70 12 sibi] iis 70 15 Poëtis] In Poëtis 70

[11] rarely commended: [12] which causes a fancy to be praised, [13] For thus will arise [14] but also [15] and, above all, [16] ^ of thoughts [17] ^ almost [18] cannot return: [19] worth saying, which begins to seem worthless to others; or great to him, which does not seem so to others. [20] ^ often [21] poets, in every kind of work, [22] poems please especially [23] narration. [24] must be [25] ^ or ridiculous

In Demonstration, in Councell, and all rigourous search of Truth, Judgement does all; except sometimes [26]the understanding have need to be opened by some apt similitude; and then there is so much use of Fancy.[26] But for Metaphors, they are in this case utterly excluded. For seeing they openly professe deceipt; to admit them into Councell, or [27] Reasoning, were manifest folly.

And in any Discourse whatsoever, if the defect of Discretion be apparent, [28]how extravagant soever the Fancy be, the whole discourse will be taken for a signe of want of wit; and so will it never[28] when the Discretion is manifest, though the Fancy be never so ordinary.

The secret thoughts of a man run over all things, holy, prophane, clean, obscene, grave, and light, without shame, or blame; which verball discourse cannot do, farther than the Judgement shall approve of the Time, Place, and Persons. An Anatomist, or a Physitian may speak, or write his judgement of unclean things; because it is not to please, but profit: but [29]for another man to write his extravagant, and pleasant fancies of the same, is as if a man, from being tumbled into the dirt, should come and present himselfe before good company. And 'tis the want of Discretion that makes the difference.[29] Again, in °profest° remissnesse of mind, and familiar company, [30]a man may play with the sounds, and aequivocall significations of words; and that many times with encounters[b] of extraordinary Fancy:[30] but in a Sermon, °or in publique,° or before persons unknown, or whom we ought to reverence, there is no Gingling[c] of words that will not be accounted folly: and the difference is onely in the want of Discretion[31]. So that where Wit is wanting, it is not Fancy that is wanting, but [32]Discretion.[32] Judgement therefore without Fancy is Wit, but Fancy without Judgement not.

When the thoughts of a man, that has a designe in hand, running over a multitude of things, observes how they conduce to that designe; or what designe they may conduce unto; if his observations be [33]such as are not easie, or °Prudence.° usuall,[33] This wit of his is called [34]PRUDENCE;[34] and dependeth on much Experience, and Memory of the like things, and their consequences heretofore. In which there is not so much difference of Men, as there is in their Fancies and Judgements; Because the Experience of men equall in age, is not much unequall, as to the quantity; but [35]lyes in different occasions;[d] every one having his private designes.[35] To govern well a family, and a kingdome, are not different degrees of Prudence; but different sorts of businesse; no more then to draw a picture in little, or [36]as great, or greater then the life,[36] are different degrees of Art. A plain husband-man is [37] more Prudent in affaires of his own house, then a [38]Privy Counseller[38] in the affaires of another man.

5 were manifest folly] added by TH in MS 13 farther] no farther MS 32 is in] in B

In Demonstratione, in Consilio, & in omni veritatis investigatione severa, solum requiritur Iudicium; nisi forte aliquando similitudine aliqua apta opus sit; ut ii qui audiunt, vel legunt, dociliores fiant. Quod autem ad Metaphoras attinet, excludendae prorsus sunt. Fallaciam enim apertè profitentur. Illas ergo in Consilio vel Ratiocinatione severa admittere, stultitia est manifesta. In Discursu quocunque, si Discretionis defectus manifestè appareat, quantumcunque placere possit Phantasia, desiderabitur Ingenium. Quod si Iudicium manifestum sit, etsi vulgaris sit Phantasia, laudabitur tamen Ingenium.

Cogitatio hominis secreta per omnia discurrit, sacra, prophana, munda, immunda, gravia, levia, sine pudore, & sine culpa; id quod sermoni non ulterius licet quam à Iudicio circa Tempora, Loca, & Personas permissum sit. Medico Anatomistae de rebus obscaenis dicere vel scribere quicquid videbitur licet, ut cui Finis est non placere, sed prodesse; aliis autem non licet, quia non est opus. Item in remissione animi & conversatione familiari, si quis ex verborum sonis & significationibus ludum faciat, (id quod aliquando non injucundè fieri solet) indecorum non est. Sed in Concione, vel coram personis incognitis vel alioqui reverendis, omnis verborum lusus stultitia videbitur. Id quod differentiam facit, Discretio sive Iudicium est. Itaque ubi Ingenium deest, non Phantasia, sed Iudicium deest. Itaque Iudicium sine Phantasia Ingenium est; Phantasia autem sine Iudicio non item.

Quando quis cogitatione multitudinem rerum percurrens, cum Fine aliquo sibi proposito, quomodo eae res ad Finem suum conducant, vel cui fini inservire possint celeriter animadvertit, Ingenium ejus Bonum dicitur; dependetque ab Experientia & Memoria rerum multarum similium, cum similibus Consequentiis. In hoc autem homines inter se non tantum differunt, quantum Iudicio & Phantasia; quia hominum aetate aequalium, experientia non est valde inaequalis, quoad quantitatem, sed rerum in quibus versantur specie variantur, cum cuique sua sint negotia propria. Familiam, an Regnum quis rectè gubernet nihil interest, quatenus ad Prudentiae gradum, multum tamen quod attinet ad negotii speciem; quemadmodum in parva aut [37] magna tabula bene pingere non distinguit Artis gradum, sed speciem, & Agricola rudis in re sua Prudentior est plerumque, quam Philosophus in aliena.

[26] it happens that the help of some apt similitude is needed, so that the listeners or readers may be more easily taught. [27] ^ strict [28] however pleasing the fancy may be, it will be taken as lacking in wit; but the wit will be praised [29] others may not, because there is no need for them to do so.

[30] if a man plays with the sounds and significations of words (which is sometimes done quite agreeably), that is not indecorous. [31] ^ or judgement [32] judgement. [33] quick, [34] good; [35] they vary in the type of things they are versed in; everyone having his particular business. [36] great, [37] ^ generally [38] philosopher

---

[b] = spontaneous and pleasing ideas; mental 'lucky hits' (OED, 'encounter', n., 4).

[c] = jingling, playing with words for the sake of their sound (OED, 'jingle', v., 3.b).

[d] = personal needs or requirements (OED, 'occasion', n.[1], 9.b).

To Prudence, if you adde the use of unjust, or dishonest means, such as usually are prompted to men by Feare, or Want; you have that Crooked Wisdome, which is called CRAFT; which is [39] a signe of Pusillanimity. [35] For Magnanimity is contempt of unjust, or dishonest helps. And [41]that which the Latines call Versutia, (translated into English, Shifting,) and is a putting off of a present danger or incommodity, by engaging into a greater, as when a man robbs one to pay another, is but a shorter sighted Craft, called Versutia,[41] from Versura, which signifies taking mony at usurie, for the present payment of interest.[e]

Craft.

40

Acquired Wit.

As for acquired Wit, (I mean acquired by method and instruction,) there is none but Reason; which is grounded on the right use of Speech; and produceth the Sciences. But of Reason and Science, I have already spoken in the fifth and sixth Chapters.

The causes of this difference of Witts, are in the Passions: and the difference of Passions, proceedeth partly from the different Constitution of the body, and partly from different °Education. For if the difference proceeded from the temper of the brain, and the organs of Sense, either exterior or interior, there would be no lesse difference of men in their Sight, Hearing, or other Senses, than in their Fancies, and Discretions. It proceeds therefore from the Passions; which are different, not onely from the difference of mens complexions;[f] but also from their difference of° customes, and education.

The Passions that most of all cause the differences of Wit, are principally, the more or lesse Desire of Power, of Riches, of Knowledge, and of Honour. All which may be reduced to the first, that is Desire of Power. For Riches, Knowledge and Honour are but severall sorts of Power.

And therefore, a man who has no great Passion for any of these things; °but is as men terme it indifferent;° though he may be [42]so farre a good man, as to be free from giving offence; yet he cannot possibly have either a great Fancy, or much Judgement.[42] For the Thoughts, are to the Desires, as Scouts, and Spies, to range abroad, and find the way to the things Desired: All Stedinesse of the minds motion, and all quicknesse of the same, proceeding from thence. For as to have no Desire, is to be Dead: so to have weak Passions, is Dulnesse; and to have Passions [43]indifferently for every thing, GIDDINESSE, and Distraction;[43] and to have stronger, and more vehement Passions for any thing, than is ordinarily seen in others, is that which men call MADNESSE.

°Giddinesse.°

Madnesse.

3 marg. om. MS 6 of a] of MS 14 are] is MS 21 complexions] complexion MS
26 therefore, a man who has] therefore {it is impossible that del. by TH} a man that hath MS

Ad Prudentiam si addatur Mediorum injustorum, vel inhonestorum usus, qualia saepe suggerit Metus, vel Inopia, fit Prudentia illa sinistra, quae appellatur Astutia; quae signum plerumque est Pusillanimitatis. Auxilia enim injusta & inhonesta animus magnus aspernatur. Est etiam alia quasi Astutiae species, quae vocatur Versutia; quae est periculi vel incommodi incurrendo in pejus, ad parvum tempus dilatio; videturque dici à Versura, quae significat mutui sumptionem, ad mutui solutionem.[e] Astutia. Versutia.

Ingenium acquisitum, nempe Methodo & Doctrina, nullum est praeter Rationem; quae orta à recto Sermonis usu producit Scientias. Sed de Ratione, & Scientia dictum est supra Cap. 5 & 6. Ingenium acquisitum.

Ingeniorum differentia oritur à Passionibus; differentia autem Passionum partim à diversa corporum constitutione, partim à diversitate consuetudinum & educationis.

Passiones illae, quae Ingeniorum differentias maximas faciunt, sunt plerumque major vel minor Cupiditas Potentiae, Divitiarum, Scientiae, Dignitatis; quae omnes reduci possunt ad Potentiam; nam Divitiae, Scientia, Dignitas, sunt Potentiae species.

Itaque si quis ea non magnifacit, etsi vir bonus esse possit, nunquam tamen videbitur bonum habere Ingenium. Cogitationes enim cupiditatum sunt tanquam Exploratores, emissi ad explorandas vias, quibus ad Cupita ferimur, quae motibus animi, tum regulam, tum celeritatem tribuunt. Sicut nihil desiderare, Mortui est; ita parum vehementer Desiderare, Tardi est; & multa simul cupere Levitatis est; habere autem Passiones multò fortiores, vehementioresque quam in caeteris hominibus videri solent, illud est quod nominatur Insania. Insania.

23 marg. here this edn.] marg. one line higher in 68, 70

39 ^generally 40 [marg.:]^Shifting. 41 there is another type (as it were) of craft, called 'versutia', which is to put off a danger or incommodity for a short time by incurring a worse one; and it seems to be named 42 a good man, will never seem to have a good wit.
43 for many things at the same time, is levity;

[e] Hobbes's explication of the meaning of 'versura' is correct; but 'versutia' is derived from 'versutus', a participial form of the verb 'verto', meaning to 'turn' (from which 'versura' is independently derived). The etymology offered by Hobbes appears to be his own; Isidore of Seville derives 'versutia' from 'verto' (Etymologiarum, X.277; cf. also Cicero, De natura deorum, III.25).

[f] = bodily temperaments or constitutions (OED, 'complexion', n., 1–3).

Whereof there be almost as many kinds, as of the Passions themselves. Sometimes [44]the extraordinary and extravagant Passion,[44] proceedeth from the evill constitution of the organs of the Body, or harme done them; and sometimes the hurt, and indisposition of the Organs, is caused by the vehemence, or long continuance of the Passion. But in both cases the Madnesse is of one and the same nature.

The Passion, whose violence, or continuance maketh Madnesse, is either °great° vaine-Glory; which is commonly called Pride, and selfe-conceipt; or great Dejection of mind.

Pride, subjecteth a man to Anger, the excesse whereof, is the Madnesse °Rage.° called RAGE, and FURY. And thus it comes to passe [36] that excessive desire of Revenge, when it becomes habituall, hurteth the organs, and becomes Rage: That excessive love, [45] with jealousie, becomes also Rage: Excessive opinion of a mans own selfe, °for divine inspiration,° for wisdome, learning, forme,[g] and the like, [46]becomes Distraction,[h] and Giddinesse: The same, joyned with Envy, Rage: Vehement opinion of the truth of any thing, contradicted by others, Rage.[46]

Dejection, subjects a man to causelesse fears; which is a Madnesse com-
°Melancholy.° monly called MELANCHOLY, apparent also in divers manners; as in haunting of solitudes, °and graves;° in superstitious behaviour; and in fearing [47]some one, some another particular thing.[47] In summe, all Passions that produce strange and unusuall behaviour, are called by the generall name of Madnesse. °But of the severall kinds of Madnesse, he that would take the paines, might enrowle a legion.° And if the Excesses [48] be madnesse, there is no doubt but the Passions themselves, when they tend to Evill, are degrees of the same.

(For example,) Though the effect of folly, in them that are possessed of [49]an[49] opinion of being inspired, be not visible alwayes in one man, by any very extravagant action, that proceedeth from such [50]Passion;[50] yet when many of them conspire[i] together, the Rage of the whole multitude is visible enough. For what argument of Madnesse can there be greater, than to clamour, strike, and throw stones at our °best° friends? Yet this is somewhat lesse than such a multitude will [51] do. For they will clamour, fight against, and destroy those, by whom all their life-time before, they have been protected, and secured from injury. And if this be Madnesse in the multitude, it is the same in every particular man. For as in the middest of the sea, though a man per-

11 marg. om. B 15 forme, and the like, becomes] forme, become MS 23 Madnesse] madnesses MS 26 (For example) . . . folly,] For although the Effect of folly (for Example) MS 29 is] is in B 31 our] ones MS

Insaniae autem tot sunt fere quot sunt Passionum ipsarum species; procedit tamen aliquando ab Organorum prava constitutione, vel laesione. Aliquando etiam à Passionis vehementia, vel duratione longa laeduntur Organa. Vtrobique tamen ejusdem generis est Insania.

Passio cujus violentia, vel duratio facit Insaniam, aut Gloria vana est, quae & superbia dicitur; aut animi demissio magna.

Superbia facit Iracundum. Irae autem Excessus Insaniae species est, quae appellatur furor. Itaque vindictae cupido ingens, si diuturna sit, organa corporis laedit, & fit Furor. Idem facit Amor vehemens praesertim [38] si comitetur zelotypia. Magna item sui ipsius aestimatio propter Sapientiam, Eruditionem, Formam & similia, etiam propter (quam putat quis falsò se habere) Inspirationem, tendit ad Insaniam.

Demissio animi obnoxium facit Metui, ubi Metus causa nulla est; quae insania est, appellari solita Melancholia, apparens diversimodè, ut in iis qui frequentant solitudines; in superstitiosis & in timentibus quae caeteri non timent. Passiones denique omnes, quae actiones insolitas exorbitantesque producunt, nomine insigniuntur Insaniae. Siquidem autem Passionum Excessus Insania sunt, dubitari non potest quin Passiones ipsae, saltem si ad malum tendant, sint ejusdem gradus.

Exempli causa, quando aliqui falsò putant inspiratos se esse, Insaniae illius effectus non est in uno homine per actionem aliquam, quae ab illa opinione procedit, exorbitantem visibilis, quando tamen multi eorum conspirant, furor totius multitudinis satis manifestus est. Quodnam enim Insaniae argumentum majus esse potest quam clamare, ferire, & lapides in amicos jacere? Minus tamen est aliquantò hoc, quam quod hujusmodi multitudines aliquando faciunt. Nam occlamant, oppugnant, & interficiunt illos, per quos omni antè-actae vitae tempore protecti, & defensi ab injuriis fuerant. Iam si Insania haec sit in multitudine, Insania quoque est in hominibus singulis. Quemadmodum enim in medio mari, quanquam sonum ab aqua sibi proxi-

1 sunt fere quot sunt] fere sunt quot 70 11 (quam putat quis falsò se habere)] falsò praesumptam 70

44 , however, it 45 especially 46 and also for inspiration (which a person falsely believes himself to possess), tends to madness. 47 what others do not fear. 48 ^ of the passions 49 a false 50 opinion; 51 ^ sometimes g = beauty (OED, 'form', n., 1.e). h = mental derangement (OED, 'distraction', 5).

i = combine, cooperate, act in harmony (OED, 'conspire', v., 3).

ceive no sound of that part of the water next him; yet he is well assured, that part contributes as much, to the Roaring of the Sea, as any other part, of the same quantity: so also, though wee perceive no great unquietnesse, in one, or [52]two[52] men; yet we may be well assured, that their singular Passions, are parts of the Seditious roaring of a troubled Nation. And if there were nothing else that bewrayed[j] [53]their[53] madnesse; yet that very arrogating such [54] inspiration to themselves, is argument enough. [55]If some man in Bedlam[k] should entertaine you with sober discourse; and you desire in taking leave, to know what he were, that you might another time requite his civility; and he should tell you, he were God the Father; I think you need expect[l] no extravagant action for argument of his Madnesse.[55]

[56]This opinion of Inspiration, called commonly, Private Spirit,[56] begins very often, from some lucky finding of an Errour [57] generally held by others; and not knowing, or not remembring, by what conduct[n] of reason, they came to so singular a truth, (°as they think it,° though it be many times an untruth they light on,) they presently[p] admire[q] themselves; as being in the speciall grace of God °Almighty,° who hath revealed the same to them supernaturally, by his [58] Spirit.

Again, that Madnesse is nothing else, but [59]too much appearing[59] Passion, may be gathered out of the effects of [60]Wine, which are the same with those of the[60] evill disposition of the organs. For the variety [37] of behaviour in men that have drunk too much, is the same with that of Mad-men: some of them Raging, others Loving, others Laughing, all extravagantly, but according to their severall °domineering° Passions: °For the effect of the wine, does but remove Dissimulation; and take from them the sight of the deformity of their Passions.° For, (I believe) °the most° sober men, when they walk alone without care and employment of the mind, would be unwilling the vanity and Extravagance of their thoughts at that time should be publiquely seen: which is a [61] confession, that Passions unguided, are for the most part meere Madnesse.

The opinions of the world, both in antient and later ages, concerning the cause of madnesse, have been two. Some, deriving them from the Passions; some, from Daemons, or Spirits, either good, or bad, which they thought might enter into a man, possesse him, and move his organs in such strange,

13 very often] commonly MS 20–21 which are . . . organs] om. MS
25 and] and {by del. by TH} MS 26–7 For, (I believe) . . . mind] For the most sober men I beleeue that are, when wthout care and employment of the mind they walke alone MS

ma nemo percipiat, scit tamen partem illam aquae proximae fremitui maris non minus contribuere, quam alia pars quaecunque ejusdem magnitudinis: ita etiam quanquam in uno vel paucis hominibus, non magnam videamus inquietudinem; certi tamen esse possumus Passiones illius unius vel paucorum, partes esse fremitus seditiosi commotae Civitatis. Etsi nihil esset aliud, quod Insaniam hujus generis indicaret, mihi tamen ipsa inspirationis divinae arrogatio, Insaniae ipsorum magnum indicium est. Quis enim in Morocomio dicentem Deum se esse,[m] vel Christum, cur illic conclusus sit nesciat? Quod autem privatum Spiritum suum tanti faciant aliqui, ut se divinitùs inspirari putent, saepenumero oritur ab erroris alicujus in Theologia vulgò recepti foelici detectione; nescientes enim vel obliti, quo ductu rationis in tam singularem veritatem (etsi interdum veritas non sit) inciderint, semetipsos, ut quibus Deus ipse speciali gratia doctrinam illam supernaturaliter Spiritu Sancto revelaverit, admirantur.

Quod Insania nihil aliud sit praeter ingentem enormemque Passionem, intelligi potest ab effectibus nimii Vini, quod similem producit [39] Organorum intemperiem. Varietas enim hominum, qui nimium biberunt eadem est in moribus, quae cernitur in insanis; quorum aliqui furiunt, alii amant, alii rident, omnes modo insolito; sed suae cujusque Passioni congruo. Nam etiam homines sobrios puto quando absque omni animi cura & occupatione soli incedunt, non libenter velle cogitationum suarum vanitatem atque exorbitantiam eo tempore publicè apparere; id quod confessio manifesta est, Passiones irregulares plerumque Insaniam meram esse.

Opiniones hominum circa Insaniae causam, tum Veterum tum Recentiorum duae sunt. Alii enim eam à Passionibus; alii à Daemonibus, sive Spiritibus derivant, bonis vel malis, quos intrare in hominem posse, eumque possidere putaverunt, atque corporis ejus organa insolito ciere motu, qualem

23 irregulares plerumque Insaniam meram] meras irregulares plerumque Insaniam 70
26 eumque this edn.] eosque 68, 70

52 a few 53 this sort of 54 ^ divine 55 For who will not know why a man in a mad-house who says he is God, or Christ, is locked up there? 56 The private spirit on which some people so pride themselves that they think they are divinely inspired 57 ^ in theology 58 ^ Holy 59 huge and excessive 60 too much wine, which produces a similar 61 ^ clear

---

j = exposed, revealed (OED, 'bewray', v., 3–6).
k The hospital of St Mary of Bethlehem in Bishopsgate, London, used as an asylum for the mentally ill.
l = require (OED, 'expect', v., 5.c). m The construction of this sentence (with the accusative 'dicentem') is defective; it could perhaps be remedied by adding 'audiens' ('hearing').
n = guidance (OED, 'conduct', n.[1], 1).
p = immediately (OED, 'presently', adv., 1.a).
q = wonder at, marvel at (OED, 'admire', v., 2).

and uncouth manner, as mad-men [62]use[62] to do. The former sort therefore, called such men, Mad-men: but the Later, called them °sometimes Daemoniacks, (that is, possessed with spirits;) sometimes° Energumeni, (that is, agitated, or moved with spirits;) and now in Italy they are called not onely Pazzi, Mad-men; but also Spiritati, men possest.

There was once a great conflux[r] of people in Abdera, a City of the Greeks, at the acting of the [63]Tragedy[63] of Andromeda, upon an extream hot day: whereupon, a great many of the spectators falling into Fevers, [64]had this accident from the heat, and from the Tragedy together, that they did nothing but pronounce Iambiques, with the names of Perseus and Andromeda; which together with the Fever,[64] was cured, by the comming on of Winter: And this madnesse was thought to proceed from the Passion imprinted [65] by the Tragedy.[s] Likewise there raigned [66]a fit[66] of madnesse in another Graecian City, which seized °onely° the young Maidens; and caused many of them to hang themselves. This was by most then thought an act of the Divel. But one that suspected, that contempt of life in them, might proceed from some Passion of the mind, and supposing they did not contemne also their honour, gave counsell to the Magistrates, to °strip such as so hang'd themselves, and° let them hang out naked. This °the story sayes° cured that madnesse.[t] But on the other side, the same Graecians, did often ascribe madnesse, to the operation of the Eumenides, or Furyes; and sometimes of Ceres, Phoebus, and other Gods: so much [67] did men attribute to Phantasmes, as to think them [68] aëreal living bodies; °and generally to call them Spirits.° And as the Romans in this, held the same opinion with the Greeks: so also did [69] the Jewes; For they called mad-men Prophets, or (according as they thought the spirits good or bad) Daemoniacks; °and some of them called both Prophets, and Daemoniacks, mad-men;° and some called the same man both Daemoniack, and [70]mad-man.[70] But for the Gentiles, 'tis no wonder; because Diseases, and Health; Vices, and Vertues; and °many° naturall accidents, were with them termed, and worshipped as Daemons. So that a man was to understand by Daemon, [71] as well (sometimes) an Ague, as a Divell. But for the Jewes to have such opinion, [38] is [72]somewhat[72] strange. For neither Moses, nor Abraham pretended to Prophecy by possession of a Spirit; but from the voyce of God; or by a Vision or Dream: Nor is there any thing in [73]his[73] Law, Morall,

6 was] were B 25 they] some of them MS 28 mad-man] mad-men B

---

[62] are seen [63] story [64] partly from the heat, and partly from the tragedy itself, could say nothing but the iambics which they had heard recited by the actors in the tragedy. But this madness [65] ^on the minds of the spectators [66] another kind [67] ^reality [68] ^, and call them, [69] ^many of [70] prophet. [71] ^in their speech, [72] more [73] Moses's animadvertimus in Insanis. Alii ergo Insanos appellaverunt, quos alii Energumenos. Hodieque eosdem homines Itali vocant Pazzi & Spiritati.

Magnus erat quondam in Vrbe Abderensium confluxus populi ad Theatrum, cum ageretur Fabula Andromedae, aestivo & fervente die; unde Spectatorum magna multitudo partim à calore, partim ab ipsa Tragoedia in Febrem incidentes, aliud nihil dicere potuerunt praeter Iambos, quos ab Actoribus in Tragoedia audierant recitatos; ab hac autem Insania, superveniente Hyeme liberati sunt; & proinde visa est processisse ab illa Passione quam animis Spectatorum impresserat Tragoedia. Etiam in Civitate alia Graeca Insaniae species alia quaedam orta est, quae in Adolescentulas incidens fecit ut earum multae se suspenderint. Hoc autem à plurimis à Diabolo profectum esse existimabatur; unus autem erat qui ipsarum contemptum hunc vitae oriri ab animi aliqua Passione suspicatus est; putansque illas non ut vitam, sic honorem etiam contempsisse, Magistratibus consilium dedit, ut quae se suspenderint nudae penderent. Quod cum factum esset, Insania illa desiit. Iidem autem Graeci Insaniam plerumque Eumenidum, sive Furiarum operationibus vel Cereris vel Phoebi aliorumque Deorum attribuerunt. Tantum enim Phantasmatibus attribuebatur realitatis, ut animalia aërea putarentur, vocarenturque. Romani etiam, & Iudaeorum multi, de hac re cum Graecis consenserunt. Iudaei enim Insanos, aut Prophetas esse, aut (prout Spiritus illos vel bonos vel malos esse putaverunt) Daemoniacos.[u] Aliqui etiam eorum eundem hominem & Daemoniacum & Prophetam. Hoc tamen in Gentibus mirandum non est; quia Morbi & Sanitas, vitia & Virtutes, atque accidentia naturalia ab illis & vocabantur, & colebantur ut Daemones. Adeo ut per Daemonem intelligenda erat [40] eorum sermone non minus aliquando Febris, quam Diabolus. Vt autem ita sentirent Iudaei, magis mirandum est. Neque enim Moses neque Abrahamus Prophetiis suis praetendebant Spiritum, sed Vocem Dei, vel Visionem, vel Somnium. Neque in Lege Mosaica Morali,

8 processisse 70] processione 68 8 Passione 68-Errata] Passisse 68 {error caused by mis-applying proof-correction to 'processione' in same line} 23 Morbi & Sanitas 68-Errata] Morbos & Sanitatem 68 25 erat] esset 70

[r] = flowing together (OED, 'conflux', 1).

[s] Lucian, How History should be Written, I (referring to Euripides' Andromeda).

[t] Plutarch, Moralia, 'Virtues of Women', XI, about the women of Miletus (saying not that they were left hanging naked, but that they were carried naked through the town square to burial). The same story is given in Aulus Gellius, Noctes atticae, XV.10.

[u] This sentence is defective; possibly it included another 'putaverunt', which a corrector may have wrongly treated as redundant.

or Ceremoniall, by which they were taught, there was any such Enthusiasme; °or any Possession.° When God is sayd, Numb. 11. 25. to take from the Spirit that was in Moses, and give to the 70. Elders, the Spirit of God [74](taking it for the substance of God) is not divided.[74] The Scriptures by the Spirit of God [75]in man, mean a mans spirit, enclined to Godlinesse.[75] And where it is said Exod. 28. 3. Whom I have filled with the spirit of wisdome to make garments for Aaron, is not meant a spirit put into them, that can make garments; but the wisdome of [76]their own spirits[76] in that kind of work. In the like sense, the spirit of man, when it produceth unclean actions, is °ordinarily° called an unclean spirit; and so other spirits, °though not alwayes, yet° as often as the vertue or vice so stiled, is extraordinary, and Eminent. Neither did the other Prophets of the old Testament [77] pretend Enthusiasme; or, that God spake in them; but to them by °Voyce,° Vision, or Dream; and the Burthen of the Lord,[y] was not Possession, but Command. How then could the Jewes fall into this opinion of possession? I can imagine no reason, but that which is common to all men; namely, the want of curiosity to search naturall causes; and their placing Felicity, in the acquisition of the grosse pleasures of the Senses, and the things that most immediately conduce thereto. For they that see any strange, and unusuall ability, or defect °in a mans mind;° unlesse they see withall, from what cause it may probably proceed, can hardly think it naturall; and if not naturall, they must needs thinke it supernaturall; and then what can it be, but that either God, or the Divell is in him? And hence it came to passe, when our Saviour (Mark 3. 21.) was compassed about with the multitude, those of the house doubted[w] he was mad, and went out to hold him: but the Scribes said he had [78] Belzebub,[x] and that was it, by which he cast out divels; °as if the greater mad-man had awed the lesser.° And that (John 10. 20.) some said, He hath a Divell, and is mad; whereas others holding him for a Prophet, sayd, These are not the words of one that hath a Divell. So in the old Testament he that [79]came to anoynt[79] Jehu, 2 Kings 9. 11. was a Prophet; but some of the company asked Jehu, What came that mad-man for? So that in summe, it is manifest, that whosoever behaved himselfe in extraordinary manner, [80] was thought by the Jewes to be possessed either with a good, or evill spirit; except by the Sadduces, who erred so farre on the other hand, as not to believe there were at all any spirits,[y] (which is very neere to °direct° Atheisme;) and 9 man] a man MS 9 called] signifyed by MS 10 so] so of MS 26 the] he the MS 32 a] om. B

---

[74] does not mean, in that place, the substance of God; for that is indivisible. [75] very often mean the spirit of a man who serves God. [76] those men themselves [77] ^after Moses [78] ^a demon, namely [79] was sent to anoint as king [80] ^greatly differing from the behaviour of others, vel Ceremoniali quicquam extat faciens ad Enthusiasmum. Quando (Num. 11. 25.) à Spiritu, qui in Mose erat sustulisse dicitur Deus, & dedisse septuaginta Senioribus, per Spiritum Dei non intelligitur eo loco substantia Dei; nam ea indivisibilis est. Per Spiritum Dei Scripturae saepenumero significant Spiritum hominis Deo servientis. Vbi enim dicitur Exod. 28: 3. Quem implevi Spiritu Sapientiae, ad faciendum Vestimenta Aaroni. Non intelligendus est peritus faciendi Vestimenta Spiritus Infusus, sed Sapientia ipsorum hominum in eo genere operis. Similiter Spiritus hominis, si producat actiones immundas, appellatur in Scripturis, Spiritus immundus. Etiam in aliis locis virtus vel vitium si egregium sit & eminens, appellatur Spiritus. Neque post Mosem Prophetae Veteris Testamenti Enthusiasmum praetenderunt; neque in, sed ad se locutum esse Deum, nempe, per Visionem vel Somnium. Neque illud onus Domini[v] Possessio erat, sed Iussio. Quomodo ergo in opinionem hanc Enthusiasmi incidere potuerunt Iudaei? Nescio, nisi quod plerisque hominibus commune est, non nimium inquirere in causas naturales; foelicitatemque collocare in voluptatibus sensuum, & rebus illis quae maximè istuc tendunt. Qui enim insolitam virtutem vel defectum insolitum vident, nisi simul videant unde probabiliter procedere potuit non facile putant esse naturalem. Quod si non naturalem, necessariò supernaturalem esse putant. Quaenam autem esse potest res illa praeter Deum aut Daemonem qui in hominem intraverit. Itaque cum Servator noster (Marc. 3. 21.) à multitudine cingeretur, illi qui in domo erant, furere eum existimaverunt, exieruntque domo ut cohiberent. Scribae autem dixerunt, quod haberet Daemonem, nempe Belzebub,[x] per quem ejecisse illum Daemonia dixerant. Hinc etiam erat quod quidam (Iohan. 10. 20.) dixerunt Daemonium habet & Insanus est. Quando alii qui illum pro Propheta habuerunt, dixerunt, Non sunt haec verba ejus qui habet Daemonium. Item in Testamento Veteri, is qui missus fuit (2 Reg. 9. 11.) ad ungendum regem Iehu, Propheta erat; eorum tamen qui cum Iehu erant aliqui ipsum interrogarunt, Quamobrem ille venit Insanus? Manifestum ergo est, illum qui insolito modo, & ab aliorum more multùm differente se gerat videri Iudaeis possessum esse bono aliquo vel malo Spiritu. Excipio tamen Sadducaeos, qui ex altera parte à veritate tantum abierunt, ut Spiritus [41] omnino esse non crediderint[y] (id quod prope

31 bono] à bono 70

[v] Jer. 23: 33–8. [w] = suspected, feared (OED, 'doubt', v., 6). [x] This unusual spelling of 'Beelzebub' does not occur in the Geneva or Bishops' Bibles, AV, Vulg, Beza, or the French Protestant version; it appears to be Hobbes's own variant spelling, recurring also in his Latin. (But cf. Ch. 44, pp. 956–7, and Ch. 47, p. 1118.) [y] Acts 23: 8 ('For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel, nor spirit').

[81]thereby perhaps the more provoked others, to terme[81] such men Daemoniacks, rather than mad-men.

But why then does our Saviour proceed in the curing of them, as if they were possest; and not as if they were mad? [82]To which I can give no other kind of answer, but that which is given to those that urge the Scripture in like manner against the opinion of the motion of the Earth. The Scripture was written to shew unto men the kingdome of God, and to prepare their mindes to become his obedient [39] subjects; leaving the world, and the Philosophy thereof, to the disputation of men, for the exercising of their naturall Reason.[82] Whether the Earths, or Suns motion make the day, and night; or whether the Exorbitant actions of men, proceed from Passion, or from the Divell, [83](so we worship him not) it is all one, as to our obedience, and subjection to God Almighty; which is the thing for which the Scripture was written. As for that our Saviour speaketh to the disease, as to a person; it[83] is the usuall phrase of all that cure by words onely, as Christ did, (and Inchanters [84]pretend to do, whether they speak to a Divel or not.)[84] For is not Christ also said (Math. 8. 26.) to have rebuked the winds? Is not he said also (Luk. 4. 39.) to rebuke a Fever? Yet this does not argue that a Fever is a Divel. [85]And whereas many of those Divels are said to confesse Christ; it is not necessary to interpret those places otherwise, than that those mad-men confessed him.[85] And whereas our Saviour (Math. 12. 43.) speaketh of an unclean Spirit, that having gone out of a man, wandreth through dry places, seeking rest, and finding none; and returning into the same man, with seven other spirits worse than himselfe; It is °manifestly° a Parable, alluding to a man, that after a little endeavour to quit his lusts, is vanquished °by the strength of them;° and becomes seven times worse than he was. So that [86]I see nothing at all in the Scripture, that requireth a beliefe, that Daemoniacks were any other thing but Mad-men.[86]

17 Is] but {because you may say added by TH in gap left by scribe} winds are spirits, is MS
19 those] the B 22 and] om. MS 25 lusts] lust B

[81] perhaps the Pharisees, the more they differed in their opinion about spirits from the Sadducees, the more they termed accedit ad Atheismum.) Fortasse autem tanto potiùs Daemoniacos vocabant Pharisaei Insanos, quanto magis à Sadducaeis circa opinionem de Spiritibus discrepabant.

[82] I answer that arguments based on a form of expression are not sound. For how often does the Holy Scripture speak of the earth as stationary, when almost all present-day philosophers judge, on the clearest evidence, that it moves? The Scripture was written by the Prophets and Apostles to teach men not philosophy (which God left to the contemplation and disputation of men, for the exercise of their natural reason) but piety, and the way to eternal salvation. [83] has nothing to do with piety or salvation. 'Come out', or a similar command, [84] falsely pretend to do).

Si hoc ita sit, cur sanat illos Servator noster, non ut Insanos, sed ut Daemoniacos? Respondeo. Argumenta quae à formula dictionis sumuntur, firma non esse. Quoties enim loquitur Scriptura Sacra de Terra, ut immobili, quam tamen Philosophi hodie ferè omnes moveri censent signis evidentissimis? Scriptura scripta est à Prophetis & Apostolis, ad docendam non Philosophiam (quam ad exercitium Rationis naturalis, contemplationibus disputationibusque hominum reliquit Deus) sed Pietatem, & Salutis aeternae viam. Sive enim Terrae, sive Solis motus Diem & Noctem faciat; sive humanarum actionum Exorbitatio à Passionibus, sive à Diabolo oriatur, ad Pietatem & Salutem nihil refert. Eorum qui per Verba sola morbos curant, ut fecit Christus (& facere se falsò jactitant Incantatores) Dictio propria est, Exi, & Iussiones similes. Nonne Christus (Matth. 8. vers. 26.) Objurgavit Ventos, & (Luc. 4. 39.) Objurgavit Febrem? Non tamen argui hinc potest Febrem esse Diabolum. Praeterea eadem Phrasis non ubique Scripturarum idem significat. In Principio erat Verbum, significat Verbi aeternitatem. In Principio creavit Deus Coelum & Terram non significat fuisse Coelum & Terram ab aeterno. Vbi Servator noster (Matth. 12. 43.) loquitur de Spiritu immundo, qui cum exisset ex homine vagatusque esset per loca arida, quaerens requiem nec inveniens, in eundem hominem postea reversus est, cum aliis septem Spiritibus se pejoribus, Parabolica locutio est, alludens ad hominem, qui post conatum cupiditates suas relinquendi debilem victus, septies pejor quam ante erat. Non sunt ergo Scripturae in sensu verborum rigido semper accipiendae; neque ex illis necessariò evinci potest Daemoniacos alios fuisse quam Insanos, Furiosos vel modo aliquo mente laesos.

1 potiùs] magis 70 1 magis] om. 70 20 vagatusque 70] vagatus 68

[85] Besides, the same phrase does not mean the same thing everywhere in the Scriptures. 'In the beginning was the word' means the eternity of the word; 'in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth' does not mean that the heaven and the earth existed from eternity.

[86] the Scriptures should not always be understood in the strict sense of their words; nor can it necessarily be proved from them that demoniacs were anything other than mad-men, raging or mentally damaged in some way.

°Insignificant Speech.°

[87]There is yet another fault in the Discourses of some men; which may also be numbred amongst the sorts of Madnesse; namely, that abuse of words, whereof I have spoken before in the fifth chapter, by the Name of Absurdity.[z] And that is, when men speak such words, as put together, have in them no signification at all; but are fallen upon by some, through misunderstanding of the words they have received, and repeat by rote; by others, from intention to deceive by obscurity. And this is incident to none but those, that converse in questions of matters incomprehensible, as the Schoole-men; or in questions of abstruse Philosophy.[87] The common sort of men seldome speak [88]Insignificantly,[88] and are therefore, by those other Egregious persons counted [89]Idiots. But to be assured their words are without any thing correspondent to them in the mind, there would need some Examples; which if any man require, let him take a Schoole-man into his hands, and see if he can translate any one chapter concerning any difficult point; as the Trinity; the Deity; the nature of Christ; Transubstantiation; Free-will, &c. into any of the moderne tongues, so as to make the same intelligible; or into any tolerable Latine, such as they were acquainted withall, that lived when the Latine tongue was Vulgar.[aa] What is the meaning of[89] these words. The first cause does not necessarily inflow any thing into the second, by force of the Essentiall subordination of the second causes, by Which it may help it to worke? They are the Translation of the Title of the sixth chapter of Suarez first Booke, Of the Concourse, Motion, and Help of God.[ab] When men write whole volumes of such stuffe, are they not Mad, or intend to make others so? And °particularly,° in the question [40] of Transubstantiation; where after certain words spoken, they that say, the White*nesse*, Round*nesse*, Magni*tude*, Quali*ty*, °Corruptibili*ty*,° all which are incorporeall, &c. go out of the Wafer, into the Body of our blessed Saviour, do they not make those [90]Nesses, Tudes, and Ties, to be so many spirits possessing his body? For by Spirits, they mean alwayes things, that being incorporeall, are neverthelesse moveable from one place to another.[90] So that this kind of Absurdity, may rightly be numbred amongst the many sorts of Madnesse; and all the time that [91]guided by clear Thoughts of their worldly lust, they forbear disputing, or writing thus,[91] but Lucide Intervals. And thus much of the Vertues and Defects Intellectuall.

1–2 Insignificant Speech] senselesse Learning MS 5 through] though B 10 Insignificantly] non-sense MS 13 into] in B

Inter Insaniae signa numerari etiam possunt quorundam hominum Sermones Absurdi, sive Insignificantes; de quibus dictum est Capite quinto.[z] Atque hoc genus Insaniae illorum hominum ferè proprium est, qui loqui, vel scribere de iis rebus audent, quae sunt incomprehensibiles; id quod soli faciunt Scholastici & Philosophi. Nam vulgus hominum raro, ita loquuntur, ut non possint intelligi; & ob eam rem ab istis aliis egregiis hominibus habentur, spernunturque pro idiotis. Vt sciamus autem qualis sit Scholasticorum, & Philosophorum de rebus difficilibus oratio, interpretetur nobis verba aliquis, [42] quae titulum faciunt Capitis 6, Libri 1, Suaris, de Concursu, Motu, & Auxilio Dei. Verba autem haec sunt, Prima causa non influit necessariò aliquid in secundam Virtute Subordinationis essentialis causarum secundarum, quo illam adjuvet operari.[ab] Qui simili oratione tota implent volumina, nonne insaniunt, vel alios insanire volunt? In Quaestione de Transubstantiatione, ubi dicunt (post certa quaedam prolata verba) Albedinem, Rotunditatem, Magnitudinem, Qualitatem, &c. quae omnia sunt incorporea, migrare è Pane, & intrare in corpus Servatoris nostri Iesu Christi, nonne faciunt ex illis Accidentibus totidem Spiritus (nam & Spiritus eidem incorporeos esse putant, etiamsi eos à loco ad locum moveri confiteantur.) Itaque genus hoc Locutionis absurdae numerari inter Insaniae species multas rectè potest. Tempora autem quibus cogitationes eorundem Insanorum gubernatae à cupiditatibus mundanis perspicuè explicantur, alia non sunt quam lucida intervalla. Atque haec de Virtutibus & Vitiis Intellectualibus dicta sufficiant.

6 aliis] om. 70 6–7 habentur, spernunturque] spernuntur, habenturque 70

[87] Among the signs of madness may also be counted the absurd or meaningless discourses of some men, which I have mentioned in the fifth chapter. And this kind of madness is almost peculiar to those who dare to speak or write about those matters that are incomprehensible, which is something done only by schoolmen and philosophers. [88] incomprehensibly,

[89] , and despised, as idiots. But in order that we may know what a speech by the schoolmen and philosophers is like about difficult matters, let someone interpret for us

[90] accidents to be so many spirits? (For the same men think that there are also incorporeal spirits, even though they admit that they move from one place to another.)

[91] the thoughts of those same mad-men, guided by worldly lust, are clearly expressed,

---

[z] See above, pp. 68–73. [aa] = commonly used by the people (OED, 'vulgar', a., 3).

[ab] Suárez, 'De concursu, motione, & auxilio Dei', I.6, in his Varia opuscula theologica, p. 31. Hobbes's version makes a small alteration and an omission, harming the sense; it should read '. . .by force of the essential subordination of the second cause to the first, by which. . .' ('Causam primam nihil necessariò influere in secundam, ex vi subordinationis essentialis causae secundae, ad primam quo illam ad agendum iuuet'). Hobbes's Latin version is a re-translation from his English.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Severall SUBIECTS of KNOWLEDGE.

There are of KNOWLEDGE two kinds; whereof one is knowledge of Fact:[a] the other knowledge of the Consequence of one Affirmation to another. The former is nothing else, but Sense and Memory, and is Absolute Knowledge; as when we see a Fact doing, or remember it done: And this is the Knowledge required in a Witnesse. The later is called Science; and is Conditionall; as when we know, that, If the figure showne be a Circle, then any straight line through the Center shall divide it into two equall parts. And this is the Knowledge required in a Philosopher; that is to say, of him that pretends to Reasoning.

The Register of Knowledge of Fact is called History. Whereof there be two sorts: one called Naturall History; which is the History of such Facts, or Effects of Nature, as have no Dependance on Mans Will; Such as are the Histories of Metalls, Plants, Animals, Regions, and the like. The other, is Civill History; which is the History of the Voluntary Actions of men in Commonwealths.

The Registers of Science, are such Books as contain the Demonstrations of Consequences of one Affirmation, to another; and are commonly called Books of Philosophy; whereof the sorts are many, according to the diversity of the Matter; And may be divided in such manner as I have divided them in the following Table.

9 two] om. B 9 this is the Knowledge required in] is the Knowledge of MS
10 of him . . . Reasoning] of one that reasons MS 13 Will] Wills B 14 Regions] Religion B
14 other, is] other, is called MS

[a] = thing done (OED, 'fact', n., 1.a).

CAPVT IX.

De Scientiarum Distributione.

Cognitionis duae sunt Species. Altera Facti; & est Cognitio propria Testium, cujus conscriptio est Historia. Dividitur autem in Naturalem & Civilem, quarum neutra pertinet ad Institutum nostrum. Altera est consequentiarum, vocaturque Scientia; Conscriptio autem ejus appellari solet Philosophia. Quoniam autem subjecta Scientiarum sunt Corpora, distribuenda est in Species, eodem modo quo distribuuntur in suas Species Corpora ipsa, id est, ita ut Vniversaliora minus Vniversalibus antecedant. Vniversalia enim Specialibus essentialia sunt, & proinde universalium Scientia essentialis est Scientiae Specierum, adeò ut haec, nisi per illorum lucem, percipi non possint.

Generalissimum autem Subjectorum Scientiae est Corpus, cujus Accidentia duo sunt Magnitudo & Motus. Illud ergo quod quaeritur primò à Philosopho circa hoc subjectum est, quid sit Motus, & quid Magnitudo. Et Philosophiae pars haec appellari solet Philosophia prima.

Of the Distribution of the Sciences.

There are two kinds of knowledge. One is of fact, and is the knowledge that belongs to witnesses; the register of it is history. It is divided, however, into natural and civil, neither of which is relevant to our purpose. The other is of consequences, and is called 'science'; the register of it, however, is called 'philosophy'. But since the subjects of the sciences are bodies, it must be divided into different kinds in accordance with the distribution of the bodies themselves into their kinds – that is, as the more universal come before the less universal. For the universal bodies are essential to the specific ones, and therefore the science of the universal ones is essential to the science of the specific kinds, so that the specific kinds cannot be perceived except by light of the universal bodies.

The most general of the subjects of science is body, the two accidents of which are magnitude and motion. So the first thing required of a philosopher on this subject is to say what magnitude is, and what motion is. And this part of philosophy is commonly called 'first philosophy'.

Note: the table which accompanies the English text of Chapter 9 is printed on pages 130–31.

Rursus Magnitudo definita, quae & Quantitas dicitur, vel Figura vel Numero definitur. Itaque Corpus figura definitum subjectum est partis illius Philosophiae, quae Geometria dicitur. Partes autem Corporis numero determinatae Scientia est dicta Arithmetica.[b] [43]

Motus autem vel Visibiles sunt, vel Invisibiles, nimirum in Corporum minutissimis partibus. Motuum autem Visibilium Scientia, eorum est, qui Machinarum, Aedificiorum secreta contemplati sunt.

Motus autem Invisibiles internarum Corporis partium qui propter effectus in Sensus nostros dicuntur Qualitates, subjectum est Physicae, sive Philosophiae Naturalis; cujus quot sunt homini Sensus, tot possunt esse Scientiae Speciales, quarum una est quae vocatur Optica, alia Musica.

Deinde si Corpus universi consideretur per partes ejus, ut Astra & Sublunaria; ex contemplatione Astrorum motorum quatenus Motorum orietur Scientia quae dicitur Astronomia.

3 Partes] Partis 70 6 autem] om. 70

Again, a determined magnitude (which is also called 'quantity') is determined by either figure or number. So body determined by figure is the subject of that part of philosophy which is called 'geometry'; whereas those parts of body that are determined by number are the [subject of the] science called 'arithmetic'.[b]

But motions are either visible or invisible (that is, in the most minute parts of bodies). Now, the science of visible motions is the science belonging to those people who have considered the secrets of machines and buildings.

But the invisible motions of the internal parts of body, which are called 'qualities' because of their effects on our senses, are the subject of physics, or natural philosophy – of which there can be as many special sciences as there are human senses. One of them is called 'optics', another 'music'.

Then again, if the body of the universe be considered in its parts, such as stars and sublunary bodies, there arises from the contemplation of the motions of the stars, insofar as they are motions, the science which is called 'astronomy'.

[b] The construction of this clause in the Latin is defective in 68 (as translated here); the version given in 70 ('whereas the science of the part of body determined by number is called "arithmetic"') corrects the grammatical defect, but makes less sense.

Et quoniam partes universi quaedam non permanent, sed in interstitiis magnorum Corporum modo apparent, modo evanescunt, contemplatio Motus illorum gignit Scientiam Meteorologicam.

Item à contemplatione partium Telluris, qualia sunt Mineralia, Vegetabilia, & Animalia, totidem oriuntur Scientiae particulares.

Ex contemplatione denique Hominis & Facultatum ejus oriuntur Scientiae Ethica, Logica, Rhetorica, & tandem Politica sive Philosophia Civilis.

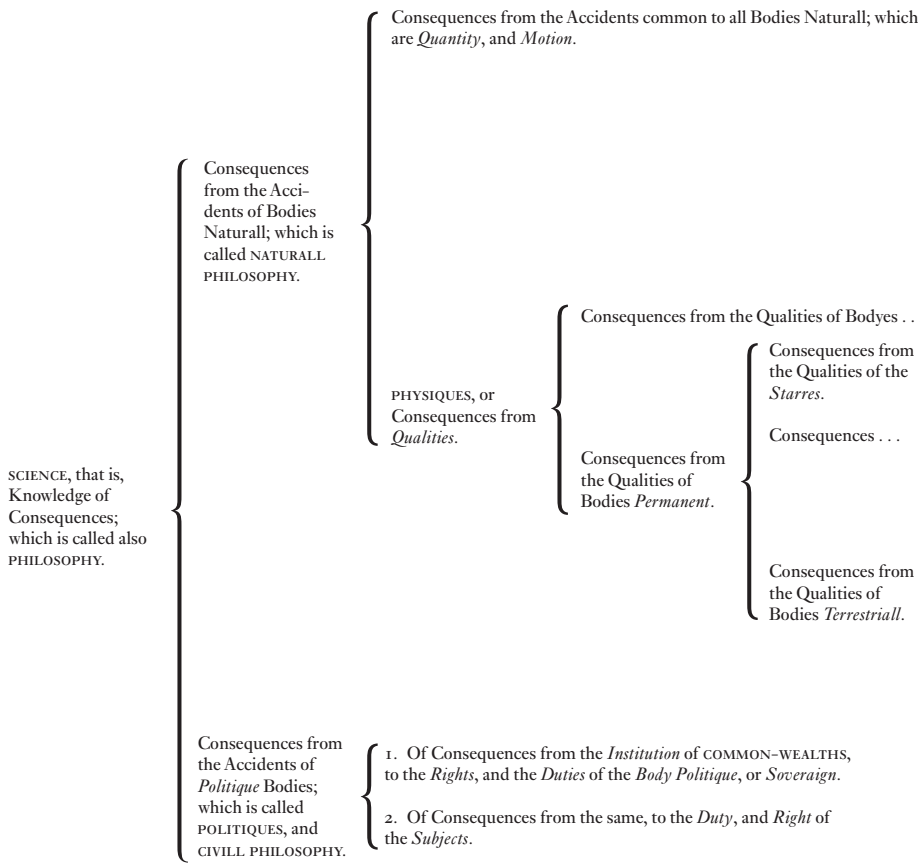
Sed ex subdivisione singulorum subjectorum innumerae aliae Scientiae nasci possunt, quas enumerare, neque facile, neque necessarium est.

And since some parts of the universe are not permanent, but sometimes appear in the spaces between the great bodies, and sometimes disappear, the contemplation of their motion gives rise to the science of meteorology.

Again, from the contemplation of parts of the earth, such as minerals, vegetables, and animals, there arise as many particular sciences.

Finally, from the contemplation of man and of his faculties, there arise the sciences of ethics, logic, rhetoric, and at last politics, or civil philosophy.

But there are innumerable other sciences that can arise from subdividing particular subjects, and it is neither easy, nor necessary, to list them.



SCIENCE, that is, Knowledge of Consequences; which is called also PHILOSOPHY.
Consequences from the Acci-dents of Bodies Naturall; which is called NATURALL PHILOSOPHY.
Consequences from the Accidents common to all Bodies Naturall; which are Quantity, and Motion.
PHYSIQUES, or Consequences from Qualities.
Consequences from the Qualities of Bodyes . . .
Consequences from the Qualities of Bodies Permanent.
Consequences from the Qualities of the Starres.
Consequences . . .
Consequences from the Qualities of Bodies Terrestriall.
Consequences from the Accidents of Politique Bodies; which is called POLITIQUES, and CIVILL PHILOSOPHY.
1. Of Consequences from the Institution of COMMON-WEALTHS, to the Rights, and the Duties of the Body Politique, or Soveraign.
2. Of Consequences from the same, to the Duty, and Right of the Subjects.

Note: the three-dot ellipses which are used to show the continuation of two lines of text across the two pages in this edition are not present in the original.

- Consequences from Quantity, and Motion indeterminate; which being the Principles, or first foundation of Philosophy, is called Philosophia Prima.[c] . . . . . → PHILOSOPHIA PRIMA.
- Consequences from Motion, and Quantity determined.
  - Consequences from Quantity, and Motion determined.
    - By Figure, ... → Mathematiques, . . . → GEOMETRY.
    - By Number, ... → Mathematiques, . . . → ARITHMETIQUE.
  - Consequences from the Motion, and Quantity of Bodies in speciall.[d]
    - Consequences from the Motion, and Quantity of the great parts of the World, as the Earth and Starres, → Cosmography, ...
      - ASTRONOMY.
      - GEOGRAPHY.
    - Consequences from the Motion of Speciall kinds, and Figures of Body, → Mechaniques, Doctrine of Weight,
      - Science of ENGINEERS.
      - ARCHITECTURE.
      - NAVIGATION.

. . . Transient, such as sometimes appear, sometimes vanish, ... → METEOROLOGY.

- Consequences from the Light of the Starres. Out of this, and the Motion of the Sunne, is made the Science of . . . . . → SCIOGRAPHY.[e]
- Consequences from the Influence[1] of the Starres, ... → ASTROLOGY.

. . . from the Qualities of[2] Liquid Bodies that fill the space between the Starres; such as are the Ayre, or substance aetheriall.

- Consequences from the parts of the Earth, that are without Sense,
  - Consequences from the Qualities of Minerals, as Stones, Metalls, &c.
  - Consequences from the Qualities of Vegetables.
- Consequences from the Qualities of Animals.
  - Consequences from the Qualities of Animals in generall
    - Consequences from Vision, ... → OPTIQUES.
    - Consequences from Sounds, ... → MUSIQUE.
    - Consequences from the rest of the Senses.
  - Consequences from the Qualities of Men in speciall
    - Consequences from the Passions of Men, → ETHIQUES.
    - Consequences from Speech,
      - In Magnifying, Vilifying, &c. . . . . → POETRY.
      - In Perswading, ... → RHETHORIQUE.
      - In Reasoning, ... → LOGIQUE.
      - In Contracting, ... → The Science of JUST and UNIUST.

[1] Influence] Influences B [2] from the Qualities of M.S] of the Qualities from H, B

[c] = 'first philosophy'. [d] = in particular (OED, 'special', a., adv., and n., B.2).
[e] = sciagraphy or 'dialling', the art of finding the time by means of the shadow of the sun or moon on a dial (OED, 'sciagraphy', 4).

[41]

CHAP. X.

Of POWER, °WORTH,° DIGNITY, HONOUR, °and WORTHINESSE.°

Power. The POWER of a Man, (to take it Universally,) is [1]his present[1] means, to obtain some future apparent Good. And is either [2]Originall,[2] or Instrumentall.

Naturall Power, is the eminence of the Faculties of Body, or Mind: as °extraordinary° Strength, Forme,[a] Prudence, Arts, Eloquence, Liberality, Nobility. Instrumentall are those Powers, which acquired by these, or by fortune, are means and Instruments to acquire more: as Riches, Reputation, Friends, and the secret working of God, which men [3] call Good Luck. For the nature of Power, is in this point, like to Fame, increasing as it proceeds;[b] or like the [4]motion[4] of heavy bodies, which the further they go, make still the more hast.

The Greatest of humane Powers, is that which is compounded of the Powers of most men, [5]united by consent, in one person, Naturall, or Civill,[5] that has °the use of° all their Powers depending on his will; [6]such as is the Power of a Common-wealth: Or depending on the wills of each particular;[6] such as is the Power of a Faction, or of divers factions leagued. Therefore to have [7] servants, is Power; To have [8] friends, is Power: for they are strengths united.

Also Riches joyned with liberality, is Power; because it procureth friends, and servants: Without liberality, not so; because in this case they defend not; but expose men to Envy, °as a Prey.°

Reputation of power, is Power; because it draweth with it the adhaerence of those that need protection.

So is Reputation of [9]love of a mans[9] Country, (called Popularity,)[c] for the same Reason.

5 Naturall] Originall MS 11 hast] hast, saue that this is downeward, but the way of power is vpward MS 13 that] who MS 20 men] om. MS

---

[1] the sum of all his [2] natural, [3] ^ generally [4] descent [5] who have been united by their consent as individuals into one person, whether that person be natural, like a man, or artificial, like a commonwealth, [6] . Nearest to this is the power that depends on the will of a multitude not united; [7] ^ many [8] ^ many [9] being a good citizen, and of loving one's

---

[a] = beauty (OED, 'form', n., 1.e). [b] Cf. Vergil, Aeneis, IV, ll. 174–5; the wording in the Latin also alludes to Lucretius, De rerum natura, VI, l. 341. [c] OED does not record this precise sense of the word; Hobbes's usage here seems at least partially to combine the meaning 'being liked by the people' with the meaning 'cultivating the favour of the people' ('popularity', n., 3, 4.a; cf. 'popular', adj. and n., 5). 'Popularitas', which he uses in the Latin, had the latter sense in post-Augustan writers such as Suetonius and Tacitus. Cf. also below, Chs. 29, pp. 516–17; 30, pp. 550–51.

CAPVT X.

De Potentia, Dignitate, & Honore.

Potentia.

Potentia cujusque (universaliter sumpta) est Mediorum omnium, quae habet ad Bonum aliquod futurum apparens adipiscendum, aggregatum. Est autem vel Naturalis, vel Instrumentalis.

Potentia Naturalis, est Excellentia Facultatum Corporis, vel Animi: ut Robur, Forma, Prudentia, Ars, Eloquentia, Liberalitas, Nobilitas. Instrumentales sunt quae per Naturales vel fortunam acquisitae, Media & Instrumenta sunt ad Potentiam augendam: ut Divitiae, Existimatio, Amici, & Operatio impercepta Dei, quam homines plerumque appellant Fortunam. Potentiae enim natura hac in re Famae similis est, eundo crescens;[b] vel corporum gravium descensui quae procedendo accelerantur.

Humanarum Potentiarum maxima est illa, quae ex potentiis plurimorum hominum in unam Personam, consensu singulorum unitorum est [44] composita, sive illa Persona Naturalis sit, ut Homo, sive Artificialis, ut Civitas, à cujus voluntate dependent Potentiae omnium. Proxima huic Potentia est, quae dependet à voluntate multitudinis non unitae; qualis est Potentia Factionis, vel Factionum foederatarum.

Itaque multos habere Servos, Potentia est; item multos habere Amicos. Sunt enim vires unitae.

Etiam Divitiae conjunctae cum Liberalitate, Potentia est; quia Servos & Amicos parant: absque Liberalitate, non item; quia non defendunt, sed Invidiae exponunt.

Potentiae Existimatio, Potentia est; quia adhaerere sibi facit eos qui Defensione indigent.

Etiam Existimatio boni Civis & Patriam amantis (quae vocatur Popularitas) Potentia est; propter causam proximè supra dictam.

12 quae procedendo accelerantur this edn.] quae procedendo acceleratur 68; qui procedendo acceleratur 70 13 ex potentiis this edn.] ex 68; ex unitorum 70 14 singulorum unitorum] om. 70

Also, what quality soever maketh a man beloved, or feared of many; or the reputation of such quality, is Power; because it is a means to have the assistance, and service of many.

Good successe is Power; because it maketh reputation of Wisdome, or good fortune; which makes men either feare him, or rely on him.

Affability of men already in power, is encrease of Power; because it gaineth love.

Reputation of Prudence in the conduct of Peace or War, is Power; because to prudent men, we commit the government of our selves, more willingly than to others.

Nobility is Power, not in all places, but onely in those Common-wealths, where it has Priviledges: for in such priviledges consisteth their Power.

Eloquence is power; because it is seeming Prudence.

Forme[d] is Power; because being a promise of Good, it recommendeth [42] men to °the favour of women and° strangers.

[10]The Sciences, are small Power; because not eminent;[e] and therefore, not acknowledged in any man; nor are at all, but in a few; and in them, but of a[10] few things. For Science is of that nature, as none can understand it to be, but such as in a good measure have attayned it.

Arts of publique use, as Fortification, making of Engines,[f] and other Instruments of War; because they conferre[g] to Defence, and Victory, are Power: °And though the true Mother of them, be Science, namely the Mathematiques; yet, because they are brought into the Light, by the hand of the Artificer, they be esteemed (the Midwife passing with the vulgar for the Mother,) as his issue.°

°Worth.° [11]The Value, or WORTH of a man, is as of all other things,[11] his Price; that is to say, so much as would be given for the use of his Power: and therefore is [12]not absolute; but a thing dependant on the need and[12] judgement of another. An able conductor[h] of Souldiers, is of great Price in time of War present, or imminent; but in Peace not so. A learned and uncorrupt Judge, is much Worth in time of Peace; but not so much in War. And as in other things, so in men, not the seller, but the buyer determines the Price. For let a man °(as most men do,)° rate themselves at [13]the highest Value they can;[13] yet their true Value is no more than it is esteemed by others.

14 of] om. B 21 are] {which del. by TH} are MS 23 the Light] sight MS 25 his issue] the issue of the artificer MS 32 a man] {a man corr. to men by TH} MS 34 it is esteemed] {is illeg. word; corr. to it is esteemd by TH} MS

Vniversim, Qualitas quaecunque, si gignat vel Amorem vel Metum multorum hominum, & hujusmodi Qualitatis opinio, Potentia est; quia Medium est ad auxilia & Officia multorum.

Successus foelix, potentia est; quia gignit Prudentiae, vel bonae Fortunae Opinionem; nam facit ut illum metuant, aut in illum confidant multi.

Affabilitas Potentium, est Potentiae majoris acquisitio; quia gignit Amicitiam.

Existimatio Prudentiae in rebus gerendis, sive Pacis, sive Belli, Potentia est; quia prudentibus regendos nos permittimus libentius quam aliis.

Nobilitas est Potentia, non ubique, sed in Civitatibus, ubi Nobilibus indulgentur privilegia; quia in his illorum consistit Potentia.

Eloquentia Potentia est, quia Prudentia Apparens.

Forma Potentia est; est enim Boni promissio, ideoque commendat hominem hominibus ignotis.

Scientia, Potentia est; sed parva; quia Scientia egregia rara est, nec proinde apparens nisi paucissimis, & in paucis rebus. Scientiae enim ea natura est ut esse intelligi non possit, nisi ab illis qui sunt Scientia praediti.

Artes quae conducunt multum ad utilitatem publicam, Potentia sunt; ut Artes Muniendi, Machinas aliaque instrumenta Belli fabricandi; quia ad Defensionem, & Victoriam plurimum conferunt.

Dignitas significat interdum Valorem sive pretium hominis, nempe tantum, quanti Potentiae ejus usum aliquis emere vellet. Major ergo vel minor est, prout ab aliis aestimatur. Dux militum egregius, [45] praesente vel imminente Bello magni Pretii est; in Pace non tanti. Iudex peritus & integer Pretii in Pace magni est; non item in Bello. Nam ut in rebus caeteris, ita etiam in hominibus, non ex vendentis, sed ex ementis arbitrio constituitur Pretium. Quanticunque quis seipsum aestimet, tanti tamen est, quanti aestimatur ab aliis.

[10] Science is power; but a small one, because conspicuous science is rare, and therefore is not apparent except in very few people, and in [11] The worth of a man sometimes means [12] greater or less, depending on the [13] whatever value;

[d] See above, note a. [e] = conspicuous (OED, 'eminent', a., 4). [f] = machines or instruments used in warfare (OED, 'engine', n., 5.a). [g] = contribute (OED, 'confer', v., 2.b).
[h] = commander, leader (OED, 'conductor', 4).

The manifestation of the Value we set on one another, is °that which is commonly called° Honouring, and Dishonouring. To Value a man at a high rate, is to Honour him; at a low rate, is to Dishonour him. °But high, and low, in this case, is to be understood by comparison to the rate that each man setteth on himselfe.°

°Dignity.°

[14]The publique worth of a man, which is the Value set on him by the Common-wealth, is that which men commonly call DIGNITY. And this Value of him by the Common-wealth, is understood, by[14] offices of Command, Judicature, publike Employment; or °by° Names and Titles, introduced for distinction of such Value.

[15]To Honour and Dishonour.[15]

To pray to another, for ayde °of any kind,° is to HONOUR; because a signe we have an opinion he has power °to help; and the more difficult the ayde is, the more is the Honour.°

To obey, is to Honour; because no man obeyes them, [16]whom they think[16] have no power to help, or hurt them. °And consequently to disobey, is to Dishonour.°

To give great gifts to a man, is to Honour him; because 'tis buying of Protection, and acknowledging of Power. To give little gifts, is to Dishonour; because it is but Almes, and signifies an opinon of the need of small helps.

To be sedulous in promoting anothers good; also to flatter, is to Honour; as a signe we seek his protection or ayde. °To neglect, is to Dishonour.°

To give way, or place to another, in any Commodity,[i] is to Honour; being a confession of greater power. °To arrogate, is to Dishonour.°

To shew any signe of love, or feare of another, is to Honour; [43] for [17]both to love, and to feare, is to value. To contemne, or lesse to love or feare, then he expects, is to Dishonour; for 'tis undervaluing.[17]

To praise, magnifie, or call happy, is to Honour; because °nothing but° goodnesse, power, and felicity is [18] valued. To revile, mock, or pitty, is to Dishonour.

To speak to another with consideration, to appear before him with decency, and humility, is to Honour him; as signes of [19]fear[19] to offend. To speak to him rashly, to do any thing before him obscenely, slovenly, impudently, is to Dishonour.

To believe, to trust, to rely on another, is to Honour him; signe of opinion of his °vertue and° power. °To distrust, or not believe, is to Dishonour.°

To hearken to a mans counsell, or discourse of what kind soever, is to Honour; as a signe we think him wise, or eloquent, or witty. To sleep, or go forth, or talk the while, is to Dishonour.

14 they think] {they thinke corr. to he thinkes by TH} MS 15 them] {them corr. to him by TH} MS

Manifestum facere quanti aliquem aestimemus, id ipsum est, quod Honorare, & Inhonorare; nempe magni aestimare, est Honorare; parvi, Inhonorare.

Dignitas autem plerumque significat, non aestimationem qua Homo, sed qua Civitas aliquem magni aestimat, quando in illum vel imperium vel magistratum, vel negotium publicum quodcunque, vel etiam Nomen vel Titulum honoris causa confert.

Opem poscere, Honorare est; quia Potentiam agnoscimus. Honor.

Obedire est Honorare; quia non paremus nisi illis qui possunt prodesse vel officere. Dona alicui dare Magna, est Honorare; quia Potentiae agnitio est, & defensionis quaedam emptio. Sed Parva dare, Inhonorare est; quia similis Eleemosynae est. Significatque, eum qui dat, illum existimare, cui datur, etiam parvis indigere. In promovendo Bono alieno sedulum esse, etiam adulari, Honorare est; quia signum est quod protectione vel auxilio indigemus.

Loco cedere in re quacunque cupita, Honorare est; quia confessio Potentiae majoris.

Amoris vel Metus indicia patefacere, Honorare est. In utroque enim est confessio Potentiae.

Laudare, Magnificare, Beatum dicere, est Honorare; quia Bonitas, Potentia, & Foelicitas maximè aestimantur. Contra, Convitiari, Irridere, Miserescere, Inhonorare est.

Quem alloquimur consideratè, quem adimus decorè, humiliterque, Honoramus; nam signa haec sunt nolentis displicere. Contra temerè alloqui, etiam impudenter vel turpiter coram agere, Inhonorare est.

Credere, Fidere, Honorantis est; signum enim est Potentiam attribuentis.

Consilium alicujus, vel sermonem quemcunque auscultare, Honorantis est; signum enim est prudentiam, vel Ingenium vel Eloquentiam attribuentis. Interea dormire, exire, interloqui Contrarium.

[14] Dignity generally means the great value set on someone not by a man but by the commonwealth, when it confers on him [15] Honour. [16] who [17] in each case there is an admission of power. [18] ^ very greatly [19] not wishing

[i] = advantage, benefit (OED, 'commodity', 2–3; cf. the Latin, 're cupita', 'desired thing').

To do those things to another, which he takes for signes of Honour, or which the Law or Custome makes so, is to Honour; because [20]in approving the Honour done by others, he acknowledgeth the power which others acknowledge. To refuse to do them, is to Dishonour.[20]

To agree with in opinion, is to Honour; as being a signe of approving his judgement, and wisdome. To dissent, is Dishonour; and an upbraiding of errour; and (if the dissent be in many things) of folly.

To imitate, is to Honour; for it is vehemently to approve. °To imitate ones Enemy, is to Dishonour.°

To honour those another honours, is to Honour him; as a signe of approbation of his judgement. °To honour his Enemies, is to Dishonour him.°

To employ in counsell, or in actions of difficulty, is to Honour; as a signe of opinion of his wisdome, or other power. °To deny employment in the same cases, to those that seek it, is to Dishonour.°

All these wayes of Honouring, are naturall; and as well within, as without Common-wealths. But in Common-wealths, where he, or they that have °the supreme° Authority, can make whatsoever they please, to stand for signes of Honour, there be other Honours.

[21]A Soveraigne doth Honour a Subject, with whatsoever Title, or Office, or Employment, or Action, that he himselfe will have taken for a signe of his will to Honour him.[21]

The King of Persia, Honoured Mordecay, when he appointed he should be conducted through the [22]streets in the Kings Garment, upon one of the Kings Horses, with a Crown on his head, and a Prince before him,[22] proclayming, Thus shall it be done to him that the King will honour.[j] [23]And yet another King of Persia, or the same another time, to one that demanded[23] for some great service, to weare one of the Kings robes, gave him leave so to do; but with this addition, that he should weare it as the Kings foole; °and then it was Dishonour.°[k] So that of Civill Honour, the Fountain is in the Person of the Common-wealth and dependeth on the Will of the Soveraigne; and [24]is therefore temporary, and called Civill Honour;[24] such as are Magistracy, [44] Offices, Titles; and in some places Coats, and Scutchions[l] painted: and men Honour such as [25]have[25] them, as having so many signes of favour in the Common-wealth; which favour is Power.

5 a] om. MS 10 a] om. MS 12 a] om. MS 13 his] om. MS 20 a] om. MS
23 upon] on MS 27 gave him] he gaue MS

[20] it confirms the honour done to him by others.
[21] A commonwealth honours a citizen by bestowing on him any title, province, or employment, if it has decided that that should be a sign of honour. [22] city in the king's garment by a prince

Ea facere alicui quae pro signis honoris ipse accipit, vel ea quae Lex aut Consuetudo Honoris signa statuit, Honorantis est; quia Honorem ab aliis illi habitum confirmat. [46]

In Opinionibus consentire, Honorantis est; ut Iudicium & Sapientiam ejus comprobantis. Dissentire, Contrarium est; utpote erroris vel (si dissensio sit in multis rebus) Stultitiae exprobratio.

Imitari, Honorantis est; ut quae est approbatio vehemens.

Honorare quos quis honorat, Honorare ipsum est; nempe Iudicii ejus approbatio.

Operâ alicujus uti, in capiendo consilio, vel in rebus arduis, Honorantis est; ut Sapientiae, vel Potentiae ejus agnitio.

Atque haec Honoris signa, tum in Civitatibus, tum extra, Naturalia sunt. In Civitatibus autem, ubi is vel ii qui habent Authoritatem signa Honoris constituendi quaecunque volunt, alii sunt Honorandi modi.

Civitas Civem Honorat impertiendo Titulum, vel Provinciam, vel Negotium quodcunque, si illud Honoris signum esse constituerit. Mardochaeum Rex Persiae tunc Honoravit, quando per Vrbem Regio habitu circumduci illum jussit à viro Principe proclamante, sic fiet illi, quem Rex Honore afficiet.[j] Contrà, quod fieri jubet Civitas contumeliae causa, Contumelia est; ut quando idem Rex Persiae cuidam qui rei alicujus bene gestae praemium petiit, veste Regia amictum incedere, quod rogavit concessit, addendo quod vestem illam gereret ut Regis Scurra.[k] Fons enim Honoris Civilis est Persona Civitatis, dependetque à voluntate ejus qui summam habet in Civitate Potestatem. Itaque Honor Civilis temporarius est, ut Magistratus, Ministerium publicum, Titulus; & aliquibus in locis Tunicae & Scuta picta: qui autem his ornantur, Honorabiles sunt, utpote habentes Gratiae Publicae totidem signa. Gratia autem publica Potentia est.

26 utpote 70] atque 68

[23] On the other hand, what the commonwealth ordains for the sake of insult, is an insult; as when the same king of Persia, to one that requested as a reward [24] therefore civil honour is temporary; [25] are decorated with [j] Esther 6: 1–12 (King Ahasuerus); quotation: v. 9.

[k] Plutarch, Life of Artaxerxes, V. (Hobbes has adapted the story. In Plutarch's account Teribazus pointed out that Artaxerxes' coat was torn, and asked to be given it. Artaxerxes did so, but forbade him to wear it; Teribazus wore it, with gold necklaces and women's ornaments, whereupon the king said he permitted him to wear the trinkets as a woman, and the coat as a madman.) The Book of Esther's Ahasuerus was identified as Artaxerxes in the Septuagint, and by Josephus (Antiquities, XI.6), but others identifed him as Xerxes.

[l] = escutcheons, the shields or shield-shaped surfaces on which coats of arms are painted (OED, 'escutcheon', 1).

°Honourable.° Honourable is whatsoever possession, action, or quality, is an argument and signe of Power.

And therefore To be Honoured, loved, or feared of many, is Honourable; as arguments of Power. °To be Honoured of few or none, Dishonourable.°

°Dishonourable.°

°Dominion, and Victory is Honourable; because acquired by Power; and Servitude, for need, or feare, is Dishonourable.°

Good fortune (if lasting,) Honourable; as a signe of the favour of God. Ill fortune, °and losses,° Dishonourable. Riches, are Honourable; for they are Power. Poverty, Dishonourable. Magnanimity, Liberality, Hope, Courage, Confidence, are Honourable; for they proceed from the conscience[m] of Power. °Pusillanimity, Parsimony, Fear, Diffidence, are Dishonourable.°

Timely [26] Resolution, or determination of what a man is to do, is Honourable; as being the contempt of small difficulties, and dangers. °And Irresolution, Dishonourable; as a signe of too much valuing of little impediments, and little advantages: For when a man has weighed things as long as the time permits, and resolves not, the difference of weight is but little; and therefore if he resolve not, he overvalues little things, which is Pusillanimity.°

All Actions, and Speeches, that proceed, or seem to proceed from much Experience, Science, Discretion, or Wit, are Honourable; For all these are Powers. °Actions, or Words that proceed from Errour, Ignorance, or Folly, Dishonourable.°

Gravity, as farre forth as it seems to proceed from a mind employed on [27]some thing else,[27] is Honourable; because [28]employment[28] is a signe of Power. But if it seem to proceed from a purpose to appear grave, it is Dishonourable. For the gravity of the former, is like the [29]steddinesse[29] of a Ship laden with Merchandise[30]; but of the later, like the [31]steddinesse of a Ship ballasted with Sand, and other trash.[31]

To be Conspicuous, that is to say, to be known, for Wealth, °Office, great° Actions, or any °eminent° Good, is Honourable; as a signe of the power for which he is conspicuous. °On the contrary, Obscurity, is Dishonourable.°

To be descended from conspicuous Parents, is Honourable; because they [32]the more easily attain[32] the aydes, and friends of their Ancestors. °On the contrary, to be descended from obscure Parentage, is Dishonourable.°

4 marg. om. MS 7 a] om. MS 14 too] om. MS 23 a] om. MS

[26] ^ (that is, neither too soon nor too late) [27] business, [28] to manage business
[29] slowness [30] ^ , which proceeds slowly [31] motion of a ship that has been laden only with sand, to stop it overturning. [32] easily transfer to themselves

[m] = consciousness (OED, 'conscience', 1).

Honorabile est, Possessio, Actio, vel Qualitas quaecunque, si argumentum sit Potentiae.

Itaque Honorari, Amari, vel Metui à multis Honorabile est; ut signum Potentiae.

Res prosperae (dum durant) Honorabiles sunt; ut signum favoris divini. Contrà Adversitas, contemptibilis. Divitiae sunt Honorabiles; sunt enim signum Potentiae. Magnanimitas, Liberalitas, Spes, Fortitudo, Fiducia, Honorabiles sunt; oriuntur enim à Potentiae Conscientia.

Id quod faciendum est, opportunè (id est nec nimis cito, nec sero) determinare, Honorabile est; quia natum à contemptu difficultatum & periculorum non magnorum.

Actiones omnes Sermonesque qui nascuntur vel videntur nasci à multa Experientia, Scientia, Iudicio, vel Ingenio, Honorabiles sunt. Sunt enim Potentiae. [47]

Gravitas, quatenus oritur vel videtur orta ab animo negotiis occupato Honorabilis est; quia res gerere Potentia est. Sin procedat ab ipsius Gravitatis affectatione, Turpis est. Gravitas enim illa prior similis est tarditati Navis, quae bonarum mercium onere tardè procedit. Sed gravitas illa posterior similis est motui Navis sola onustae saburra, ne evertatur.

Clarum esse, id est multis cognitum esse, propter Opes, Actiones, vel Bonum quodcunque, Honorabile est; ut signum Potentiae propter quam cognoscitur.

Claris parentibus ortum esse, Honorabile est; quia hujusmodi homines auxilia, & amicos majorum suorum ad se facile transferunt.

3 signum] signum sit 70 5 Honorabiles sunt this edn.] Honorabile est 68, 70

Actions proceeding from Equity, joyned with losse, are Honourable; as signes of Magnanimity: °for Magnanimity is a signe of Power. On the contrary, Craft, Shifting,[n] neglect of Equity, is Dishonourable.°

Covetousnesse of great Riches, and ambition of great Honours, are Honourable; as signes of [33]power[33] to obtain them. Covetousnesse, and ambition, of little [34]gaines, or preferments,[34] is Dishonourable.

Nor does it alter the case of Honour, whether an action (so it be [45] great and difficult, and consequently a signe of much power,) be just or unjust: for Honour consisteth onely in the opinion of Power. Therefore the ancient Heathen did not thinke they Dishonoured, but greatly Honoured the Gods, when they introduced them in their Poems, committing [35]Rapes, Thefts,[35] and other great, but unjust, or unclean acts: In so much as nothing is so much celebrated in Jupiter, as his Adulteries; nor in Mercury, as his Frauds, and Thefts: [36]of whose praises, in a hymne of Homer, the greatest is this,[36] that being born in the morning, he had invented Musique at noon, and before night, stolne away the Cattell of Apollo, from his Herdsmen.[p]

°Also amongst men,° till there were constituted great Common-wealths, it was thought no dishonour to be a Pyrate, or a High-way Theefe; but rather [37] a lawfull Trade, °not onely amongst the Greeks, but also amongst all other Nations;° as is manifest by the Histories of antient time[38]. [q] And at this day, in this part of the world, private Duels are, and alwayes will be Honourable, though unlawfull, till such time as there shall be [39]Honour ordained for[39] them that refuse, and Ignominy for them that make the Challenge. [40]For Duels also are many times effects of Courage; and the ground of Courage is alwayes Strength or Skill, which are Power; though for the most part they be effects of rash speaking, and of the fear of Dishonour, in one, or both the Combatants; who engaged by rashnesse, are driven into the Lists[r] to avoyd disgrace.[40]

15–16 before night . . . Herdsmen] the same day at night stolne the {illeg. word corr. to Heardes by TH} of Apollo MS

[33] the power which that person thinks he has [34] things, [35] adulteries, murders, [36] in whose praise Homer gives the following: [37] ^ an honour and [38] ^ , especially those of the Greeks [39] laws devised, which will make it happen that honour is given to [40] How this may be done, I do not see. For promptness to fight is always a sign of courage – which, in the natural state of mankind, is the greatest virtue, if not the only one. To refuse to fight, however, becomes a virtue not by nature but by laws, and nature is stronger than laws.

Actiones quae oriuntur ab Aequitate, si cum damno fiant, Honorabiles sunt; ut signa Animi Magni.

Cupiditates Divitiarum ingentium, & Honorum magnorum, Honorabiles sunt; ut quae signa sunt potentiae, quam is videtur sibi ea adipiscendi possidere. Cupiditas contra rerum exiguarum, Turpis est.

Quod ad Actionis Honorem attinet, modo actio magna & ardua sit, & proinde magnae Potentiae argumentum, utrum justa, an injusta sit, parum refert. Consistit enim Honor in solius Potentiae existimatione. Itaque Ethnici antiqui, qui Deos in versibus suis Adulteria, Caedes, aliasque magnas quidem sed injustas vel immundas actiones commisisse faciunt, non illos (ut existimavere) dehonestabant, sed valde honorabant; & propterea nihil in Iove magis celebrabant quam ejus Adulteria, neque in Mercurio quam furta & fraudes; in cujus laudibus ab Homero ponitur hoc,

Natus mane, die medio factus Citharaedus,
Armentum Phoebi fur vespertinus abegit.[p]

Antequam magnae extiterint Civitates, ignominia non erat, sed potius Honorificum, & negotii genus legitimum, si quis terra vel mari praedo erat, ut ex historiis antiquis manifestum est, praesertim Graecis.[q] Etiam hodie in hac nostra parte orbis terrarum, pugna singularis privatorum, quanquam illicita, Honorifica tamen est, & erit, donec excogitatae fuerint leges, quarum virtute fieri potest, ut qui ad pugnam provocat, vilis, qui provocationi non respondet Honorandus videatur. Quod quî fieri possit non video. Nam promptitudo ad pugnam Fortitudinis signum semper est, quae in statu hominum naturali Virtus maxima, si non unica est; pugnam autem recusare non natura sed Legibus Virtus fit, & Legibus Natura Fortior est.

9 Deos this edn.] Deos quos 68, 70 21 potest] possit 70 22 quî fieri possit] an effici queat 70

[n] See Hobbes's explication of this term in Ch. 8, p. 110 (and cf. OED, 'shifting', vbl. n., 2.b).

[p] Homeric Hymns (attributed, traditionally but wrongly, to Homer), IV, ll. 17–19: 'born in the morning, by midday he was playing the lyre, and in the evening he stole the cattle of far-shooting Apollo' (tr. West, p. 115). Hobbes gives an accurate translation in the Latin, omitting only 'far-shooting'.

[q] Thucydides, Eight Bookes, I[.5], p. 4: 'For the Grecians in old time, and such Barbarians as, in the Continent, liued neere vnto the Sea . . . after once they beganne to crosse ouer one to another in Ships, became Theeues, and went abroad . . . to enrich themselues . . . Being a matter at that time no where in disgrace, but rather carrying with it something of glory . . . They also robbed one another within the maine Land.' Aristotle also described brigandage as a common way of life: Politics I.3 (1256a36–9).

[r] = the place of combat (OED, 'list', n.[3], 9.b).

°Coats of Armes.°

Scutchions,[s] and Coats of Armes haereditary, where they have °any eminent° Priviledges, are Honourable; otherwise not: for their Power consisteth either in such Priviledges, or in Riches, or some [41]such[41] thing as is equally honoured in other men. This kind of Honour, commonly called Gentry, has been derived from the Antient Germans. For there never was any such thing known, where the German Customes were unknown. Nor is it now any where in use, where the Germans have not inhabited. The antient Greek Commanders, when they went to war, had their Shields painted with such Devises as they pleased; insomuch as an unpainted Buckler[u] was a signe of Poverty, and of a common Souldier: but they transmitted not the Inheritance of them. The Romans transmitted the Marks of their Families: but they were the Images, not the Devises of their Ancestors. Amongst the people of Asia, Afrique, and America, there is not, °nor was ever,° any such thing. The Germans onely had that custome; from whom it has been derived[v] into England, France, Spain and Italy, when in great numbers they either ayded the Romans, or made their own Conquests in these Westerne parts of the world.[w]

For Germany, being antiently, as all other Countries, °in their beginnings,° divided amongst an infinite number of little Lords, or Masters of [42] Families, that continually had wars one with another; those Masters, or Lords, principally to the end they might, when they were Covered with Arms, be known by their followers; and partly for ornament, both painted their Armor, or their Scutchion,[x] or Coat, with the picture of some Beast, or other thing; and also put some °eminent[y] [46] and° visible mark upon the Crest of their Helmets.[z] And [43]this ornament both of the Armes, and Crest,[43] descended by inheritance to their Children; to the eldest [44]pure,[44] and to the rest with some note of diversity, such as the [45]Old master,[45] that is to say in Dutch, the Here-alt

19 those] these MS 21 both painted] did both paynt MS 23 Helmets] {helmets corr. to helmet by TH} MS 26 in Dutch] om. MS

---

[41] other [42] ^ large [43] these ornaments or insignia of their arms [44] just as they had been worn by their father, [45] chief of the family,

---

[s] See above, note l. [t] The Latin is grammatically correct, but its meaning ('For such symbols of power consist in. . .') does not correspond to the English. Probably 'Potentiae enim Insignium talium consistunt . . .' ('For the powers of such symbols consist in . . .') was intended; this may have been wrongly corrected by someone who thought that 'Potentiae' was a genitive singular.

[u] Properly, a buckler was a small round shield (OED, 'buckler', *n.*², 1); but Hobbes apparently uses the word just as a synonym for 'shield'. [v] = conveyed, transmitted (OED, 'derive', v., 4).

[w] This paragraph draws (as Hobbes says in the MS: see the textual apparatus, for p. 146, ll. 9–11) on Cluverius, Germaniae antiquae, esp. pp. 342–8, where, however, it is claimed only that this practice was most strongly observed by the Celts and Germans, not that it was unique to them. [x] See above, note l.

[y] See above, note e. [z] See Cluverius, Germaniae antiquae, pp. 343–4 (crests), 347, 376–8 (images of wild beasts).

Tunicae & Scuta picta haereditaria, ubi adjuncta habent Privilegia, [48] Honorabilia sunt, absque illis non item. Potentiae enim Insignia talia consistunt[t] in Privilegiis, vel in Divitiis, aliave re quae in caeteris hominibus aequè Honoratur. Genus hoc Honoris vulgò dicta Nobilitas gentis, ab antiquis Germanis videtur derivata. Res enim omnibus incognita est, nisi quibus cogniti sunt mores Germanorum. Neque usquam hodie in consuetudine sunt, ubi illi non aliquando habitaverunt. Graecorum veterum Duces ad bellum exeuntes scuta quidem picta, sed suo quisque arbitrio gestare consueverunt; pauperis, & gregarii militis erat scutum purum. Sed ad filios non transierunt scuta ut pars haereditatis. Romanorum familiis Insignia quidem erant sua, quae ad posteros suos descenderunt; nec tamen scuta, sed Imagines Majorum suorum. In Asia, Africa, & America tale nihil est. Proprium erat hoc Germanorum; à quibus in Angliam, Galliam, Hispaniam, & Italiam manavit, quo tempore, magno numero, aut Romanis aut sibimet ipsis in his partibus mundi Occidentalibus militaverunt.[w]

Germania enim cum esset antiquitùs (sicut caeterae gentes) divisa inter numerum ingentem Regulorum exiguorum, sive potius Patrum Magnarum Familiarum, perpetuò inter se bellantium, Reguli illi maximè, ut cooperti Armis à militibus suis dignoscerentur, partim etiam ornamenti causa, Arma sua, aut Scuta, aut Tunicam Imagine ornabant alicujus Bestiae, vel alîus rei; etiam visibilem notam aliquam cassidi imposuerunt, quae ornamenta sive Insignia Armorum ad filios suos descendebant; & quidem ad natu maximum, sicut erant à patre gestata, ad caeteros autem cum nota aliqua distinctionis, qualem Princeps familiae, (id est Germanicè heralt) constituebat. Sed quan-

17 numerum ingentem Regulorum exiguorum] plurimos exiguos Regulos 70
17–18 Patrum . . . bellantium] Patres . . . bellantes 70 22 ad natu maximum 70] natu maximo 68
23 ad caeteros 70] caeteris 68

thought fit.[aa] But when many such Families, joyned together, made a [46]greater[46] Monarchy, this duty of the Herealt, to distinguish Scutchions, [47]was made a private Office a part.[47] And the issue of these Lords, is the [48]great and antient Gentry;[48] which °for the most part° bear[ab] living creatures, noted for courage, and rapine; or Castles, Battlements, °Belts,° Weapons, °Bars,[ac] Palisadoes,° [ad] and other notes of War; nothing being then [49]in honour, but[49] vertue military. Afterwards, not onely Kings, but popular Common-wealths, gave divers manners of Scutchions, to such as went forth to the War, or returned from it, for encouragement, or recompence to their service. All which, °by an observing Reader,° may be found in such antient Histories, Greek and Latine, as make mention of the German Nation, and Manners, in their times.

°Titles of Honour.°

Titles of Honour, such as are Duke, Count, Marquis, and Baron, are Honourable; as signifying the value set upon them by [50] the Soveraigne Power of the Common-wealth: Which Titles, were in old time titles of [51]Office, and Command,[51] derived some from the Romans, some from the Germans, and French. Dukes, in Latine Duces, being [52]Generalls in War:[52] Counts, Comites, such as bare the Generall company °out of friendship;° and were left [53] to govern and defend places conquered, and pacified: Marquises, Marchiones, were Counts that governed the Marches, or bounds of the Empire. Which titles of Duke, Count, and Marquis, came into the [54] Empire, about the time of Constantine the Great,[ae] from the customes of the German Militia. But Baron, seems to have been a Title of the Gaules, and signifies a Great man; [55]such as were the Kings, or Princes men, whom they employed in war about their persons;[55] and seems to be derived from Vir, [56] to Ber, and Bar, that signified the same in the Language of the Gaules, that Vir in Latine; and thence [57] to Bero, and Baro: [58]so that such men were called[58] Berones, and after [59] Barones;

7 Afterwards] Afterward MS 9–11 All which . . . their times] The places of antient History out of w[ch] this that I haue sayd may be gathered, are at lardge collected by Philip Cluuerius in his Germania antiqua MS

[46] great [47] and insignia, was deputed to another, who is now called the 'Herald'. [48] greatest and most ancient nobility that now exists in this part of the world;
[49] so greatly valued as [50] ^ the man (or people) who has [51] public office,
[52] those who led the armies of the Romans: [53] ^ by the generals (when they returned [to Rome])
[54] ^ Roman [55] , or magnate, whose help was very much used by kings in the conduct of war;
[56] ^ whence it easily slipped [57] ^ easily [58] and hence came about the Ciceronian Latin word[af]
[59] ^ (in French)

do hujusmodi familiae conjunctae fuerunt, ita ut magna jam Monarchia facta esset, officium hoc Principis familiae, Scuta sive Insignia constituendi, alii demandatum est, quem nunc appellant Heraldum. Atque ex illorum Regulorum sobole orta est maxima & antiquissima, quae nunc est, in hac parte orbis Nobilitas. Gestant autem aut animalia, rapina & fortitudine nota, aut Castra, Valla, Tela, & ejusmodi notas belli. Nihil enim illis temporibus in pretio tanto erat quantum Virtus Bellica. Postea autem non solum Reges, sed etiam Civitates populares exeuntibus in bellum vel à bello redeuntibus, provocandae vel remunerandae virtutis causa, Scuta diversimodò picta concesserunt. Quae omnia in Historiis antiquis, tum Graecis tum Latinis, ubi de Germanorum gente & moribus verba faciunt, inveniri possunt.

Honoris Tituli, quales sunt Dux, Comes, Marchio, Baro, Honorabiles sunt, ut qui significant quantum eos aestimet is, vel illi, qui Civitatis [49] summam habent Potestatem. Tituli autem illi fuerunt olim Ministerii publici, & derivati partim à Romanis, partim à Germanis, & Gallis. Duces enim erant, qui Romanorum exercitus duxerunt; Comites, qui comitabantur Duces; quibus etiam loca capta & pacata, à redeuntibus Ducibus regenda & tutanda relinquebantur. Marchiones Comites erant, qui regebant Imperii limites. Atque Tituli Dux, Comes, Marchio, in Imperium Romanum introducti sunt, à consuetudine Militiae Germanicae, circa tempora Constantini Magni.[ae] At Baro, Gallorum Titulus videtur esse, significatque magnum hominem, vel Magnatem, quorum in negotiis bellicis opera maximè utebantur Reges. Deducta autem videtur vox à Latina Vir, unde facilis est lapsus ad Ber, & Bar, quae Linguâ Gallorum idem significabat quod Latinè Vir; inde facilis erat transitus ad Bero & Baro; & inde fiebat Ciceroni vox Latina Berones,[af] & postea Gal-

9 diversimodò] diversimodè 70 20 tempora 68-Errata] tempore 68
24 Linguâ 70] Linguae 68 25 & inde fiebat] hincque facta 70

[aa] 'Dutch' here means German (cf. the Latin: 'Germanicè'). This was the popular etymology; William Camden noted in his 'Antiquity of Heralds in England' that 'most' accepted the derivation from 'the German . . . which signifieth old and ancient master' (p. 88). But it was rejected (correctly) in Verstegan, Restitution, pp. 320–21.

[ab] = display as heraldic devices (OED, 'bear', v.[1], 6.c).

[ac] = defensive barriers, bulwarks (OED, 'bar', n.[1], 14).

[ad] = palisades, defensive fences made from stakes fixed in the ground (OED, 'palisado', n.; 'palisade', n.).

[ae] The Emperor Constantine I became ruler of the north-western territories of the Empire in 306, took power in Rome in 312, and died in 337.

[af] The word 'baro' was used by Cicero to mean 'simpleton', 'blockhead': see, e.g., De finibus, II.76; De divinatione, II.144.

and (in Spanish) Varones. [60]But he that would know more particularly the originall of Titles of Honour, may find it, as I have done this, in Mr. Seldens most excellent Treatise of that subject.[ag] In processe of time these offices of Honour, by occasion of trouble, and for reasons of good and peaceable government, were turned into meer Titles; serving for the most part, to distinguish the precedence, place, and order of subjects in the Common-wealth:[60] and men were made Dukes, Counts, Marquises, and Barons of Places, wherein they had neither possession, nor command: °and other Titles also, were devised to the same end.°

°Worthinesse.° [61]WORTHINESSE, is a thing different from the worth, or value of a man; and also from his merit, or desert; and consisteth in a particular power, or ability for that, whereof he is said to be worthy: which particular ability, is °Fitnesse.° usually named FITNESSE, or Aptitude.[61]

[62]For he is Worthiest to be a Commander, to be a Judge, or to have any other charge,[ah] that is best fitted, with the qualities required to the [47] well discharging of it; and Worthiest of Riches, that has the qualities most requisite for the well using of them: any of which qualities being absent, one may neverthelesse be a Worthy man, and valuable for some thing else. Again, a man may be Worthy of Riches, Office, and Employment, that neverthelesse, can plead no right to have it before another; and therefore cannot be said to merit or deserve it. For Merit, praesupposeth a right, and that the thing deserved is due by promise: Of which I shall say more hereafter, when I shall speak of Contracts.[62] [ai]

1 and (in Spanish) Varones] om. MS 2–3 may find . . .Treatise] let him read m[r] Seldens treatise MS

[60] You will find these things, and many other things written about these matters, in John Selden's book Titles of Honor. In the course of time, because of the harm done to the commonwealth by the power of certain men in the kingdom of England, as the powers of these titled ones ceased or were taken away, titles were eventually conferred on the rich or the deserving, for no other reason than to distinguish the ranks of citizens: [61] Worthiness is sometimes taken in the sense of 'aptitude'.

[62] For example, that person is worthy of command or magistracy who is fit, that is, who is best endowed with those qualities that are necessary for exercising command or magistracy.

Each person is also described as worthy of the thing he merits. But merit is never called 'worthiness'; for they differ insofar as merit presupposes a right resulting from a promise, whereas worthiness does not presuppose a right.

[ag] Selden, Titles of Honor, esp. pp. 182–240 (Duke, Marquis, Count), 258–93 (Baron: suggesting a Gaulish origin, with the basic meaning 'man').

[ah] = commission, responsibility (OED, 'charge', n., 12).

[ai] See Ch. 14, below.

lica Barones, & Hispanica Varones. Haec & alia multa de his scripta invenies à Iohanne Seldeno in libro de Titulis Honoris.[ag] Progrediente tempore propter quorundam hominum Potentiam in Regno Angliae Reipublicae incommodam, cessantibus aut ablatis Titulatorum horum Potentiis, Tituli tandem in Divites, vel bene meritos ad nullam aliam rem collati sunt, quam ad distinguendos Civium ordines, factique sunt Duces, Comites, Marchiones, & Barones locorum, ubi nec imperium ullum, neque agros habuere.

Dignitas etiam accipitur aliquando pro Aptitudine; ut Dignus sit is Imperio vel Magistratu qui Idoneus est, id est qui qualitatibus illis maximè praeditus est, quae ad Imperium & Magistratum administrandum sunt necessariae. Item Dignus divitiis, qui scit illis bene uti.

Dignus etiam dicitur unusquisque ejus rei quam meretur. Meritum autem Dignitas nunquam dicitur; nam distinguuntur eo quod Meritum praesupponit jus ex promisso; Dignitas non praesupponit jus.

CHAP. XI.

Of the difference of MANNERS.

By MANNERS, I mean not here, [1]Decency of behaviour; as how one man should salute another, or how a man should wash his mouth, or pick his teeth before company, and such other points of the Small Moralls;[a] But those qualities of man-kind, that concern their living together in Peace, and Unity. To which end we are to consider,[1] that the Felicity of this life, consisteth not in the repose [3]of a mind satisfied.[3] For there is [4] no such Finis ultimus, (utmost ayme,) nor Summum Bonum, (greatest Good,) as is spoken of in the Books of the old Morall Philosophers.[b] Nor can a man any more live, whose Desires are at an end, than he, whose Senses and [5]Imaginations[5] are at a stand. Felicity is a continuall progresse [6]of the desire, from one object[6] to another; the attaining of the former, being still but the way to the later. The cause whereof is, That the object of mans desire, is not to enjoy once onely, and for one instant of time; but to [7]assure for ever, the way of his future desire.[7] And therefore the voluntary actions, °and inclinations of all men,° tend, not onely to the procuring, but also to the assuring of [8]a contented life; and differ onely in the[8] way: which ariseth partly from the diversity of passions, in divers men; and partly from the difference of the °knowledge, or° opinion each one has of the causes, which produce the effect desired.

[2]What is here meant by Manners.[2]

A restlesse desire of Power, in all men.

So that in the first place, I put for [9]a generall inclination of all mankind, a perpetuall and restlesse desire of Power after power, that ceaseth onely in Death.[9] And the cause of this, is not alwayes that a man hopes for a [10] more intensive delight, than he has already attained to; or that he cannot be content with a moderate power: but because he cannot assure the power and means to live well, which he hath present, without the acquisition of more. And from hence it is, that Kings, whose power is greatest, turn their endeavours

5–6 marg. om. MS {Note: all marginal notes in this chapter are omitted in the MS; these omissions are not separately noted here.} 21 This para. is numbered 1. in the MS {Note: each subsequent para. in this chapter is numbered in the MS, up to 26. These numbers are not separately noted here.}

[1] the ways of behaving when eating, dressing, and uttering greetings, and other points of the 'small morals' which boys are taught; but those qualities of mankind by which peace is conserved, and the state of the commonwealth is strengthened. It must be known, however,

[2] [Note: from the beginning of Ch. 11 to the end of the book, the Latin omits almost all marginal notes. Henceforth these omissions are not separately noted.] [3] or tranquillity of a mind.

CAPVT XI.

De Varietate Morum.

Per Mores intelligo hoc loco, non comendi, vestiendi, salutandi ritus, aliaque Moralia Parva quae docentur pueri; sed humani generis qualitates illas, quibus Pax conservatur, & Civitatis status confirmatur.

Sciendum autem est, vitae praesentis Foelicitatem non consistere in [50] tranquillitate sive requie animi. Finis enim ultimus & Summum Bonum, de quibus loquuntur Ethici Veteres,[b] locum in praesente vita nullum habent. Neque is, cujus Cupiditates ad finem pervenerunt, vivere potest, magis quam is cujus Sensus & Memoria perierunt. Foelicitas progressus perpetuus est ab unâ Cupiditate ad alteram; & adeptio prioris Cupiti, ad adeptionem posterioris Via est. Causa hujus rei est, Quod Objectum Cupiditatis humanae, non est ut eo semel, & quasi ad momentum temporis fruatur homo, sed ut fruitionem suam securam in futurum reddat. Itaque Actiones voluntariae non solum eo tendunt, ut bonum procurent, sed etiam ut certum sibi in perpetuum faciant. Sed non eadem via omnium procedunt Actiones, propter diversorum hominum diversas passiones; partim etiam propter differentiam opinionum, quas habent diversi homines circa causas, à quibus res cupita sit producenda.

Primo ergo loco pono, Morem omnium hominum esse, ut perpetuò atque indesinenter Potentiam unam post aliam per omnem vitam persequantur; non quod quis majorem sive intensiorem semper speret, quam qua jam fruitur, neque quod modica Potentia contentus esse non possit; sed quod Potentiam, & bene vivendi facultates praesentes conservare non possit, nisi acquirendo plura. Atque hinc est, quod Reges, quorum Potentia est maxima,

[4] ^, in our present life, [5] memory [6] of one desire
[7] make his enjoyment secure in the future. [8] a good for ever; but the actions of all people do not proceed in the same
[9] the manner of behaving of all mankind, the perpetual and unceasing pursuit of one power after another through one's entire life. [10] ^ greater or

[a] Hobbes appears to have been the first writer to use the phrase 'small morals' in English.
[b] Cicero's De finibus discussed the theories of Epicurean, Stoic, Peripatetic, and other moral philosophers about the 'finis ultimus', 'summum bonum', or 'ultimum bonum'.

to the assuring it at home by Lawes, or abroad by Wars: and when [11]that is done, there succeedeth a new desire; in some, of Fame from new Conquest; in others, of ease and sensuall pleasure; in others, of admiration, or being flattered for excellence in some art, or other ability of the mind.[11]

Love of Contention from Competition.

[12]Competition[12] of Riches, Honour, Command, or other power, enclineth [48] to Contention, Enmity, and War: Because the way of one Competitor, to the attaining of his desire, is to kill, subdue, [13]supplant,[c] or[13] repell the other. °Particularly,° competition of praise, enclineth to a reverence of Antiquity. For [14]men[14] contend with the living, not with the dead; to these ascribing more than due, that they may [15]obscure the glory of[15] the other.

Civil obedience from love of Ease.

Desire of Ease, and sensuall Delight, disposeth men to obey a common Power: Because by such Desires, a man doth abandon the [16]protection[16] might be hoped for from his own Industry, and labour. Fear of [17] Death, and Wounds, disposeth to the same; and for the same reason. °On the contrary,° needy men, and hardy, not contented with their present condition; as also, all men that are ambitious of Military [18]command, are enclined to continue the causes of warre; and to stirre up trouble and sedition: for there is no honour Military but by warre; nor any such hope to mend an ill game, as by causing a new shuffle.[18 d]

From feare of Death, or Wounds.

And from love of Arts.

Desire of Knowledge, and Arts of Peace, enclineth men to obey a common Power: For such Desire, containeth a desire of leasure; and consequently protection from some other Power than their own.

Love of Vertue, from love of Praise.

Desire of Praise, disposeth to laudable actions, such as please them whose judgement they value; for of those men whom we contemn, we contemn also the Praises. Desire of Fame after death does the same. And though after death, there be no sense of the praise given us [19]on Earth,[19] as being joyes, that are either swallowed up in the unspeakable joyes °of Heaven,° or extinguished in the extreme torments °of Hell:° yet is not such Fame vain; because men have a present delight therein, from the foresight of it, and of the benefit that may redound thereby to their posterity: which though they now see not, yet they imagine; and any thing that is pleasure in the sense, the same also is pleasure in the imagination.

3 others] other MS 18 as] om. B 24 love of H-Errata] love H, B

[11] this too is successfully achieved, another new desire arises, either of fame or of new sensual pleasures. [12] Desire [13] and in any way [14] those who live [15] take it away from [16] power which [17] ^ violent [18] honour, are inclined to stir up wars and seditions, and to promote the causes of them; for without these, there is no military glory. [19] by men, ad eam, tum domi Legibus, tum Foris Armis tutandam se convertant. Etiam quando hoc quoque rectè successit, Cupiditas oritur alia nova, aut Famae aut Voluptatum novarum.

Divitiarum, Honorum, Imperii, vel Potentiae cujuscunque Cupiditas disponit hominem ad Contentionem, Inimicitias, & Bellum; competitorem enim interficere, vincere, & quomodocunque repellere, competitori alteri ad obtinendum quod cupit, Via est.

Laudis competitio venerationem producit antiquitatis. Nam qui vivunt, cum viventibus, non cum mortuis contendunt, & his plus justo tribuunt, ut ab illis demant.

Cupiditas Otii & Voluptatis disponit homines ad parendum Potentiae alicui communi; quia propter Cupiditates illas, homines Potentiam quam à sua ipsorum Industria sperare poterant, derelinquunt. Metus mortis violentae & vulnerum disponit ad idem, & propter causam eandem. Homines indigi iidemque fortes, nec sorte sua contenti; etiam Honoris militaris Ambitiosi disponuntur ad bella & seditiones excitandas, & ad causas eorum alendas; quia sine his militaris gloria nulla est.

Cupiditas Scientiarum, pacisque Artium, disponit ad parendum [51] Potentiae communi; continet enim Cupiditatem Otii, quod sine Potentiae alienae protectione haberi non potest.

Amor Laudis disponit ad Actiones laudabiles, quales placiturae illis sunt, quorum Iudicium magnifacimus; quorum autem personas eorum etiam Laudes spernimus. Cupido Famae post mortem, idem facit, Quanquam enim post mortem, Laudes hominum non sentimus, ut quae gaudia sunt, ab ineffabilibus gaudiis absorpta, vel ab indicibilibus doloribus extincta; vana tamen non est, quia Fama praevisa per se placet, atque etiam insuper propter bonum ad posteritatem inde redundaturum. Nam etsi hoc nesciant, imaginantur tamen; quod autem in sentiendo placet, placet etiam in imaginatione.

15 Honoris militaris] in Honoribus militaribus 70

[c] 'Supplant' had a range of meanings, including 'trip up', 'cause the downfall of', 'root out', and 'get rid of', in addition to its modern sense of 'dispossess and take the place of' (OED, 'supplant', v., 1–5).

[d] = shuffling of the pack of cards (OED, 'shuffle', n., 6.a).

Hate, from difficulty of Requiting great Benefits.

To have received from [20]one, to whom we think our selves equall,[20] greater benefits than there is hope to Requite, disposeth to counterfeit love; but really secret hatred; and puts a man into the estate of a desperate debtor, that in declining the sight of his creditor, tacitely wishes him there, where he might never see him more. For benefits oblige; and obligation is thraldome; and unrequitable obligation, perpetuall thraldome; [21]which is to ones equall,[21] hatefull. But to have received benefits from one, whom we acknowledge for superiour, enclines to love; because the obligation is no new depression:[e] and cheerfull acceptation, [22](which men call Gratitude,) is such an honour done to the obliger, as[22] is taken generally for retribution. Also to receive benefits, though from an equall, or inferiour, as long as there is hope of requitall, disposeth to love: for [23]in the intention of the receiver, the obligation is of ayd, and service mutuall; from whence[23] proceedeth an Emulation of who shall exceed in benefiting; the most noble and profitable contention possible; wherein the victor is pleased with his victory, and the other revenged by confessing it.

And from Conscience of deserving to be hated.

To have done more hurt to a man, than he can, or is willing to expiate, enclineth the doer to hate the sufferer.[f] For he must expect revenge, [49] or forgivenesse; both which are hatefull.

Promptnesse to hurt, from Fear.

Feare of [24]oppression,[24] disposeth a man to anticipate, or to seek [25]ayd by society:[25] for there is no other way by which a man can secure his life and liberty.

And from distrust of their own wit.

Men that distrust their own subtilty, are in tumult, and sedition, better disposed for victory, than they that suppose themselves wise, or crafty. For these love to consult, the other (fearing to be [26]circumvented,)[26] to strike first. And in sedition, men being alwayes in [27] the procincts[g] of battell, to hold together, and use all advantages of force, is a better stratagem, than any that can [28] proceed from subtilty of Wit.

Vain undertaking from Vain-glory.

[29]Vain-glorious men, such as without being conscious to themselves of great sufficiency,[h] delight in supposing themselves gallant men, are enclined onely[29] to ostentation; but not to attempt: Because when [30]danger or difficulty[30] appears, they look for[i] nothing but to have their insufficiency discovered.

3 really] really to MS 16 it] {it corr. to himselfe vanquished by TH} MS

[20] our equals, [21] but to be in thraldom to one's equal is [22] which always obliges the obliger, [23] the obligation is of mutual good; whence sometimes [24] harm from another [25] allies: [26] deceived), [27] ^, as it were, [28] ^ easily [29] Vain-glory, which, resting on no foundations, is the mere pretence that one possesses other people's virtues, inclines those who suffer from it [30] real danger

Majora à Paribus bona accepisse, quam speramus posse retribuere, disponit ad odium secretum, simulque amorem fictum; facitque hominem similem Debitoris, qui non est solvendo; nam talis praesentiam creditoris odit, optatque illum tacitus ibi esse, ubi videri amplius non possit. Beneficia enim obligant; obligatio autem, servitudo est; & obligatio insolubilis servitudo perpetua. Servire autem pari odiosum est. Beneficia autem accepta ab eo, quem agnoscimus superiorem, disponit ad amorem; quia obligatio haec, depressio[e] nova non est: etiam acceptatio grata, quae obligantem semper obligat, habetur ubique pro retributione. Beneficia accepisse ab aequali vel etiam ab inferiore, dum spes est retribuendi, disponit ad amorem. Obligatio enim est boni mutui; unde oritur aliquando in Benefaciendo Aemulatio, & certamen omnium utilissimum & nobilissimum, cum quis alterum benefaciendo superabit, ubi victori sua placet victoria, & victo ipsum certasse ultio est.

Laesisse alium plus, quàm potest aut vult reparare disponit eum qui laesit, ad odium laesi.[f] Nam aut ultionem expectat vel Veniam, quarum utraque est odiosa.

Damni ab alio metus disponit ad anticipationem, vel ad parandos socios. Nam ut quis vitae & libertatis securus sit, via alia nulla est.

Qui ingeniis propriis diffidunt, meliùs disponuntur in seditionibus ad victoriam, quam illi, qui se sapientes vel astutos esse putant. Nam hi consulere, illi (metuentes decipi) ferire priores amant. Quia autem in seditionibus homines quasi in procinctu[g] praelii semper sunt, bene inter se consentire, & viribus quotiescunque possunt uti, stratagema melius est, quam quod facile à subtilitate ingenii nasci potest.

Inanis Gloria, quae nullo innixa fundamento, Virtutum alienarum, quasi suarum Fictio mera est, quos possidet, ad Ostentationem, non [52] ad Aggressionem urget; quia, cum ad vera pericula ventum est, nihil expectant, praeterquam ut vanitas ipsorum detegatur.

5 servitudo] servitus 70 13 superabit] superat 70 14 Laesisse alium plus, quàm] Laesio major quam is qui laesit 70 14–15 eum qui laesit,] hunc 70 15 vel] aut 70 24 potest] possit 70

[e] = weighing down, lowering (OED, 'depression', 1, 4). [f] Cf. Tacitus, Agricola, XLII.3.

[g] = Hobbes appears to conflate two terms here: (i) 'procinct', meaning 'the condition of being prepared or equipped' (the meaning of the Latin phrase he uses here, 'in procinctu', denoting readiness for battle), which in English was used only in the phrase 'in procinct', meaning 'ready, prepared' (OED, 'procinct', *n.*², citing Chapman (*c.*1611), 'in all procinct of warre', and Milton (1667), 'warr in procinct'); (ii) 'procincts' meaning 'precincts' (the general area surrounding something) (OED, 'procinct', *n.*¹, 'precinct', n., 1.b). The Latin here seems unambiguous; but Hobbes's use of the English plural, and a comparison with Ch. 21, p. 332, 'they live . . . upon the confines of battel', may suggest that the spatial metaphor of 'precincts' was present in his mind. [h] = ability, competency (OED, 'sufficiency', 4).

[i] = expect (OED, 'look', v., 15).

[31]Vain-glorious men, such as estimate their sufficiency[j] by the flattery of other men, or the fortune of some precedent action, without assured ground of hope from the true knowledge of themselves, are enclined to rash engaging; and in the approach of danger, or difficulty, to retire if they can: because not seeing the way of safety, they will rather hazard their honour, which may be salved with an excuse; than their lives, for which no salve is sufficient.[31]

Ambition, from opinion of sufficiency.

Men that have a strong opinion of their own wisdome in matter of government, are disposed to Ambition. Because without publique Employment °in counsell or magistracy,° the honour of their wisdome is lost. And therefore Eloquent speakers are enclined to Ambition; for Eloquence seemeth wisedome, both to themselves and others.

Irresolution, from too great valuing of small matters.

Pusillanimity disposeth men to Irresolution, and consequently to lose [32]the occasions, and fittest[32] opportunities of action. For after men have been in deliberation [33]till the time of action approach,[33] if it be not then manifest what is best to be done, 'tis a signe, the difference of Motives, the one way and the other, are not great: Therefore not to resolve then, is to lose the occasion by weighing of trifles; °which is Pusillanimity.°

Frugality, (though in [34]poor[34] men a Vertue,) maketh a man unapt to atchieve such actions, as require the strength of many men at once: For it weakeneth their Endeavour, which is to be nourished and kept in vigor by Reward.

Confidence in others from Ignorance of the marks of Wisdome and Kindnesse.

Eloquence, with flattery, [35]disposeth men to confide[k] in them that have it;[35] because the former is seeming Wisdome, the later seeming Kindnesse. Adde to them Military reputation, and it disposeth men to [36]adhaere, and subject themselves to those men that have them.[36] The two former, having given them caution[l] against danger from him; the later gives them caution against danger from others.

And from Ignorance of naturall causes.

°Want of Science, that is,° Ignorance of causes, disposeth, or rather constraineth a man to rely on the advise, and authority of others. For all men whom the truth concernes, if they rely not on their own, must rely on the opinion of some other, whom they think wiser than themselves, and see not why he should deceive them. [50]

24 and] om. MS 26 gives] giue MS

[31] Vain-glory, which has as its foundation either the flattery of others, or some previous action which was successful (but fortuitously so), may well stir up those who suffer from it to begin some enterprise, but deserts them in the midst of dangers. And so they turn pale, tremble, and flee, each thinking more about his life, which cannot be repaired, than about his honour, which, he hopes, can somehow be patched up again – perhaps with a lie.

[32] , generally, the [33] for as long as is allowed by the necessity of taking action,

[34] private

[35] acquires friends, by whom one may be trusted;

[36] obedience.

Inanis Gloria, quae pro fundamento habet, vel adulationem aliorum, vel Actionem aliquam praecedentem prosperam quidem, sed fortuitam, eos quos possidet, ad inceptum quidem acuit, in mediis autem periculis deserit. Itaque pallent, tremunt, fugiuntque, vitae, quae reparari non potest, prospicientes potius, quam honori, quem resarciri aliquo modo, mendacio forte, posse sperant.

Qui valde sibi videntur periti rerum politicarum, dispositi ad Ambitionem sunt. Quia hujusmodi peritiae, nisi in negotiis publicis, honor perit. Itaque Oratores eloquentes facile ambitiosi fiunt; nam Eloquentia, tum sibimet ipsis, tum aliis habetur pro Sapientia.

Pusillanimitas cunctatorem facit, qui rerum gerundarum tempora plerumque perdit; quando enim deliberatum est, quantum permittit gerendae rei necessitas, si quid factu optimum est, non appareat, certum est, non multum interesse, utrum hoc, an illo modo feceris; & per consequens rerum magnarum occasiones, pensitando nugas, amittuntur.

Frugalitas (quanquam in homine privato Virtus) illis quibus ea gerenda sunt quae multorum hominum vires simul postulant, aptitudinem adimit. Conatum enim debilitat, qui nutriri & conservari Praemio debet.

Eloquentia, cum Blandiloquentia amicos acquirit quibus confidatur; quia illa, ut Sapientia apparet, haec, ut Amor. Illis si adjungatur existimatio militaris obedientiam acquirit. Nam qualitates illae duae priores contra periculum ab ipso, posterior contra periculum ab aliis Cautio est.

Ignoratio causarum disponit, vel potius cogit ad consilium sequendum, & Authoritatem aliorum. Omnes enim, quorum interest, veritatem scire, si propriis consiliis non acquiescant, aliorum, quos se Sapientiores esse putant, nec cur fallerent, vident, consilia sequuntur necessariò.

2 quidem, sed] licèt, at 70 9–10 sibimet ipsis] ipsis Eloquentibus 70

[j] See above, note h. [k] = put trust, have confidence (OED, 'confide', v., 1).
[l] = security, a guarantee (OED, 'caution', n., 1).

And from want of Understanding.

Ignorance of the signification of words; which is, want of understanding, disposeth men to take on [37]trust, not onely the truth they know not; but also the errors; and which is more, the non-sense of them they trust;[37] For neither Error, nor [38]non-sense,[38] can without a perfect understanding of words, be detected.

°From the same it proceedeth, that men give different names, to one and the same thing, from the difference of their own passions: As they that approve a private opinion, call it Opinion; but they that mislike it, Haeresie: and yet haeresie signifies no more than private opinion; but has onely a greater tincture of choler.°

From the same also it proceedeth, that men cannot distinguish, without study and [39]great[39] understanding, between one action of many men, and many actions of one multitude; as for example, [40] between the one action of all the Senators of Rome in killing Catiline,[m] and the many actions of a number of Senators in killing Caesar; and therefore [41] are disposed to take for the action of the people, [42]that which is a multitude of actions done by a multitude of men, led perhaps by the perswasion of one.[42]

Adhaerence to Custome, from Ignorance of the nature of Right and Wrong.

Ignorance of the causes, and originall constitution of Right, Equity, Law, and Justice, disposeth a man to make Custome and [43] Example the rule of his actions; in such manner, as to think that Unjust which it hath been the custome to punish; and that Just, [44]of the impunity and approbation whereof they can produce an Example, or (as the Lawyers which onely use this false measure of Justice barbarously call it) a Precedent;[44] like little children, that have no other rule of good and evill manners, but the correction they receive from their Parents, and Masters; save that children are constant to their rule, whereas [45]men are not so; because grown strong, and stubborn, they[45] appeale from custome to reason, and from reason to custome, as it serves their turn; °recedingⁿ from custome when their interest requires it, and° setting themselves against reason, as oft as reason is against [46]them:[46] Which is the cause, that the doctrine of Right and Wrong, is perpetually disputed, both by the Pen and the Sword: Whereas the doctrine of Lines, and Figures, is not so; because [47]men care not,[47] in that subject what be truth, as a thing that crosses no mans ambition, profit, or lust. For I doubt not, but if it had been a thing contrary to °any mans right of dominion, or to° the interest of men that have dominion, [48] That the three Angles of a Triangle, should be equall to two Angles of a Square;[p] that doctrine should have been, if not disputed, yet [49]by the burning of all books of Geometry, suppressed, as farre as he whom it concerned was able.[49]

6 it] om. MS 11 also it] om. MS 16 which is . . . a multitude] w^ch^ is {one action of added by TH} a multitude MS 26 strong] old B

Ignorare quid verba propriè significent, sive quod idem est non posse rectè Intelligere, facit, ut veritatem & falsitatem, atque etiam verba nihil significantia ab aliena sumamus authoritate. Neque enim error, neque contradictio verborum sine perfecto Intellectu potest detegi.

Ab eadem caussa proficiscitur, ut sine studio & intellectu claro, distingui non possit inter unam actionem multorum hominum, & plures actiones unius multitudinis. Exempli causa, differentia magna [53] est inter actionem Senatorum Romanorum omnium unam, cum interficerent Catilinam,[m] & plures actiones Senatorum illorum, qui interfecerunt Caesarem. Itaque qui parum intelligunt verba, pro Actione populi, saepenumero accipiunt Actiones quae fiunt ab hominum multitudine, quanquam ab unius forte instigatione natas.

Ignoratio causarum & constitutionis primae Iuris, Aequitatis, Legis, & Iustitiae facit, ut homines pro suarum actionum regula sequantur Consuetudinem, & Exempla temporis praeteriti; putantque Injustum nihil aliud esse, quam quod puniri consuevit; justumque esse quod aliquando impune fuit, quasi pueri, qui boni & mali moris aliam regulam nullam habent, praeter Parentum & Magistrorum correctiones. Pueri tamen sua regula constanter semper usi sunt; homines autem adulti à consuetudine ad rationem, & rursus à ratione ad consuetudinem, quoties volunt per contumaciam provocant, rationemque oppugnant, quoties ipsorum commoda oppugnat ratio. Doctrina ergo Iusti & Injusti perpetuò disputatur tum Scriptis tum Armis; doctrina autem Linearum, & Figurarum non disputatur; quare? Quia in doctrina hac, quaenam sit veritas (quia nullius ambitionem, lucrum, aut cupidinem impedit) pauci curant. Nam si Propositio haec Euclidis, Tres Anguli Trianguli aequales sunt duobus rectis,[p] utilitati eorum, qui dominabantur contraria fuisset, non dubito quin illa, si non disputata, suppressa tamen fuisset.

26 dominabantur] dominantur 70 27 fuisset] esset 70 27 illa] dudum 70
27 tamen] om. 70

[37] the authority of others truth, falsehood, and even words which mean nothing.
[38] verbal contradiction, [39] clear [40] ^ there is a great difference
[41] ^, very often, those who have too little understanding of words
[42] actions done by a multitude of men, even though they may have arisen from the strong instigation of one man. [43] ^ previous [44] which was sometimes unpunished, [45] grown men, through stubbornness, [46] their advantage: [47] few care [48] ^ [to accept] this proposition of Euclid, [49] suppressed.

[m] Catiline (Lucius Sergius Catilina) was condemned by the Senate for his conspiracy against the Roman Republic; but he died on the battlefield (in 62 BC). [n] = departing (OED, 'recede', v.[1], 1, 3).
[p] Euclid, Elements, I, prop. 32.

Adhaerence to private men, From ignorance of the Causes of Peace.

Ignorance of remote causes, disposeth men to attribute all events, to the causes immediate, and Instrumentall: For these are all the causes they perceive. And hence it comes to passe, that in all [50]places,[50] men that are grieved with payments to the Publique, discharge their anger upon the Publicans, that is to say, Farmers,[q] Collectors, and other Officers of the publique Revenue; and adhere to such as find fault with the publike Government; and thereby, when they have [51]engaged themselves beyond hope of justification, fall also upon[51] the Supreme [51] Authority, for feare of punishment, or shame of receiving pardon.

Credulity from Ignorance of nature.

Ignorance of [52]naturall[52] causes disposeth a man to Credulity, so as to believe [53]many times[53] impossibilities: For [54]such know nothing to the contrary, but that they may be true; being unable to detect the Impossibility.[54] And Credulity, because [55] men love to be hearkened unto in company, disposeth [56]them[56] to lying: so that Ignorance it selfe without [57]Malice,[57] is able to make a man both to believe lyes, and tell them; and sometimes also to invent them.

Curiosity to know, from Care of future time.

Anxiety for the future time, disposeth men to enquire into the causes of things: because the knowledge of [58]them, maketh men the better able to order the present to their best advantage.[58]

Naturall Religion, from the same.

°Curiosity, or° love of the knowledge of causes, draws a man from consideration of the effect, to seek the cause; and again, the cause of that cause; [59]till of necessity he must[59] come to this thought at last, that there is some cause, whereof there is no former cause, but is eternall; °which is it men call God.° So that it is impossible to make any profound enquiry into naturall causes, without being enclined thereby to believe there is one God Eternall; though they cannot have any Idea of [60]him in their mind, answerable[r] to his nature.[60] For as a man that is born blind, hearing men talk of warming themselves by the fire, and being brought to warm himself by the same, may easily conceive, and assure himselfe, there is somewhat there, which men call Fire, and [61]is the cause of the heat he feeles;[61] but cannot imagine what it is like; nor have an Idea of it °in his mind,° such as they have that see it: so also, by [62]the visible things of this world, and their admirable[s] order, a man may conceive[62] there is a cause of them, which men call God; and yet not have an [63]Idea, or Image[63] of him in his mind.

33 his mind] their minds MS

---

[50] times, [51] sunk themselves in crime, they join them in attacking [52] physical [53] sometimes [54] not everyone knows what things are or are not impossible. [55] ^ most [56] the credulous [57] any other vice [58] the causes of past things usually sheds light on present things. [59] and so on; until he [60] the divine nature in their mind. [61] which warms him;
[62] contemplation of the order of visible things, a man is certain that [63] image, or fancy

Ab Ignoratione Causarum remotarum, fit ut eventus omnes imputent homines Causis immediatis & instrumentalibus; causas enim alias nullas vident. Itaque quandocunque onerantur aere Publico, iras exonerant in Publicanos, id est Conductores, Exactores, aliosque redituum publicorum Ministros, iidemque reprehensoribus publici regiminis sese aggregant; cumque crimini se immerserint, una cum illis Authoritatem ipsam Supremam oppugnant, vel metu supplicii, vel quia ignosci pudet.

Ignoratio Causarum Physicarum Credulitatem gignit, eo usque aliquando, ut ea credantur, quae sunt impossibilia. Nam quae sunt, & quae non sunt impossibilia, non omnes norunt. Credulitas autem, quia maxima pars hominum in congressibus auscultari sibi amat, Credulum mendacem plerumque facit: Itaque Ignorantia ipsa sine alia pravitate hominem non solum ad mendacia credenda, sed etiam ad narranda, & quandoque etiam ad excogitanda aptum reddit.

Futuri temporis Sollicitudo ad causarum investigationem homines adigit; quia causarum cognitio, rerum praeteritarum, rebus praesentibus lucem praeferre solet. [54]

Causas cognoscendi Amor hominem ab effectus consideratione ad quaerendam causam acuit, & rursus causam causae, & sic deinceps, donec ad cogitationem hanc veniatur, Causam aliquam esse aeternam, sive qua prior nulla esse potuit. Adeo, ut, qui profundè in rerum naturalium contemplationem se immerserit, impossibile sit quin inde disponatur ad credendum unum esse Deum & Aeternum, quanquam ideam naturae divinae, animo concipere non possit. Sicut enim homo, qui coecus natus est, etsi audierit dicentes alios, se ad ignem calefieri, ducaturque ad eundem ignem, ut & ipse calefiat; facile cognoscet, esse aliquid eo loco, à quo ipse calefit, quemque homines Ignem vocant; cui autem rei similis sit, imaginari, aut Ideam ignis, qualem videntes habent, habere non potest. Ita homo, à contemplatione ordinis rerum visibilium, earundem causam aliquam esse, quem Deum appellant certus est, nec tamen Imaginem, aut Phantasma ejus inde aliquod animo concipere potest.

13 excogitanda] cogitanda 70

[q] = tax-farmers, collectors of public revenues on the basis of a fixed sum (OED, 'farmer²', 1).
[r] = corresponding (OED, 'answerable', v., 3).
[s] 'admirable' here has the sense of 'causing wonder or surprise' (OED, 'admirable', a., 1).

And they that make little, or no enquiry into the [64]naturall causes of things,[64] yet from the feare that proceeds from the ignorance it selfe, of [65]what it is[65] that hath the power to do them °much° good or harm, are enclined to suppose, and feign unto themselves, severall kinds of Powers Invisible; and to stand in awe of their own imaginations; and in time of distresse to invoke them; as also in the time of °unexpected° good successe, to give them thanks; making [66]the creatures of their own fancy, their[66] Gods. By which means it hath come to passe, that from the innumerable variety of Fancy, men have created °in the world° innumerable sorts of Gods. And this Feare of things invisible, is the °naturall° Seed of that, which every one in himself calleth Religion; and in them that worship, or feare °that Power° otherwise than they do, Superstition.

And this seed of Religion, having been observed by many; some [67]of those that have observed it, have been enclined thereby to nourish, dresse, and forme it into Lawes; and to adde[67] to it of their own invention, [68]any opinion[68] of the causes of future events, by which they thought they should best be able to [69]govern others, and make unto themselves the greatest use of their Powers.[69]

6 unexpected this edn.; {an expected corr. to unexpected by TH} MS] an expected H, B

[64] causes of natural things, [65] whether or not there is something [66] them, finally, [67] have cultivated it and formed it into laws; and have added [68] various opinions [69] induce others to serve them.

Etiam, qui de rerum naturalium causis, parum aut nihil solliciti sunt, illis tamen metus quidam inest, ortus ab eo ipso, quod an sit potentia aliqua necne, qua juvari aut laedi possunt, ignorant; atque ab eo metu proclives sunt ad Suppositionem & Fictionem variarum Potentiarum invisibilium, metuuntque sua ipsorum Phantasmata, invocantque in rebus adversis, laudantque in prosperis, & faciunt denique Deos. Atque inde factum est, ut homines à Phantasmatibus suis innumerabilibus, innumerabiles creaverint sibi Deos. Metus autem hic invisibilium Semen est ejus, quam quisque in seipso Religionem vocat, in illis autem, qui diversè metuunt, coluntque Superstitionem.

Religionis Semen hoc, cum à pluribus animadversum fuerit, à quibusdam cultum, & in Leges formatum est, opinionesque de causis rerum futurarum variae adinventae sunt, quibus putabant, optimè fieri posse, ut alii servire sibi inducerentur.

1 Etiam] Etiam illis 70 1–2 illis tamen] om. 70 3 possunt] possint 70 4–5 metuuntque] metuentes 70 5 invocantque] quae invocant 70 6 laudantque] laudant 70 9 vocat 70] om. 68 9 coluntque] coluntve 70 10 fuerit] esset 70 12 servire] ad serviendum 70

[52]

CHAP. XII.

OF RELIGION.

Religion, in Man onely.

Seeing there are no signes, nor fruit of Religion, but in Man onely; there is no cause to doubt, but that the seed of Religion, is also onely in Man; and consisteth in some [1]peculiar quality, or at least in some eminent degree therof, not to be found in other Living creatures.[1]

First, from his desire of knowing Causes.

And first, it is peculiar to the nature of Man, to be inquisitive into the Causes of the Events they see, some more, some lesse; but all men so much, as to be curious in the search of the causes of their own good and evill fortune.

From the consideration of the Beginning of things.

Secondly, upon the sight of [2]any thing that hath a Beginning, to think also[2] it had a cause, which determined the same to begin, then when it did, rather than sooner or later.

From his observation of the Sequell of things.

Thirdly, whereas there is no other Felicity of Beasts, but the enjoying of their [3]quotidian Food, Ease, and Lusts; as having little, or no foresight of the time to come, for want of observation, and memory of the order, consequence, and dependance of the things they see;[3] Man observeth how one Event hath been produced by another; and remembreth in them Antecedence and Consequence; And when he cannot assure himselfe of the true causes of things, °(for the causes of good and evill fortune for the most part are invisible,)° he supposes causes of them, either such as his own fancy suggesteth; or [4]trusteth to the Authority of[4] other men, such as he thinks to be °his friends, and° wiser than himselfe.

The naturall Cause of Religion, the Anxiety of the time to come.

[5]The two first, make[5] Anxiety. For being assured that there be causes of all things that have arrived hitherto, or shall arrive hereafter; it is impossible for a man, who °continually° endeavoureth to secure himselfe against the evill he feares, and procure the good he desireth, not to be in a perpetuall solicitude of the time to come; So that every man, especially those that are over provident, are in an estate like to that of Prometheus. For as Prometheus, (which interpreted, is, The [6] prudent man,[a]) was bound to the hill Caucasus, a place of large prospect, where an Eagle feeding on his [7]liver,[7] devoured in the

3–4 marg. om. MS {Note: all marginal notes in this chapter are lacking in the MS; these omissions are not separately noted here.} 21 to the] the B 25 for] {that corr. to for by TH} MS

CAPVT XII.

De Religione.

Cvm neque signum neque fructus Religionis nisi in solo homine animadversum sit, non est dubitandum, quin Religionis Semen in homine solo sit, consistatque in aliqua qualitate (aut saltem in aliquo ejus gradu) homini propria.

Primo autem, naturae humanae proprium est, Causas investigare [55] eventuum quos vident, alii magis, alii minus, sed omnes, quatenus possunt causas investigant propriae fortunae sive bonae sive malae.

Secundo, homines omnes, si alicujus rei Principium viderint, concludunt statim, eandem rem Causam habuisse, quae effecit, ut inciperet eo tempore potius quam alio.

Tertio, quia brutorum animantium foelicitas in fruitione consistit voluptatum sensualium, ut quae propter tarditatem ingenii consequentiarum dependentiarumque ordinem non observant; Homo autem, quae causa, quem effectum producit animadvertit, & quae res antecessit, & quae consecuta est, memoria tenet; etiam quando causarum verarum inscius est, causas supponet, quas ipse imaginatur, vel suggerunt alii, quos seipso Sapientiores esse arbitratur.

Ab his Naturae humanae proprietatibus nascitur Anxietas. Rerum enim omnium quae hactenus contigerunt, aut postea contingent, causas esse Homines certò sciunt, conantibusque mala quae metuunt arcere, & bona quae cupiunt procurare, temporis futuri sollicitudinem perpetuam evitare impossibile est. Vnusquisque ergo, maximè verò is qui in futurum tempus maximè prospicit, similem Prometheo vitam agit. Nam ut Prometheus (id est, Providentiâ excellens)[a] monti Caucaso (unde satis longè prospicere erat) affixus,

3–4 animadversum] animadversus 70 4 sit] obtineat 70 6 autem, naturae 70] autem naturae, 68 21 conantibusque] conantibus verò 70 23 maximè verò] cumprimis 70

[1] quality, or at least in some degree thereof, peculiar to man.
[2] the beginning of any thing, all men conclude immediately that
[3] sensual pleasures, since, because of the slowness of their wits, they do not observe the order of the consequences and dependences of things; [4] as they are suggested by [5] From these properties of human nature is born [6] ^ outstandingly [7] heart

[a] The name was derived from προμηθής, 'fore-thinking', 'prudent'.

day, as much as he was repayred in the night:[b] So that man, which looks too far before him, °in the care of future time,° hath his heart °all the day long,° gnawed on by feare of death, poverty, or [8]other calamity;[8] and has no repose, nor pause of his anxiety, but in sleep.

Which makes them fear the Power of Inuisible things.

This perpetuall feare, alwayes accompanying mankind in the ignorance of causes, as it were in the Dark, must needs have for object something. And therefore when there is nothing to be seen, there is nothing to accuse, [9]either of their good, or evill[9] fortune,[c] but some Power, or Agent Invisible: In which sense perhaps it was, that some of the old Poets said, that the Gods were at first created by humane Feare:[d] which spoken of the Gods, (that is to say, of the many Gods [53] of the Gentiles) is very true. But the acknowledging of one God Eternall, Infinite, and Omnipotent, [10]may more easily be derived, from the desire men have to know[10] the causes of naturall bodies, and their severall vertues, and operations; than from the feare of what was to befall them in time to come. For he that from any effect hee seeth come to passe, should reason to the next and immediate cause thereof, and from thence to the cause of that cause, and plonge himselfe profoundly in the [11]pursuit[11] of causes; shall at last [12]come to this, that there must be (as even[12] the Heathen Philosophers confessed) one First Mover; that is, a [13]First,[13] and an Eternall cause of all things; which is that which men mean by the name of God: And all this without thought of their fortune; the solicitude whereof, both enclines to fear, and [14]hinders them from the search of the causes of other things;[14] and thereby gives occasion of feigning of as many Gods, as there be men that feigne them.

And suppose them Incorporeall.

And for the matter, or substance of the Invisible Agents, so fancyed; they could not by °naturall° cogitation, fall upon any other conceipt, but that it was the same with that of the Soule of man; and that the Soule of man, was of the same substance, with that [15] which appeareth in a Dream, to one that sleepeth; or in a Looking-glasse, °to one that is awake;° which, men not knowing that such apparitions are nothing else but creatures of the Fancy, think to be reall, [16]and externall[16] Substances; and therefore call them Ghosts; [17]as the Latines called them Imagines, and Umbrae; and thought them Spirits,

1 that] {that corr. to the} MS 17 in] {in corr. to into by TH} MS 20 that] it MS

[8] calamities, or by other biting worries; [9] as cause of their [10] could have been more easily derived from the investigation of [11] order [12] find that there is (as the more sound of the [13] single [14] turns the mind away from the investigation of natural causes;
[15] ^ of a man, or of other bodies, [16] but thin
[17] . For ghosts (spirits) are very thin bodies. Such were the 'invisible agents' of the heathen, that is, their gods and demons; but because these used to appear and vanish, on and off, in the manner of creatures of the fancy, they preferred to call them spectres and shades, rather than spirits and substances. However, quotidie cor devorandum Aquilae praebuit, ita ut quantum noctibus reficiebatur, tantundem interdiu consumeretur;[b] ita Cor hominis in longitudinem nimiam prospicientis, à metu Mortis, vel egestatis, vel calamitatum, vel curis aliis mordacibus sine intermissione, praeterquam in somno, roditur.

Metus hic perpetuus, qui genus humanum in causarum ignorantiâ, quasi in tenebris comitatur, Objectum habet necessariò aliquod. Quia ergo fortunarum suarum causam aliam homines non vident, nihil est quod accusare possunt, praeter Potentiam aliquam, & Agentem invisibilem. Atque hinc fortasse erat, quod veterum Poëtarum aliqui, Deos primos à Timore factos esse dixerint.[d] Id quod de Diis (id est, de multis Ethnicorum Diis) verum est. Agnitio verò Vnici, Aeterni, Infiniti, Omnipotentis Dei ab investigatione causarum, Virtutum operationumque corporum naturalium, quam à Curâ futuri temporis, facilius derivari potuit. Nam qui ab Effectu quocunque quem viderit, ad Causam ejus proximam ratiocinaretur, & inde ad illius Causae Causam proximam procederet, & in Causarum deinceps ordinem profunde se immergeret, inveniret tandem (cum veterum Philosophorum sanioribus) unicum esse primum Motorem, id est, [56] unicam & aeternam Rerum omnium Causam, quam appellant omnes Deum; atque hoc sine omni fortunarum suarum cogitatione, quarum sollicitudo & Metum gignit, & ab inquisitione Causarum naturalium Animum avertit, simulque tot Deorum fingendorum occasionem praebet, quot sunt fere, qui eos fingunt.

Quod ad Deorum materiam sive substantiam attinet, cogitare aliam vix potuere quam qualem putaverunt esse substantiam Animae humanae. Animae autem humanae substantiam talem esse arbitrati sunt, qualis est Hominis, vel aliorum Corporum, in somnio vel speculo apparentium species; quam nihil esse aliud praeter Phantasma nescientes, substantiam realem esse crediderunt, sed tenuem, & propterea eam Spiritum vocabant. Sunt autem Spiritus Corpora tenuissima. Tales fuere Ethnicorum Agentes invisibiles, nimirum they thought that they were bodies. For it cannot be understood that the same thing is both spirit and incorporeal. A spirit is determined in place and shape, that is, by its outlines and by its size; and therefore it is a body, however thin and undetectable by the senses.

9 erat] fuit 70 9 aliqui this edn.] aliquis 68, 70 9–10 dixerint] dixerit 70 12 Curâ] Sollicitudine 70 13 qui] si quis 70 13 viderit] videt 70 17 Motorem 68-Errata] Motorum 68 19 sollicitudo] cura 70

[b] Cf. Hesiod, Theogony, ll. 521–6.

[c] This value-free use of 'accuse' is unknown to the OED, which records only the negative sense of 'charge with the crime or fault of' ('accuse', v., 3).

[d] Petronius, Fragment 28, l. 1, and Statius, Thebais, III, l. 661: 'Fear was the first thing in the world that made gods' ('Primus in orbe deos fecit timor').

that is, thin aëreall bodies; and those Invisible Agents, which they feared, to bee like them; save that they appear, and vanish when they please. But the opinion that such Spirits were Incorporeall, or Immateriall, could never enter into the mind of any man by nature; because, though men may put together words of contradictory signification, as Spirit, and Incorporeall; yet they can never have the imagination of any thing answering to them:[17] And therefore, men that by their own meditation, arrive to the acknowledgement of one Infinite, Omnipotent, and Eternall God, choose rather to confesse he is Incomprehensible, and above [18]their[18] understanding; than to define his Nature by Spirit Incorporeall, [19] and then confesse their definition to be unintelligible: or if they give him such a title, it is not Dogmatically, with intention to make the Divine Nature understood; but Piously, to honour him [20]with attributes, of significations, as remote as they can from the grossenesse of Bodies Visible.[20]

But know not the way how they effect any thing.

Then, for the way by which they think these Invisible Agents wrought their effects; that is to say, what [21]immediate[21] causes they used, °in bringing things to passe,° men that know not what it is that we call causing, (that is, almost all men) have no other rule to guesse by, but by observing, and remembring [22]what they have seen to precede the like effect[22] at some other time, or times before, without seeing between the antecedent and subsequent Event, any dependance or connexion at all: And therefore from the like things past, they expect the like things to come; and hope for good or evill luck, °superstitiously,° from things that have no part at all in the causing of it: [23]As the Athenians [54] did for their war at Lepanto, demand another Phormio;[e] The Pompeian faction for their warre in Afrique, another Scipio;[23] [f] and others have done in divers other occasions since. [24]In like manner they[24] attribute their fortune to a stander by, to a lucky or unlucky place, [25]to words spoken, especially if the name of God be amongst them; as Charming, and Conjuring (the Leiturgy of Witches;)[25] insomuch as to believe, they have power to turn °a stone into bread,° [g] bread into a man, or any thing, into any thing.

22–3 superstitiously] {superstitious corr. to superstitiously by TH} MS

[18] our [19] ^ (unless with the authority of Scripture)
[20] by removing all the grossness of visible bodies from God. [21] second [22] the order in which they have seen one thing precede or follow another
[23] . Thus the Athenians, because Phormio had acted so well against the Spartans at Naupactus, chose another Phormio after his death.[e] Likewise the Romans, because of Scipio's success in Africa against Hannibal, chose, also in Africa, another Scipio as general against Caesar.[f] In both cases it turned out badly.
[24] Others (when they have experienced two or three similar cases)
[25] or (as others do) to certain spoken words, which they call incantations,

Dii & Daemones; sed quia modò apparere, modò evanescere solebant, more Phantasmatum, spectra & Vmbras, quàm Spiritus & substantias nominare maluerunt, Corpora tamen esse putabant. Quod autem res eadem & Spiritus sit & Incorporea intelligi non potest. Spiritus enim loco & figura, id est Terminis & magnitudine suâ aliquâ determinatur; & proinde Corpus est, utcunque tenue & insensile. Illi igitur qui meditatione propria in cognitionem venerunt unius Infiniti, Omnipotentis & Aeterni Dei, maluerunt illum supra intellectum nostrum Incomprehensibilemque esse confiteri, quam Naturam ejus per Spiritum Incorporeum (praeter Scripturae authoritatem) definire, & deinde confiteri Definitionem illam non esse intelligibilem: Sed Deum esse Spiritum Incorporeum dixerunt fortasse non Dogmaticè, ut Naturam Divinam per ea verba comprehenderent, sed ex intentione piâ Deum Attributo aliquo honorandi, quod Corporum visibilium crassitudinem omnem à Deo removeret.

Deinde, quâ viâ Invisibilia illa Agentia effectus suos produxerunt, id est, quibus causis secundis utebantur, ii qui quid sit Causam esse nesciunt (id est, maxima pars Hominum) penitus ignorabant; neque aliter conjicere potuerunt, quam ex observatione & memoria ordinis, quo tempore praeterito una res aliam antecessit vel consequuta est, quanquam nullam inter Antecedentia & subsequentia connexionem viderint. Itaque à similibus praeteritis similia expectabant futura, sperabantque bonam, aut malam fortunam ab illis rebus quae nihil omnino speratis contribuebant. Sic Athenienses propter res ad Naupactum à Phormione contra Lacedaemonios bene gestas, illo mortuo, alium elegerunt Phormionem.[e] Item Romani propter res in Africâ contra Annibalem foeliciter gestas à Scipione, in eâdem [57] Africâ Imperatorem elegerunt contra Caesarem alium Scipionem,[f] ambo infoeliciter. Idem aliis locis & temporibus factitatum est. Fortunam suam alii (post duos vel tres casus similes) personae alicui astanti, vel fortunato infortunatove loco tribuerunt. Alii verbis quibusdam prolatis, quas Incantantiones vocant, tantam virtutem ascribunt, ut Panem in Hominem, Quidlibet in Quodlibet mutari posse putent.

3 maluerunt, this edn.] maluerunt. 68, 70 14 removeret this edn.] removerent 68, 70
19 nullam] nullum 70 28 infortunatove] vel infortunato 70

[e] Thucydides, Peloponnesian War, II.84; III.7: for a campaign which included an attack on Naupactus (Lepanto), the Athenians chose Asopius, son of Phormio (who had previously defeated the Spartans there) as commander. Hobbes's claim that this was 'demanded' by the Athenians ignores Thucydides' statement that the request for a son or other kinsman of Phormio was made by the Acarnanians, who were the Athenians' allies.

[f] Plutarch, Life of Cato the Younger, 57: the army thought they would be successful in Africa if they were commanded by Metellus Scipio, because he was descended from Scipio Africanus Major (who had defeated Hannibal) and Scipio Africanus Minor (who had destroyed Carthage). [g] Cf. Matt. 4: 3.

But honour them as they honour men.

Thirdly, for the worship which naturally men exhibite to Powers invisible, it can be no other, but such expressions of their reverence, as they would use towards men[26]; Gifts, Petitions, Thanks, Submission of Body, Considerate Addresses, sober Behaviour, [27]premeditated Words, Swearing (that is, assuring one another of their promises, by invoking them). Beyond that reason suggesteth nothing; but leaves them either to rest there; or for further ceremonies, to rely on those they believe to be wiser than themselves.[27]

And attribute to them all extraordinary events.

Lastly, [28]concerning how these Invisible Powers declare to men the things which shall hereafter come to passe, especially concerning their good or evill fortune in generall, or good or ill successe in any particular undertaking, men are naturally at a stand;[h] save that using to conjecture of the time to come, by the time past, they are very apt, not onely to take casuall[i] things, after one or two encounters,[j] for Prognostiques of the like encounter ever after, but also to believe the like Prognostiques from other men, of whom they have once conceived a good opinion.[28]

Foure things, Naturall seeds of Religion.

And in these foure things, Opinion of Ghosts, Ignorance of second causes, Devotion towards what men fear, and Taking of things Casuall[k] for Prognostiques, consisteth the Naturall seed of Religion; which by reason of the different Fancies, Judgements, and Passions [29] of severall men, hath grown up into ceremonies so different, that those which are [30]used by one man,[30] are for the most part ridiculous to another.

Made different by Culture.

For these seeds have received culture from two sorts of men. One sort have been they, that have [31]nourished, and ordered them,[31] according to their own invention. The other, have done it, by Gods commandement, and direction: but both sorts have done it, with a purpose to make [32]those men that relyed on them, the more apt to Obedience, Lawes, Peace, Charity, and civill Society.[32] So that the Religion of the former sort, is a part of [33]humane Politiques; and teacheth part of the duty which Earthly Kings require of their Subjects. And the Religion of the later sort is Divine Politiques; and containeth Precepts to those that have yeelded themselves subjects in the Kingdome of God. Of the former sort, were all the founders of Common-wealths, and the Lawgivers of the Gentiles: Of the later sort, were Abraham, Moses, and our Blessed Saviour; by whom have been derived[l] unto us the Lawes of the Kingdome of God.[33]

5 promises, by invoking them) MS] promises,) by invoking them H, B 22 different] difficult B

[26] ^ who are their superiors

[27] and other such things. For nature does not dictate bloody sacrifices (which, originally, were instituted by commonwealths, in order to feed the sacrificers). Nor does swearing an oath seem to be part of natural worship, since oaths have no place outside the civil state. Natural reason suggests no other worship than Tertiò, Cultus qui Potentiis invisibilibus, dictante solâ Naturâ, exhiberi potest, alius non est quàm quo homines superiores suos colere consueverunt; nempe signa Honoris & Reverentiae, ut Dona, Preces, Gratiae, Submissio, Alloquia & Gestus decori, & hujusmodi alia. Nam Sacrificia cruenta dictamen Naturae non sunt, ut quae ab initio ad Sacrificatores alendos à Civitatibus instituta erant. Neque Cultus naturalis videtur esse Iusjurandum, quia extra statum Civilem Iuramento non est locus. Ratio naturalis Cultus alios quàm quos dixi non suggerit, sed quicquid, ultrà est, Legibus relinquit singularum Civitatum.

Postremò, Quod ad modum attinet, quo Agentia haec invisibilia hominibus praeterita, futura, prospera & adversa indicant Natura nihil dictat. Itaque futura ex praeteritis conjicientes, simile ejus quod Effectum aliquem aliquoties antevertit, pro prognostico habent, Effectûs similis sequuturi.

In his autem quatuor rebus, Metu Spirituum, Ignorantiâ Causarum secundarum, Cultu eorum quae timent, & sumptione fortuitorum pro prognosticis, consistit Religionis semen naturale, quod per hominum Phantasias, Iudicia, Passiones & Consilia diversa, adeo diversas produxit ceremonias, ut quae Lege in una Civitate comprobantur, in aliâ derideantur.

Semina autem haec à duobus Hominum generibus culturam nacta sunt. Primum genus est eorum, qui secundùm suas ipsorum phantasias, Religionum authores extiterunt. Alterum, eorum, quibus ab ipso Deo, praecepta & praescripta Religio fuit. Vtrorumque autem consilium erat initiatos suos sibi reddere obedientiores. Illorum Religio pars Politicae, Horum Politica pars Religionis est, & Praecepta continet, qualia illis conveniunt qui in Civitatem Dei admittuntur. Illorum Religiones à Legislatoribus Gentium, Horum Religio ab Abrahamo, Mose, & Iesu Christo, qui Regni Caelorum Leges nos docuerunt, instituta est.

what I have mentioned; but it leaves whatever goes beyond that to the laws of particular commonwealths.

[28] nature dictates nothing about how these invisible agents inform men of fortunate or unfortunate events, past or future. So, conjecturing about future events on the basis of past ones, when they see something similar to that which preceded a certain effect several times in the past, they take it as a prognostic sign that a similar effect will follow. [29] ^ and purposes [30] approved by law in one commonwealth [31] set themselves up as authors of religions, [32] their initiates more obedient to them.

[33] politics; the politics of the latter sort is a part of religion, and contains precepts suitable to those who are admitted into the City of God. The religions of the former sort were founded by the law-givers of the Gentiles; the religion of the latter sort was founded by Abraham, Moses, and Jesus Christ, who taught us the laws of the Kingdom of Heaven.

---

[h] = at a standstill, unable to go further (OED, 'stand', n.[1], 5.a).

[i] = fortuitous (OED, 'casual', a. (n.), 1.a).

[j] 'encounters' here appears to have the sense of 'experiences of coming across things undesignedly' (OED, 'encounter', n., 2). [k] See above, note i. [l] = conveyed, transmitted (OED, 'derive', v., 4).

The absurd opinion of Gentilisme.

[34]And for that part of Religion, which consisteth in opinions concerning the nature[34] of Powers Invisible, there is °almost° nothing that has a name, that has not been esteemed amongst the Gentiles, [35]in one [55] place or another, a God, or Divell; or by their Poets feigned[35] to be inanimated,[m] inhabited, or possessed by some Spirit or other.

The unformed matter of the World, was a God, by the name of Chaos.

The Heaven, the Ocean, the Planets, the Fire, the Earth, the Winds, were so many Gods.

Men, Women, a Bird, a Crocodile, a Calf, a Dogge, a Snake, an Onion, a Leeke, Deified.[n] Besides that they filled almost all places, with spirits called Daemons: the plains, with Pan, and Panises,[p] or Satyres; the Woods, with Fawnes, and Nymphs; °the Sea, with Tritons, and other Nymphs;° every River, and Fountayn, with a [36]Ghost[36] of his name, °and with Nymphs;° every house, with its Lares, or Familiars; every man, with his Genius; [37]Hell, with Ghosts, and spirituall Officers, as Charon, Cerberus, and the Furies;[q] and in the night time, all places with Larvae, Lemures, Ghosts of men deceased, and a whole kingdome of Fayries, and Bugbears.[37] [r] They have also ascribed Divinity, and built Temples to meer Accidents, and Qualities; such as are Time, Night, Day, Peace, Concord, Love, Contention, [38]Vertue, Honour, Health, Rust,[s] Fever, and the like; which when they prayed for, or against, they prayed to, as if [39]there were Ghosts of those names hanging over their heads, and letting fall, or withholding that Good, or Evill, for, or against which they prayed.[39] They invoked also their own Wit, by the name of Muses; their own Ignorance, by the name of Fortune; their own Lust, by the name of Cupid; their own Rage, by the name Furies; their own privy members by the name of Priapus;[t] and attributed their pollutions, to Incubi, and Succubae:[u] insomuch as there was nothing, which a Poet could introduce as a person in his Poem, which they did not make either a God, or a Divel.

The same authors of the Religion of the Gentiles, observing the °second° ground for Religion, which is mens Ignorance of causes; and thereby their aptnesse to attribute their fortune to causes, on which there was no dependance at all °apparent,° took occasion to obtrude on their ignorance, in stead of second causes, a kind of second and ministeriall Gods; ascribing the cause of Foecundity, to Venus; the cause of Arts, to Apollo; of [40]Subtilty and Craft,[40] to

10 Besides that MS] Besides, that H, B

---

[34] As for the names [35] a god or a demon; nor is there a thing or a place which has not been imagined by some [36] demon [37] Hell was full of demons, and almost all places were full of ghosts and shades of the dead. [38] ^ victory, [39] they were gods hanging over their heads. [40] wit,

Quod ad Agentium invisibilium nomina attinet, nihil est, si modo nomen habeat quod ab Ethnicis aliquibus pro Deo aut Daemone habitum [58] non sit; neque res aut locus quem non ab aliquo Spiritu animatum, habitatum, sive occupatum finxerint aliqui.

Mundi materia informis Deus habebatur, dictus Chaos. Coelum, Terra, Oceanus, Planetae, Ignis, Venti totidem Dii.

Viri, Faeminae, Aves, Crocodilus, Vitulus, Canis, Anguis, Porrum, Caepe, deificata.[n] Omnia ferè loca Daemonibus plena erant; Campestria Panibus & Paniscis;[p] Silvae Faunis & Nymphis. Omnis Fluvius & Fons Daemonem habebat cognominem; Vnaquaeque Domus suum Larem; Vnusquisque Homo suum Genium. Plenum erat Daemonibus Infernum; Larvae, Lemures, Vmbrae mortuorum omnibus fere locis. Etiam Accidentibus divinitatem attribuerunt, templa aedificarunt, ut Tempori, Diei, Nocti, Paci, Concordiae, Amori, Contentioni, Victoriae, Virtuti, Honori, Sanitati, Rubigini,[s] Febri; quae cum optarent aut metuerent, invocabant, quasi impendentes capitibus Deos. Etiam Ingenia propria invocabant nomine Musarum; Ignorantiam propriam nomine Fortunae; Luxuriam propriam nomine Cupidinis; Iram propriam nomine Furiarum; Pudenda propria nomine Priapi;[t] proprias denique Pollutiones Incubis & Succubis[u] imputaverunt. Adeo ut nihil esset de quo ut de persona Poëta loqui potuit, quod ab illis aut Deus aut Daemon non crederetur.

Iidem Religionis Gentium authores, cum Religionis fundamentum animadvertissent esse Causarum ignorationem, & inde innatum hominibus morem fortunas suas Causis adscribendi, nihil ad Effectum attinentibus, obtrudere ignorantibus ausi sunt pro Causis secundis secundos quosdam &

10 cognominem 68-Errata] cognomen 68 20 ab] non ab 70 21 non] om. 70

[m] = endowed with life (OED, 'inanimate', v.[1]). [n] This listing draws on Juvenal, Satirae, XV, ll. 1–10.

[p] 'Panises' is Hobbes's anglicization of 'Panisci'; a Paniscus was a little Pan or minor rural deity.

[q] In classical mythology Charon was the boatman who ferried souls to Hades, Cerberus was the three-headed dog which guarded the gates of Hades, and the Furies were three subterranean goddesses who personified the wrath of the dead.

[r] A 'bugbear' was a sort of hobgoblin, invoked by nurses to frighten children (OED, 'bugbear', 1).

[s] = a fungal disease of crops (OED, 'rust', n.[1], 6); 'Rubigo' was the divinity to whom farmers prayed to avert it. [t] A Greek and Roman phallic god, associated with sexuality, fertility, and gardens.

[u] = demonic spirits supposed to have sexual intercourse with, respectively, women and men, in their sleep.

Mercury; of [41]Tempests and stormes,[41] to Aeolus; and of other effects, to other Gods: insomuch as there was amongst the Heathen almost as great variety of Gods, as of businesse.

And to the Worship, which naturally men conceived fit to bee used towards their Gods, namely Oblations, Prayers, Thanks, and the rest formerly named; the same [42]Legislators of the Gentiles[42] have added [43] their Images, both in Picture, and Sculpture; [44]that the more ignorant sort, (that is to say, the most part, or generality of the people,) thinking the Gods for whose representation they were made, were really included, and as it were housed within them, might so much the more stand in feare of them: And endowed them with lands, and houses, and officers, and revenues, set apart from all other humane uses; that is, consecrated, and made holy to those their Idols;[44] as Caverns, Groves, Woods, Mountains, and whole Ilands; and [56] have attributed to them, not onely the shapes, some of Men, some of Beasts, some of Monsters; but also [45]the Faculties, and Passions of men and beasts; as Sense,[45] Speech, Sex, Lust, Generation, (and this not onely by mixing one with another, to propagate the kind of Gods; but also by mixing with men, and women, to beget mongrill Gods, °and but inmates of Heaven,° as Bacchus, Hercules, and others;) [46]besides, Anger, Revenge, and other passions of living creatures, and the actions proceeding from them, as[46] Fraud, Theft, Adultery, °Sodomie,° and any vice that may be taken for an effect of Power, °or a cause of Pleasure;° and all such Vices, as amongst men are taken to be against Law, rather than against Honour.

Lastly, to the Prognostiques of time to come; which are naturally, but °Conjectures upon° the Experience of time past; and supernaturally, divine Revelation; the same authors of the Religion of the Gentiles, [47]partly upon pretended Experience, partly upon pretended Revelation,[47] have added innumerable other °superstitious° wayes of Divination; and made men believe they should find their fortunes, sometimes in the ambiguous or senslesse answers of the Priests at Delphi, Delos, °Ammon,° [v] and other famous Oracles; which answers, were made ambiguous by designe, to own[w] the event both wayes; or absurd, by the intoxicating [48]vapour of the place, which is very frequent in sulphurous Cavernes:[48] Sometimes in the leaves of the 12 consecrated] consecrate MS 15 men] man MS 19 besides, Anger] {and added by TH} Anger MS 32–3 which is very . . . Cavernes] om. MS 33 Sometimes] Sometime MS

[41] winds, [42] authors [43] ^ the worship of [44] , and cast metal, so that the people, that is, the multitude of ignorant men, might think the gods themselves inhabited those images, and might endow fields, temples, revenues, and priests; all of which were held to be sacred, that is, destined for the priest's benefit only;

ministrantes Deos, Faecunditatem Veneri, Artes Apollini, Ingenium Mercurio, Ventos Aeolo, aliosque Effectus Diis aliis ascribentes. Adeo ut quot sunt rerum agendarum genera, tot ferè veteres Ethnici habuere Deos.

Etiam ad Cultum divinum quem Natura dictat, nempe Oblationes, Preces, Gratiarum actiones, caeterasque antedictas iidem authores Imaginum tum pictarum & sculptarum, tum fusarum adorationes addidere, eo fine ut Populus, id est Ignorantium multitudo Deos ipsos in istis Imaginibus habitare existimaret, & Agris, Templis, Reditibus & Sacerdotibus donaret; quae omnia Sacra habebantur, id est, solius Sacerdotis commodo destinata, ut Cavernae, Luci, Sylvae, Montes, Insulae integrae quae illis consecratae erant. Diis autem istis non modò varias formas ut Hominum, Bestiarum, Monstrorum, sed etiam omne genus Passionum & Facultatum carnalium, ut Sexum, Sermonem, Cupidinem, Generationem (generationem [59] non modò mixtione inter se Deorum, unde Dii, sed etiam mixtione Deorum cum Hominibus, unde Hybridae orti, ut Hercules & Bacchus) attribuerunt. Etiam eosdem Deos Adulteros, Fraudulentos, Fures, omnibusque aliis vitiis conspurcatos faciebant, natis à Potentiâ, & quae Leges humanas, potiùs quàm honorem videntur violare.

Postremò, ad Prognostica Futuri, quae praeter experientiam Praeteriti naturaliter nulla sunt, neque supernaturaliter, praeter revelationem divinam, iidem authores Religionum Ethnicarum fabulas excogitantes, & colloquia cum Diis simulantes, innumera addiderunt genera Divinationum, hominibusque persuaserunt, praecognituros se fortunas suas ex Responsis absurdis, vel ambiguis Sacerdotum in Delphis, Delo,[v] aliisque locis, propter Oracula celebribus, Responsis quae ad eventus contrarios accommodari possent propter ambiguitatem, vel propter mentem Vatis à Vaporibus perturbatam (id quod in locis cavernosis mirabile non est) absurdis; vel ex foliis sybillarum,

10 Diis] Dii 70

[45] every kind of carnal passions and faculties, such as [46] and have defiled those gods with [47] inventing fables, and pretending to have conversations with the gods,
[48] effect of vapours on the mind of the priest (which is not to be marvelled at in cavernous places):

[v] Delphi, the most famous oracle of Apollo; the island of Delos, which had a temple and oracle of Apollo; the oasis of Siwa (in Libya), where the oracle of the Egyptian god Amun ('Ammon') was associated with Zeus. [w] = lay claim to (OED, 'own', v., 3.a).

Sibills; of whose Prophecyes [49](like those perhaps of Nostradamus; for the fragments[49] now extant seem to be the invention of later times) there were some books in reputation in the time of the Roman Republique:[x] Sometimes in the [50]insignificant Speeches of Mad-men, supposed to be possessed with a divine Spirit; which Possession they[50] called Enthusiasme; and these kinds of foretelling events, were accounted Theomancy, or Prophecy: Sometimes in the aspect of the Starres °at their Nativity;° which was called Horoscopy, °and esteemed a part of judiciary Astrology:° Sometimes in their own hopes and feares, called Thumomancy,[y] or Presage: Sometimes in the Prediction of Witches, that pretended conference[z] with the dead; which is called Necromancy, °Conjuring, and Witchcraft; and is but juggling[aa] and confederate knavery:° Sometimes in the °Casuall°[ab] flight, or feeding of birds; called Augury: Sometimes in the Entrayles of a sacrificed beast; which was Aruspicina: Sometimes in Dreams: Sometimes in Croaking of Ravens, °or chattering of Birds:° Sometimes in the Lineaments of the face; °which was called Metoposcopy; or by Palmistry° in the lines of the hand; in casuall words, °called Omina: Sometimes in Monsters,° or unusuall accidents; °as Ecclipses, Comets, rare Meteors, Earthquakes, Inundations, uncouth Births, and the like, which they called Portenta, and Ostenta, because they thought them to portend, or foreshew some great Calamity to come: Somtimes, in meer Lottery, as Crosse and Pile;[ac] counting holes in a sive; dipping[ad] of Verses in Homer, and Virgil; and innumerable other such vaine conceipts.° So easie are men to be drawn to believe any thing, from such men as °have gotten credit with them; and can° with gentlenesse, °and dexterity,° take hold of their °fear, and° ignorance. [57]

The designes of the Authors of the Religion of the Heathen.

And therefore the first Founders, and Legislators of Common-wealths amongst the Gentiles, whose ends were °only° to keep the people in obedience, °and peace,° have °in all places° taken care; First, to imprint in their minds a beliefe, that those precepts which they gave concerning Religion, might not be thought to proceed from their own device, but from the dictates of some God, or [51]other Spirit;[51] or else that they themselves were of a higher nature than [52]mere mortalls,[52] that their Lawes might the more easily be received: So Numa Pompilius pretended to receive the Ceremonies he instituted amongst the Romans, from the Nymph Egeria:[ae] and the first King and founder of the Kingdome of Peru, pretended himselfe and his wife to be the

4 insignificant Speeches] {illeg. corr. to senselesse wordes by TH} MS 6 were] was MS 11 is] is for the most part MS 14 in Croaking] in {the added by TH} Croaking MS 14 Ravens] a Rauen MS 15 of Birds] of {a added by TH} Pye MS 16 hand; in] hand; {sometimes added by TH} in MS

quarum libri aliquot à Civitate Romanâ (quanquam libri qui eo nomine nunc extant videntur subsequentium temporum figmentum esse) pro Vaticiniis habiti sunt;[x] vel ex hominum mente captorum deliriis, qui dicebatur Enthusiasmus. Haec omnia Theomantia dici possunt. Deinde, futura praedicebant ex aspectibus stellarum, quae Horoscopia erat; vel ex suo cujusque Metu vel Spe, quod Praesagium & Thumomantia[y] appellabatur; vel ex praedictionibus Sagarum, quam (propter ficta cum mortuis colloquia) Necromantiam dicebant; vel ex Volatu aut Pastu Avium, quod erat Augurium; vel ex Animalium caesorum Extis, quae Aruspicina erat; Etiam ex quolibet Somnio, ex Crocitatione Corvorum, ex lineamentis Vultus & Manuum, ex qualibet Voce fortuitâ, ex quolibet insolito Accidente. Adeo facile est, cujus ignorantiam molliter tractare didiceris, quocunque velis ducere.

Fundatores ergo Civitatum, & Legislatores gentium primi, quibus Populum in obedientia continere consilium erat, sedulò providerunt, Primò, ut praecepta Religionis non ab ipsorum ingenio, sed ab alicujus Dei vel Daemonis dictamine Populus profecta esse crederet, vel seipsos melioris naturae homines esse quàm caeteros eo fine, ut Leges suas libentiùs acciperent. Sic Numa Pompilius Religionis Romanae Ceremonias Nymphae Egeriae,[ae] Mahometes Religionem suam Spiritui Sancto (apparenti in formâ Columbae)

[49] (although the books of that name which are [50] mind of a man seized by ravings, which was [51] demon; [52] the rest,

[x] The Sibyls were legendary prophetesses in various parts of the ancient world. A collection of prophecies attributed to some of them (the 'Sibylline books') was held in the Temple of Jupiter in Rome, but those texts do not survive; the surviving 'Sibylline oracles' are indeed later texts, from the 2nd to 5th centuries AD. Michel de Nostredame (1503–66) published his Propheties in 1555; Hobbes may have had in mind the 1605 edn. of the Propheties, which included, for the first time, some 'predictions' of events in 1602.

[y] Hobbes adapts this word from the Greek θυμόμαντις, meaning 'prophesying from one's own soul'.

[z] = conversation, talk (OED, 'conference', n., 4.a).

[aa] = deception, trickery (OED, 'juggling', vbl. n.). [ab] See above, note i.

[ac] = tossing a coin (OED, 'cross', n., 21).

[ad] This transitive use of the verb 'to dip' is not recorded in OED, but the meaning here (selecting verses by dipping into the text at random) is clear.

[ae] Livy, Ab urbe condita, I.19.

children of the Sunne:[af] and Mahomet, to set up his new Religion, pretended to have conferences[ag] with the Holy Ghost, in forme of a Dove.[ah] Secondly, they have had a care, to make it believed, that the same things were displeasing to the Gods, which were forbidden by the Lawes. Thirdly, to prescribe Ceremonies, °Supplications, Sacrifices, and Festivalls,° by which they were to believe, [53]the anger of the Gods might be appeased;[53] and that ill success in War, great contagions of Sicknesse, Earthquakes, and each mans private Misery, came from °the Anger of the Gods; and their Anger from° the Neglect of their Worship, or the forgetting, °or mistaking° some point of the Ceremonies required. And though amongst the antient Romans, men were not forbidden to deny, that which in the Poets is written of the paines, and pleasures after this life; which divers of great authority, and gravity in that state have °in their Harangues openly° derided;[ai] yet that beliefe was alwaies more cherished, than the contrary.

And by these, and such other Institutions, they obtayned in order to their end, (which was the peace of the Commonwealth,) that the common people in their misfortunes, laying the fault on neglect, or errour in their Ceremonies, or on their own disobedience to the lawes, were the lesse apt to mutiny against their Governors. And being entertained with the pomp, and [54]pastime of Festivalls, and publike Games, made in honour of the Gods,[54] needed nothing else but bread, [55] to keep them from °discontent, murmuring, and° commotion against the State. And therefore the Romans, that had conquered the greatest part of the °then known° World, made no scruple of tollerating any Religion whatsoeuer °in the City of Rome it selfe;° unlesse it had somthing in it, that could not consist with their Civill Government; nor do we read, that any Religion was there forbidden, but that of the Jewes;[aj] who [56](being the peculiar[56] Kingdome of God) thought it unlawfull to acknowledge subjection to any mortall King °or State° whatsoever. And thus you see how the Religion of the Gentiles was a part of their Policy.[ak]

2 Secondly] Againe MS 12 which] {and added by TH} w^ch^ MS 18–19 mutiny against their Governors] mutinyes, and change of gouerment MS

[53] the Gods were pleased if they were duly and accurately carried out, and angered if they were neglected; [54] games of festivals, [55] ^ and festivals, [56] (having been for a long time under the imputavit.[ah] Sic Peruviae Rex primus, se & Vxorem suam à Sole genitos esse jactitavit.[af] Secundò, ut crederent, quae Legibus vetita erant, eadem omnia [60] Diis suis displicitura esse. Tertiò, ut Ceremoniis ritè accurateque peractis placari Deos, neglectis irritari crederent, adeoque Bellorum casus adversos, Pestes, Terraemotus, singulariumque calamitates Cultui neglecto, aut Ceremoniae alicui praetermissae imputarent. Quamquam autem apud Romanos veteres ea negare, quae de Gaudiis & Poenis post hanc vitam à Poëtis scripta erant, non prohiberetur, & multi magni gravissimique viri ea publicè deriderent,[ai] Fides tamen illa magis quàm contraria semper alebatur.

Per has, similesque Institutiones, ad finem suum, nempe Pacem Civitatis, hoc saltem obtinuerunt, ut Populus calamitates suas errori alicui, vel neglectui in agendis Sacris, vel propriis Legum transgressionibus attribuens, minùs contra Rectores suos incitaretur, Ludis, Pompisque Dierum Festorum contentus. Itaque ne statum conturbaret, nulla re praeter Dies Festos & Panem indigebant. Omnem igitur Religionem Romani, Terrarum ferè omnium Domini, quae non habebat aliquid in se Regimini Civili contrarium, facile tolerabant; neque ullius Gentis Religionem Romae vetitam esse legimus praeterquam Iudaeorum,[aj] qui (cum essent jamdudum sub Regno Dei) mortali Regi obedire illicitum esse crediderunt. Patet ergò, Religionem apud Ethnicos Politiae suae partem fuisse.

18 Regno 70] Regnum 68

[af] Purchas, Purchas his Pilgrimes . . . The Fourth Part, VI, ch. 13, pp. 1455–6 (from de la Vega, Primera parte de los commentarios, I, chs. 15–17, fos. 14v–16v). [ag] See above, note z.

[ah] The claim that Muhammad had trained a dove or pigeon to peck corn from his ear (to make it seem that the Holy Spirit was speaking to him) was commonly made in medieval Christian anti-Muslim polemical works (see Daniel, Islam and the West, pp. 13, 32, 231), and was still current in the 17th century (see, e.g., Baudier, Histoire generale, p. 16).

[ai] It is not clear who is meant here. The best-known denier of an afterlife among the ancient Romans, Lucretius, had no position in the 'state'. Possibly Hobbes refers to Cicero, who reproduced the argument of Carneades that all living things experiencing pleasures and pains are mortal (De natura deorum, III.12–14), and expounded an ethic (in De finibus) based entirely on virtue in this life.

[aj] This refers to the expulsion of the Jews from Rome by the Emperor Tiberius in 19 AD.

[ak] = conduct of affairs, civil administration; or polity, political organization (OED, 'policy', n.[1], 1.a, 2).

The true Religion, and the lawes of Gods kingdome the same.

But where God himselfe, by supernaturall Revelation, planted Religion; there he also made to himselfe a peculiar Kingdome; and gave [57] Lawes, not only of behaviour towards himselfe; but also towards one another; and thereby [58] in the Kingdome of God, the Policy, and lawes Civill, are a part of Religion; and therefore the [58] distinction of Temporall, and Spirituall Domination, hath there no place. It is true, that God is King of all the Earth: Yet may he be King [59]of a peculiar, and chosen[59] Nation. For there is no more incongruity therein, than that he that hath the generall command of the whole Army, should have withall a peculiar Regiment, or Company of his own. °God is King of all the Earth by his Power: but of his chosen people, he is King by Covenant.° But to speake more largly of the Kingdome of God, both by Nature, and Covenant, I have in the following discourse assigned an other place.[al]

Chap. 35.

The causes of Change in Religion.

From the [60]propagation[60] of Religion, it is not hard to understand the causes of the resolution of the same into its first seeds, or principles; which are only an opinion of a Deity, [61]and Powers invisible, and supernaturall;[61] that can never be so abolished out of humane nature, but that new Religions may againe be made to spring out of them, by the culture of such men, as for such purpose are [62]in reputation.[62]

For seeing all formed Religion, is founded at first, upon the faith which a multitude hath in some one person, whom they believe not only to be a wise man, and [63]to labour to procure their happiness,[63] but also to be a holy man, to whom God himselfe vouchsafeth to declare his will supernaturally; It followeth necessarily, when they that have the Goverment of Religion, shall come to have either the wisedome of those men, their [64]sincerity,[am] or their love[64] suspected; or that they shall be unable to shew any °probable° token of Divine Revelation; that the Religion which they desire to uphold, must be °suspected likewise; and° (without the feare of the Civill Sword) contradicted and rejected.

5 Religion] their Religion MS 5 and therefore] and {therefore del. by TH} MS
16 and Powers] and {the added by TH} Powers MS 25 men,] men, {or added by TH} MS
27 they desire] {he desires corr. to they desire by TH} MS

[57] ^ his subjects [58] ^ it is obvious that [59] in a peculiar way of some [60] formation [61] or simply of a supernatural power; [62] suitable. [63] benevolent, [64] benevolence, or their holiness

[al] See below, Chs. 31 (Kingdom of God by nature), 35 (Kingdom of God by covenant).
[am] = purity, integrity, genuineness (an attribute of a person, not of a statement or expression) (OED, 'sincerity', 1).

Vbi verò per revelationem supernaturalem plantavit Religionem Deus, ibi etiam Regnum sibi condidit peculiare; subditisque suis Leges dedit, non modò circa Officia eorum erga seipsum, sed etiam erga se invicem. Manifestum ergo est, in Regno Dei Politiam & Leges Civiles omnes, Religionis partem esse; ideoque distinctionem Dominii Temporalis & Spiritualis in Regno Dei nullam fuisse. Deus Terrarum quidem omnium Rex est; Nil tamen prohibet quin Gentis alicujus peculiari modo Rex esse possit; nulla enim istic incongruitas est. Totius Exercitûs Imperator, peculiarem tamen sibi habere potest Cohortem aut Centuriam. Sed de Regno Dei tum per Pactum, tum per Naturam fusiùs dicetur infra.[al]

A constitutione Religionum apparet etiam modus, quo rursus in Principia sua prima resolvuntur, nempe in agnitionem Divinitatis, sive Potentiae supernaturalis simpliciter; quae agnitio nunquam ita aboleri potest, quin inde novae Religiones (si Cultores accesserint idonei) germinaturae sint.

Cum enim Religio omnis formata, ab initio fundata sit in fide quam habet uni alicui Personae multitudo hominum, quam Personam non modo virum Sapientem esse, & Benevolum credit, sed etiam Sanctum, & cui Deus voluntatem suam supernaturali modo dignatus [61] sit Revelare; necessario sequitur, tunc quando Antistitum Religionis aut Sapientia, aut Benevolentia, aut Sanctitas suspecta sit, aut Revelationis indicium omne deest, ut Religio quam sustentatam vellent, nisi Gladius Civilis prohibeat, rejiciatur.

17 Benevolum credit, 70] Benevolum, 68 19 tunc] ut tunc, 70 20 sit] est 70
20 ut] om. 70

Injoyning beleefe of Impossibilities.

That which taketh away the reputation of Wisedome, in [65]him that formeth a Religion, or addeth to it when it is allready formed,[65] is the enjoyning of a beliefe of contradictories: [66]For both parts of a contradiction cannot possibly be true:[66] and therefore to enjoyne the beleife of them, is an argument of ignorance; which [67]detects the Author in that; and discredits him in all things else he shall propound as from revelation supernaturall: which revelation a man may indeed have of many things above, but of nothing against naturall[67] reason.

Doing contrary to the Religion they establish.

That which taketh away the reputation of [68]Sincerity,[68 an] is the doing, or saying of such things, as appeare to be signes, that what they require other men to believe, is not believed by themselves; all which doings, or sayings are therefore called Scandalous, because they be stumbling blocks,[ao] that make men to [69] fall in the way of Religion: as Injustice, Cruelty, [70]Prophanesse,[70] Avarice, and Luxury. For who can believe, that he that doth ordinarily such actions, as proceed from any of these rootes, believeth there is any such Invisible Power to be feared, as he affrighteth other men withall, °for lesser faults?°

That which taketh away the reputation of [71]Love, is the being detected of private ends:[71] as when the beliefe they require of others, conduceth °or seemeth to conduce° to the acquiring of Dominion, [72]Riches, [59] Dignity, or secure Pleasure,[72] to themselves onely, or specially. For that which men reap benefit by to themselves, they are thought to do for their own sakes, and not for love of others.

Want of the testimony of Miracles.

Lastly, the testimony that men can render of divine [73]Calling,[73] can be no other, than the operation of Miracles; [74]or true Prophecy, (which also is a Miracle;) or extraordinary Felicity. And therefore, to those points of Religion, which have been received from them that did such Miracles; those that are added by such, as approve not their Calling by some Miracle,[74] obtain no greater beliefe, than what the Custome, and Lawes of [75]the places, in which they be educated,[75] have wrought into them. For as in naturall things, men of judgement require naturall °signes, and° arguments; so in supernaturall things, they require signes supernaturall, °(which are Miracles,) before they consent inwardly, and from their hearts.°

3 possibly] passibly B 14 that] om. MS 15 proceed] {proceedes corr. to proceede by TH} MS 15 these] those MS

[65] teachers,

[66] . For everyone knows – even the unlearned, who do not know what 'contradiction' is – that one part of a contradiction is false:

[67] makes all their doctrine suspect. For although there can be truths above natural reason, there is no truth against [68] holiness, [69] ^ stumble or [70] hypocrisy, Existimatio Sapientiae in Doctoribus tollitur quoties credi jubent Contradictoria. Sciunt enim omnes, etiam indocti, qui quid sit Contradictio nesciunt, in Contradictoriis alterum esse falsum. Itaque utrumque credi velle indicium est Ignorantiae, omnemque eorum Doctrinam suspectam reddit. Quanquam enim vera esse possunt quae sunt supra Rationem Naturalem, verum tamen contra Rationem nihil est.

Existimatio Sanctitatis tollitur faciendo dicendove ea, quae Doctorem, quae docet ipsum, non credere indicant. Atque facta & dicta talia, quia procedentes in via Religionis procidere aut titubare cogunt, Scandala dicuntur, qualia sunt Injustitia, Crudelitas, Hypocrisia, Avaritia, Luxuria, &c. Si quis enim ea quotidie faciat, quae ab his exurgunt radicibus, quis Potentias Invisibiles illas metuendas esse credet, quibus ille alios terrere vellent.

Existimatio Benevolentiae tollitur, quando non Gregis, sed sua bona quaerunt, id est, quando Credenda praedicant quae credi sibi solis, vel maximè, utilia sunt ad Potestatem vel Divitias comparandas. A quibus enim rebus cuique bonum nascitur, eas res agere censebitur non aliorum, sed sui ipsius causâ.

Postremò, quia unicum est Revelationis Divinae testimonium Operatio Miraculorum, si quis praeter Religionis receptae Articulos, Articulos novos introducere conabitur sine miraculo edito, fides illi praeter eam, quam faciunt Civitatis Leges & Consuetudines, vel Sanctitas ferè miraculosa, nulla habebitur. Sicut enim in rebus naturalibus vir prudens argumenta naturalia, ita in supernaturalibus signa supernaturalia postulat.

10 Hypocrisia] Hypocrisis 70 12 credet] crediderit 70 20–21 eam, quam faciunt 70] eam quam faciunt, 68 21 Consuetudines 70] Consuetudinis 68

[71] benevolence, is when they seek their own good, not that of their flock: [72] or riches,
[73] revelation,
[74] therefore if, in addition to the articles of the received religion, any people try to introduce new articles, without the performance of any miracle, they will [75] the commonwealth, or an almost miraculous holiness,

[an] See above, note am.
[ao] Hobbes gives here the meaning of the term 'scandalous', i.e., causing others to fall (OED, 'scandalous', a. (and n.), 1; cf. Rom. 14: 13, where 'stumblingblock' translates 'σκάνδαλον' (Vulg: 'scandalum')).

All which causes of the weakening of mens faith, do manifestly appear in the Examples following. [76]First, we have the Example of the children of Israel; who when Moses, that had approved his Calling to them by Miracles, and by the happy conduct[ap] of them[76] out of Egypt, was absent but 40. dayes, [77]revolted from the worship of the true God, recommended to them by him; and Exod. 32. 1, 2[aq] setting up * a Golden Calfe for their God,[77] relapsed into the Idolatry of the Egyptians; °from whom they had been so lately delivered.° And again, after Moses, Aaron, °Joshua,° and that generation which had seen the great works Judges 2. 11.[ar] of God in [78]Israel,[78] * were dead; another generation arose, and served Baal. So that Miracles fayling, Faith also failed.

*1 Sam. 8. 3. Again, when the sons of Samuel, * being constituted by their father Judges in Bersabee, received bribes, and judged unjustly, the people of Israel refused any more to have God to be their King, [79]in other manner than he was King of other people; and therefore cryed out to Samuel, to choose them[79] a King after the manner of the Nations.[as] So that [80]Justice fayling, Faith also fayled: Insomuch, as they deposed their God, from reigning over them.[80]

And whereas °in the planting of Christian Religion,° the Oracles ceased in all parts of the Roman Empire, and the number of Christians encreased wonderfully every day, [81]and in every place, by the preaching of the Apostles, and Evangelists;[81] a great part of that successe, may reasonably be attributed, to the contempt, into which the Priests °of the Gentiles of that time,° had brought themselves, by their uncleannesse, avarice, and [82]jugling[at] between Princes. Also the Religion of the Church of Rome, was partly, for the same cause abolished in England, and many other parts of Christendome; insomuch, as the fayling of Vertue in the Pastors, maketh Faith faile in the People: and partly from bringing of the Philosophy, and doctrine of Aristotle into Religion, by the Schoole-men; from whence there arose so many contradictions, and absurdities, as brought the Clergy into a reputation both of Ignorance, and of Fraudulent intention; and[82] enclined people to revolt from them, either [83]against the will of their own Princes, as in France, and Holland;[83] or with their will, as in England. [60]

10 failed] fayleth MS 26 the Philosophy, and doctrine] Philosophy and the doctrine MS

[76] Moses, who had led the people of Israel
[77] when that people, having abandoned the true God who had lately delivered them from servitude, and having made a golden calf, seditiously [78] the wilderness, [79] and demanded [80] the holiness of the rulers failing, the faith of the people failed with it.

Deficientis fidei causae modò dictae in sequentibus exemplis perspicuè apparebunt. Moses qui Populum Israëliticum eduxerat ex Aegypto, dies tantum quadraginta aberat, cum Populus ille per seditionem, relicto vero Deo qui paulò ante ipsos à servitute exemerat, fabricatoque Vitulo aureo, in Idololatriam Aegyptiorum relaberentur. Rursus, postquam Moses, Aaron & generatio illa quae magnalia Dei viderat in Deserto mortui essent (Iud. 2. 11.)[ar] surrexit generatio nova, quae servivit Baal. Itaque miraculis deficientibus, defecit Fides.

Samuelis filii à patre Iudices in Bersabe constituti (1 Sam. 8. & 9.) [62] quia injustè judicaverunt & dona acceperunt, Populus Israëliticus, rejecto Regno Dei, Regem more Gentium poposcerunt. Itaque deficiente Rectorum Sanctitate, unà defecit fides Populi. Etiam quod ad Euangelii praedicationem primam Oracula per Imperium Romanum omnia siluerunt, numerusque Christianorum quotidie & mirabiliter augeretur, magna ex parte tribui potest Sacerdotum Avaritiae, Spurcitiei, fictisque vaticiniis, vel ad promerendos Reges, vel ne nihil praedicere viderentur, ambiguis. Nec multum dissimili de causâ Ecclesiae Romanae apud Anglos, nonnullosque alios Populos enormis potestas tandem suppressa est; cessante scilicet Pastorum Sanctitate, Populi cessavit Fides.

Eadem in Ecclesia, introductâ in Religionem Philosophiâ Aristotelis, innumeras inde contexuerunt Scholastici Doctrinas sibi invicem repugnantes & contradictorias, Clericorum non modò ignorantiam, sed etiam fraudulentiam detegentes. Quae causa altera erat, quare Populus illorum jugum excuteret, Principibus partim volentibus, ut in Anglia; partim prohibere non valentibus, ut in Gallia.

9 8.] 1. 70 13 siluerunt] siluerint 70 20 in Ecclesia 70] Ecclesia 68

[81] by the first preaching of the Gospel;

[82] fictitious prophecies, which, either to win the favour of kings or to avoid the appearance of predicting nothing, were ambiguous. And for a not very different reason the enormous power of the Church of Rome was finally abolished in England, and among several other peoples; so that the failing of holiness in the pastors made faith fail in the people.

In the same Church, when the philosophy of Aristotle was brought into religion, the schoolmen wove out of it innumerable doctrines which were contradictory and at variance with one another, and which thereby revealed not only the ignorance but also the fraudulence of the clergy. And this was another thing that [83] with their princes being unable to stop them, as in France, [ap] 'Happy' here means successful, dexterous, skilled in bringing about the desired result (OED, 'happy', a., 5.a); 'conduct' means the action of leading (OED, 'conduct', n.[1], 1).

---

[aq] Correctly: Exod. 32: 1–4. [ar] Correctly: Judg. 2: 10–11 [as] 1 Sam. 8: 5. [at] See above, note aa.

Lastly, amongst the points [84] by the Church of Rome declared necessary for Salvation, there be so many, manifestly to the advantage of the Pope, and of his spirituall subjects, residing in the territories of other °Christian° Princes, that were it not for the mutuall emulation of those Princes, they might without warre, [85]or trouble, exclude all forraign Authority,[85] as easily as it has been excluded in England. For who is there that does not see, to whose benefit it conduceth, to have it believed, that a King hath [86]not his Authority[86] from Christ, unlesse a Bishop crown him[87]? That a King, if he be a Priest, cannot Marry? That whether a Prince be born in lawfull Marriage, or not, must be judged by [88]Authority from[88] Rome? That Subjects [89]may be freed from their Alleageance, if by the Court of Rome, the King be judged[89] an Heretique? That a King (as Chilperique of France) may be deposed °by a Pope (as Pope Zachary,) for no cause; and his Kingdome given to one of his Subjects?° [av] That the Clergy, and Regulars,[aw] °in what Country soever,° shall be exempt from the [90]Jurisdiction of their King,[90] in cases criminall? [91]Or who does not see, to whose profit redound the Fees of private Masses, and Vales[ax] of Purgatory; with other signes of private interest, enough to mortifie the most lively Faith, if (as I sayd) the civill Magistrate, and Custome did not more sustain it, than any opinion they have of the Sanctity, Wisdome, or Probity of their Teachers?[91] So that I may attribute °all° the changes of Religion °in the world,° to one and the same cause; and that is, unpleasing Priests; °and those not onely amongst Catholiques, but even in that Church that hath presumed most of Reformation.°

4 mutuall emulation of] emulation of one another in MS 16 and] and {the added by TH} MS
21–3 and those . . . Reformation.] On whom when {men added by TH} by common frailety are Carried to execute their anger they beare downe not onely Religion w^ch^ they reduce to Priuate fancy but also the Ciuil gouerment that would vphold it, reducing it to the naturall Condition of Priuate force. MS

[84] ^ of faith [85] exclude that power, [86] no authority, and that his authority is not [87] ^ , which is the reason for that ceremony in the coronation of kings [88] the Court of [89] of a Christian king may be freed from their civil obedience if the king be [90] civil jurisdiction
[91] There is no one who does not understand the nature and purpose of indulgences, private masses, and many other things unnecessary to the people's salvation, and how much power they have to extinguish even the most lively faith, were that faith not sustained by the civil power and by custom.

Postremò, inter Articulos Fidei quos ad salutem necessarios declaravit Ecclesia Romana, adeo multi ad Papae, & suorum in Dominiis aliorum Principum habitantium subditorum Spiritualium emolumentum manifestè tendunt, ut nisi illorum mutua obstaret aemulatio, non minus facile esset Principibus quibuscunque Potestatem illam, etiam sine Bello, ejicere; quam ex Angliâ ejecta fuit. Quis enim, cujus bono creditur Regis authoritatem nullam esse, nisi ab Episcopo coronatus sit, à Christo non esse,[au] causam Ceremoniae illius in coronandis Regibus, non animadvertit? Regi, si Sacerdos fiat, uxorem ducere non licere; utrum Rex in legitimo Matrimonio natus sit, judicandum esse à Curiâ Romanâ; subditos Regis Christiani ab Obedientiâ Civili absolvi posse, si Haereticus sit Rex; Regem (ut Chilpericus Rex Galliae) Regno privari posse;[av] Clericos & Regulares in causâ Criminis à cognitione Civili exemptos esse; Indulgentias, Missas privatas, aliaque multa Populo ad salutem non necessaria, quo tendunt, & quantam ad extinguendam Fidem, etiam vivacissimam, vim habeant, nisi à Potestate Civili & Consuetudine foveretur nemo est qui non intelligit. Itaque Mutationum in Religionibus unam videor mihi causam assignare posse, ingratos Sacerdotes.

7 nullam esse, nisi ab Episcopo coronatus sit, à Christo non esse] nullam, nec à Christo esse, nisi ab Episcopo coronatus sit 70 12 Regno] Regni 70

[au] Possibly the 'nullam esse' and 'non esse' here are an unintended duplication; removing the first would yield a translation of the English.

[av] Childeric III of France (r. 743–51) was deposed by Pepin (who succeeded him), after Pope Zachary (r. 741–52) had absolved Childeric's subjects of their oath of allegiance. Hobbes's source may have been Carleton, Jurisdiction, which gives the name as 'Chilperic' (pp. 86–7).

[aw] = members of monastic orders (OED, 'regular', adj., n., and adv., 1).

[ax] = 'vails', profits, fees (OED, 'vail', n.[1]).

CHAP. XIII.

Of the °NATURALL° CONDITION of Mankind, as concerning their Felicity,[1] and Misery.[1]

Men by nature Equall.

Nature hath made men so equall, in the faculties of body, and mind; as that though there bee found one man sometimes manifestly stronger in body, or of quicker mind then another; yet when all is reckoned together, the difference between man, and man, is not so considerable, as that one man can thereupon [2]claim[2] to himselfe any benefit, [3]to which another may not pretend,[3] as well as he. For as to the strength of body, [4]the weakest has strength enough to[4] kill the strongest, either by secret machination, or by confederacy with others, that are in the same danger with himselfe.

And as to the faculties of the mind, (setting aside the arts grounded upon words, [5]and especially that skill of proceeding upon generall, and infallible rules, called Science;[5] which very few have, and but in few things; as being not a native faculty, born with us; nor attained, [6](as Prudence,) while we look after somewhat els,)[6] I find yet a greater equality °amongst men, than that of strength.° For Prudence, is [7]but[7] Experience; which [8] equall time, equally bestowes on all men, in [61] those things they equally apply themselves unto. That which may perhaps make such equality incredible, is but a vain conceipt of ones owne wisdome, which almost all men think they have in a greater degree, than the Vulgar; that is, than all men but themselves, and a few others, whom by Fame, or for concurring with themselves, they approve. For such is the nature of men, that howsoever they may acknowledge °many° others to be more °witty, or more° eloquent, or more learned; Yet they will hardly believe there be many [9]so wise as themselves:[9] For they see their own wit at hand, and other mens at a distance. But [10]this proveth rather that men are in that point equall, than unequall. For there is not ordinarily a greater signe of the equall distribution of any thing, than[10] that every man is contented with his share.[a]

4–5 Men by nature Equall] {Naturall equality of men added by TH} MS 20 almost all . . . have] euery man thinkes he hath MS 22 such] it MS 23 that] om. MS

[1] in the present life. [2] promise [3] for which another may not hope,
[4] you will rarely find a man so weak that he cannot [5] that is, the general rules of the sciences;
[6] from prudence, without study), [7] entirely from [8] ^nature in [9] more prudent:
[10] the best argument for the equality of wits is, for our present purpose,

[63]

CAPVT XIII.

De Conditione generis Humani quantùm attinet ad felicitatem praesentis vitae.

Tum Corporis, tum Animae facultatibus adeo aequales inter se produxit Natura homines, ut quamvis alii aliis viribus aut ingenio praestent, si tamen omnia simul considerentur, differentia tanta non est, ut promittere sibi commodi quicquam possit unus, quod alius sperare aeque non potest. Quod attinet ad vim corpoream rarò invenias hominem ita imbecillum, ut fortissimum non possit interficere, vel dolo, vel conjunctione cum aliis quibus periculum est commune. Quod autem attinet ad facultates Animi (verborum artibus, id est scientiarum Regulis generalibus exceptis, quas pauci & in rebus paucissimis possident, ut quae nec nobiscum natae sint, nec à Prudentia sine studio acquisitae) majorem adhuc invenio aequalitatem. Prudentia enim omnis ab Experientiâ est, & omnibus aequali tempore in iis rebus quibus animum aequaliter applicant, aequaliter tribuitur à Naturâ. Id verò quod aequalitatem hujusmodi dubiam videri facit, Opinio tantùm est eorum qui plus justo se aestimant. Nam ferè unusquisque sapientiorem se esse credit multò quam est quilibet è vulgo, id est, quàm est alius quicunque, praeter paucos quos propter famam, vel propter consensum cum ipsis solet admirari. Ea enim est natura Hominis, ut quamquam alium aliquem seipso eloquentiorem vel eruditiorem esse confiteatur, prudentiorem tamen esse quemquam, non concedet. Ingenium enim proprium à propinquo, alienum à longinquo quisque spectat. Ingeniorum autem aequalitatis argumentum quantùm ad praesens Institutum attinet maximum est, quod unusquisque suo contentus est.[a]

7 potest] possit 70 12 sint] sunt 70

[a] Cf. Descartes, Discours de la methode, I (Oeuvres, vi, pp. 1–2): 'Good sense is the thing that is most equally shared out in the world; for everyone thinks himself so well provided with it, that even those who are the hardest to satisfy in everything else do not normally wish for any more of it than what they have' ('Le bon sens est la chose du monde la mieux partagée: car chascun pense en estre si bien pouruû, que ceux mesme qui sont les plus difficiles a contenter en toute autre chose, n'ont point coustume d'en desirer plus qu'ils en ont').

From Equality proceeds Diffidence.[b]

From this equality of ability, ariseth equality of hope in the attaining of our Ends. And therefore if any two men desire the same thing, which nevertheless they cannot both enjoy, they become enemies; and in the way to their End, (which is °principally° their owne conservation, °and sometimes their delectation only,°) endeavour to destroy, or subdue one an other. And from hence it comes to passe, that where [11]an Invader[11] hath no more to feare, than an other mans single power; if one plant, sow, build, or possesse[c] a [12] convenient Seat, others may °probably° be expected to come prepared with forces united, to dispossesse, and deprive him, not only of the fruit of his labour, but also of his life, or liberty. And the Invader again is in the like danger of another[13].

From Diffidence Warre.

And from [14]this diffidence[14] [d] of one another, there is no way for any man to secure himselfe, [15]so reasonable, as[15] Anticipation; that is, by force, or wiles, to master the persons of all men he can, so long, till he see no other power great enough to endanger him: And this is no more than his own conservation requireth, and is generally allowed[16]. Also because there be some, that [17]taking pleasure in contemplating their own power in the acts of conquest, which they pursue farther than their security requires;[17] if others, that otherwise would be glad to be at ease within modest bounds, should not by invasion increase their power, they would not be able, long time, by standing only on their defence, to subsist. And by consequence, such [18]augmentation[18] of dominion over men, being necessary to a mans conservation, it ought to be allowed him.

Againe, [19] men have no pleasure, (but on the contrary °a great deale of° griefe) in keeping company, where there is no power able to over-awe them all. For every man looketh that his companion should value him, at the same rate he sets upon himselfe: And upon all signes of [20]contempt, or undervaluing, naturally[20] endeavours, as far as he dares (which amongst them that have no common power °to keep them in quiet,° is far enough to make them destroy each other,) to [21]extort a greater value from his contemners, by dommage; and from others, by the example.[21]

1–3 From Equality proceeds Diffidence.] {Nature alloweth {for page cut} a mans security wh{ere page cut} there is no ciuil st{ate page cut} to inuade and sub{due page cut} all that he think{es page cut} can hurt him added by TH} 8 others] other B 12–13 marg. om. MS 24 men have] there is MS 24 marg.: {Men delight in hau{ing page cut} their power thought {great page cut} and hate to be vn{der- page cut} valued added by TH} MS 29 them] them both MS 31 others] other MS

Ab aequalitate Naturae, oritur unicuique ea quae cupit acquirendi spes. Quoties ergo duo idem cupiunt, quo frui ambo non possunt, alter alterius hostis fit, & ad finem sibi propositum (quae est conservatio propria) alter alterum conatur subjugare vel interficere. Itaque cui animus est vicinum aggrediendi, si nihil sit, quo deterreatur praeter vim unius hominis, quoties unus aliquis agrum paulò commodiorem possederit, conseverit, plantaverit, inaedificaverit, expectandi sunt alii viribus conjunctis parati, non modo laboris ejus omnem fructum, sed etiam vitam, vel libertatem sublaturi, idem rursus passuri ipsi à se fortioribus. [64]

In tanto, & mutuo hominum metu, securitatis viam meliorem habet nemo Anticipatione; nempe ut unusquisque vi & dolo ceteros omnes tam diu subjicere sibi conetur, quàm diu alios esse, à quibus sibi cavendum esset viderit. Neque hoc majus est, quam & conservatio sua postulat, & ab omnibus concedi solet. Quoniam enim sunt, qui animi & gloriae causâ universum terrarum orbem superare vellent, nisi alii (alioqui modicis contenti finibus) potentiam suam alios invadendo augerent, sed tantummodo se & sua defendere conarentur, subsistere diu non possent. Itaque Dominii acquisitio per vim unicuique, ut ad conservationem propriam necessaria, concedi debet.

Praeterea, in Congressibus, ubi potentia nulla est, quae omnes coërcere possit, voluptas nulla, sed contra Molestia per Naturam esset. Unusquisque enim tanti à caeteris fieri vellet, quanti ipse sese aestimat, & ad signum omne neglectionis conatur quantùm audet (id est ubi nulla extat potentia communis quantùm ad mutuas caedes sufficit) ulcisci; scilicet, ut alteri ab alteris majorem sui aestimationem à spectantibus exemplo ultionis extorqueant.

9 ipsi 68-Errata] ipse 68 12 esset this edn.] esse 68, 70 22 conatur] conaretur 70
22–3 communis . . . sufficit) 70] communis) . . . sufficit 68 24 extorqueant] extorquerent 70

[11] someone who is minded to attack his neighbour [12] ^ slightly more [13] ^ stronger than himself [14] such great fear [15] better than [16] ^ by everyone
[17] for reasons of pride and glory would wish to conquer the whole world; [18] acquisition by force
[19] ^ by nature [20] neglect, [21] avenge himself; that is, that one person should extort from the other (and from onlookers, by the example of his vengeance) a higher estimation of himself.

[b] = mistrust (OED, 'diffidence', 1).
[c] = take possession of, obtain, seize (OED, 'possess', v., 5.a; cf. the Latin, 'possederit', 'take possession of').
[d] See above, note b.

So that in the nature of man, we find three principall causes of quarrell. First, Competition; Secondly, [22]Diffidence;[22] [e] Thirdly, Glory. [62]

The first, [23]maketh men invade for Gain; the second, for Safety;[23] and the third, for Reputation. The first use Violence, [24]to make themselves Masters of other mens persons, wives, children, and cattell; the second, to defend them;[24] the third, for trifles, as a word, a smile, [25]a different[25] opinion, and any °other° signe of undervalue, either direct in their Persons, or by reflexion in their Kindred, their Friends, their Nation, their Profession, or their Name.

Out of Civil States, there is alwayes Warre of every one against every one.

Hereby it is manifest, that during the time men live without a [26]common Power to keep them all in awe,[26] they are in that condition which [27]is called Warre; and such a warre, as is[27] of every man, against every man. For WARRE, consisteth not in Battell onely, °or the act of fighting;° but in a tract of time, wherein the Will to contend by Battell is sufficiently known: and therefore the notion of Time, is to be considered in the nature of Warre; as it is in the nature of Weather. For as the nature of Foule weather, lyeth not in a showre °or two° of rain; °but in an inclination thereto of many dayes together:° So the nature of War, consisteth not in actuall fighting; °but in the known disposition thereto, during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary.° [28]All other time[28] is PEACE.

The Incommodities of such a War.

Whatsoever therefore is consequent to a time of Warre, where every man is Enemy to every man; the same is consequent to the time, wherein men live without other security, than what their own strength, and their own invention shall furnish them withall. In such condition, there is no place for Industry; because the fruit thereof is [29]uncertain:[29] and consequently no Culture of the Earth; no Navigation, °nor use of the commodities that may be imported by Sea;° no commodious Building; no Instruments of moving, and removing such things as require much force; no Knowledge of the face of the Earth; no account of Time; no Arts; °no Letters;° no Society; and which is worst of all, [30]continuall feare, and[30] danger of violent death; And the life of man, solitary, poore, °nasty,° brutish, and short.

1 marg.: {Causes of hostility added by TH} MS 9–11 Out of . . . every one.] {without a ciuil power men are in a Condition of Warre added by TH} MS 20–21 marg. om. MS 29 feare,] feare MS

[22] defence; [23] looks for dominion; the second for security; [24] for profit; the second for safety; [25] an [26] coercive power, [27] I have called a war [28] Time without war, however, [29] non-existent: [30] fear and perpetual

[e] See above, note b.

Itaque in Naturâ humanâ simultatum inveniuntur tres praecipuae causae, Competitio, Defensio, Gloria; quarum prima ad Dominium, secunda ad Securitatem, tertia ad Famam spectat. A primâ est, quod de Lucro; à secundâ, quod de Salute; à tertiâ, quod de Nugis pugnetur; nimirum de Verbo, de Risu, de Opinione, de omni signo, Parvipendii, sive Ipsorum, sive Cognatorum, Amicorum, Patriae, Professionis vel Nominis.

Manifestum igitur est, quamdiu nulla est Potentia coërciva, tamdiu conditionem Hominum eam esse quam dixi Bellum esse uniuscujusque contra unumquemque. Consistit enim natura Belli, non in Pugna, sed in tractu aliquo temporis, quo durante, Voluntas Armis decertandi est manifesta. Itaque in naturâ Belli, sicut in naturâ Tempestatum considerandum est Tempus. Nam ut unus Imber non denominat Tempestatem humidam; ita neque Pugna quaelibet denominat Bellum. Tempus autem Bello vacuum, Pax est.

Quicquid ergo Bello omnium contra omnes naturaliter adhaeret, idem conditionem hominum, sine aliâ securitate quam quae à cujusque robore & ingenio expectari potest, necessariò comitatur. In conditione autem tali locus Industriae nullus est, quia nullus fructus. Nullus ergo Terrae cultus, nulla Navigatio, Aedificia commoda nulla, Instrumenta quibus quae majoribus indigent viribus moveantur nulla, faciei telluris cognitio nulla, Temporum computatio [65] nulla, nullae Artes, neque Societas; sed quod gravissimum est, mortis violentae metus, & periculum perpetuum, vitaque hominum solitaria, indiga, bruta & brevis.

19 moveantur nulla, this edn.] moveantur, nulla 68, 70

It may seem strange to some man, that has not well weighed these things; that Nature should thus dissociate, and render men apt to °invade, and° destroy one another: [31]and he may therefore, not trusting to this Inference, made from the Passions, desire perhaps to have the same[31] confirmed by Experience. Let him therefore consider with himselfe, when taking a journey, he armes himselfe, and seeks to go well accompanied; when going to sleep, he locks his dores; [32]when even in his house he[32] locks his chests; and this when he knowes there bee Lawes, and publike Officers, armed, to revenge all injuries shall bee done him; what opinion he has of his fellow [33]subjects, when he rides armed; of his fellow Citizens, when he locks his dores; and of his children, and servants, when he locks his chests.[33] Does he not there as much accuse mankind by [34]his actions, as I do by my words?[34] But neither of us accuse °mans° nature in it. The °Desires, and other° Passions of man, are °in themselves° no Sin. [35]No more[35] are the Actions, that proceed from those Passions, till [36]they[36] know a Law that forbids them: which till Lawes be made they cannot know: nor can any Law be made, till they have agreed upon the Person that shall make it. [37] [63]

[38]It may peradventure be thought, there was never such a time, nor condition of warre as this; and I believe it was never generally so, over all the world: but there are many places, where they live so now. For the savage people in many places of America, except the government of small Families, the concord whereof dependeth on naturall lust, have no government at all; and live at this day in that brutish manner, as I said before.[38] [g] Howsoever, it may be perceived what manner of life there would be, where [39]there were no common Power to feare;[39] by the manner of life, which men [40]that have formerly lived under a peacefull government, use to degenerate into,[40] in a civill Warre.

[31] nevertheless this has been clearly inferred from the nature of the passions, and is also [32] and [33] citizens, neighbours, and servants. [34] that caution of his, as I do? [35] , nor [36] those who act [37] ^But why should we try to prove to educated men what is known even by dogs, who bark at unknown visitors in the daytime, and at all visitors at night?
[38] But (someone will say) there never was a war of all against all. What? Did not Cain kill his own brother Abel out of envy[f] – a misdeed so great that he would not have dared to commit it if there had then existed a common power capable of avenging it? Are there not many places where people live so today? The people of America live so,[g] except that they are subject to paternal laws in small families; and the concord of those families is sustained only by the similarity of their desires.
[39] men were not the subjects of a common power, [40] have Illis qui haec non pensitaverunt mirum fortasse videbitur, Naturam homines dissociavisse, & ad mutuam caedem aptos produxisse; & tamen hoc perspicuè illatum est ex natura Passionum, & praeterea Experientiae consentaneum. Cogita enim, quando Iter ingrederis, cur Comites quaeris, Arma gestas; quando dormitum is, fores claudis, Arcas obseras, idque legibus & ministris armatis ad omnem violentiam ulciscendam paratis, qualem habeas opinionem de concivibus, de vicinis & de domesticis. Nonne cautelâ istâ tuâ genus humanum aeque accusas atque Ego? Neutri Naturam accusamus. Passiones hominum peccata non sunt, neque quae inde oriuntur actiones, quamdiu, quae illas prohibeat, potestatem nullam qui faciunt, vident; neque enim Lex cognosci potest quae non sit lata; neque ferri, quamdiu in legislatorem consensum non sit. Sed quid hominibus doctis conamur demonstrare id quod ne Canes quidem ignorant, qui accedentibus oblatrant, interdiu quidem ignotis, noctu autem omnibus.

Sed omnium in omnes (inquiet aliquis) Bellum nunquam erat. Quid, nonne fratrem suum Abelem invidiâ interfecit Cain;[f] tantum facinus non ausurus, si communis potentia quae vindicare potuisset tunc extitisset? Nonne hodie, multis in locis ita vivitur? Americani, excepto quod per familias parvas legibus paternis subditi sunt, quarum familiarum concordia similitudine solâ Cupiditatum sustinetur, ita vivunt.[g] Qualis etiam vita hominum esset nulli potentiae communi subditorum, ex vitâ eorum cognosci potest, quibus Bellum est Civile.

16 suum 68-Errata] suam 68

[f] Gen. 4: 2–8.

[g] 'as I said before' apparently refers to the description of the 'brutish' life, above. Cf. Osorio, De rebus gestis, p. 66, on the natives of Brazil ('they know no letters, cultivate no religion, are bound by no laws, use no weights or measures, and are subjected to the rule of no king': 'Nullas literas norunt: nullam religionem colunt: nullis legibus alligantur: nullis ponderibus aut mensuris vtuntur: nullius Regis imperio subijciuntur'); Montaigne, Essais, p. 120, also on the natives of Brazil ('no kind of trade, no knowledge of letters, no science of numbers, no title of governor or of political rule': 'aucune espece de trafique; nulle cognoissance de lettres; nulle science de nombres; nul nom de magistrat, ny de superiorité politique'); Gray, Good Speed to Virginia, sigs. C2v ('in Virginia the people are sauage and incredibly rude, they . . . differ very litle from beasts, hauing no Art, nor science, nor trade'), C4r ('they range and wander vp and downe the Countrey, without any law or gouernment, being led only by their owne lusts and sensualitie'); d'Avity, Estates of the World, p. 252 ('Among the people of the New world, the Chichimeques of New Spain, and certaine people of Brasil were most barbarous: these leading a sauage and brutish life, without commanders, without laws, & without any forme of ciuilitie, or pollicie').

But though there had never been any time, wherein particular men were in a condition of warre one against another; yet in all times, Kings, and Persons of Soveraigne authority, [41]because of their Independency,[41] are in continuall jealousies,[h] and in the state and posture of Gladiators; having their weapons pointing, and their eyes fixed on one another; that is, their Forts, [42]Garrisons, and Guns[42] upon the Frontiers of their Kingdomes; and [43]continuall Spyes upon their neighbours;[43] which is a posture of War. But because they [44]uphold thereby, the Industry[44] of their Subjects; there does not follow from it, that misery, which accompanies the [45] Liberty of particular men.

In such a Warre, nothing is Unjust.

To this warre of every man against every man, this also is consequent; that nothing can be Unjust. The notions of Right and Wrong, Justice and Injustice have there no place. °Where there is no common Power, there is no Law: where no Law, no Injustice.° Force, and Fraud, are in warre the two Cardinall vertues. Justice, and Injustice are none of the Faculties neither of the Body, nor Mind. If they were, they might be in a man that were alone in the world, °as well as his Senses, and Passions.° They are Qualities, that relate to men [46]in Society, not in Solitude.[46] It is consequent also to the same condition, that there be no Propriety, no Dominion, no Mine and Thine distinct; but onely that to be every mans, that he [47]can get;[47] and for so long, as he can keep it. And thus much for the ill condition, which man by meer Nature is actually placed in; though with a possibility to come out of it, consisting partly in the Passions, partly in his Reason.

The Passions that incline men to Peace.

The Passions that encline men to Peace, are Feare [48]of[48] Death; Desire of such things as are necessary to commodious living; and a Hope by their Industry to obtain them. And Reason suggesteth [49]convenient[i] Articles of Peace, upon which men may be drawn to agreement. These Articles, are they, which otherwise are called[49] the Lawes of Nature: whereof I shall speak more particularly, in the two following Chapters.

10–12 In such . . . Unjust.] {In warre nothing ius{t page cut} nor Vniust in respect of the enemy added by TH} MS 23–4 marg. om. MS

[41] are enemies; for they [42] and garrisons [43] spies concealed in their enemies' territory; [44] cannot otherwise provide for the safety [45] ^ complete [46] not as men, but as citizens. [47] has acquired; [48] , especially fear of violent [49] certain articles of peace, which are

[h] = suspicions, mistrust (OED, 'jealousy', 5).
[i] = suitable, fitting (OED, 'convenient', a. and n., 4).

Quamquam autem tempus nunquam fuerit, in quo unusquisque uniuscujusque hostis erat, Reges tamen & Personae summam habentes potestatem, omni tempore hostes inter se sunt. Semper enim alii aliis suspecti sunt, more stantes gladiatorio, armis oculisque intentis, id est castellis & praesidiis ad confinia collocatis, & exploratoribus in hostico latitantibus, quae est conditio Belli. Sed quia subditorum saluti provideri aliter non potest, non sequitur inde miseria illa, quae privatorum hominum libertatem plenam sequutura esset.

Praeterea Bello omnium contra omnes consequens est, ut nihil dicendum sit injustum. Nomina Iusti & Injusti locum in hac conditione non habent. Vis & Dolus in Bello Virtutes Cardinales sunt. Neque sunt Iustitia & Injustitia Corporis aut Animae facultates; nam si essent, homini inesse possent qui in mundo solitarius esset & unicus. [66] Qualitates quidem Hominis sunt, non autem quatenus Hominis, sed quatenus Civis. Eidem conditioni hominum consequens est, ut nullum sit Dominium, nulla Proprietas, nullum Meum aut Tuum, sed ut illud uniuscujusque sit, quod acquisivit, & quamdiu conservare potest. Atque haec sufficiant dicta de conditione Humanâ merè Naturali; à qua tamen partim à Ratione, partim etiam à Passionibus liberari potuit.

Passiones quibus homines ad Pacem perduci possunt, sunt Metus, praesertim verò Metus Mortis violentae, & Cupiditas rerum ad bene vivendum necessariarum, & spes per industriam illas obtinendi. Pacis autem articulos quosdam suggerit Ratio, quae Leges sunt Naturales; de quibus fusiùs dicemus in duobus Capitibus proximè sequentibus.

3 tempore 70] tempori 68 13 esset] foret 70 22 illas] illa 70

[64]

CHAP. XIV.

Of the first and second NATURALL LAWES, and of CONTRACTS.

Right of Nature what.

The RIGHT OF NATURE, °which Writers commonly call° Jus Naturale, is the Liberty each man hath, to use his own power, as he will himselfe, for the preservation of his own Nature; °that is to say, of his own Life;° and consequently, of doing any thing, which [1]in his own Judgement, and Reason, hee shall conceive to be the aptest means[1] thereunto.

Liberty what.

By LIBERTY, is understood, according to the proper signification of the word, the absence of externall Impediments: °which Impediments, may oft take away part of a mans power to do what hee would; but cannot hinder him from using the power left him, according as his judgement, and reason shall dictate to him.°

A Law of Nature what.

A LAW OF NATURE, (Lex Naturalis,) is a Precept, or generall Rule, found out by Reason, by which a man is forbidden to do, that, which [2]is destructive of his life, or taketh away the means of preserving the same; and to omit, that, by which he thinketh it may be best preserved.[2] For though [3]they that speak of this subject, use to[3] confound Jus, and Lex, Right and Law; yet they ought to be distinguished; because RIGHT, consisteth in liberty to do, or to forbeare; Whereas LAW, determineth, and bindeth to one of them: so that Law, and Right, differ as much, as Obligation, and Liberty; which in one and the same matter are inconsistent.

Difference of Right and Law.

Naturally every man has Right to every thing.

And because the condition of Man, (as hath been declared in the precedent Chapter) is a condition of Warre of every one against every one; in which case every one is governed by his own Reason; and there is nothing he can make use of, that may not be a help unto him, [4]in preserving[4] his life against his enemyes; It followeth, that in [5]such a[5] condition, every man has a Right to every thing; even to one anothers body. And therefore, as long as this [6]naturall Right of every man to every thing[6] endureth, there can be no security to any man, (how strong °or wise° soever he be,) °of living out the time, which Nature ordinarily alloweth men to live.° And consequently it

2 the first and second NATURALL LAWES] the {two added by TH} first naturall {Lawe corr. to Lawes by TH} MS 18 use] be vsed MS

[1] will seem to tend [2] will seem to him to tend to his disadvantage. [3] writers very often
[4] at some time, in defending [5] man's natural [6] right

CAPVT XIV.

De duabus primis Legibus Naturalibus, & de Contractibus.

Ius Naturale est Libertas, quam habet unusquisque potentiâ suâ ad Naturae suae conservationem suo arbitrio utendi, & (per consequens) illa omnia quae eò videbuntur tendere, faciendi.

Per Libertatem intelligo (id quod ea vox propriè significat) externorum impedimentorum absentiam.

At Lex Naturalis Praeceptum est, sive Regula generalis Ratione excogitata, quâ unusquisque id quod ad damnum suum sibi tendere videbitur facere prohibetur. Etsi autem vocabulis Ius & Lex promiscuè saepenumerò utantur scriptores, distingui tamen debent. Consistit enim Ius in faciendi vel non faciendi Libertate; sed Lex ad faciendum obligat vel ad non faciendum. Itaque Ius & Lex differunt ut Libertas & Obligatio, quae circa eandem rem sunt inconsistentes.

Quoniam autem conditio hominum (ut praecedente Capite ostensum est) est conditio Belli omnium contra omnes, & propterea unusquisque suâ ipsius ratione gubernatur; & quia nihil est, quod in vita contra hostem defendendâ utile ei aliquando esse non possit, sequitur in conditione hominum Naturali omnium in omnia Ius esse ipsis hominum corporibus non exceptis. Quamdiu ergo Ius illud retinebitur, nulla cuiquam, etsi fortissimus sit, securitas esse is a precept, or generall rule of Reason, That every man, ought to endeavour Peace, as farre as he has hope of obtaining it; and when he cannot obtain it, that he may seek, and use, all helps, °and advantages of Warre.° The first branch of which Rule, containeth the first, °and Fundamentall° Law of Nature; which is, to seek Peace, and follow it. The Second, the summe of the Right of Nature; which is, [7]By all means we can, to defend our selves.[7]

The Fundamentall Law of Nature.

The second Law of Nature.

From this [8]Fundamentall[8] Law of Nature, °by which men are commanded to endeavour Peace,° is derived this second Law; That a man be willing, when others are so too, [9]as farre-forth, as for Peace, and [65] defence of himselfe he shall think it necessary,[9] to lay down this right to all things; and be contented with so much liberty °against other men,° as he would allow other men °against himselfe.° For as long as every man holdeth this Right, of doing any thing he liketh; so long [10]are all men in the condition of Warre.[10] But if other men will not lay down their Right, °as well as he;° then there is no [11]Reason for[11] any one, to devest himselfe of his: For that were to expose himselfe to Prey,[a] (which [12]no man is bound to)[12] rather than to [13]dispose himselfe to[13] Peace. This is that Law of the Gospell; Whatsoever you require that others should do to you, that do ye to them.[b] And that Law of all [14]men,[14] Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.[c]

What it is to lay down a Right.

To lay downe a mans Right to any thing, is to devest himselfe of the Liberty, of hindring another of the benefit of his own Right to the same. For he that renounceth, or [15]passeth away[15] his Right, giveth not to any other man a [16]Right which he had not before[17]; because there is nothing to which every man had not Right °by Nature:° but onely standeth out of his way, that he may [18]enjoy his own originall Right,[18] without hindrance from him; not without hindrance from another. So that the effect which redoundeth to one man, by another mans [19]defect[19] [d] of Right, is but [20]so much diminution of impediments to the use of his own Right originall.[20]

Renouncing a Right what is it.

Transferring Right what.

Right is layd aside, either by simply Renouncing it; or by Transferring it to another. By Simply RENOUNCING; when he [21]cares not to whom the benefit thereof redoundeth.[21] By TRANSFERRING; when he [22]intendeth the benefit thereof[22] to some certain person, °or persons.° And when a man hath in either manner abandoned, or granted away his Right; [23]then is he said to be Obligation.

OBLIGED, or BOUND, not to hinder those, to whom such Right is granted, or Duty.

abandoned, from the benefit of it: and that he Ought, and it is his DUTY, not to make voyd that voluntary act of his own: and that such hindrance is INIUS-

1–2 The Fundamentall Law of Nature.] {The first and added by TH} ye Fundamentall Law of nature. {To seeke peace added by TH} MS 6 we can, to defend our selves] one can, to defend himselfe MS
7–8 The second Law of Nature.] the second law of nature {seeke peace del. by TH; contract and way of peace added by TH} MS 20 to the same] om. MS

poterit. Rationis ergo Praeceptum sive Regula generalis est, Pacem quidem, dum ejus obtinendae spes est, quaerendam esse; quando autem haberi non potest, auxilia undecunque quaerere; & illis uti licitum esse. Regulae hujus pars prima [67] continet legem Naturae primam, Pacem quaere & persequere; secunda est Iuris Naturalis summa, Omnibus viis & modis seipsum defendendi Ius unicuique esse.

A lege Naturae primâ oritur secunda, Oportere unumquemque quoties Paci & defensioni propriae provisum erit, à Iure suo in Omnia, (caeteris idem facere paratis) decedere, contentumque esse eâdem libertate quam caeteris concedi vellet. Quamdiu enim faciendi omnia, quae vult, Ius retinet, tamdiu Bellum manet. Verùm si caeteri Iura sua in omnia deponere recusent, neque ille suum deponere obligatur. Alioqui caeteris in praedam potius se exponere, quod Natura non postulat, quam Pacem persequi putaretur. Atque haec Lex eadem est cum illâ Euangelii, Quicquid vobis fieri vultis id facite aliis;[b] & cum illâ omnium Gentium, Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.[c]

In rem aliquam Ius suum deponit, qui libertate illa se privat quam habet caeteros impediendi quò minùs quilibet eorum Iure suo utatur in rem eandem. Nam qui Iuri suo renuntiat, vel Ius suum transfert, Ius novum quod per Naturam non ante habuit nemini tribuit, quia omnibus in omnia Ius erat; sed cedit ei tantum, eo fine ut Iure quod ante habuit sine impedimento à se orto liberè fruatur, à se inquam orto, non ab alio. Itaque quod alteri accedit ex Iure alieno in se translato, nihil aliud est quàm sublatio impedimentorum à parte solius transferentis.

Deponitur Ius vel simplici Renuntiatione, vel Translatione ad alium. Simpliciter Renuntiat, qui in medium abjicit, nemini tribuens. Transfert, qui certo alicui concedit. Vtrovis autem modo faciat, Ius habentem, quin re utatur, impedire non debet; esset enim hoc suum ipsius actum irritum facere.

2 obtinendae 70] obtinendi 68 19 non ante] ante non 70 20 Iure 70] Ius 68

---

[7] each person has the right to defend himself by all ways and means. [8] first [9] whenever provision is being made for peace and his own defence, [10] war persists.
[11] obligation on [12] nature does not require) [13] pursue [14] nations, [15] transfers
[16] ^ new [17] ^ by nature [18] freely enjoy the right which he previously possessed,
[19] transfer [20] the removal of impediments on the part of the transferrer alone. [21] casts it away to the people generally, not giving it to any individual. [22] gives it up [23] he ought not to hinder the person who has the right from using the thing; for that would be to make void his own action. For injustice is also called 'injury', because it involves a hindrance without right (when the right has previously been laid down).

---

[a] = pillaging, depredation, the action of seizing by force (OED, 'prey', n., 4.b). [b] Matt. 7: 12.
[c] Scriptores historiae Augustae, Aelius Lampridius, Vita Severi Alexandri, LI.8 ('That which you do not wish to be done to you, do not do to another'). [d] = lack, deficiency (OED, 'defect', n., 1).

Injustice.

TICE, and INIURY, as being Sine Jure;[e] the Right being before renounced, or transferred.[23] So that °Injury, or° Injustice, in the controversies of the world, is somewhat like to that, which in the [24]disputations of Scholers[24] is called Absurdity. For as it is there called an Absurdity, to contradict what one maintained in the Beginning: so in the world, it is called Injustice, °and Injury, voluntarily° to undo that, which from the beginning he had voluntarily [25]done.[25] The way by which a man either °simply° Renounceth, or Transferreth his Right, is a Declaration, or Signification, by some voluntary and sufficient signe, or signes, that he doth so Renounce, or Transferre; or hath so Renounced, or Transferred the same, °to him that accepteth it.° And these Signes are either Words onely, or Actions onely; or (as it happeneth most often) both Words, and Actions. And the same are the BONDS, °by which men are bound, and obliged: Bonds,° that have their strength, not from their own Nature, °(for nothing is more easily broken then a mans word,)° but from Feare of some evill consequence upon the rupture[26].

Not all Rights are alienable.

Whensoever a man Transferreth his Right, or Renounceth it; it is [27] either in consideration of some Right reciprocally transferred to [66] himselfe; or for some other good °he hopeth for thereby.° For it is a voluntary act[28]: and of the [29]voluntary acts[29] of every man, the object is some Good to himselfe. And therefore there be some [30]Rights, which no man can be understood by any words, or other signes, to have abandoned, or transferred. As first a man cannot lay down the right of resisting them, that assault him by force, to take away his life; because he cannot be understood to ayme thereby, at any Good to himselfe. The same may be sayd of Wounds, and Chayns, and Imprisonment; both because there is no benefit consequent to such patience;[f] as there is to the patience of suffering another to be wounded, or imprisoned: as also because a man cannot tell, when he seeth men proceed against him by violence, whether they intend his death or not. And lastly[30] the motive, and end for which this renouncing, and transferring of Right is introduced, is nothing else but the [31]security of a mans person, in his life, and in the means of so preserving life, as not to be weary of it.[31] And therefore if a man by words, or other signes, seem to despoyle himselfe of the End, for which [32]those signes were intended;[32] he is not to be understood as if °he meant it, or that° it was his will; but that he was ignorant of how such words and actions were to be interpreted.

26–7 as also because] Besides MS

Injustitia enim Injuria etiam dicitur ex eo, quod (deposito ante Iure) absque Iure impedimentum fit. Est enim in controversiis hominum Injustitia similis ejus, quam in Scholis Absurditatem vocant. Sicut enim iis quae initio supposita erant contradicere Absurdum; ita quod faciendum voluntariè susceperis, irritum facere, Injustum appellatur. Modus autem, quo quis Iuri suo Renuntiat vel Ius suum Transfert, talis est; signo, vel signis idoneis voluntariè declarat, tali Iuri se Renuntiare, vel Renuntiasse; vel ad hunc Ius suum se Transferre, vel Transtulisse. Sunt autem Signa illa vel Verba, vel Facta, vel (ut plerumque fit) utraque. Atque haec sunt Vincula illa quae non à suâ Naturâ, sed à Metu damni à Promissi violatione robur habent.

Quotiescunque Ius suum derelinquit quis, vel transfert, eâ causâ id facere intelligitur, ut sibi reciprocè ab eo, cui translatum est Ius aliquod vel aliud bonum accipiat. Nam qui prior transtulit, voluntariè [68] id fecit; Voluntatis autem objectum semper Bonum est aliquod Volenti. Sunt autem res aliquae, quae neque Verbis, neque aliis signis transferri aut relinqui possunt, quia cui bono id fecerit, intelligi non potest. Idem de Vulneribus & Incarceratione dicendum est. Secundò, Ius contra vim se defendendi necessariò retinetur; Nam qui se defendit, quousque vis progressura est, ignorat. Tertiò, finis propter quem Relictio vel Translatio Iuris introducta est, alius non est, quàm vitae & mediorum ad vitam conservatio. Si quis ergo Verbis, signisve aliis spoliare se fine, propter quem illis usus esse intelligitur, reperiatur, id fecisse voluntariè existimandus non est, sed (per ignorantiam) verborum & signorum illorum vim non intelligens.

10 damni this edn.] damni; 68, 70 12 sibi] om. 70 16 potest.] potest. (*Primò, de morte intentata---) 70 21 intelligitur, reperiatur, 70] intelligitur, 68

[24] schools [25] undertaken to do. [26] ^ of the promise [27] ^ understood to be [28] ^ of the person who transferred first [29] will [30] things which cannot be transferred or abandoned by words or other signs, because it is impossible to understand what benefit would result. [70: First, concerning a situation where death is threatened. . .] The same should be said about wounds and imprisonment. Secondly, the right to defend oneself against force is retained; for he who defends himself does not know how far the use of force will go. Thirdly, [31] preservation of life, and of the means to life. [32] he is understood to have used them;

[e] = 'without right'. [f] = endurance, forbearance (OED, 'patience', n.[1] (and int.), 1.a–b).

Contract what.

The mutuall transferring of Right, is that which men call CONTRACT.

There is difference, between transferring of Right °to the Thing;° and transferring, or tradition, that is, delivery of the Thing it selfe. For the Thing may be delivered together with the Translation of the Right; as in buying and selling [33]with ready mony; or exchange of goods, or lands: and it may be delivered some time after.[33]

Again, one of the Contractors, may [34]deliver the Thing contracted for on his part, and leave the other to perform his part at some determinate time after, and in the mean time be trusted; and then the Contract on his part, is called PACT, or COVENANT: Or both parts may contract now, to performe hereafter: in which cases, he that is to performe in time to come, being trusted, his performance is called Keeping of Promise, or Faith; and the fayling of performance (if it be voluntary)[34] Violation of Faith.

Covenant what.

When the transferring of Right, is not mutuall; but one of the parties transferreth[35], in hope to gain thereby friendship, or service from [36]another, or from his friends; or in hope to gain the reputation of Charity, or Magnanimity; or to deliver his mind from the pain of compassion; or in hope of reward in heaven; This is not Contract, but GIFT, FREE-GIFT, GRACE: which words signifie one and the same thing.[36]

Free-gift.

Signes of Contract Expresse.

[37]Signes of Contract, are either Expresse, or by Inference. Expresse, are words spoken with understanding of what they signifie: And such words are either of the time Present, or Past; as, I Give, I Grant, I have Given, I have Granted, I will that this be yours: Or of the future; as, I will Give, I will Grant: which words of the future, are called PROMISE.[37]

Signes of Contract by Inference.

Signes [38] by Inference, are sometimes the consequence of Words; [67] sometimes the consequence of Silence; sometimes the consequence of Actions; somtimes the consequence of Forbearing an Action: and generally a signe by Inference, of any Contract, is whatsoever sufficiently argues the will of the Contractor.

2 is] is a MS 18 which] all w^ch^ MS 24 called] om. MS

---

[33] when one party transfers the money, the other the goods together with the right; and sometimes the right is transferred before the thing is delivered.

[34] precede the other in delivering the thing or fulfilling the contract; then he is said to give credit to, or have faith in, the other; and the latter's promise is called a pact; and not to keep it, is called

[35] ^a right or thing

[36] the person to whom he transfers it, or acts for the sake of his reputation among others, or out of charity, such a transfer is called 'gift' and 'grace'.

[37] Express signs of contract are words; but they must be uttered about the present or the past, as 'I give', 'I have given', 'I grant', 'I have granted'. For if they are about the future, as 'I shall give', 'I shall grant', although they contain a promise to transfer a right, they do not yet transfer anything.

[38] ^of contract

Translatio Iuris mutua Contractus dicitur. Differunt autem inter se Ius transferre & Rem transferre, sive tradere. Traditur Res eodem tempore aliquando quo Transfertur Ius, ut fit in Emptione & Venditione, quando alter Pecuniam alter Mercem simul cum Iure Transfert; aliquando etiam Transfertur Ius, antequam Tradatur Res.

Praeterea, alter Contrahentium ad tradendam Rem, vel ad Contractum exequendum altero prior esse potest; tunc posteriori Credi sive Fides haberi dicitur; & Promissio ejus Pactum dicitur; & non praestitisse, Violatio Fidei.

Quando Translatio Iuris mutua non est, Contrahentium autem alter Ius vel Rem transfert, spe Amicitiae vel Officii ab eo cui transfert, vel existimationis causâ apud alios, vel ex Charitate, talis Translatio Donatio & Gratia appellatur.

Contractuum Signa expressa, sunt Verba; debent autem prolata esse de Tempore Praesente, vel Praeterito, ut Do, Dedi, Concedo, Concessi. Nam si de Futuro sunt, ut Dabo, Concedam, continent quidem transferendi Iuris promissionem, sed nondum quicquam transferunt.

Contractûs Signa per Consequens, interdum sunt Consequentiae Verborum; interdum consequentiae Silentii, interdum consequentiae Actionum, interdum etiam consequentiae Omissionum. In universum autem Signum Contractûs per Consequens, est quicquid Contrahentis Voluntatem Contrahendi satis indicat.

9 mutua non this edn.] mutua 68, 70

Free gift passeth by words of the Present or Past.

Words alone, if they be of the time to come, °and contain a bare promise,° are an insufficient signe of a Free-gift °and therefore not obligatory.° For [39]if they be of the time to Come, as, To morrow I will Give, they[39] are a signe I have not given yet, and consequently that my right is not transferred, but remaineth °till I transferre it by some other Act.° But if the words be of the time Present, or Past, as, I have given, or do give to be delivered to morrow, then is my to morrows Right given away [40]to day;[40] and that by the vertue of the words, though there were no other argument of my will. And there is a great difference in the signification of these words, Volo hoc tuum esse cras, and Cras dabo; that is, between I will that this be thine to morrow, and, I will give it thee to morrow: For the word I will, in the former manner of speech, signifies an act of the will Present[41]; but in the later, it signifies °a promise of° an act of the will to Come: [42]and therefore the former words, being of the Present, transferre a future right; the later, that be of the Future, transferre nothing. But if there be other signes of the Will to transferre a Right, besides Words; then, though the gift be Free, yet may the Right be understood to passe by words of the future: as if a man propound a Prize to him that comes first to the end of a race, The gift is Free; and though the words be of the Future, yet the Right passeth: for if he would not have his words so be understood, he should not have let them runne.[42]

Signes of Contract are words both of the Past, Present, and Future.

In Contracts, [43]the right passeth, not onely where the words are of the time Present, or Past; but also where they are of the Future: because all Contract is mutuall translation, or change of Right; and therefore[43] he that promiseth °onely,° because he hath already received the benefit for which he promiseth, is to be understood as if he intended the Right should passe: [44]for unlesse he had been content to have his words so understood, the other[44] would not have performed his part first. And for that cause, in buying, and selling, and other acts of Contract, a Promise is equivalent to a Covenant; °and therefore obligatory.°

19 be] {be del. by TH} MS

[39] the words 'tomorrow I will give' [40] correctly; [41] ^ and certain [42] that is to say, uncertain; that is to say, no will at all; because no one is master of his next day's will. In the former case, therefore, the right must be understood as concerning the present.

In a race, the organizer of the games promises a prize to the first person who reaches the winning post, using words about the future; nevertheless the prize is owed to that person, even though it is a free gift, because if the organizer had not wished it to be so, he should not have invited those people to take part in the race.

[43] too, the right passes by means of words about the future, namely, when the transfer of rights is mutual. For [44] otherwise, the person to whom the promise has been made Verba sola, si de Futuro sunt, Donationis Signum idoneum non sunt. Nam Verba haec Cras dabo, significant nondum Dedisse, & proinde Ius nondum Translatum esse, sed Manere. Sin de Praesenti, vel Praeterito sint, ut Do, vel Dedi habendum Cras, tunc Ius Crastinum recte Transfertur, idque Vi Verborum, etsi Voluntatis Signum aliud nullum sit. Magna enim differentia est inter Volo hoc tuum esse Cras, & Cras tibi hoc Dabo. Nam illic Volo, Praesentem & certam [69] Voluntatem; hic Futuram, id est incertam, id est, nullam indicat; quia Voluntatis suae Crastinae dominus nemo est. Illic ergo Ius de Praesente debet intelligi.

Athlotheta in certamine Cursûs pervenienti ad metam primo, praemium promittit Verbis de Futuro; debitum tamen illi praemium est, quamquam gratis datum, quia nisi id voluisset Athlotheta, illos ad certamen non invitasset.

In Contractibus etiam Ius transit per Verba de Futuro, nempe ubi Translatio Iuris mutua est. Nam qui promisit, ideo Transferre Ius suum velle intelligitur, quia Bonum propter quod promisit jam accepit. Alioqui is cui promisit praestiturus non esset. In Emptione ergo & Venditione, aliisque Contractibus, Promissio tantum valet, quantum Pactum.

1 non sunt this edn.] non est 68, 70 16 cui this edn.] qui 68, 70

Merit what.

He that performeth first in the case of a Contract, [45]is said to MERIT that which he is to receive by the performance of the other; and he hath it as Due. Also when a Prize is propounded to many, which is to be given to him onely that winneth; or mony is thrown amongst many, to be enjoyed by them that catch it; though this be a Free gift; yet so to Win, or so to Catch, is to Merit, and to have it as DUE.[45] For the Right is transferred in the Propounding of the Prize, °and in throwing down the mony; though it be not determined to whom, but by the Event[g] of the contention. But there is between these two sorts of Merit, this difference, that In Contract, I Merit by vertue of my own power, and the Contractors need; but in this case of Free gift, I am enabled to Merit onely by the benignity of the Giver: In Contract, I merit at the Contractors hand that hee [68] should depart with[h] his right; In this case of Gift, I Merit not that the giver should part with his right; but that when he has parted with it, it should be mine, rather than anothers. And this I think to be the meaning of that distinction of the Schooles, between Meritum congrui, and Meritum condigni.[i] For God Almighty, having promised Paradise to those men (hoodwinkt with carnall desires,) that can walk through this world according to the Precepts, and Limits prescribed by him; they say, he that shall so walk, shall Merit Paradise Ex congruo. But because no man can demand a right to it, by his own Righteousnesse, or any other power in himselfe, but by the Free Grace of God onely; they say, no man can Merit Paradise ex condigno. This I say, I think is the meaning of that distinction; but because Disputers do not agree upon the signification of their own termes of Art, longer than it serves their turn; I will not affirme any thing of their meaning: onely this I say; when a gift is given indefinitely, as a prize to be contended for, he that winneth Meriteth, and may claime the Prize as Due.°

[45] makes the other's performance of it due. So in a race, or when coins are thrown down to be kept by whoever first takes them, that prize belongs to the winner, or first taker.

---

[g] = outcome (OED, 'event', n., 3.a).

[h] = part with, surrender (OED, 'depart', v., 12.b, citing an example from 1642: 'Shee hath departed with her right by the feoffment').

[i] = (literally) 'the merit of him who is suitable' and 'the merit of him who is utterly deserving'. See Aquinas, ST Ia IIae, qu. 114, art. 6, resp.; Bonaventure, Commentaria in quatuor libros sententiarum, I, dist. XLI, art. 1, qu. 1, resp. (in his Opera omnia, i, p. 729).

Qui in Contractû prior praestat, praestationem alterius facit debitam. Sic in certamine, vel quando projiciuntur Nummi praeripienti habendi, praemium illud victori, vel praeripienti Iure proprium est. Nam in ipsâ certaminis indictione Ius Transfertur.

Covenants of Mutuall trust, when Invalid.

If a Covenant be made, wherein neither of the parties [46] performe presently,[j] but [47] trust one another; in the condition of meer Nature, (which is a condition of Warre of every man against every man,) upon any reasonable suspition, it is Voyd: But if there be a common Power set over them both, with right and force sufficient to compell performance; it is not Voyd. For he that performeth first, has no assurance the other will performe after; because the bonds of words are too weak to bridle mens ambition, avarice, anger, and other Passions, without the feare of some coërcive Power; which in the condition of meer Nature, where all men are equall, and judges of the justnesse of their own fears, cannot possibly be supposed.[47] And therfore [48] he which performeth first, does but betray himselfe to his enemy; contrary to the [49] Right (he can never abandon) of defending his life, and means of living.[49]

°But in a civill estate, where there is a Power set up to constrain those that would otherwise violate their faith, that feare is no more reasonable; and for that cause, he which by the Covenant is to perform first, is obliged so to do.°

The cause of [50] feare, which maketh [50] such a Covenant invalid, must be °alwayes° something arising after the Covenant made; [51] as some new fact, or other [51] signe of the Will not to performe: else it cannot make the Covenant voyd. For that which could not hinder a man from promising, ought not to be °admitted as° a hindrance of performing.

Right to the End, Containeth Right to the Means.

He that transferreth any Right, transferreth [52] the Means of enjoying it,[52] as farre as lyeth in his power. As he that selleth Land, [53] is understood to transferre [53] the Herbage,[k] and whatsoever growes [54] upon it; Nor can he that sells a Mill turn away the Stream that drives it. And they that give to a man the Right of government in Soveraignty, are understood to give him the right of levying mony to maintain Souldiers; and of appointing Magistrates [55] for the administration of Justice.[55]

No Covenant with Beasts.

To make Covenants with bruit Beasts, is impossible; because [56] not understanding our speech, they understand not, nor accept of any [69] translation of Right; nor can translate any Right to another: and without mutuall acceptation, there is no Covenant.[56]

Nor with God without speciall Revelation.

To make Covenant with God, is impossible, but by Mediation of such as God speaketh to, [57] either by Revelation supernaturall, or by his Lieutenants that govern under him, and in his Name:[57] For otherwise we know not whether [58] our Covenants be accepted,[58] or not. And therefore they that Vow [59] any thing contrary to any law of Nature, Vow in vain; as being a thing unjust °to pay such Vow.° And if it be a thing commanded by the Law of Nature, [60] it is not the Vow, but the Law that binds them.

Verùm, si Contractus fiat, quo neuter Contrahentium statim praestare obligatur, sed ad diem certum Futurum, Pactum illud in merâ conditione Naturae, id est in Bello, si quaecunque interveniat suspicio de praestando, invalidum est. In Civitate non item. Nam qui prior praestat, in casu priore incertus est, an praestiturus sit alter; in Civitate certus est, quia est qui cogat. Itaque nisi Potentia communis aliqua sit coërciva, is qui prior praestat seipsum hosti prodit, praeter Ius Naturale se & sua defendendi.

Suspicionis autem, quae Pactum invalidum reddere possit causa debet esse aliquid quod Pactum sequitur, signumque sit Voluntatis non praestandi; alioqui Pactum irritum facere non potest. Quod enim impedire non potuit quin promiseris, impedire non debet quin promissum praestes.

Qui Ius aliquod transfert, etiam usum rei, quantum in se est, unà transfert. Ut qui agrum vendit, herbam & quodcunque agro innascitur vel inaedificatur simul vendit; Et qui Molendinum vendit, aquam, quâ agebatur, avertere non debet. Et qui Regendi summam Potestatem alicui transferunt, intelliguntur iidem[l] Ius dedisse exigendi Pecunias ad Milites alendos, & creandi Magistratus & Ministros publicos.

Pacisci cum Brutis, quia Sermone carent, quo Voluntates significare possunt, impossibile est.

Pacisci cum Deo, nisi mediante aliquo, quem Deus alloquatur, [70] vel qui locum Dei teneat, impossibile est; aliter enim, an Deus etiam pactus sit, necne ignoramus. Itaque qui vovet Deo aliquid, quod contra Legem Naturalem sit, frustra vovet, quia illicitum est; Sin Lege Naturali mandatum sit frustra est, quia Vovens, non Voto suo, sed Naturae Lege obligatur.

2 obligatur this edn.] obligantur 68, 70 3 de] de non 70 19 possunt] possint 70
20 vel qui this edn.] vel 68, 70 21–2 necne this edn.] nec ne 68, 70

---

46 ^ is obliged to

47 rather to do so on a certain day in the future, that covenant, in the condition of mere nature (that is, in war), if any suspicion arise about its performance, is void. In a commonwealth it is not so. For in the former case the person who performs first is uncertain whether the other will perform; in a commonwealth he is certain, because there exists someone who may compel performance.

48 ^ , unless there is some common coercive power,

49 natural right of defending himself and his own. 50 suspicion, which can make 51 and a

52 with it the use of the thing, 53 sells at the same time 54 ^ or is built 55 and public ministers. 56 they lack speech, by which to express their wishes.

57 or such as represent God: 58 God too is bound, 59 ^ to God

60 ^ the vow is in vain, because

---

j = immediately (OED, 'presently', adv., 1.a).

k 'Herbage' was a legal term for the pasture of a piece of land, conceived as a species of property distinct from the land itself (OED, 'herbage', 3).

l 'iidem' ('those same people') makes sense here, but the English suggests that this may be an error for 'eidem' ('to him').

No Covenant, but of Possible and Future.

The matter, or subject of a Covenant, is always something that falleth under deliberation; (For [61]to Covenant,[61] is an act of the Will; °that is to say an act, and the last act, of deliberation;°) and is therefore always understood to be something to come; and which is judged Possible for him that Covenanteth, to performe.

And therefore, to promise that which is known to be Impossible, is no Covenant. But if that prove impossible afterwards, which before was thought possible, the Covenant is valid, and bindeth, (though not to the thing it selfe,) yet to the value; or, if that also be impossible, to the unfeigned endeavour of performing as much as is possible: °for to more no man can be obliged.°

Covenants how made voyd.

Men are freed of their Covenants two wayes; by Performing; or by being Forgiven. For Performance, is the natural end of [62]obligation;[62] and Forgivenesse, the restitution of liberty; as being a retransferring of that Right, in which the obligation consisted.

Covenants extorted by feare are valide.

Covenants [63]entred into[63] by fear, in the condition of meer Nature, are obligatory. For example, if I Covenant to pay a ransome, °or service° for my life, to an enemy; I am bound by it. For it is a Contract, wherein one [64]receiveth the benefit of life; the other is to receive mony, or service for it;[64] and consequently, where no other Law (as in the condition, of meer Nature) forbiddeth the performance, the Covenant is valid. Therefore Prisoners of warre, if [65]trusted with the payment of[65] their Ransome, are obliged to pay it: And if a weaker Prince, make a disadvantageous peace with a stronger, for feare; he is bound to keep it; unlesse (as hath been sayd before) there ariseth some new, and just cause [66]of feare, to renew the war.[66] And even in Commonwealths, if I be forced to redeem my selfe from a Theefe by promising him mony, I am bound to pay it, [67]till the Civill Law discharge me.[67] For whatsoever I may lawfully do without Obligation, the same I may lawfully Covenant to do through feare: and what I lawfully Covenant, I cannot lawfully break.

The former Covenant to one, makes voyd the later to another.

A former Covenant, makes voyd a later. For a man that hath passed away his Right [68]to one man to day, hath it not to passe to morrow to another: and therefore the later promise passeth no Right, but is null.[68]

[61] deliberation [62] every covenant; [63] extorted
[64] transfers the right which he has over life, the other that which he has over money;
[65] they have accepted freedom on condition that they pay [66] to excuse him.
[67] unless the civil law forbids it. [68] today will not have it tomorrow.

Materia, sive objectum Pactorum semper aliquid est, de quo deliberari potest, propterea quod Deliberatio, quae est actus Voluntatis, intelligitur semper de futuro, & de eo, quod à Paciscente fieri possibile existimatur.

Itaque Promittere ea, quae Impossibilia esse scimus, Pacisci non est. At si contingat, post Impossibile esse, quod credebatur Possibile, Pactum validum est, obligatque ad praestandum (non rem Promissam) sed tantundem; sin hoc quoque sit Impossibile; ad conatum praestandi quantum potest.

Pactis liberamur duobus modis, si praestiterimus, vel si condonatum sit. Est enim Praestatio omnis Pacti terminus naturalis; Condonatio autem est Libertatis restitutio, sive remissio Iuris obligationem constituentis.

Pactum etiamsi Metu extortum sit, in conditione tamen hominum naturali validum est; ut si paciscar cum hoste, servandae vitae causâ, pecuniam dare, praestare teneor. Contractus enim est, in quo alter Ius in Vitam, alter in Pecuniam transfert. Itaque ubi nulla Lex alia sit (ut in conditione naturali) quae Praestationem prohibeat, Pactum validum est. Sic bello captus, si libertatem eâ conditione acceperit, ut pretium redemptionis post solvat, solvere obligatur. Etiam Princeps cum Principe fortiore, si Pacem incommodam Metu fecerit, observare debet, nisi (ut supradictum est) causa aliqua nova & justa oriatur, quae excuset. Item in Civitate, si à Latrone vitam redimere promissâ pecuniâ coactus fuero, praestanda pecunia est, nisi Lex Civilis prohibeat. Quicquid enim facere licitum est non obligato, idem licitè pacisci possum propter Metum. Quod autem licitum est pacisci, illicitum est non praestare.

Pactum prius posterius invalidum reddit. Iure enim quod quis transtulit hodie, cras carebit.

A mans Covenant not to defend himselfe, is voyd.

A Covenant not to defend my selfe from force, [69]by force, is alwayes[69] voyd. For (as I have shewed before) no man can °transferre, or° lay down his Right to [70]save himselfe from Death,[70] Wounds, and Imprisonment, (the avoyding whereof [71]is the onely End of laying [70] down any Right;) and therefore the promise of not resisting force, in no Covenant transferreth any right; nor is obliging.[71] For though a man may [72] Covenant thus, Unlesse I do so, or so, kill me; he cannot Covenant thus, Unlesse I do so, or so, I will not resist you, when you come to kill me. For man by nature chooseth the lesser evill, which is danger °of death° in resisting; rather than the greater, which is certain [73]and present death in not resisting.[73] And this is granted to be true by all men, in that they lead Criminals to Execution, and Prison, with armed men, °notwithstanding that such Criminals have consented to the Law, by which they are condemned.°

No man obliged to accuse himself.

A Covenant to accuse ones selfe, without assurance of pardon, is likewise invalide. For in the condition of Nature, where [74]every man is Judge,[74] there is no place for Accusation: and in the Civill State, the Accusation is followed with Punishment; which being Force, a man is not obliged not to resist. The same is also true, of the Accusation of those, by whose Condemnation a man falls into misery; as of a Father, Wife, or [75]Benefactor.[75] For the Testimony of such an Accuser, if it be not willingly given, [76]is[76] praesumed to be corrupted by Nature; and therefore not to be received: °and where a mans Testimony is not to be credited, he is not bound to give it.° Also Accusations upon Torture, are not to be reputed as Testimonies. For Torture is to be used but as means of °conjecture, and light, in the further° examination, and search of truth: and what is in that case confessed, tendeth to the ease of him that is Tortured; not to the informing of the Torturers: °and therefore ought not to have the credit of a sufficient Testimony:° for whether he deliver himselfe by true, or false [77]Accusation, he does it by the Right[77] of preserving his own life.

[69] is [70] defend himself against a threat of death, or [71] was the reason why the natural right to all things was laid down). [72] ^ rightly [73] death.
[74] there are no law-courts, [75] other kith and kin. [76] should be [77] confession, he does it by right – the right, I say,

Si quis se seipsum non defensurum esse contra vim paciscatur, Pactum invalidum est. Nam (ut ante ostensum est) Ius se defendendi contra Mortem intentatam, vulnera, incarcerationem (quorum fugiendorum causâ Ius in omnia naturale depositum est) deponere nemo potest. Nam etsi aliquis recte pacisci possit sic, Nisi hoc vel illud fecero occide, pacisci tamen non potest sic, Nisi hoc vel illud fecero, occisuro [71] non resistam. Eligit enim homo naturaliter minus malum, id est periculum à resistentiâ, potiùs quàm malum majus, nempe Mortem certam. Atque haec norunt omnes qui condemnatos sive ad carcerem, sive ad Mortem armati ducunt.

Si quis paciscatur seipsum accusare, nisi certus veniae fiat, Pactum invalidum est. Nam in conditione Naturae ubi non sunt Iudicia, nullus est accusationibus locus. In statu autem Civili, accusationem sequitur supplicium; cui, cum sit vis, nemo obligatur non resistere. Idem verum est de accusatione eorum quorum condemnatione conjicimur in Miseriam, quales sunt Pater, Vxor, aliique Necessarii; testimonium enim eorum, utpote invitè dictum à Naturâ ipsâ corrumpi praesumendum est, neque ergo recipiendum. Neque accusationes expressae per tormenta pro testimoniis habendae sunt: Tormenta enim explorationi tantùm inserviunt, & quicquid tortus confitetur, ad relaxationem cruciatuum spectat, non ad torquentium instructionem. Sive enim verâ sive falsâ confessione se expediat, Iure id facit, Iure inquam vitam propriam conservandi.

1 se] om. 70 4 naturale 68-Errata] naturali 68 15 invitè 70] invitùs 68

The End of an Oath.

The force of Words, being (as I have formerly noted) too weak to hold men to the performance of their Covenants; there are °in mans nature,° but two °imaginable° helps to strengthen it. And those are either a Feare of the [78] consequence of breaking their word; or [79]a Glory, or Pride in appearing not to need to breake it.[79] This later is a Generosity[m] too rarely found to be presumed on, °especially in the pursuers of Wealth, Command, or sensuall Pleasure; which are the greatest part of Mankind.° The Passion to be reckoned upon, is Fear; whereof there be two very generall Objects: one, [80]The Power of Spirits[80] Invisible; the other, The Power of [81]those men they shall therein Offend.[81] Of these two, though the former be the greater Power, yet the feare of the later is commonly the greater Feare. The Feare of the former is [82]in every man, his[82] own Religion: which hath place in the nature of man before Civill Society. The later [83]hath not so; at least not place enough, to keep men to their promises;[83] because in the condition of meer Nature, the inequality of Power is not discerned, but by the event[n] of Battell. So that before the time of Civill Society, or in the interruption thereof by Warre, there is nothing can strengthen [84]a Covenant of Peace agreed on, against the temptations of Avarice, Ambition, Lust, or other strong desire, but the feare of that Invisible Power, which they every one Worship as God; and Feare as a Revenger of their perfidy. All therefore that can be done [71] between two men not subject to Civill Power, is to put one another to swear by the God he feareth:[84] Which Swearing, or OATH, is a Forme of Speech, added to a Promise; by which he that promiseth, signifieth, that unlesse he performe, he [85]renounceth the mercy of his God, or calleth to him for[85] vengeance on himselfe. Such was the Heathen Forme, Let Jupiter kill me else, as I kill this Beast.[p] So is our Forme, I shall do thus, and thus, so help me God. And this, with the Rites and Ceremonies, which every one useth in his own Religion, that the feare of breaking [86]faith might be[86] the greater.

The forme of an Oath.

1–2 The End of an Oath.] {The vse of Oathes added by TH} MS
8–9 one, . . . the other,] 1. . . . 2. MS

[78] ^ harmful
[79] disdain for breaking it (on the grounds that doing so would indicate a lack of power).
[80] powers [81] men. [82] from each man's
[83] was born with commonwealths; but [70: outside the commonwealth] does not suffice to compel men to fulfil their covenants;
[84] covenants against the desires of men better than the fear of that invisible agent which is called 'god' by all men, and worshipped with different ceremonies. Therefore to strengthen covenants, covenanters have thought it necessary to swear, by the god they feared, that they would fulfil their covenants.
[85] invokes God's [86] the oath might be so much

Verba per se (ut ante dixi) homines ad Pactorum praestationem constringendi vim non habent. Duo autem ei rei auxilia tantum sunt, nimirum Metus Damni à violatione Pacti, vel quia fallere (ut signum Impotentiae) dedignentur. Posterior haec causa Generositas adeo rara est, ut in rationes venire non debeat. Solus Metus considerandus est, isque duorum generum, quorum alter est Metus Potentiarum invisibilium, alter Metus Potentiae humanae; & prior quidem Metus est majoris Potentiae; posterior autem major Metus. Metus prior à suâ cujusque Religione est, ineratque hominibus ante omnem Societatem Civilem. Posterior Metus cum Civitatibus natus est; sed ad cogendos homines ad Pactorum praestationem non sufficit. In conditione enim Naturae differentia Potentiarum non discernitur, nisi per eventum Belli. Itaque ante Societatem Civilem, & quoties Societas Civilis per Bellum interrumpitur, nihil est, quo Pacta confirmari contra Cupiditates hominum meliùs possunt, quam Metus Agentis invisibilis, quem vocant omnes Deum, diversis Ritibus adorantes. Ad firmanda ergo Pacta Paciscentibus necessarium visum est, ut per Deum quem metuebant Pacta sua se praestituros esse jurarent. Iuramentum autem est Promissioni adjuncta formula Orationis, quâ qui promittit, nisi promissum praestiterit, Deum Vltorem invocat. Formula apud Romanos hujusmodi erat, Mactet me Iupiter, sicut ego macto hanc bestiam;[p] & apud nos, Hoc faciam ita me juvet Deus. Atque haec [72] faciebat cum Ceremoniis Ritibusque unusquisque Religionis propriae, ut tantò magis à Iuramenti violatione deterreretur.

2 nimirum] nimirum vel 70 9 sed] sed (*extra Civitatem) 70 14 possunt, quam Metus] possint, quàm Metu 70

[m] = nobility of conduct (OED, 'generosity', 2).
[n] See above, note g. [p] Livy, Ab urbe condita, I.25.

No Oath, but by God.

By this it appears, that an Oath taken according to any other Forme, °or Rite,° then his, that sweareth, is in vain; °and no Oath:° And that there is no Swearing by any thing which the Swearer thinks not God. For though [87]men[87] have sometimes used to swear by their Kings, °for feare, or flattery;° yet they would have it thereby understood, they attributed to them Divine honour. And that Swearing unnecessarily [88]by God, is but prophaning of his name: and Swearing by other things, as men do in common discourse, is not Swearing, but an impious Custome, gotten by too much vehemence of talking.[88]

An Oath addes nothing to the Obligation.

It appears also, that the Oath addes nothing to the Obligation. For a Covenant, if lawfull, binds [89]in the sight of God, without the Oath, as much as with it:[89] if unlawfull, bindeth not at all; though it be confirmed with an Oath.

[87] some of the heathen

[88] , but voluntarily, and frequently, is not swearing properly so called, but an abuse of God's name, arising from the vicious custom of those who always assert things with too much vehemence.

[89] by the force of natural law, without the swearing of an oath:

Constat hinc, Iuramentum aliâ formâ juratum, quàm quae est secundum Religionem Iurantis, infirmum esse. Constat item Iuramentum non esse, nisi per Deum Iurantis. Quamquam enim Ethnicorum aliqui per Reges suos Iurare soliti sunt, simul tamen intelligi Divinum illis honorem à se tribui voluerunt. Iuramenta autem illa non requisita, sed voluntaria, frequenter jurata, Iuramenta propriè dicta non sunt, sed Nominis Divini abusio, nata ex pravâ consuetudine omnia nimium vehementer asserentium.

Constat denique, quòd Obligationi, à Iuramento nihil additur. Pactum enim, si licitum sit, obligat per vim Legis Naturalis sine Iurejurando; sin illicitum sit, ne addito quidem Iurejurando obligare potest.

CHAP. XV.

Of other Lawes of Nature.

The third Law of Nature, Justice.

From that law of Nature, by which we are obliged to [1]transferre to another,[1] such Rights, as °being retained,° hinder the peace of Mankind, there followeth a Third; which is this, That men performe their Covenants made: without which, [2]Covenants are in vain, and but Empty words; and the Right of all men to all things remaining, wee are still in the condition of Warre.[2]

Justice and Injustice what.

And in this law of Nature, consisteth the [3]Fountain and Originall[3] of JUSTICE. For where no Covenant hath preceded, there hath no Right been transferred, and every man has right to every thing; and consequently, [4]no action can be[4] Unjust. °But when a Covenant is made, then to break it is Unjust:° And the definition of INIUSTICE, is [5]no other than[5] the not Performance of Covenant. [6] And whatsoever is not Unjust, is Just.

Justice and Propriety begin with the Constitution of Commonwealth.

But because Covenants of mutuall trust, where there is a feare of not performance on either part, (as hath been said in the former Chapter,) are invalid; though the Originall of Justice be the making of Covenants; yet Injustice actually there can be none, [7] till the cause of such feare be taken away; which while [8]men are in the naturall condition of Warre, cannot be done.[8] Therefore before the names of Just, and Unjust can have place, there must be some [9]coërcive Power, to compell men equally to the performance of their Covenants, by the terrour of some punishment, greater than the benefit they expect [72] by the breach of their Covenant; and to make good that Propriety, which by mutuall Contract men acquire, in recompence of the universall Right they abandon: and such power there is none before the erection of a Common-wealth.[9] And this is also to be gathered out of the ordinary definition of Justice in the Schooles: For they say, that Justice is the constant Will of giving to every man his own.[a] And therefore where there is no Own, that is, no Propriety, there is no Injustice; and where there is no °coërceive Power erected, that is, where there is no° Common-wealth, there is no Propriety; °all men having Right to all things: Therefore where there is no Common-wealth, there nothing is Unjust.° So that the [10]nature[10] of Justice, consisteth in keeping of °valid° Covenants: but the Validity of Covenants begins not but with the Constitution of a [11]Civill Power, sufficient to compell men to keep them: And then it is also that Propriety begins.[11]

3 another] one another MS

CAPVT XV.

De Legibus Naturae aliis.

A Lege Naturae, quae impedientia Pacem humanam Iura relinqui jubet, sequitur Lex Naturae tertia, Praestanda esse Pacta. Nam absque eo Ius in omnia frustra deponitur, manetque omnium contra omnes Bellum.

Atque in hac Lege consistit natura Iustitiae. Vbi enim non praecessit Pactum, ibi Ius nullum est translatum, sed omnia omnium sunt. Nihil ergo est Injustum. Manifesta hinc est Injustitiae Definitio, Injustitia est Pactorum non Praestatio, sive (quod idem est) Fidei datae Violatio. Iustum autem est, quod Injustum non est.

Quoniam autem Pacta Fidei mutuae (ut ante ostensum est) propter Metum unius, ne alter fallat, invalida sunt, etsi origo Iustitiae sit Pactum, Pactum tamen non praestare, ubi causa Metus sublata non est, non est Injustitia. Sublata autem non est, manente Iure omnium in omnia. Vocabula ergo Iustum & Injustum ante Potentiam Civilem, quae Violationem Pactorum ulcisci posset, & cuique Proprietatem suam Pactis acquisitam stabilire, usurpata non fuerunt. Idem intelligitur ex receptâ in Scholis Iustitiae Definitione, Iustitia est Voluntas constans suum cuique tribuendi.[a] Nam ubi Suum non est, id est, ubi Proprium non est, ibi Injustum nihil est; & ubi Civitas non est, nihil est Proprium. Iustitiae autem essentia consistit in Praestatione [73] Pactorum, quae tunc valida esse incipiunt, quando constituta est Civitas; Itaque Civitas, Proprietas Bonorum, & Iustitia simul nata sunt.

4 absque 70] atque 68 18 Voluntas 68-Errata] Voluntas, 68

[1] relinquish [2] the right to all things is given up in vain, and the war of all against all persists.
[3] nature [4] nothing is [5] evidently, therefore,
[6] ^, or, what is the same, the violation of faith. [7] ^ in not peforming a covenant,
[8] the right of all men to all things remains, is not taken away.
[9] civil power which can avenge the violation of covenants, and assure to each person that property of his which he has acquired by covenants. [10] essence
[11] commonwealth; thus the commonwealth, property in goods, and justice are born at the same time.

[a] Digest, 1.1.10 pr. ('constans et perpetua voluntas ius suum cuique tribuendi': Hobbes gives this phrasing, omitting 'perpetua' and 'ius', in the Latin); Cicero, De finibus, V.65; Aquinas, ST IIa IIae, qu. 58, art. 1.

Justice not Contrary to Reason.

The Foole hath sayd in his heart, there is no such thing as Justice;[b] and °sometimes also with his tongue; seriously alleaging,° that every mans conservation, °and contentment,° being committed to his own care, there could be no reason, why every man might not do what he thought conduced thereunto: [12]and therefore also[12] to make, or not make; keep, or not keep Covenants, [13]was not against Reason, when it conduced to ones benefit.[13] He does not therein deny, that [14]there be[14] Covenants; and that °they are sometimes broken, sometimes kept; and that such° breach of them may be called Injustice, and the observance of them Justice: but he [15]questioneth, whether[15] Injustice, taking away the feare of God, [16](for the same Foole hath said in his heart there is no God,) may not sometimes stand with that Reason, which dictateth to every man his own good; and particularly then, when it conduceth to such a benefit, as shall put a man in a condition, to neglect not onely the dispraise, and revilings, but also the power of other men.[16] The Kingdome of God [17] is gotten by violence:[c] but what if it could be gotten by unjust violence? were it against Reason so to get it, when it is impossible to receive hurt by it[18]? and if it be not against Reason, [19]it is not against Justice: or else Justice is not to be approved for good.[19] From such reasoning as this, Successfull wickednesse hath obtained [20] the name of Vertue: and [21]some that in all other things have disallowed the violation of Faith; yet have allowed it,[21] when it is for the getting of a Kingdome.[d] And the Heathen that believed, that Saturn was [22]deposed by his son[22] Jupiter, believed neverthelesse the same Jupiter to be the avenger of Injustice: [23]Somewhat like to a piece of Law in Cokes Commentaries on Litleton; where he sayes, If the right Heire of the Crown be attainted of Treason; yet the Crown shall descend to him, and eo instante the Atteynder be voyd:[e] From which instances a man will be very prone to inferre; that when the Heire apparent of a Kingdome, shall kill him that is in possession, though his father; you may call it Injustice, or by what other name you will; yet it can never be[23] against Reason, seeing all the voluntary actions of men tend [24] to the benefit of themselves; and those actions are most Reasonable, that conduce most to their [73] ends. This specious reasoning is neverthelesse false.

13 put] {sot*? corr. to* set by TH} MS

Dixit Insipiens, Non est Iustitia.[b] Conservationis suae singuli & soli curam gerunt. Rationis ergò est, ut faciant singuli, quicquid eò conducere sibimet ipsis videbitur, id est, Pacta facere vel non facere, custodire vel non custodire arbitrio suo. Pacta facere licitum esse non negat, nec observationem eorum Iustitiam vocari, Violationem Injustitiam. Sed Injustitiam (sublato timore Dei) consistere aliquando posse dicit cum rectâ Ratione. Regnum (inquit) Dei acquiritur Violentia;[c] quid si ab homine acquiri possit per Violentiam injustam, anne contra rectam Rationem esset, cum impossibile esset, ut inde ullum sibi malum, sed summum bonum sequeretur? Si contra Rationem non est, quomodò contra Iustitiam est? At hujusmodi ratiocinatione ortum est, ut ab aliquibus Scelera prospera Virtutes existimatae sint; utque Fides, regnandi saltem causâ violanda esset.[d] Crediderunt Ethnici, Saturnum coelo expulsum à Iove esse, qui Iovem tamen Injustitiae ultorem existimaverunt. Etiam, Iurisprudentium nostrorum aliqui haeredem Regni, etsi Proditor sit, statim ac moritur Rex, in Regnum succedere debere.[e] Hujusmodi facinora quocunque nomine appellata contra Rationem (inquit) non sunt; quia omnes omnium Actiones voluntariae tendunt naturaliter ad bonum sibimet ipsis, & maximè rationales sunt, quae eò maximè tendunt. Verumtamen ratiocinatio haec, utcunque speciosa, falsa est.

8 esset] esset, non acquirere per violentiam talem 70 10 At] Ab 70

[12] that is, [13] at will. [14] it is lawful to make [15] says that [16] may sometimes be consistent with right reason. [17] ^ (he says) [18] ^ , and when the greatest good would come of it [19] how can it be against justice? [20] ^ , from some people, [21] it has been thought that faith should be violated, at least [22] driven from heaven by [23] . Some of our jurists also say that the heir to the kingdom must succeed to it immediately when the king dies, even if he is a traitor.[e] Misdeeds of this sort, by whatever name they are called, are not (he [sc. the fool] says) [24] ^ naturally

---

[b] Cf. Ps. 14: 1 ('The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God').

[c] Matt. 11: 12 ('And from the days of John the Baptist until now the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force').

[d] Hobbes alludes to the saying 'if right is to be violated, it should be violated for the sake of ruling; in other matters, cultivate piety' ('si violandum est ius, regnandi gratia violandum est; aliis rebus pietatem colas'), adapted by Cicero (De officiis, III.82) from Euripides, Phoenician Maidens, ll. 524–5 ('if wrong-doing is ever necessary, the finest wrong-doing is for the sake of kingly rule; in other things one must act piously': lines spoken by Eteocles, who broke his promise to his brother in order to retain rule over Thebes). Following Cicero, Renaissance writers took this as a classic expression of outrageous ambition: see, e.g., de la Primaudaye, French Academie, p. 230 (misprinted '239'); Charron, Sagesse, I.22 (p. 167).

[e] Coke, First Part of the Institutes, I.i.8, fo. 16r ('If the right heire of the Crowne be attainted of Treason, yet shall the Crowne discend to him, and eo instante (without any other reuersall) the attainder is vtterly auoided, as it fell out in the case of Henrie the seuenth'). 'Eo instante' = 'in that instant'.

For the question is not of promises mutuall, [25]where there is no security of performance on either side; as when there is no Civill Power erected over the parties promising;[25] for such promises are no Covenants: But [26]either where one of the parties has performed already; or where there is a Power to make him performe; there is the question whether it be against reason, that is, against the benefit of the other to performe, or not. And I say it is not against reason. For the manifestation whereof, we are to consider; First, that when a man doth a thing, which notwithstanding any thing[26] can be foreseen, and reckoned on, tendeth to his own destruction, howsoever some accident which he could not expect, arriving, may turne it to his benefit; yet [27]such events[f] do not make it reasonably or wisely done. Secondly, that in a condition of Warre,[27] wherein every man to every man, °for want of a common Power to keep them all in awe,° is an Enemy, there is no man can [28]hope by his own strength, or wit, to defend himselfe from destruction,[28] without the help of Confederates; [29]where every one expects the same defence by the Confederation, that any one else does: and therefore he which declares he thinks it reason to deceive those that help him, can in reason expect no other means of safety, than what can be had from his own single Power. He therefore that breaketh his Covenant, and consequently declareth that he thinks he may with reason do so, cannot be received into any Society, that unite themselves for Peace and Defence, but by the errour of them that receive him; nor when he is received, be retayned in it, without seeing the danger of their errour; which errours a man cannot reasonably reckon upon as the means of his security: and therefore if he be left, or cast out of Society, he perisheth; and if he live in Society, it is by the errours of other men, which he could not foresee, nor reckon upon; and consequently against the reason of his preservation; and so, as all men that contribute not to his destruction, forbear him onely out of ignorance of what is good for themselves.[29]

As for the Instance of gaining the [30]secure and perpetuall felicity of Heaven, by any way;[30] it is frivolous: there being but one way [31]imaginable; and that is not breaking, but keeping of Covenant.[31]

And for the other Instance of attaining Soveraignty by Rebellion; [32]it is manifest, that though the event[g] follow, yet because it cannot reasonably be expected, but rather the contrary; and because by gaining it so, others are taught to gain the same in like manner, the attempt thereof is against reason. Justice therefore, that is to say,[32] Keeping of Covenant, is a Rule of Reason, °by which we are forbidden to do any thing destructive to our life;° and consequently a Law of Nature.

6 is not] is MS 15 where] who MS

Quaestio enim non est de Promissis mutuis in conditione hominum naturali, ubi nulla est Potentia cogens; Nam sic Promissa illa Pacta non essent; sed existente Potentiâ, quae cogat, & alter promissum praestiterit, ibi quaestio est, an is, qui fallit cum Ratione, & ad bonum proprium congruenter fallat. Ego verò contra Rationem, & imprudenter facere dico. Primò enim in Civitate, si quis id faciat, quod (quantùm Prospici, & Ratione intelligi potest) ad suam ipsius tendit destructionem, quanquam improvisum aliquod accidat, quod eventum felicem efficiat, factum nihilominus fuisse imprudenter, quia improvisum. In conditione autem naturali, ubi unusquisque uniuscujusque hostis est, sine ope Sociorum securè vivere nemo potest. Hominem autem, qui Pacta fallere Rationis esse putat, in Societatem (quae mutuis Pactis ad singulorum defensionem initur,) quis (nisi per inscitiam) admittet, aut admissum retinebit? Quare, aut ejectus peribit, aut quod ejectus non sit, alienae debebit inscitiae, quod est contra rectam Rationem. Etiam ipsa Regni Coelestis [74] per Injustitiam acquisiti Suppositio ridicula est; per solam enim Iustitiam acquiri potest.

Praeterea, Supposito quod Regnum acquisitum sit per Rebellionem, etiam sic contra rectam Rationem acquisitum erit; tum quia successus tales ab initio incerti sunt, tum quia exemplo suo docentur alii tantundem audere contra ipsos. Pactorum ergo observatio, Rationis praeceptum est, id est, Lex Naturalis.

[25] in the natural condition of man, where there is no power that compels;

[26] where there is a power that compels, and one party has fulfilled his promise, there the question is whether the party who fails to perform does so with reason and in accordance with his own good. And I say he acts against reason, and imprudently. For, first of all, in a commonwealth, if someone does something which, so far as [27] it was done imprudently, because the result was not foreseen. However, in the natural condition,

[28] live securely

[29] . But who (except someone acting from ignorance) will receive into society (which is founded on mutual covenants for the defence of each person) someone who thinks it reasonable to fail to perform covenants – or retain him, if he has been received? Therefore either he will perish, having been cast out; or, if he is not cast out, that fact will be due to the ignorance of others, which is against right reason.

[30] kingdom of Heaven by injustice; [31] , which is by justice.

[32] even if it is so attained, it will have been attained against right reason, both because the success of such enterprises is uncertain from the beginning, and because those who act in this way teach others, by their own example, to dare as much against them. Therefore

---

[f] = outcomes (OED, 'event', n., 3.a).

[g] See above, note f.

There be some that °proceed further; and° will not have the Law of Nature, to be those Rules which conduce to the preservation of mans life on earth; but to the attaining of [33]an eternall felicity after death; to which they think the breach of Covenant may[33] conduce; and consequently be just °and reasonable;° (such are they that [34]think it a work of [74] merit[34] to kill, or depose, or [35]rebell against, the Soveraigne Power constituted over them by their own consent.)[35] [h] But because there is no °naturall° knowledge of mans estate after death; °much lesse of the reward that is then to be given to breach of Faith;° but onely a beliefe grounded upon other mens saying, that they know it supernaturally, or that they know those, that knew them, that knew others, that knew it supernaturally; Breach of [36]Faith cannot be called a Precept of Reason, or Nature.[36]

Covenants not discharged by the Vice of the Person to whom they are made.

Others, [37]that allow for a Law of Nature, the keeping of Faith, do nevertheless make exception of certain persons; as Heretiques,[i] and such as use not to performe their Covenant to others: And this also is against reason.[37] For if any fault of a man, be sufficient to discharge our Covenant made; the same ought in reason to have been sufficient to have hindred the making of it.

Justice of Men, & Iustice of Actions what.

The names of Just and Injust, when they are attributed to Men, signifie one thing; and when they are attributed to Actions, another. When they are attributed to Men, they signifie [38]Conformity, or Inconformity of Manners, to Reason. But when they are attributed to Actions, they signifie the Conformity, or Inconformity to Reason, not of Manners, or manner of life, but of particular Actions. A Just man therefore, is he that taketh all the care he can, that his Actions may be all Just: and an Unjust man, is he that neglecteth it. And such men are more often in our Language stiled by the names of Righteous, and Unrighteous; then Just, and Unjust; though the meaning be the same. Therefore a Righteous man, does not lose that Title, by one, or a few unjust Actions, that proceed from sudden Passion, or mistake of Things, or Persons: nor does an Unrighteous man, lose his character, for such Actions, as he does, or forbeares to do, for feare: because his Will is not framed by the Justice, but by the apparent benefit of what he is to do. That which gives to humane Actions the relish of Justice,[38] is a certain Noblenesse or Gallant-

8 then to be given] to be giuen then MS 22 not of] not of his MS 23 particular Actions] one particular action MS

---

[33] the felicity of an eternal life; to which they say the breach of covenant may sometimes

[34] say it is a work of piety

[35] make war against their own kings, under the pretext of religion).

[36] covenants, according to their opinion, is a breach not of natural, but of supernatural, law. But we have no supernatural law other than Holy Scripture; and it frequently prescribes obedience to kings, and the keeping of covenants.

Sunt alii, qui Praecepta, quae ad conservandam vitam praesentem conducunt, Leges Naturae esse negant, sed illa quae ducant ad felicitatem Vitae aeternae; ad quam conducere aliquando dicunt Pactorum violationem, quae violatio propterea Iusta est. Atque hi sunt, qui Pietatis opus esse dicunt, Reges suos praetextu Religionis Bello persequi, deponere & interficere.[h] Sed quoniam statûs humani post mortem Scientia nulla est, sed tantummodo Fides, hominibus certis habita, dicentibus se id Scire supernaturaliter, vel accepisse ab aliis supernaturaliter scientibus, & sic alii ab aliis ascendendo, Violatio Pactorum juxta illorum sententiam non Legis Naturalis, sed supernaturalis violatio est. Legem autem supernaturalem habemus nullam praeter Scripturam Sacram. Ea autem Obedientiam Regibus praestare, & Pacta observare passim praecipit.

Alii rursus, Pacta observanda esse concedunt, praeterquàm cum Haereticis.[i] Sed hoc quoque iniquum est. Nam si vitium Personae satis causae sit Pacti violandi, satis etiam causae debebat esse non Paciscendi.

Iustum & Injustum vocabula, aliud Hominibus, aliud Actionibus attributa significant. Hominibus attributa Morem vel Habitum significant, ut Virtutem aut Vitium. Sic Homo cui constans est voluntas Ius suum unicuique tribuendi, etsi Actiones ejus aliquando Injustae fuerint, ipse tamen Iustus est, modo Iustitiam amet, vel quod Injuste fecerat, etiamsi clam sit, ipse damnet, factum nollet, damnum, si quod factum sit, resarciat quantum potest. Injustus contra est, qui Iustitiam negligit, etsi Metu, vel alia causâ sinistrâ nemini unquam Injuriam fecisset; Id quod Iustitiam veram & facere, & condire solet,

23 fecisset] fecerit 70 23 solet, 70] solet, & 68

[37] again, allow that covenants should be kept, except with heretics. But this also is iniquitous.

[38] their behaviour or disposition, insofar as it is a virtue or a vice. Thus a person who has a constant will of giving to every man his own, even if his actions may sometimes have been unjust, is nevertheless himself just, provided that he loves justice, condemns what he has done unjustly (even though the action is unknown to others), wishes he had not done it, and repairs any harm that came of it, so far as he can. An unjust person, on the other hand, is someone who cares nothing for justice, even if – out of fear, or for some other low reason – he has never done an injury to anyone. That which usually makes true justice, and gives it its relish,

[h] Hobbes may have had in mind the notorious defence by the Spanish Jesuit Juan de Mariana of the assassination of tyrants: De rege et regis institutione, pp. 51–63.

[i] The view that promises and treaties were not to be kept with heretics was attributed by Protestant controversialists to Catholics in general and Jesuits in particular (see, for example, Anon., Aphorismes . . . of the Jesuits, p. 8: 'that there cannot be any commerce or peace with heretiks, and therefore that faith giuen vnto them, though it be confirmed by an oath, is not to be kept at any hand'). This was not, however, the view of leading Jesuits such as Martinus Becanus (see his Disputatio de fide haereticis servanda).

nesse of courage, °(rarely found,)° by which a man scorns to be beholding for [39]the contentment of his life,[39] to fraud, or breach of promise. °This Justice of the Manners, is that which is meant, where Justice is called a Vertue; and Injustice a Vice.°

But [40]the Justice of Actions denominates[40] men, not Just, but Guiltlesse: and [41]the Injustice of the same, (which is also called Injury,) gives them but the name of[41] Guilty.

Injustice of Manners, and Injustice of Actions.

Again, the Injustice of [42]Manners,[42] is the disposition, or aptitude to do Injurie; and is Injustice [43]before it proceed to Act; and without supposing any individuall person injured.[43] But the Injustice of an Action, °(that is to say Injury,)° supposeth an individuall person Injured; namely him, to whom the Covenant was made: And therefore many times the injury is [44]received[44] by one man, when the dammage [45]redoundeth to[45] another. As when the Master commandeth his servant to give mony [46]to a stranger; if it be not done, the Injury is done to the Master, whom he had before Covenanted to obey; but the dammage redoundeth to the stranger, to whom he had no Obligation; and therefore could not Injure him.[46] And so also in [47]Common-wealths,[47] [75] private men may remit[j] to one another their debts; but not robberies [48]or other violences, whereby they are endammaged; because the detaining[k] of Debt, is an Injury to themselves; but Robbery and Violence, are Injuries to the Person of[48] the Common-wealth.

Nothing done to a man, by his own consent can be Injury.

Whatsoever is done to a man, conformable to his own Will °signified to the doer,° is no Injury to him.[l] For [49]if he that doeth it, hath not passed away his originall right to do what he please, by some Antecedent Covenant, there is no breach of Covenant; and therefore no Injury done him. And if he have; then his Will to have it done being signified, is a release of that Covenant: and so again there is no Injury done him.[49]

Justice Commutative, and Distributive.

Justice of Actions, is by Writers divided into Commutative, and Distributive: and the former they say consisteth in proportion Arithmeticall; the later in proportion Geometricall.[m] Commutative therefore, they place in the equality of value of the things [50]contracted for;[50] And Distributive, in the distribution of equall benefit, to men of equall merit. As if it were Injustice to sell dearer than we buy; °or to give more to a man than he merits.° The value of all things °contracted for,° is measured by the Appetite of the Contractors: and therefore the just value, is that [51]which they be contented to give.[51]

6 but] del. MS 8 Injustice this edn.; Iniustice MS] Iustice H; Justice B 9 Injustice this edn.] Iustice MS; Iustice H; Justice B 22 signified H-Errata] signied H 23 to a man, by his own] to man, by {his added by TH} own MS

est Animi generositas quaedam quicquam fraudi & perfidiae deberi dedignantis. Iustitiae autem Actiones denominant hominem (non Iustum sed) Insontem; ut contra Injustitiae Actiones, id est Injuriae, non Injustum, sed Sontem.

Praeterea, Injustitia Hominis est Animi ad Injuriam faciendam Habitus, Injustum faciens etiam ante quàm facta sit Injuria propter voluntatem faciendi. Sed Injustitia Actionis Personam aliquam affectam [75] Injuria supponit, nempe illum, quicum pactum est. Itaque contingit aliquando Injuriam alius, Damnum quod ab Injuriâ est, alius facit, ut quando Dominus debitam alicui solvere pecuniam servum jusserit, si Servus non fecerit, Injuria quae Creditori fit à Domino est, quae Domino fit, à Servo est; non enim Servus, sed Dominus cum Creditore pactus est. Similiter, in statu Civili, debita sibi remittere homines privati possunt; sed Latrocinia non item, quia sunt quasi debita publica, ita ut Injuriae factae sint Civitati.

Quod Volenti fit, Injuria non est.[l] Nam nisi Pactum sit, ut non faceret, Injuria esse non potest; si Pactum sit, tollitur Obligatio per Voluntatem Obligantis, id est, ejus quicum pactum est.

Iustitia Actionum dividitur à Scriptoribus in Commutativam & Distributivam; quarum priorem dicunt in proportione Arithmeticâ, posteriorem in Geometricâ consistere;[m] ita ut Commutativam in rerum commutandarum Aequalitate quoad pretium, Distributivam in Beneficiorum aequaliter merentibus aequali Distributione consistere dicant; quasi pluris vendere quàm emimus Injustum esset. Pretium omnium rerum Contrahentium appetitu aestimatur, pretiumque Iustum est in quod ambo Emptor & Venditor con-

8 quicum this edn.] qui cum 68, 70 8–9 Injuriam alius] Injuria alii 70 17 id est, ejus this edn.] id ejus 68; ejus 70

---

39 anything 40 actions of justice denominate
41 on the other hand actions of injustice, that is, injuries, denominate men not 'unjust', but 42 a man, 43 even before an injury is done, because of the will to do it. 44 done 45 is done by 46 that is owed to someone; if the servant does not do so, the injury to the creditor is done by the master, while the injury to the master is done by the servant; for it was not the servant but the master who covenanted with the creditor. 47 the civil state,
48 , because they are, as it were, public debts, so that they are injuries done to 49 if there is no covenant not to do it, there can be no injury; if there is a covenant, the obligation is removed by the will of the obliger, that is, the person with whom the covenant was made.
50 to be exchanged; 51 on which both the buyer and the seller agree.

---

j = forgive (OED, 'remit', v., 3). k = withholding (OED, 'detain', v., 2.a). l The Latin here adapts the legal maxim 'volenti non fit injuria' ('injury is not done to the willing'). This had become a Common Law maxim (see, e.g., Plowden, Commentaries, p. 501, reporting a case of 18 and 19 Elizabeth); it derived from the canon law tradition (see William of Drogheda, Summa aurea, p. 175) and, ultimately, from Digest, 47.10.1.5. m Aristotle, Nicomachaean Ethics, V.3–4 (1131a10–1132b20).

And Merit (besides that which is by Covenant, where [52] the performance on one part, meriteth the performance of the other part, °and falls under Justice Commutative, not Distributive,°) is not due by [53]Justice;[53] but is rewarded of Grace onely. And therefore this distinction, in the sense wherein it useth to be expounded, is not right. To speak properly, Commutative Justice, is the Justice of a Contractor; that is, a Performance of Covenant, in Buying, and Selling; Hiring, °and Letting to Hire;° Lending, and Borrowing; Exchanging, °Bartering,° and other acts of Contract.

And Distributive Justice, the Justice of an Arbitrator; [54]that is to say, the act of defining what is Just. Wherein, (being trusted by them that make him Arbitrator,) if he performe his Trust, he is said to distribute to every man his own: and this is indeed Just Distribution, and may be called (though improperly) Distributive Justice; but more properly Equity; which also is a Law of Nature, as shall be shewn in due place.[54] [n]

The fourth Law of Nature, Gratitude.

As Justice dependeth on Antecedent Covenant; so does GRATITUDE depend on Antecedent Grace; °that is to say, Antecedent Free-gift:° and is the fourth Law of Nature; which may be conceived in this Forme, That a man which receiveth Benefit from another of meer Grace, Endeavour that he which giveth it, have no reasonable cause to repent him of his [55]good will.[55] For no man giveth, but with intention of Good to himselfe; because Gift is Voluntary; and of all Voluntary Acts, the Object is to every man his own Good; of which if men see they shall be frustrated, there will be no beginning of benevolence, or trust; nor consequently of mutuall help; nor of reconciliation [56]of one man to another;[56] and therefore they are to remain still in the condition of War; which is contrary to the first °and Fundamentall° Law of Nature, which commandeth men to Seek Peace. °The breach of this Law, [76] is called Ingratitude; and hath the same relation to Grace, that Injustice hath to Obligation by Covenant.°

4–5 in the sense . . . expounded] in such sense as it vseth to be expounded in MS
15 fourth] {third corr. to fourth by TH} MS {Note: all subsequent numberings in the marginal notes of this chapter are similarly corrected, and will not be separately noted.} 15–17 marg. one para. higher in B
17 fourth] {third corr. to fourth by TH} MS {Note: all subsequent numberings in the text of this chapter are similarly corrected, and will not be separately noted.} 23 nor consequently] and consequently MS
23 nor of] {of corr. to or by TH} MS

[52] ^ it can be said that [53] right;
[54] who (because he is trusted), if he performs his trust, distributes to each party what is that party's own; and this is nothing other than equity. [55] benefit. [56] between enemies.

[n] See below, pp. 236–7.

sentiunt. Meritum autem (praeterquam quod in Contractibus qui prior praestat, ut alter quoque praestet pòst, Mereri dici possit) non ex Iure, sed ex Gratiâ est. Distinctio ergo illa, illo quo exponi solet sensu, bona non est. Iustitia Commutativa, propriè est Iustitia Contrahentium, id est, Conservatio pactorum de Venditione & Emptione, de mutuò Datione & Acceptione; de Conductione; de Commutationibus, aliisque Actibus Contrahentium.

Iustitia autem Distributiva est Iustitia Arbitri, qui (quia Fides ei adhibetur) si Fidem servat, utrique parti quod suum est Distribuit; & alia non est quam Aequitas.

Vt ab antecedente Pacto Iustitia, ita ab antecedente Gratia dependet Gratitudo, quae est Lex Naturalis quarta, & comprehendi potest hac Formulâ: Qui Beneficium gratis datum accipit, conari debet, ne danti justa causa sit Beneficii dati poenitendi. Nemo enim dat nisi respiciens ad Bonum sibi, propterea quòd omnis Actionis Voluntariae finis Bonum volenti est; quod Bonum si frustra expectandum esse homines scierint, nullum erit Benefaciendi initium, neque Confidentiae mutuae, neque mutui Auxilii, neque Reconciliationis inter inimicos. Manebunt ergo in conditione Belli. Quod est contra Legem Naturae primam, quae Pacem quaerendam esse dictat.

15 esse 70] esset, 68 15 scierint] scirent 70 15 erit] esset 70 17 inimicos] inimicos ratio 70 17 Manebunt] Manerent 70

The fifth, Mutuall accommodation, or Compleasance.

A fifth Law of Nature, is COMPLEASANCE; that is to say, That every man °strive to° accommodate himselfe to the rest. For the understanding whereof, we may consider, that there is in mens aptnesse to Society, a diversity of [57]Nature,[57] rising from their diversity of Affections; not unlike to that we see in stones brought together for building of an Aedifice. For as that stone which by the asperity, and irregularity of Figure, takes more room from others, than it selfe fills; and for the hardnesse, cannot be easily made plain, °and thereby hindereth the building,° is by the builders cast away as unprofitable, and troublesome: so also, a man that by asperity of [58]Nature,[58] will [59]strive to retain[59] those things which to himselfe are superfluous, and to others necessary; and for the stubbornness of his Passions, cannot be corrected, is to be °left, or° cast out of Society, °as combersome thereunto.° For seeing every man, not onely by [60]Right, but also by necessity[60] of Nature, is supposed to endeavour all he can, to obtain [61]that which is necessary for his conservation;[61] He that shall oppose himselfe against it, for things superfluous, is guilty of the warre that thereupon is to follow; and therefore doth that, which is contrary to the [62]fundamentall[62] Law of Nature, °which commandeth to seek Peace. The observers of this Law, may be called SOCIABLE, (the Latines call them Commodi;) The contrary, Stubborn, Insociable, Froward,[p] Intractable.°

The sixth, Facility to Pardon.

A sixth Law of Nature, is this, That upon caution[q] of the Future time, a man ought to pardon the offences past of them that repenting, desire it. For [63]PARDON, is nothing but granting of Peace;[63] which though granted to them that persevere in their hostility, be not Peace, but Feare; yet not granted to them that [64]give caution of the Future time,[64] is signe of an aversion to Peace; and therefore contrary to the Law of Nature.

The seventh, that in Revenges, men respect onely the future good.

A seventh is, That in Revenges, °(that is, retribution of Evil for Evil,)° Men look not at the greatnesse of the evill past, but the greatnesse of the good to follow. Whereby we are forbidden to inflict punishment with any other designe, than for correction of the offender, or [65]direction of others.[65] For this Law is consequent to the next before it, that commandeth Pardon[66], upon security of the Future time. Besides, Revenge without respect to °the Example, and° profit to come, is [67]a triumph, or glorying in the hurt of another, tending to no end; (for the End is alwayes somewhat to Come;) and glorying to no end, is vain-glory, and contrary to reason; and to hurt without reason, tendeth to the introduction of Warre; which is against the Law of Nature; and is commonly[67] stiled by the name of Cruelty.

32 glorying] glory MS 35 and is] and MS

Lex Naturae quinta est, ut Vnusquisque se commodum caeteris praestet. [76] Quod ut intelligatur, considerandum est, esse in hominum ad Societatem aptitudine Ingeniorum diversitatem, à diversitate Passionum ortam, non dissimilem ejus, quam videmus in congestis ad Domum aedificandam lapidibus. Sicut enim Lapis, qui propter asperitatem & figurae irregularitatem plus loci proximis adimit quàm ipse implet, neque propter duritiem complanari potest, ab aedificantibus ut inutilis & molestus abjicitur: Ita etiam homo, qui propter asperitatem Ingenii de rebus contendit, sibi quidem superfluis, vicino autem necessariis, nec (propter Affectuum contumaciam) corrigi potest, è Societate ejiciendus est. Cum enim unusquisque, Naturae non modò Lege, sed etiam necessitate, Conservationem propriam, & quae ad eam necessaria sunt conari intelligitur; is qui ob superflua repugnat, Belli sequuturi reus est, facitque contra Legem Naturae primam.

Lex Naturae sexta est, Vt Vnusquisque acceptâ temporis futuri Cautione, praeteritas Injurias poenitentibus & petentibus condonet. Nam condonare alicui Injuriam, nihil aliud est, quàm Pacem petentibus Pax concessa; Quae tamen perseverantibus in Inimicitia, non est Pax, sed Metus. Poenitentibus autem non concessa, signum est Animi à Pace alieni, & proinde contra Legem Naturae.

Septima est, In Vltionibus non respiciendum esse ad magnitudinem Mali praeteriti, sed ad magnitudinem Boni nascituri. Lege hac vetitum est poenam alio consilio infligere, quàm ut qui peccavit emendetur, vel moneantur qui vident ut caveant. Sequitur enim Lex haec ex praecedente, quae, quando cautum est de futuro, praeteriti veniam dare jubet. Vlcisci enim, nisi ad futurum Bonum dirigatur, ἐπιχαιρεκακία[r] est; id est, de Malo alieno vanus & inutilis triumphus; & proinde contra Rationem, & Legem Naturae, quae de Vanis & Superfluis contendere prohibet. Violatio Legis hujus Crudelitas appellatur.

7 molestus 68-Errata] molesta 68 8–9 vicino 68-Errata] vicina 68

[57] wits, [58] wit, [59] dispute about [60] the law, but also by the necessity, [61] his own conservation, and those things that are necessary to it, [62] first [63] to pardon someone for an injury, is nothing but the granting of peace to those who desire peace;
[64] repent, [65] warning those who see it to beware. [66] ^ of what is past [67] ἐπιχαιρεκακία,[r] that is, an empty and profitless triumphing in the hurt of another; and therefore contrary to reason, and the law of nature, which forbids strife about vain and superfluous things. The violation of this law is

[p] = perverse, disposed to go against what is commanded (OED, 'froward', a., adv., prep., 1).
[q] = upon receiving a security, guarantee, or pledge (OED, 'caution', n., 1).
[r] This term is used in Aristotle, Nicomachaean Ethics, II.6 (1107a10).

The eighth, against Contumely.

And because all signes of hatred, or contempt, provoke to fight; °insomuch as most men choose rather to hazard their life, than not to be revenged;° we may in the eighth place, for a Law of Nature, set down this Precept, That no man by deed, word, countenance, or gesture, declare Hatred, or Contempt of another. The breach of which Law, is commonly called Contumely.

The ninth, against Pride.

The question [68]who is the better man,[68] has no place in the condition of meer Nature; [69]where, (as has been shewn before,) all men are equall. [77] The inequallity that now is,[69] has bin introduced by the Lawes civill. I know that Aristotle in the first booke of his Politiques, for a foundation of his doctrine, maketh men by Nature, some [70]more worthy to Command, meaning the wiser sort (such as he thought himselfe to be for his Philosophy;)[70] others to Serve, (meaning those that had [71]strong bodies, but were not Philosophers as he;)[71] [s] as if Master and Servant were not introduced by consent of men, but by difference of Wit: which is not only against reason; but also against experience. For [72]there are very few[72] so foolish, that had not rather governe themselves, than be governed by others: Nor when [73]the wise in their own conceit,[73] contend by force, with [74]them who distrust their owne wisdome, do they alwaies, or[74] often, or almost at any time, get the Victory. If Nature therefore have made men equall, that equalitie is to be acknowledged: or if Nature have made men unequall; yet because men [75]that think themselves equall, will not enter into conditions of Peace, but upon Equall termes, such equalitie must be admitted. And therefore for the ninth law of Nature, I put this, That every man acknowledge other for his Equall by Nature.[75] The breach of this Precept is Pride.

The tenth, against Arrogance.[t]

On this law, dependeth [76]another,[76] That at the entrance into conditions of Peace, no man require to reserve to himselfe any Right, which he is not content should be reserved to every one of the rest. As it is necessary [77]for all men that seek peace,[77] to lay down certaine Rights of Nature; °that is to say, not to have libertie to do all they list:° so is it necessarie °for mans life,° to retaine some; as right to governe their owne bodies; enjoy aire, water, [78]motion, waies to go from place to place;[78] and all things else, without which a man cannot live, °or not live well.° If in this case, °at the making of Peace,° men require for themselves, [79]that which they would not have[79] to be granted to others, they do contrary to the precedent law, °that commandeth the acknowledgment of

7 before] afore MS 17 contend] {illeg. corr. by TH to Come to con}tend MS

Quoniam autem Odii & Contemptus signa omnia ad Pugnam accendunt, octavo loco pro Lege Naturali ponimus, Ne quis alium Facto, Verbo, Vultu aut Gestu Odisse vel Despicere se significet. Lege hac prohibetur Contumelia.

Quaestio de Ordine inter homines in Conditione Naturali nulla est. Distinctio illa introducta est à Lege Civili. Scio Aristotelem lib. 1. Politicorum quasi Principio uti, Esse alios à Naturâ factos ad Imperium, nimirum, Sapientes (id est, ut innuere voluit Philosophos, qualis ipse erat) alios ad Serviendum (nempe homines corporibus & ingenio duris)[s] quasi Dominium & Servitus non à consensu hominum, sed à differentiâ Ingeniorum originem habuerint; id [77] quod non modo contra Rationem, sed etiam contra Experientiam est. Quis enim ita stultus est, ut sibi ab aliis imperari mallet, quàm à seipso? Etiam quando vi contenditur inter illos qui habentur Sapientes, & illos qui sunt Robusti, priores illi, rarò aut nunquam victoriâ potiuntur. Si ergo homines Natura aequales fecit, agnoscenda est aequalitas. Sed si inaequales fecit, quia tamen unusquisque unicuique aequalem se esse putat, Pax nisi aequalibus conditionibus non habebitur. Admittenda ergo est Aequalitas, & Lex Naturae nona est Homines omnes inter se Naturâ aequales esse. Hujus Legis violatio Superbia est.

Ex hac Lege sequitur decima, ut in Pace ineundâ nemo reservari sibi poscat Ius aliquod, quod cuiquam caeterorum reservatum nolit. Cum enim vitae conservandae causâ, sicut deponi Iura quaedam Naturalia, ita retineri quaedam necessarium esset, nempe Ius proprii corporis curandi, Igne, Aquâ, Aëre fruendi, caeterisque sine quibus Homo vivere non potest; si jam plus retinere Iuris postulat, aliquis, quàm aliis libenter concessum vellet, facit ille contra

14 Natura 68-Errata] Naturae 68

[68] of rank among men [69] that distinction
[70] made to command, meaning the wise (that is, as he meant to insinuate, philosophers, such as he was);
[71] hard bodies and wits); [72] who are [73] those who are accounted wise
[74] those who are strong, do they
[75] think themselves equal to one another, peace will not be had except on equal terms. Therefore equality must be admitted, and the ninth law of nature is that All men are naturally equal to one another.
[76] the tenth, [77] , for the sake of the preservation of one's life, [78] fire, [79] to retain more of their right than they would wish freely

[s] Aristotle, Politics, I.5–6 (1254b15–1255b15).
[t] As this para. makes clear, Hobbes uses 'Arrogance' (and 'Arrogant') to mean not haughtiness, but demanding more than one's share or entitlement (a sense partly, but not fully, acknowledged in OED, 'arrogance' and 'arrogant', a. and n.). Cf. Elisha Coles's English Dictionary (1676), in which the only meaning given for 'arrogant' is 'he that takes too much to [himself]'.

naturall equalitie, and therefore also against the law of Nature. The observers of this law, are those we call Modest, and the breakers Arrogant men.° The Greeks call the violation of this law πλεονεξία; [80]that is, a desire of more than their share.[80] [u]

The eleventh, Equity.

Also if a man be trusted to judge [81]between man and man, it is a precept of the[81] Law of Nature, that he deale Equally between them. For without that, the Controversies of men cannot be determined °but by Warre.° He therefore that [82]is partiall in judgment,[82] doth what in him lies, to [83]deterre men from[83] the use of Judges, and Arbitrators; and consequently, [84](against the fundamentall Lawe of Nature) is the cause of Warre.[84]

°The observance of this law, from the equall distribution to each man, of that which in reason belongeth to him, is called EQUITY, and (as I have sayd before) distributive Justice: the violation, Acception of persons, προσωπολημψία.° [v]

The twelfth, Equall use of things Common.

And from this followeth [85]another law,[85] That such things as cannot be divided, be enjoyed in Common,[86]if it can be;[86] and if the quantity of the thing permit, without Stint; otherwise Proportionably to the number of them that [87]have Right.[87] For otherwise the distribution [88]is Unequall, and contrary to Equitie.[88] [78]

The thirteenth, of Lot.

But some things there be, that can neither be divided, nor enjoyed in common. Then, The [89]Law of Nature, which prescribeth Equity,[89] requireth, That the Entire Right; or else, ([90]making the use alternate,) the First Possession, be determined by Lot. °For equall distribution, is of the Law of Nature; and other means of equall distribution cannot be imagined.°

The fourteenth, of Primogeniture, and First seising.

Of Lots there be two sorts, Arbitrary, and Naturall. Arbitrary, is that which is agreed on by the Competitors: Naturall, is either Primogeniture, °(which the Greekes call Κληρονομία, which signifies, Given by Lot;)° [w] or First Seisure.

And therefore those things which cannot be enjoyed in common, nor divided, ought to be adjudged to the First Possessor; and in some cases to the First-Borne, as acquired by Lot[91].

The fifteenth, of Mediators.

It is also a Law of Nature, That all men that mediate Peace, be allowed safe Conduct. For the Law that commandeth [92] Peace, as the End, commandeth [93]Intercession, as the Means; and to Intercession the Means is safe Conduct.[93]

26 Greekes call MS] Greek calls H, B

Legem praecedentem. Hujus Legis violationem Graeci πλεονεξίαν, Latini Arrogantiam dicunt.

Si in controversiâ Iuris Sententia alicujus Arbitri fidei permittatur, Lex Naturae est, undecima, ut in utramque partem aequus sit. Nam absque eo finiri Lites non possunt. Qui ergo Aequus non est, Litigantibus quantum in eo est Arbitria & Iudicia, & per consequens Pacem ipsam tollit, contra Legem Naturae primam.

Ex hac Lege sequitur duodecima, Quae Dividi non possunt, eorum usum communem esse; idque, si fieri potest, & quantitas rei patiatur, sine restrictione; alioqui numero utentium proportionaliter. Distributio enim aequalis aliter esse non potest.

Sunt autem quaedam res, quarum neque Divisio, neque Vsus communis esse potest. De his Lex Naturae statuit decimatertia, ut Ius integrum, vel (si usus alternus placet) possessio prima Sorte determinetur.

Sortium duo sunt genera, Arbitrarium & Naturale. Arbitrarium in quod consentiunt Partes. Naturale est, aut Primogenitura, aut prima Occupatio.

Itaque quarum rerum neque Divisio est, neque Vsus communis, eae res vel primi Occupantis, vel Primogeniti sunt, Sorte acquisitae: Quae est Lex Naturae decima quarta.

Lex Naturae decima quinta est, Vt Pacis Mediatoribus ire & redire tutò liceat. Lex enim quae dictat Pacem quaerendam esse, ut finem, dictat quoque Mediatorum protectionem, ut Viam. [78]

5 est, Litigantibus] est Litigantibus, 70 17 eae 70] ea 68

[80] and the Latins, 'arrogance'.
[81] in a controversy over a right, it is the eleventh [82] does not deal equally,
[83] take away from the litigants [84] takes away peace itself, contrary to the first law of nature.
[85] the twelfth, [86] ; and that should happen, if possible, [87] enjoy it. [88] cannot be equal.
[89] thirteenth law of nature [90] ^ if people prefer [91] ^ : which is the fourteenth law of nature [92] ^ the seeking of [93] the protection of mediators, as the means.

[u] Hobbes's explication is accurate, and etymological: πλεονεξία is derived from πλέον, 'more', and ἔχω, to 'have'.
[v] The Greek term, meaning partiality towards the rich or powerful, is from the New Testament (see Rom. 2: 11; Eph. 6: 9; Col. 3: 25), where it renders a Hebrew term (see 2 Chr. 19: 7; cf. Job 34: 19).
[w] The standard meaning of κληρονομία (from κλῆρος, 'lot') is 'inheritance'.

The sixteenth, of Submission to Arbitrement.

And because, [94]though men be never so willing to observe these Lawes,[94] there may neverthelesse arise questions °concerning a mans action;° First, whether it were done, °or not done;° Secondly (if done) whether [95]against the Law, or not against the Law;[95] the former whereof, is called a question Of Fact; the later a question Of Right; therefore unlesse the parties to the question, Covenant mutually to stand to the sentence of another, [96]they are as farre from Peace as ever.[96] This other, °to whose Sentence they submit,° is called an ARBITRATOR. And therefore it is [97]of the Law of Nature, That they that are at controversie, submit their Right[97] to the judgement of an Arbitrator.

The seventeenth, No man is his own Judge.

And seeing every man is [98]presumed[98] to do all things in order to his own benefit, no man is a fit Arbitrator in his own cause: [99]and if he were never so fit; yet Equity allowing to each party equall benefit, if one be admitted to be Judge, the other is to be admitted also; & so the controversie, that is, the cause of War, remains, against the[99] Law of Nature.

The eighteenth, no man to be Judge, that has in him a natural cause of Partiality.

For the same reason no man in any Cause ought to be received for Arbitrator, to whom °greater° profit, or honour, or pleasure apparently[x] ariseth out of the victory of one party, [100]than of the other: for hee hath taken (though an unavoydable bribe, yet) a bribe; and no man can be obliged to trust him. And thus also the controversie, and the condition of War remaineth, contrary to the[100] Law of Nature.

The nineteenth, of Witnesses.

[101]And in a controversie of Fact, the Judge being to give no more credit to one, than to the other, (if there be no other Arguments) must give credit to a third; or to a third and fourth; or more: For else the question is undecided, and left to force, contrary to the[101] Law of Nature.

These are the Lawes of Nature, [102]dictating Peace, for a means of the conservation of men in multitudes; and which onely concern the doctrine of Civill Society.[102] There be other things tending to the destruction of particular men; as [103]Drunkenness, and all other parts[103] of Intemperance; [104]which may therefore also be reckoned amongst those things which the Law of Nature hath forbidden; but are not necessary [79] to be mentioned, nor are pertinent enough to this place.[104]

5 therefore] om.MS 30 hath] haue MS

Quoniam autem inter eos qui Leges Naturales observant, quaestiones nasci possunt, primò, an factum sit; secundò (si factum est) utrum Iure an Injuriâ; quarum prima dicitur controversia Facti, secunda controversia Iuris; nisi Litigantes in sententiâ alicujus tertii acquiescere mutuò paciscantur, Bellum manet. Tertius autem Arbiter dicitur. Itaque Lex Naturae decimasexta est in Sententia Arbitri acquiescere.

Quoniam autem Vnusquisque in omni Actione suâ respicere solet ad Bonum sibi, Arbiter idoneus in causâ propria nemo est. Quae est Lex Naturae decimaseptima.

Propter eandem causam, pro Arbitro recipiendus nemo est in controversiâ quacunque, cui Lucrum, Dignitas vel Voluptas à Victoriâ partis alterutrius manifestè oritura est. Corrumpitur enim talis Arbiter à Naturâ humanâ. Quae est Lex Naturae decimaoctava.

Decimanona Lex Naturae est, in quaestione Facti judicandum esse secundùm Testes. Litigantium enim uni credere potiùs, quàm alteri contra Aequitatem est, nempe Legem Naturae undecimam.

Atque hae Naturae Leges sunt, quae conducunt ad multitudinem hominum in Pace conservandam. Aliae autem res sunt, quae ad singulorum destructionem tendunt, ut omne genus Intemperantiae. Sed quia Naturam individuam spectant, nec ad institutam doctrinam pertinent, omittantur.

11 alterutrius] alterius 70

[94] among those who observe the laws of nature, [95] with right, or without it; [96] war persists. [97] the sixteenth law of nature, to submit [98] accustomed [99] which is the seventeenth [100] . For such an arbitrator is corrupted by human nature. Which is the eighteenth [101] The nineteenth law of nature is, in a question of fact, judgement must depend on the evidence of witnesses. For to believe one of the parties rather than the other is against equity, that is, against the eleventh [102] which are conducive to the preservation in peace of a multitude of men. [103] all kinds [104] but because they concern individual nature, and are not relevant to our argument, they may be omitted.

[x] = visibly, openly, plainly (OED, 'apparently', adv., 1–2; cf. the Latin, 'manifestè').

A Rule, by which the Laws of Nature may easily be examined.

And though this may seem too subtile a deduction of the Lawes of Nature, to be taken notice of by all men; whereof the most part are too busie in getting food, [105]and the rest too negligent to understand;[105] yet to leave [106]all[106] men unexcusable, they have been contracted [107]into one easie sum, intelligible, even to the meanest capacity; and that is,[107] Do not that to another, which thou wouldest not have done to thy selfe;[z] which sheweth him, that he has no more to do in learning the [108]Lawes[108] of Nature, but, when weighing the actions of other men with his own, °they seem too heavy,° to put them into the other part of the ballance, °and his own into their place,° that his own passions, °and selfe-love,° may adde nothing to the weight; °and then there is none of these Lawes of Nature that will not appear unto him very reasonable.°

The Lawes of Nature oblige in Conscience alwayes, but in Effect then onely when there is Security.

The Lawes of Nature oblige in foro interno;[aa] that is to say, [109]they bind to a desire they should take place:[109] but in foro externo;[ab] °that is, to the putting them in act,° not alwayes. For he that should [110]be modest, and tractable, and performe all he promises, in such time, and place, where no man els should do so, should but make himselfe[110] a prey to others, °and procure his own certain ruine,° contrary to the ground of all Lawes of Nature, [111]which tend to[111] Natures preservation. And again, he that having sufficient Security, that others shall observe the same Lawes towards him, observes them not himselfe, seeketh not Peace, but War; °& consequently the destruction of his Nature by Violence.°

And whatsoever Lawes bind in foro interno,[ac] may be broken, not onely by a fact[ad] contrary to the Law, but also by a fact according to it, in case a man think it contrary. For though his Action in this case, be according to the Law; yet his Purpose was against the Law; [112]which where the Obligation is in foro interno, is a breach.[112]

The Laws of Nature are Eternal;

°The Lawes of Nature are Immutable and Eternall; For Injustice, Ingratitude, Arrogance,[ae] Pride, Iniquity, Acception of persons,[af] and the rest, can never be made lawfull. For it can never be that Warre shall preserve life, and Peace destroy it.°

And yet Easie.

The same Lawes, because they oblige onely to a desire, and endeavour, I mean an unfeigned and constant endeavour, are easie to be observed. For in that they require nothing but endeavour; he that endeavoureth [113]their performance, fulfilleth them; and he that fulfilleth the Law,[113] is Just.

2 men] men whom they shall concerne MS 12 in] into B 16 there is Security] it is secure MS 28 Eternal;] Eternal and yet easy. MS 31–2 marg. moved (see previous marg.) in MS 34 fulfilleth] hath fulfilled MS

Est haec, dicet aliquis, Legum Naturalium deductio subtilior, quàm ut intelligi ab omnibus possit, quorum maxima pars alimentis studet, aut voluptatibus. Ne tamen etiam tardissimis excusationi locus relinquatur, contraxit eas Scriptura Sacra in unam eamque brevem & perspicuam sententiam, Quaecunque vultis facere vobis homines, id facite illis;[y] & Philosophi, Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.[z] Quare ad totam Legem Naturalem perdiscendam, aliâ re opus non est, quàm ut Actiones alienas cum nostris pensitantes, in alteram lancem transferamus, ne Passiones propriae ponderi fortè aliquid addiderint.

Leges Naturales obligant in Foro interno,[aa] id est, earum transgressio, non Crimen propriè, sed Vitium dicendum est. Sed in Foro externo[ab] non semper obligant. Nam qui illas observaret tunc, quando à caeteris contemnuntur, caeteris praeda esset, contra fundamentum omnium Legum Naturalium, nempe Naturae conservationem. Attamen, quando de earundem observatione à caeteris cautum est, tunc is, qui eas non observat, Bellum, non Pacem quaerit.

Legem omnem, in Foro interno[ac] obligantem, Factum violat non [79] modò Legi contrarium, sed etiam congruum, si contrarium putet is qui facit. Quanquam enim Actio ipsa fuerit secundùm Legem, Voluntas contra erat. Nam in Foro interno solus Animus Reus fit.

Eaedem Leges, quia ad Velle tantùm obligant, Velle inquam constanter, & sincere, faciles observatu sunt; solus Conatus sufficit. Qui illas observare quantùm potest conatus est, observavit, & Iustus est.

6 fieri non vis] non vis fieri 70 9 addiderint] addant 70

[105] or sensual pleasure, [106] even the most slow-witted
[107] by Holy Scripture into one short and clear pronouncement, Whatever you would that men do unto you, do that unto them;[y] and by the philosophers, [108] whole law [109] to transgress them should properly be called a vice, not a crime:
[110] observe them, when they are disregarded by others, would be [111] namely,
[112] for in foro interno only the mind is guilty.
[113] , so far as he can, to observe them, does observe them, and

[y] See Ch. 14, note b. [z] See Ch. 14, note c. [aa] Literally, 'in the internal court'.
[ab] Literally, 'in the external court'. [ac] See above, note aa.
[ad] = action, deed (OED, 'fact', n., 1.a). [ae] See above, note t. [af] See above, note v.

The Science of these Lawes, is the true Morall Philosophy.

And the Science of them, is the true and onely Moral Philosophy. For Morall Philosophy is nothing else but the Science of what is Good, and Evill, in the conversation,[ag] and Society of man-kind. [114]Good, and Evill, are names that signifie our Appetites, and Aversions; which in different tempers, customes, and doctrines of men, are different: And divers men, differ not onely in their Judgement on the senses, of what is pleasant, and unpleasant to the tast, smell, hearing, touch, and sight; but also of what is conformable, or disagreeable to Reason, in the actions of common life.[114] Nay, the same man, [115]in divers times, differs from himselfe; and[115] one time praiseth, that is, calleth Good, what another time he dispraiseth, and calleth Evil: [80] From whence arise Disputes, Controversies, and at last War. And therefore so long [116]a man is in the condition of meer Nature, (which is a condition of War,) as private Appetite is the measure of Good, and Evill:[116] And consequently all men agree on this, that Peace is Good, [117]and therefore also the way, or means of Peace, which (as I have shewed before)[117] are Justice, Gratitude, Modesty, Equity, °Mercy,° & the rest of the Laws of Nature, [118]are good; that is to say, Morall Vertues; and their contrarie Vices, Evill.[118] Now the science of Vertue and Vice, is Morall Philosophie; and therfore the true Doctrine of the Lawes of Nature, is the true Morall Philosophie. But the Writers of Morall Philosophie, though they acknowledge the same Vertues and Vices; Yet not seeing wherein consisted their Goodnesse; nor [119]that they come to be praised, as the meanes of peaceable, sociable, and comfortable living; place them in a mediocrity[ah] of passions:[119] as if not the Cause, but the Degree of daring, made Fortitude; or not the Cause, but the Quantity of a gift, made Liberality.[ai]

These dictates of Reason, men use to call by the name of Lawes; but improperly: for they are but °Conclusions, or° Theoremes concerning what conduceth to the conservation °and defence° of themselves; wheras Law, properly is the word of him, that °by right° hath command [120]over others. But yet if we consider the same Theoremes, as delivered in the word of God, that by right commandeth all things; then are they properly called Lawes.[120]

6 iudgment on the senses, MS] Judgement, on the senses H, B 24 Liberality] liberality, and the like MS 25 men] we MS 30 properly called Lawes] lawes properly so called MS

---

[114] The same things are called good and evil by different men, according to the different appetites, aversions, customs, and doctrines of men; [115] because his will has changed,

[116] as private men make the measure of good and evil, men are in the condition of a war of all against all:

[117] and all seek it. Therefore it cannot be denied that the necessary means to peace are good. And those means [118] . They are therefore moral goods, that is, virtues, and the opposites of them are evils, that is, vices.

[119] why they are praiseworthy, have not recognized any other virtues than passions (but mediocre ones):

[120] – either spoken or written, in such a way that all who are required to obey may know that it is his word.

Legum Naturalium Scientia, vera & sola Ethica est. Ethica autem alia non est, praeter Scientiam earum rerum quae in Congressibus & Societate hominum, bonae vel malae sunt. Bonae autem & Malae dicuntur eaedem res à diversis hominibus, propter hominum Appetitus, Aversiones, Consuetudines & Doctrinas diversas diversè; & quandoque ab eodem homine, propter mutationem Voluntatis eadem res modò bona modò mala appellatur.

Inde autem oriuntur Disputationes, Controversiae, & tandem Bellum. Quamdiu ergo homines privati Boni & Mali mensuram faciunt, tamdiu homines sunt in conditione Belli omnium contra omnes. Pacem ergo bonam esse confitentur, quaeruntque omnes. Itaque Media ad Pacem necessaria bona esse negari non potest. Sunt autem illa, Iustitia, Gratitudo, Modestia, Aequitas, & caeterae Leges Naturae. Bona igitur Moralia sunt, id est, Virtutes; & his contraria Mala, id est, Vitia. Scientia autem Virtutum & Vitiorum est Philosophia Moralis. Doctrina ergo de Legibus Naturae Vera est Ethica. Scriptores Ethici, etsi easdem agnoscant Virtutes, atque eadem Vitia; in quo tamen consistit Bonitas Virtutis, & quare laudabilis sit non videntes, Virtutes alias non agnoverunt quàm Passiones, sed Mediocres; quasi Fortitudo, non causa, sed gradus Audendi; & Liberalitas, non causa, sed quantitas dati esset.[ai] Dictamina haec Rationis nomen quidem obtinuerunt Legum; sed improprie dictarum. Sunt enim de iis rebus quae ad Conservationem hominum conducunt tantùm Theoremata. Lex autem propriè dicta, est Vox Imperantis, vel prolata, vel scripta, ita ut omnes qui obedire tenentur, sciant vocem ejus esse.

1 Scientia, vera & sola this edn.] Scientia vera & sola, 68, 70 1 alia this edn.] aliâ 68, 70
16 consistit] consistat 70 17 sed] easque 70

[ag] = social behaviour (OED, 'conversation', 1–2, 4–6).
[ah] = intermediate state (OED, 'mediocrity', n., 1.b).
[ai] Hobbes prejudicially summarizes Aristotle, Nicomachaean Ethics, II.6–7 (1106b35–1107b21).

CHAP. XVI.

Of PERSONS, [1]AUTHORS, and things Personated.[1]

A Person what.

A PERSON, is he, [2]whose words or actions are considered, either as his own, or as representing the words or actions of an other man, or of any other thing to whom they are attributed, whether Truly or by Fiction.[2]

Person Naturall, and Artificiall.

[3]When they are considered as his owne, then is he called a Naturall Person: And when they are considered as representing the words and actions of an other, then is he a Feigned or Artificiall person.[3]

The word Person, whence.

[4]The Word Person is latine: insteed whereof the Greeks have πρόσωπον, which signifies the Face, as Persona in latine signifies the disguise, or outward appearance of a man, counterfeited on the Stage; and somtimes more particularly that part of it, which disguiseth the face, as a Mask or Visard: And from the Stage, hath been translated to any Representer of speech and action, as well in Tribunalls, as Theaters. So that a Person, is the same that an Actor is, both on the Stage and in common Conversation;[a] and to Personate, is to Act, or Represent himselfe, or an other; and he that acteth another, is said to beare his Person, or act in his[4] name; (in which sence Cicero useth it where he saies[5], Unus sustineo tres Personas; Mei, Adversarii, & Judicis, I beare three Persons; my own, my Adversaries, and the Judges;)[b] [6]and is called [81] in diverse occasions, diversly; as a Representer, or Representative, a Lieutenant, a Vicar, an Attorney, a Deputy, a Procurator, an Actor, and the like.[6]

Actor, Author,

Of [7]Persons Artificiall,[7] some have their words and actions Owned by those whom they represent. And then the [8]Person is the Actor; and he that owneth his words and actions, is the AUTHOR: In which case the Actor acteth by Authority.[8] For that which in speaking of goods and possessions, is called an Owner, and in latine Dominus, °in Greeke κύριος;° speaking of [9] Actions, is called Author. And as the Right of possession, is called Dominion; so the Authority.

Right of doing any Action, is called AUTHORITY. °So that by Authority, is alwayes understood a Right of doing any act: and done by Authority, done by Commission, or Licence from him whose right it is.°

3 he] a man MS 7 they are] they {be added by TH} MS 9 Greeks] Greeke MS
13 Stage,] stage {it added by TH} MS 23 Actor,] Author, Actor, Authority. MS
24 marg. om. MS {moved to previous marg.} 27 called Author] called {an added by TH} Author MS
28 marg. om. MS {moved to earlier marg.}
28 AUTHORITY] Authority {and sometimes warrant added by TH} MS

CAPVT XVI.

De Personis & Authoribus.

Persona est is qui suo vel alieno nomine Res agit. Si suo, Persona Propria, sive Naturalis est; si alieno, Persona est ejus, cujus Nomine agit Representativa. Personam Graeci vocant πρόσωπον, quod significat [80] Faciem hominis Naturalem. Sed à Latinis Persona frequentissimè sumitur pro Facie Fictitiâ, quae & Larva dicitur, quali utebantur in theatris Histriones. A Theatro autem in Forum translata est, etiam sine Larvâ; adeo ut Persona tum in Theatro, tum in Foro idem significaret quod Actor; & Personam alicujus gerere aut sustinere diceretur ille, qui Nomine cujuscunque (etsi sine Larvâ) Partes ageret. Atque eo sensu utitur vocabulo Persona Cicero ad Atticum, ubi dicit, Vnus sustineo tres Personas, Mei, Iudicis, & Adversarii.[b] Itaque Deputati, Procuratores, Proreges, aliique qui aliorum negotia faciunt, eorum Personae sunt Repraesentativae.

Verba & Facta Repraesentantium, ab iis quos Repraesentant aliquando pro suis agnoscuntur; tunc autem Repraesentans Actor, Repraesentatus Author dicitur, ut cujus authoritate Actor agit. Qui autem in quaestione de Bonis & Possessionibus, Dominus; in quaestione de Verbis & Actionibus, Author appellatur. Et ut Ius habendi, Dominium, ita Ius agendi, Authoritas dicitur.

[1] and authors. [2] who does things in his own or another's name.

[3] If in his own, he is a proper or natural person; if in another's, he is the representative person of the one in whose name he acts.

[4] The Greeks call a person πρόσωπον, which means the natural face of a man. But 'person' is very frequently applied by the Latins to an artificial face, which is also called a mask, as used by actors in theatres. From the theatre it has been transferred (but without the mask) to the law-court; so that 'person', both in the theatre and in the court, means the same as 'actor', and a man is said to bear or carry the person of someone, when he acts a part – even without a mask – in anyone's [5] ^ to Atticus

[6] . Therefore deputies, procurators, regents, and others who do the business of others, are their representative persons. [7] representatives,

[8] representative is called the actor, and the one represented is called the author, as he is the one by whose authority the actor acts. [9] ^ words and

---

[a] = social behaviour (OED, 'conversation', 1–2, 4–6).

[b] Cicero, De oratore, II.102: 'tres personas unus sustineo summa animi aequitate ['with perfect impartiality'], meam, adversarii, iudicis'. Hobbes's reference to Atticus in the Latin here is mistaken; this text was addressed to Cicero's brother Quintus.

Covenants by Authority, bind the Author.

From hence it followeth, that when the Actor maketh a Covenant by Authority [10], he bindeth thereby the Author, no lesse than if he had made it himselfe; and no lesse subjecteth him to all the consequences of the same. And therfore all that hath been said formerly, (Chap. 14.[11]) of the nature of Covenants °between man and man in their naturall capacity,° is true also when they are made by [12]their Actors, Representers, or Procurators, that have authority from them,[12] so far-forth as is in their Commission, °but no farther.°

And therefore he that maketh a Covenant with the Actor, °or Representer,° not knowing the Authority he hath, doth it at his own perill. For no man is obliged by a Covenant, whereof he is not Author; °nor consequently by a Covenant made against, or beside the Authority he gave.°

But not the Actor.

When the Actor doth any thing against the Law of Nature by [13]command of the Author, if he be obliged by former Covenant to obey him,[13] not he, but the Author breaketh the Law of Nature: for though the Action be against the Law of Nature; yet it is not [14]his: but contrarily, to refuse to do it, is against the Law of Nature, that forbiddeth breach of Covenant.[14]

The Authority is to be shewne.

And he that maketh a Covenant with the °Author, by mediation of the° Actor, not knowing what Authority he hath, but onely takes his word; in case[c] such Authority be not made manifest unto him [15] upon demand, is no longer obliged: For the Covenant °made with the Author,° is not valid, without [16]his Counter-assurance.[16] But if he that so Covenanteth, [17]knew before hand he was to expect[17] no other assurance, than the Actors word; then is the Covenant valid[18]; because the Actor in this case maketh himselfe the Author. And therefore, as when the Authority is evident, the Covenant obligeth the Author, °not the Actor;° so when the Authority is feigned, it obligeth the Actor °onely; there being no Author but himselfe.°

Things personated, Inanimate.

There are few things, [19]that are uncapable of being represented by Fiction.[19] Inanimate things, as a Church, an Hospital, a Bridge, may be personated by a Rector, Master, or Overseer. But things Inanimate, cannot be Authors, [20]nor therefore give Authority to their Actors: Yet the Actors may have Authority to procure their maintenance, [82] given them by[20] those that are Owners, or Governours of those things. And therefore, [21]such things cannot be Personated, before there be some state of Civill Government.[21]

28 may be] om. MS

Si ergo Actor Paciscatur per Authoritatem sibi datam, Authorem obligat, & Pacti consequentiis omnibus subjicit, tanquam si in Personâ suâ propriâ Pactus esset. Omnia ergo quae de naturâ Pactorum Capp. 14. & 15. dicta sunt, vera etiam sunt, ubi Pacta fiunt per Personas Repraesentativas, sed secundùm Authoritates sibi concessas.

Itaque qui cum Actore Paciscitur, cujus Authoritatem nescit, proprio id facit periculo. Nemo enim Pacto obligatur, cujus ipse non sit Author. Quando ergo aliquod contra Legem Naturae, Authoritate alienâ facit Actor, non Actor, sed Author Legem violat. Actio quidem contra Legem est, sed non Actoris, sed Authoris Actio est; quia Legem violasset Actor si non fecisset, cum facere Pactus esset.

Qui cum Actore, Authoritatis illi concessae inscius, verbo ejus credens Paciscitur, nisi Authoritatem Actor rogatus ostendat, non est ulteriùs obligatus. Pactum enim sine Authoritate invalidum est. Sin qui Pactus sit aliam cautionem non expectabat praeter Actoris Verbum, tum cum Paciscebatur, Pactum contra Actorem valet, quia se Authorem fecit. Et sic, ubi Authoritas manifesta est, Author; ubi ficta est, Actor obligatur.

Paucae res sunt, quarum non possunt esse Personae. Quamquàm enim Persona sit per Naturam aliquid quod intelligit, id tamen cujus Persona geritur non semper necessariò ita est. Itaque rei Inanimatae, ut Ecclesiae, Nosocomii, Pontis Persona geri potest à Rectore vel Curatore aliquo. Authores autem res Inanimatae esse non possunt; [81] verùm Rectores & Curatores qui gerunt Personam rerum Inanimatarum, agent per Authoritatem eorum, quorum est Dominium illarum. Personae ergo ejusmodi extra Statum Civilem non existunt.

8 aliquod this edn.] aliquis 68; aliquis Actor 70 8 Actor] om. 70 15 Actoris] Auctoris 70

[10] ^ given to him [11] ^ and 15 [12] representative persons, [13] the authority of another, [14] the actor's, but the author's action; because the actor would have broken the law if he had not done it, since he had covenanted to do it. [15] ^ by the actor [16] authority.
[17] was, at the time when he covenanted, expecting [18] ^ against the actor
[19] of which there may not be persons. For although a person is, by nature, something that understands, this is not always necessarily true of a thing whose person is borne. Thus [20] ; the rectors or overseers who bear the persons of inanimate things will act by the authority of [21] persons of that kind do not exist outside the civil state.

[c] = in the event that, if (OED, 'case', n.[1], 10).

Irrational; Likewise Children, [22]Fooles, and Mad-men that have no use of Reason, may be Personated by Guardians, or Curators;[d] but can be no Authors (during that time) of any action done by them, longer then (when they shall recover the use of Reason) they shall judge the same reasonable. Yet during the Folly, he that hath right of governing them, may give Authority to the Guardian. But this again has no place but in a State Civill, because before such estate, there is no Dominion of Persons.[22]

False Gods; [23]An Idol, or meer Figment of the brain, may be Personated;[23] as were the Gods of the Heathen; °which by such Officers as the State appointed,° were Personated, and held [24]Possessions, and other[24] Goods, and Rights, which men °from time to time dedicated, and° consecrated unto them. But Idols cannot be Authors[25]: for an Idol is nothing.[e] The Authority proceeded from the State: °and therefore before introduction of Civill Government, the Gods of the Heathen could not be Personated.°

The true God. The true God may be Personated. As he was; [26]first, by Moses; who governed the Israelites, (that were not his, but Gods people,) not in his own name, with Hoc dicit Moses; but in Gods Name, with Hoc dicit Dominus.[f] Secondly, by the Son of man, his own Son, our Blessed Saviour Jesus Christ, that came to reduce[g] the Jewes, and induce all Nations into the Kingdome of his Father; not as of himselfe, but as sent from his Father. And thirdly, by the Holy Ghost, or Comforter, speaking, and working in the Apostles: which Holy Ghost, was a Comforter that came not of himselfe; but was sent, and proceeded from them both.[26] [i]

A Multitude of men, how one Person. A Multitude of men, are made One Person, when they are by one man, °or one Person,° Represented; [27]so that it be done with the consent[27] of every one of that Multitude in particular. For it is the Unity of the Representer, not the Unity of the Represented, that maketh the Person One. °And it is the Representer that beareth the Person, and but one Person:° And Unity, cannot otherwise be understood in Multitude.

23 both] both {on the day of Pentecost added by TH} MS

[22] and those who are not in possession of their faculties may be personated by guardians; but during the time when a child is without the possession of its faculties, a guardian is an author only by permission of the commonwealth. For authority can be given to guardians and overseers only by civil right.

[23] Idols, or mere figments, [24] moveable and immovable [25] ^ of anything

[26] . For he created the world in his own person. In the redemption of the human race, Jesus Christ personated God. In the sanctification of the elect, the Holy Spirit personated the same God; which is what we are taught in the public catechism, namely, 'to believe in God the Father, who hath made me and all the world; and in God the Son, who hath redeemed me and all mankind; and in God the Holy Ghost, who hath sanctified me and all the elect people of God.'[h] [27] who has the authority Infantis, & ejus qui mentis compos non est, Persona geri potest per Tutorem; qui tamen dum Infans mentis impos est, Author non est, nisi per concessionem Civitatis. Authoritas enim Tutoribus & Curatoribus dari non potest nisi Iure Civili.

Idoli, id est meri figmenti, quales erant Dii Gentium, Personae fuere constitutae, quae Bona Mobilia & Immobilia, & Iura tenuerunt Idolis consecrata. Idolum autem, cum sit nihil,[e] nullius rei Author esse potuit. Authoritatem dederunt Civitates.

Etiam Dei veri Persona geritur, & gesta est. Mundum enim in propriâ Personâ creavit. In redimendo genere Humano Personam Dei gessit Iesus Christus. In Electis sanctificandis ejusdem Dei Personam gessit Spiritus Sanctus; Id quod docemur in Catechismo publico, nempe, Credere in Deum Patrem qui creavit Me & totum Mundum; & in Deum Filium qui redemit Me & totum genus Humanum, & in Spiritum Sanctum qui Sanctificavit Me & omnem Electum Populum Dei.[h]

Etiam plurium hominum fit una Persona, quando repraesentantur ab uno, qui habet à Singulis Authoritatem. Non enim Repraesentati, sed Repraesentantis Unitas est, quae Personam facit esse Unam; neque Unitas alio modo in Multitudine intelligi potest.

16 repraesentantur this edn.] repraesentatur 68, 70

[d] = guardians (OED, 'curator', 1). [e] 1 Cor. 8: 4.

[f] Exod. 32: 27: 'haec dicit Dominus' (Vulg); 'Thus saith the Lord'.

[g] = lead back, bring back (OED, 'reduce', v., 2).

[h] Hobbes cites (with one significant change: 'hath sanctified' for 'sanctifieth') the Catechism from the service of Confirmation in the 1559 Book of Common Prayer; his Latin version is his own translation of the English, not the Latin version published in 1560.

[i] Cf. John 14: 26: 'But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name. . .'. Hobbes affirms here (though perhaps with a more limited sense of 'proceeded') the doctrine of the Western Churches on the dual procession of the Holy Spirit from both the Father and the Son.

Every one is Author.

And because the Multitude naturally is not One, but Many; they [28]cannot be understood for[28] one; but many Authors, of every thing [29] their Representative saith, or doth °in their name;° Every man giving their common [30]Representer,[30] Authority from himselfe in particular; [31]and owning all the actions the Representer doth, in case they give him Authority without stint: Otherwise, when they limit him in what, and how farre he shall represent them, none of them owneth more, than they gave him[31] commission to Act.

An Actor may be Many men made One by Plurality of Voyces.

And if the [32]Representative consist of many[32] men, the voyce of the greater number, must be considered as the voyce of [33]them all.[33] For if the lesser number pronounce (for example) in the Affirmative, and the greater in the Negative, °there will be Negatives more than [83] enough to destroy the Affirmatives; and thereby° the excesse of Negatives, standing uncontradicted, are the [34]onely voyce the Representative hath.[34]

Representatives, when the number is even, unprofitable.

And a Representative [35] of even number, especially when the number is not great, whereby the [36]contradictory voyces are oftentimes equall,[36] is therefore oftentimes mute, and [37] uncapable of Action. Yet in some cases contradictory voyces equall in number, may determine a question; as in [38]condemning, or absolving, equality of votes, even in that they condemne not, do absolve; but not on the contrary condemne, in that they absolve not. For when a Cause is heard; not to condemne, is to absolve:[38] but on the contrary, to say that not absolving, is condemning, is not true. The like it is in a deliberation of executing presently,[j] or deferring till another time: For °when the voyces are equall,° the not decreeing Execution, is a decree of Dilation.[k]

Negative voyce.

Or if the number be odde, as three, or more, [39](men, or assemblies;) whereof every one has by a Negative Voice, authority to take away the effect of all the Affirmative Voices of the rest, This number is no Representative;[39] because by the diversity of Opinions, and [40]Interests[40] of men, it becomes oftentimes, and in cases of the greatest consequence, a mute Person, and unapt, [41]as for many things else, so for the government of a Multitude, especially in time of Warre.[41]

11 more than] om. MS 11–12 Affirmatives] Affirmatiues, and spare MS

---

[28] are not [29] ^ that the actor, who is [30] actor,

[31] but if the authority given to him is limited, each is the author only of those actions which are contained in the [32] actor or person is not one man, but a group of [33] the person.

[34] voice of the person, that is, of them all; for otherwise the person would be mute, which is against nature. [35] ^ person [36] affirmatives and negatives cancel each other, [37] ^ therefore useless, and

[38] indictments, when they are unable, because of the equality of votes, to condemn the defendant, they thereby absolve him;

[39] if the voice of one can take away the effect of the contradictory voices of the rest, this number could not be the representative person; [40] appetites [41] for action.

Quoniam autem Multitudo Naturaliter non Unum aliquod, sed Multi sunt; non Unus, sed Multi, nempe Singuli, Authores sunt eorum quae dicit vel facit Actor, qui est Persona ipsos Repraesentans. Unusquisque enim eorum communi Actori suo Authoritatem tribuit suam. Sin Authoritas finita sit quae tribuitur, Author quisque est illarum solummodo Actionum quae in Mandatis continentur.

Si Actor, seu Persona non sit Unus homo, sed Coetus hominum, tunc Vox partis Majoris accipienda est pro Voce Personae. Nam si Pars Minor pronuntiet (exempli causâ) Affirmativè, Major Negativè, Voces Negativae abundantes, ut quibus non contradicitur, Personae, id est, Omnium Vox est; Nam alioqui (contra Naturam) Persona Muta esset.

Si Persona Repraesentans ex pluribus constet numero paribus, praesertim parvo, continget saepenumero (Negationibus & Affirmationibus se mutuò extinguentibus) Personam fieri Mutam & proinde inutilem, & Agendi incapacem. Potest tamen fieri ut Voces contradictoriae, eaedemque aequales numero, quaestionem determinent; ut [82] in Accusationibus, eo ipso Reum absolvunt quod condemnare eum propter voces aequales non possunt; at contra non absolvere, non est condemnare. Idem contingeret deliberantibus utrum aliquid statim faciendum sit, an in aliud tempus differendum. Eo enim quod praesentem executionem non decernunt, decernunt dilationem.

Porro, si numerus impar sit, ut tres, vel plures; siquidem vox unius tolleret voces reliquorum contradictorias, numerus ille Persona non esset, propter diversitatem opinionum & appetituum in rebus multis & maximi momenti. Muta enim esset & ad Agendum inepta.

[j] = immediately (OED, 'presently', adv., 1.a).
[k] = delay (OED, 'dilation 1').

Of Authors there be two sorts. The first simply so called; which I have [42]before defined to be him, that owneth the Action of another simply. The second is he, that owneth an Action, or Covenant of another conditionally; that is to say, he undertaketh to do it, if the other doth it not, at, or[42] before a certain time. And these [43]Authors conditionall, are generally called SURETYES, in Latine Fidejussores, and Sponsores; and particularly for Debt, Praedes; and for Appearance before a Judge, or Magistrate,[43] Vades.[1]

[84: blank]

2 him] he MS 5 generally] commonly MS 6 marg.: {Authors conditionall, suretyes added by TH} MS 6–7 , and Sponsores . . . Vades] om. MS

[42] just spoken about. The others only conditionally; such as someone who takes it on himself to fulfil a covenant, if the one who covenanted has not fulfilled it

[43] , although they are authors of the fulfilment of promises, are nevertheless called by other names, according to their various kinds of action – for example, 'fideijussores', 'sponsores', 'praedes', and

[1] Hobbes's use of these Roman Law terms is correct; all referred to people who stood bail or surety for others. The 'sponsio' was a surety restricted to Roman citizens and to stipulations; the 'fideiussio' was a surety open to everyone and used in the widest sense; 'praedes' and 'vades' stood bail for the appearance of a party in court, while the term 'praedes' was also used for sureties in state contracts.

Authorum duo sunt genera. Sunt enim alii simpliciter Authores; de quibus modò dictum est. Alii conditionaliter tantùm; ut qui Pactum praestare in se recipit, si is qui Pactus est, ante constitutum diem non praestiterit. Atque hi, quamquam Fidei habendae Authores sunt, aliis tamen nominibus pro variis Actionum generibus vocitantur, ut Fideijussores, Sponsores, Praedes, Vades.[1]

[85]

OF COMMON-WEALTH[1].

CHAP. XVII.

Of the [2]Causes,[2] Generation, and Definition of a COMMON-WEALTH.

The End of Common-wealth, particular Security:

THE finall Cause, End, or Designe of men, (who naturally love Liberty, and Dominion °over others,°) in [3]the introduction of that restraint upon themselves, (in which wee see them live in Common-wealths,)[3] is the foresight of their own preservation, and of a more contented life thereby; that is to say, of getting themselves out from that miserable condition of Warre[4], which is necessarily consequent °(as hath been shewn)° to [5]the naturall[5] Passions of men, when there is no visible Power to [6]keep them in awe,[6] and tye them by feare of punishment to the performance of their Covenants, and observation of [7]those Lawes of Nature set down in the fourteenth and fifteenth Chapters.[7]

Chap. 13.

Which is not to be had from the Law of Nature:

For the Lawes of Nature (as Justice, Equity,[8]Modesty, Mercy,[8] and (in summe) doing to others, as wee would be done to,) of themselves, without the terrour of some [9]Power, to cause them to be observed,[9] are contrary to our naturall Passions, [10]that carry us to Partiality, Pride, Revenge, and the like. And Covenants, without the Sword, are but Words, and of no strength to secure a man at all. Therefore notwithstanding the Lawes of Nature, (which every one hath then kept, when he has the will to keep them, when he can do it safely,) if there be no Power erected, or not great enough for our security; every man will, and may lawfully rely on his own strength and art, for caution[a] against all other men. And in all places, where men have lived by small Families, to robbe and spoyle one another, has been a Trade, and so farre from being reputed against the Law of Nature, that the greater spoyles they gained, the greater was their honour;[b] and men observed no other Lawes

10 shewn] shewn in chap. 13. MS 10 marg. om. MS 13 Nature set . . . Chapters] nature, in the 14th, and 15th. chapters mentioned MS

[1] ^OR REPUBLIC [2] cause, [3] wishing to live under rule (as happens in the civil state),
[4] ^of all against all [5] natural liberty, because of the [6] restrain those passions,
[7] the laws of nature. [8] etc., [9] coercive power,

[83]

DE CIVITATE SIVE REPVBLICA.

CAPVT XVII.

De Causa, Generatione, & Definitione Civitatis.

Quod homines Libertatis & Dominii per naturam amatores, ex praescripto (ut fit in statu Civili) vivere voluerunt, Finis & Causa fuit cura conservationis suae Vitaeque commodioris, id est, ut è conditione misera Belli omnium contra omnes exirent, quae conditio Libertati naturali (propter passiones humanas) necessariò tunc adhaeret, quando nulla extat potentia visibilis quae passiones illas terrore poenarum temperare possit, legesque naturales, & pacta observari faciat. Leges enim naturae (ut Iustitia, Aequitas &c.) & uno verbo, Facere aliis quod fieri vellemus nobis, absque metu Potentiae coactivae, passionibus naturalibus (quales sunt Ira, Superbia, Cupiditasque omnis) contrariae sunt.

Exitum autem è conditione Belli omnium contra omnes Leges & Pacta, per se praestare non possunt. Verba enim sunt, dumque verba tantùm sunt, non timentur, ideoque ad securitatem hominum per se sine armis inutilia sunt. Itaque Leges (quas qui observare, aliis observantibus, conatus est, observavit) quoties potentiae cogentis metus abest non obligant, neque impediunt, quin securitatem suam à viribus & artibus propriis petere unicuique licitum sit. Idem etiam docent historiae veteris Graeciae, ubi cum nulla essent

13 Cupiditasque this edn.] Cupiditasque, 68, 70 18 observare, aliis observantibus, conatus est,] observare conatus est, aliis observantibus 70 21 Idem] Item 70

[10] such as anger, pride, and every form of desire.

However, laws and covenants are not of themselves capable of getting us out of the condition of a war of all against all. For they are words, and while they are only words they are not feared, and for that reason they are, by themselves, without arms, useless for people's security. Therefore the laws (which have been observed by anyone who has tried to observe them, so long as others were observing them) do not oblige whenever the fear of a coercive power is lacking; nor do they stop it from being lawful for every man to seek his own security by means of his own strength and skill. The same is taught by the histories of ancient Greece, where, when there were no governments (except by the fathers of families), robbery by land and sea was an occupation not only lawful but – so long as people abstained from cruelty, and from taking the instruments of husbandry – even honourable.[b]

[a] = precaution (OED, 'caution', n., 5). [b] See above, Ch. 10, note q.

therein, but the Lawes of Honour; that is, to abstain from cruelty, leaving to men their lives, and instruments of husbandry.[10] And as small Familyes did then; so now do [11]Cities and Kingdomes[11] which are but greater Families (for their own security) enlarge their Dominions, upon [12]all pretences of danger, and fear of Invasion, or assistance that may be given to Invaders,[12] endeavour as much as they can, to subdue, or weaken their [13]neighbours,[13] by open force, and secret arts, [14]for want of other Caution, justly; and are remembred for it in after ages with honour.[14]

Nor from the conjunction of a few men or familyes:

Nor is it the joyning together of a small number of men, that gives them [15]this security; because in small numbers, small additions [86] on the one side or the other, make the advantage of strength so great, as is sufficient to carry the [15]Victory; and therefore gives encouragement to an Invasion. The Multitude sufficient to confide[c] in for our Security, is not determined by any certain number, but by comparison with the [16]Enemy we feare;[16] and is then sufficient, when the odds[d] of the Enemy is not of so °visible and° conspicuous moment, to determine the event[e] of warre, as to move him to attempt.

Nor from a great Multitude, unlesse directed by one judgement:

And be there never so great a Multitude; yet if their actions be directed [17]according to their particular judgements, and particular appetites, they can expect thereby no defence, nor protection,[17] neither against a Common enemy, nor against the injuries of one another. For [18]being distracted[f] in opinions concerning the best[18] use and application of their strength, they do not help, °but hinder° one another; and reduce their strength by mutuall opposition to nothing: whereby they are easily, not onely subdued by a [19]very few that agree together; but also when there is no common enemy,[19] they make warre upon each other, for their particular interests. For if we could suppose a great Multitude of men to consent in the observation of [20]Justice,[20] and other Lawes of Nature, without a common Power to keep them all in awe; we might as well suppose all Man-kind to do the same; and then there [21]neither would be, nor[21] need to be any Civill Government, °or Common-wealth° at all; because there would be Peace without subjection.

2–3 small Familyes did then] then did small familyes MS 15 and] or MS 24 they] om. MS

[11] commonwealths [12] every suspicion of danger, or of hostile invasion, and [13] enemies, and those who look as if they will help their enemies,
[14] and they do so justly, because they cannot otherwise be secure.
[15] the security they seek; because in small numbers, a small addition of allies suffices for certain [70: renders uncertain the] [16] strength of the enemy;
[17] by the judgements and decisions of many, they can expect thereby no security, [18] disagreeing among themselves about the [19] common enemy, but also [20] equity,
[21] would not

(praeter paterna) Imperia, latrocinium mari terraque quaestus non modo licitus, sed etiam (à crudelitate, & ab agri colendi instrumentis abstinentibus) honorificus erat.[b] Quod autem fecerunt tunc Familiae parvae, id nunc faciunt Civitates, id est Familiae magnae, dominia sua securitatis causa, ad omnem periculi vel invasionis hostilis suspicionem augentes; & tum hostes, tum eos qui hostibus auxiliaturi videntur, quantum possunt vi & astu debellant aut debilitant; idque, quia aliter securi esse non possunt, justè. [84]

Neque securitatem quam quaerunt praestare potest paucorum hominum inter se conspiratio, quia in parvis numeris parva Sociorum accessio ad certam sufficit victoriam, animosque addit aggressoribus. Multitudo autem quae securitatis suae spem praestare potest, numero non certo, sed cum viribus hostium comparato determinatur, ut major sit quam ut excessus tanti & tam conspicui momenti ad Bellum finiendum sit, ut hostis ad aggrediendum provocetur.

Sit autem multitudo quantacunque, si tamen actiones eorum Iudiciis & Arbitriis multorum gubernentur, nullam inde expectare possunt securitatem, neque contra communem hostem, neque contra injurias alter alterius. Dissentientes enim inter se de Virium usu non sibi mutuò auxiliaturi sunt, sed oppositis consiliis vires ad nihilum reducturi. Vnde non modo à communi hoste facile superantur, sed etiam de commodis propriis inter se Bello certaturi sunt. Siquidem enim hominum numerus magnus, sine Potentia communi quae posset omnes cogere, in Aequitatem caeterasque Leges Naturae observandas consentire supponeretur, idem etiam de toto genere humano supponendum esset, itaque Regimine Civili omnino opus non esset, victuris scilicet hominibus in Pace, & sine Dominis.

3 tunc] om. 70 5 &] om. 70 9–10 ad certam sufficit] incertam reddit 70 12 ut] quò 70 12–13 excessus tanti & tam 68-Errata] excessus tanti ei tam 68; excessu aliquo 70 13 sit, ut] om. 70 19 reducturi] redacturi 70 20 superantur] superandi 70 21 Siquidem] Si 70

[c] = put trust, have confidence (OED, 'confide', v., 1).
[d] = the amount by which one quantity exceeds another (OED, 'odds', n., 2.a).
[e] = outcome (OED, 'event', n., 3.a).
[f] = drawn asunder, divided (OED, 'distract', v., 1).

And that continually.

Nor is it enough for the security, which men desire should last all the time of their life, that they be governed, [22]and directed by one judgement, for a[22] limited time; as in one Battell, or one Warre. For though they obtain a Victory by their unanimous endeavour against a forraign enemy; yet afterwards, when either they have no common enemy, or he that by one part is held for an enemy, is by another part held for a friend, [23]they[23] must needs by the difference of their [24]interests[24] dissolve, and fall again into a Warre amongst themselves.

Why certain creatures without reason, or speech, do neverthelesse live in Society, without any coërcive Power.

[25]It is true, that certain living[25] creatures, as Bees, and Ants, live [26]sociably one with another,[26] (which are °therefore° by Aristotle numbred amongst Politicall creatures;)[g] and yet have no other direction, than their particular judgements and appetites; nor speech, whereby one of them can signifie to another, what he thinks expedient [27] for the common benefit: [28]and therefore some man may perhaps desire to know, why Man-kind cannot do the same.[28] To which I answer,

First, that men are continually in competition for Honour and Dignity, which these creatures are not; and consequently amongst men there ariseth on that ground[29], Envy and Hatred, and finally Warre; but amongst these [30]not so.[30]

Secondly, that amongst these creatures, the Common good differeth not from the Private; and being by nature enclined to their private, they procure thereby the common benefit. But [31]man, whose Joy consisteth in comparing himselfe with other men, can relish nothing but what is eminent.[31]

Thirdly, that these creatures, having not °(as man)° the use of reason, do not see, nor think they see any fault, in the administration of [87] their common businesse: whereas amongst men, there are very many, that thinke themselves wiser, and able to govern the Publique, better than the rest; and these strive to reforme °and innovate,° one this way, another that way; and thereby [32]bring it into Distraction[h] and Civill[32] warre.

Fourthly, that these creatures, though they have [33]some use[33] of voice, in making knowne to one another their desires, °and other affections;° yet they want that art of words, by which some men can represent to others, that which is Good, in the likenesse of Evill; and Evill, in the likenesse of Good; [34]and augment, or diminish the apparent greatnesse of Good and Evill; discontenting men, and troubling their Peace at their pleasure.[34]

5 an] om. MS 6 a] om. MS 27 able MS] abler H, B 28 this way, another that] one way, another, another MS

Neque ad securitatem (quam perpetuam esse volunt) sufficit, ut gubernentur pro certo tantùm & determinato tempore, ut in uno praelio, vel Bello uno. Etsi enim (per conatum unanimem) hostem vincant, postea tamen, si communem hostem non habeant, vel si alii hostem, alii amicum, eundem putent, Societas necessariò dissolvetur, & propter voluntatum differentias, inter seipsos Bellum renovabitur.

Sed sunt, inquiet aliquis, Animalia quaedam bruta, ut Apes, & Formicae quae pacificè in eodem Alveari, & in eadem Formicaria inter se vivunt, habenturque ab Aristotele pro Animalibus Politicis,[g] regunturque suo unumquodque Iudicio & Appetitu, idque sine usu Sermonis quo significare alius alii possit, quid ad utilitatem communem conducere, vel non conducere existimet. Quid ergo impedit quo minùs homines idem faciant? Ad hoc respondeo.

Primò, Quod Homines inter se de Honoribus & Dignitate perpetuò contendunt; sed Animalia illa non item. Itaque inter homines Invidia, Odium, Bellum, propter eam (inter alias) causam saepe nascitur; inter illa rarissimè.

Secundò, Inter Animalia illa bonum Publicum & Privatum idem est. Ergo ad bonum Privatum dum naturaliter feruntur, simul procurant Bonum Commune. Homini autem in bonis propriis nihil tam jucundum est, quam quod alienis sunt majora. [85]

Tertio, Animalia illa, quia carent Ratione, in rerum suarum communium administratione nihil vident, aut videre sibi videntur, quod culpent; inter homines autem permulti sunt, qui se caeteris sapientiores, & regendae Civitatis capaciores esse putant, quique dum suo quisque modo reformare volunt, dissident inter se & Belli causa sunt.

Quarto, Animalia illa (etsi ad cupiditates suas significandas inter se vocis usum habeant quanto egent) verborum tamen arte illa carent, qua Homines alii aliis videri faciunt Bonum Malum, & Malum Bonum; Magnum Parvum; & Parvum Magnum; & alter alterius actiones ita reprehendit, ut inde turbae oriantur.

12 existimet 70] existimant 68 26–7 (etsi . . . egent)] etsi . . . egent, 70

---

[22] for only a certain and [23] their society [24] wills [25] But, someone will say, certain brute [26] peacefully in the same hive or the same anthill, [27] ^ or inexpedient [28] so what prevents men from doing the same? [29] ^ (among others) [30] very rarely. [31] to man, nothing is so pleasant about his own goods as the fact that they are greater than other people's. [32] disagree among themselves and are a cause of [33] as much use as they need [34] great as small, and small as great; and can find so much fault with one another's actions that disorders ensue.

---

[g] Aristotle, History of Animals, I.1, 488a8–13. [h] = disorder, dissension (OED, 'distraction', 3.b).

Fiftly, irrationall creatures cannot distinguish betweene Injury, and Dammage; and therefore as long as they be at ease, they are not offended with their fellowes: whereas Man is then most troublesome, when he [35]is most at ease:[35] for then it is that he loves to shew his Wisdome, [36]and controule[36 i] the Actions of them that governe the Common-wealth.

Lastly, the agreement of these creatures is Naturall; that of men, is by Covenant °only,° which is Artificiall: and therefore it is no wonder if there be somwhat else required (besides Covenant) to make their Agreement constant and lasting; which is a Common Power, to keep them [37] in awe, and to direct [38]their actions[38] to the Common Benefit.

The Generation of a Common-wealth.

The only way to erect such a Common Power, as may be able to defend them from the invasion of Forraigners, and the injuries of one another, and thereby to secure them in such sort, as that by their owne industrie, and by the fruites of the Earth, they may nourish themselves and live contentedly; is, [39]to conferre all their[39] power and strength upon one Man, or upon one Assembly of men, that may reduce all their Wills, °by plurality of voices,° unto one Will: which is as much as to say, to appoint one Man, or Assembly of men, to beare [40]their Person;[40] and every one to owne, and acknowledge himselfe to be Author of whatsoever [41]he that so beareth their Person, shall Act, or cause to be Acted, in those things which concerne the Common Peace and Safetie; and therein to submit their Wills, every one to his Will, and their Judgements, to his[41] Judgment. This is more than Consent, or Concord; it is a reall Unitie of them all, in one and the same Person, made by Covenant of every man with every man, in such manner, as if every man should say to every man, I [42]Authorise and give up my[42] Right of Governing my selfe, to this Man, or to this Assembly of men, on this condition, that [43]thou give up thy Right to him, and Authorise all his Actions in like manner.[43] This done, [44]the Multitude so united in one Person,[44] is called a COMMON-WEALTH, in latine CIVITAS. This is the Generation of that great LEVIATHAN, or rather (to speake more [45]reverently)[45] of that Mortall God, to which wee owe under the Immortall God, [46] our peace and defence. For by this [47] Authoritie, given him by every particular man °in the Common-Wealth,° he hath the use of so much Power and Strength [88] °conferred on him,° that by terror thereof, he is inabled to conforme the wills of them all, to Peace at home, and mutuall ayd against their enemies abroad. And in him consisteth the Essence of the Commonwealth; which (to define it,) is One Person, of whose Acts a great Multitude, by mutuall Covenants one with another, have made themselves every one the Author,

The Definition of a Common-wealth.

3 whereas] whereas as MS 14 fruites] fruite MS 30 of] om. MS 33–4 that . . . thereof, he is inabled to] as . . . thereof to MS 34 conforme MS; conforme {with con added as a cancel} some H {see Register of In-Press Variants}] forme H-Errata; performe H; perform B

Quintò, Animalia bruta inter Injuriam & Damnum non distinguunt. Itaque quamdiu bene sibi est, caeteris non invident. Homo autem tunc maximè molestus est, quando otio opibusque maximè abundat. Tunc enim sapientiam suam in Regentium actionibus reprehendendis ostentare amat.

Postremò, Animalium illorum consensio à Natura est; consensio autem hominum à pactis est, & Artificiale. Mirum ergo non est, si ad firmitatem & durationem ejus, aliud praeter pactum requiratur; nempe Potentia communis quam singuli metuant, & quae omnium actiones ad bonum commune ordinet.

Communem autem Potentiam constituendi, quae homines tum ab invasione exterorum, tum ab injuriis mutuis tueri possit, ita ut propriae industriae & telluris fructu contenti vivant & alantur, unica via haec est, ut Potentiam & Vim suam omnem in hominem vel hominum Coetum unum unusquisque transferat, unde voluntates omnium ad unicam reducantur, id est, ut unus homo vel coetus unus Personam gerat uniuscujusque hominis singularis; utque unusquisque authorem se esse fateatur actionum omnium quas egerit Persona illa, ejusque voluntati & judicio voluntatem suam submittat. Est autem hoc aliquid amplius quam consensio aut concordia. Est enim in Personam unam vera omnium Unio; quod fit per pactum uniuscujusque cum unoquoque; tanquam si unicuique unusquisque diceret, Ego huic homini (vel huic coetui) Authoritatem & Ius meum regendi meipsum concedo, ea conditione, ut tu quoque tuam Authoritatem & Ius tuum tui regendi in eundem transferas. Quo facto, Multitudo illa una Persona est, & vocatur Civitas & Respublica. Atque haec est Generatio magni illius Leviathan, vel (ut digniùs loquar) Mortalis Dei; cui Pacem & Protectionem sub Deo Immortali debemus omnem. Authoritate enim tanta ab omnibus & singulis collata, tantam Potentiam [86] & tantarum Virium usum habet, ut terrore earum voluntates omnium ad Pacem inter se, & ad conjunctionem contra hostes conformare possit. In quo consistit essentia Civitatis, quae sic Definitur. Civitas Persona una est, cujus Actionum, homines magno numero, per Pacta mutua uniuscujusque

17 egerit] gerit 70 26 Authoritate] Authoritas 70

35 has most leisure and wealth: 36 in finding fault with 37 ^ each 38 the actions of all of them 39 that each individual should transfer all of his 40 the person of each individual;
41 that person shall do; and submit his will to that person's will and 42 grant my authority and 43 you also transfer your authority and right of governing yourself to the same man or assembly.
44 that multitude is one person, and 45 becomingly) 46 ^ all 47 ^ so great i = challenge, find fault with (OED, 'control', v., 3; cf. the Latin: 'reprehendendis').

to the end he may use the strength and means of them all, as he shall [48]think expedient,[48] for their Peace and Common Defence.

Soveraigne, and Subject, what.

And he that carryeth [49]this Person, is called SOVERAIGNE, and[49] said to have Soveraigne Power; and every one besides, [50]his SUBIECT.[50]

The attaining to this Soveraigne Power, is by two wayes. One, by °Naturall° force; as when a man maketh his children, to submit themselves, °and their children° to his government, as being able to destroy them [51]if they refuse;[51] or by Warre subdueth his enemies to his will, giving them their lives on that condition. The other, is when men [52]agree amongst themselves, to submit[52] to some Man, or Assembly of men, voluntarily, on confidence to be protected °by him against all others.° This later, [53]may be called a Politicall Common-wealth, or Common-wealth by Institution; and the former, a Common-wealth by Acquisition.[53] And first, I shall speak of a Common-wealth by Institution.

3 carryeth] beareth MS

[48] choose, [49] the person of the commonwealth is [50] is called a 'subject' and a 'citizen'. [51] by not feeding them; [52] give sovereign power [53] is the institution of a commonwealth; the former is the acquisition of a commonwealth.

cum unoquoque fecerunt se Authores; eo fine, ut Potentia omnium arbitrio suo ad Pacem & Communem Defensionem uteretur. Is autem qui Civitatis Personam gerit, Summam habere dicitur Potestatem. Caeteri omnes Subditi & Cives appellantur. Potestas autem summa duobus modis habetur, quarum una est Vis, ut cum Pater Filios suos sibi obedire cogit; vitam enim illis, non alendo, auferre potest. Vel ut, qui victis hostibus ea conditione vitam condonat, ut imperata faciant. Alter modus est, quando homines sponte summam Potestatem in unum hominem vel coetum, spe Protectionis conferunt. Atque haec Civitatis Institutio; illa Civitatis Acquisitio est. Dicam autem primò de Civitate Instituta.

4 appellantur 68-Errata] appellatur 68 4 una] om. 70

CHAP. XVIII.

Of the RIGHTS of Soveraignes [1] by Institution.

The act of Instituting a Common-wealth, what.

A Common-wealth is said to be Instituted, when °a Multitude of° men do Agree, and Covenant, [2] every one, with every one, that to whatsoever Man, or Assembly of Men, shall be given by [3] the major part, the Right to [4]Present[4] the Person of them all, [5](that is to say, to be their Representative;)[5] every one, as well he that Voted for it, as he that Voted against it, [6]shall Authorise all the Actions and Judgements, of that Man, or Assembly of men, in the same manner, as if they were his own, to the end, to live peaceably amongst themselves, and be protected against other men.[6]

The Consequences to such Institution, are

From [7]this Institution of a Common-wealth are derived all the Rights, and Facultyes[a] of him, or them, on whom the Soveraigne Power is conferred by the consent of the People assembled.[7]

1. The Subjects cannot change the forme of government.

First, because they Covenant, it is to be understood, they are not obliged by former Covenant to any thing repugnant [8]hereunto. And Consequently they that have already Instituted a Common-wealth, being thereby bound by Covenant, to own the Actions, and Judgements of one, cannot lawfully make a new Covenant, amongst themselves,[8] to be obedient to any other, in any thing whatsoever, without [9]his permission.[9] And therefore, they that are subjects to a Monarch, cannot [10]without his leave cast off Monarchy, and return to the confusion of a disunited Multitude; nor transferre their Person from him that beareth it, to another Man, or other Assembly of men: for they [89] are bound, every man to every man, to Own, and be reputed Author of all, that he that already is their Soveraigne, shall do, and judge fit to be done: so that any one man dissenting, all the rest should break their Covenant made to that man, which is injustice: and they have also every man given the Soveraignty to him that beareth their Person; and therefore if they depose him, they take from him that which is his own, and so again it is injustice.[10] Besides, if he that attempteth to [11]depose his Soveraign, be killed, or pun-

2 RIGHTS of Soveraignes] consequences and Rights of soueraignty MS 6 Present] beare MS 12–13 Consequences] consequents MS 13 the H-Errata;{the added by TH} MS] om. H, B

[1] ^ in a commonwealth [2] ^ of their own accord, [3] ^ the votes of [4] bear
[5] they shall all be obedient. Therefore

CAPVT XVIII.

De Iure habentium Potestatem Summam in Civitate per Institutionem.

Instituitur Civitas, quando homines sponte sua convenientes singuli cum singulis paciscuntur, ut cuicunque homini vel coetui pars major suffragiis suis Personam omnium gerendi Ius contribuit, illi omnes obedirent. Obligatur ergo unusquisque eorum, sive suffragium suum in illum contulerit, sive non contulerit, illi quem major pars elegerit obedire, & pro Authore actionum illius omnium habendus est. Nam nisi in parte suffragiorum majore intelligantur comprehensa suffragia omnium, frustra conventum est, & contra finem ab unoquoque sibi propositum, nempe Pacem & Protectionem omnium.

A forma Institutionis, tum Potestas omnis, & Iura omnia summam habentis Potestatem, tum Civium omnium officia derivantur.

Primò, ex eo quod Pacti sunt, intelligitur, Quod nullis Pactis prioribus obligati erant ad id quod Pacto praesenti contrarium est. Itaque qui Civitatis alicujus jam Cives sunt, Pactum novum inire non possunt quo Personam suam in alium transferre, vel cuiquam alii (non permittente qui Summam habet Potestatem) in re quacunque obedire obligentur; &, per consequens, qui sub Monarcha Cives [87] sunt, neque Monarchiam rejicere, neque ad Libertatem naturae relabi, si noluerit qui habet Summam Potestatem, vel quilibet alius Civium, Iure possunt. Violarent enim Pactum initum cum singulis; & Potestatem Summam Iure jam habenti datam, contra Ius eriperent. Praeterea si qui eam eripere conaretur, interfectus aut quocunque supplicio

18 obligentur 70] obligetur 68 23 qui] quis 70 23 conaretur] conaretur, is 70

---

[6] is obliged to obey the man who was elected by the majority, and must be considered author of all his actions. For unless the votes of all are understood to be contained in the votes of the majority, the agreement is in vain, and contrary to the end which each person intended, namely, peace and the protection of all. [7] the form of institution are derived all the power and all the rights of the sovereign, and the duties of all the citizens.

[8] to the present covenant. Therefore they who are already citizens of some commonwealth cannot make a new covenant by which they would be obliged to transfer their person to another, or [9] the permission of the sovereign.

[10] rightfully cast off monarchy, or return to the liberty of nature, against the wishes of the sovereign, or of any other citizen. For they would break the covenant made with each individual, and would wrongfully seize the sovereign power which had rightfully been given to its present holder.

[11] seize it, be killed, or punished in any way,

---

[a] = conferred powers (OED, 'faculty', 11.a).

ished by him for such attempt,[11] he is author of his own punishment, °as being by the Institution, Author of all his Soveraign shall do:° And because it is injustice for a man to do any thing, for which he may be punished by his own authority, he is also upon that title, unjust. And whereas some men have pretended for their disobedience to their Soveraign, a new Covenant, made, not with men, but with God;[b] this also is unjust: for there is no Covenant with God, but by mediation of some body that representeth [12]Gods Person;[12] which none doth but [13]Gods Lieutenant,[13] who hath the Soveraignty under God. But this pretence of Covenant with God, is [14]so evident a[14] lye, even in the pretenders own consciences, [15]that it is not onely an act of an unjust, but also of a vile, and unmanly disposition.[15]

2. Soveraigne Power cannot be forfeited.

Secondly, [16]Because the Right of bearing the Person of them all, is given to him they make Soveraigne, by Covenant onely of one to another, and not of him to any of them; there can happen no breach of Covenant on the part of the Soveraigne; and consequently none of his Subjects, by any pretence of forfeiture, can be freed from his Subjection. That he which is made Soveraigne maketh no Covenant with his Subjects before-hand, is manifest; because either he must make it with the whole multitude, as one party to the Covenant; or he must make a severall Covenant with every man. With the whole, as one party, it is impossible; because as yet they are not one Person: and if he make so many severall Covenants as there be men, those Covenants after he hath the Soveraignty are voyd, because what act soever can be pretended by any one of them for breach thereof, is the act both of himselfe, and of all the rest, because done in the Person, and by the Right of every one of them in particular. Besides, if any one, or more of them, pretend a breach of the Covenant made by the Soveraigne at his Institution; and others, or one other of his Subjects, or himselfe alone, pretend there was no such breach, there is in this case, no Judge to decide the controversie: it returns therefore to the Sword again; and every man recovereth the right of Protecting himselfe by his own strength, contrary to the designe they had in the Institution.

18 either] om. MS 26 one] any B

[12] God; [13] him [14] an evident [15] and not only an unjust act, but a most vile one.

[16] the sovereign power cannot be taken away from the holder of it on account of the bad government of the commonwealth; first because, since he bears the person of the whole commonwealth, the things he does as actor are done by the commonwealth as author. But who would accuse the commonwealth? Again, he on whom the sovereign power is conferred does not covenant with any of those who confer it; so he cannot do an injury to any of them that would justify depriving him of it. For either he has covenanted with the whole multitude as if with one person, which could not have happened before he was chosen, because that multitude was not yet a person; or he has covenanted with each individual separately, which means that as soon as he was chosen, each individual has become the author of that bad government for which he affectus fuerit, supplicii proprii Author esset; & quia Injustum est, quod facientis ipsius Authoritate puniri potest, eo quoque nomine Injustum. Quod autem Cives quidam contumaciae Pactum praetenderunt novum, non cum hominibus, sed cum Deo initum,[b] id quoque Injustum erat. Pactum enim cum Deo iniri non potest, nisi mediante aliquo, qui Deum representat; id quod solus facit is, qui Summam sub Deo habet Potestatem. Sed pretensio illa Pacti cum Deo, manifestum mendacium erat, neque Injustum tantùm, sed vilissimum factum esse, cognoverunt ipsi praetendentes.

Secundò, Summa Potestas propter malam Reipublicae administrationem, habenti tolli non potest; primò quia cum totius Civitatis Personam gerat, quae ut Actor facit ille, ut Author facit Civitas. Quis autem est, qui Civitatem ream faciet? Deinde is in quem confertur Potestas Summa, cum nemine paciscitur conferentium; & proinde nemini eorum Injuriam potest facere propter quam Potestate sua privaretur. Aut enim Pactus est cum tota multitudine quasi cum una Persona, quod non potuit fieri antequam eligeretur, quia multitudo illa una Persona nondum erat; aut cum singulis seorsim, & sic simul atque electus est, unusquisque malae administrationis, cujus reum faciunt illum Author ipse est, & accusat seipsum. Velle ergo Pactis illum obligare qui Summam habet Potestatem, est ipsam Civitatem obligare velle. Verùm si concedamus, illum qui Summam habet Potestatem, Pacta cum Civitate & inire & violare posse, is autem cum violaverit violasse negaverit, quis litem hanc determinabit? Nisi autem determinetur, reditur ad Anarchiam, nec Civitas amplius est. Si determinetur à Civitate, ab ipso determinatur, qui Personam Civitatis gerit, id est à Potestatem Summam jam habente. Quem qui Pactis

1 fuerit] om. 70 2 puniri 70] punire 68 4 erat] fuit 70 5 representat] repraesentet 70 19 Potestatem 70] Potestatum 68 22 autem] enim 70

[b] This may refer to either the Scottish National Covenant of Feb. 1638 (cf. Behemoth, ed. Seaward, p. 143 (fo. 14v): 'a Couenant amongst themselues, which impudently they called a Couenant with God, to put downe Episcopacy, without consulting with the King'), or the Solemn League and Covenant of Sept. 1643. Those covenants were, however, oaths sworn 'before' or 'in the presence of' God, not covenants with him, though the former did contain a reference to 'Christians who have renewed their covenant with God' (Gardiner, ed., Constitutional Documents, pp. 133, 271). Royalist writers commonly treated the latter as a pretended covenant with God: see, e.g., Bramhall, Works, iii, p. 282.

It is therefore in vain to grant Soveraignty by way of precedent Covenant. The opinion that any Monarch receiveth his Power by Covenant, that is to say on Condition, proceedeth from want of understanding this easie truth, that Covenants being but words, and breath, have no force to oblige, contain, constrain, or protect any man, but what it has from the publique Sword; that is, from the untyed hands of that Man, or Assembly of men that hath the Soveraignty, and whose actions are avouched by them [90] all, and performed by the strength of them all, in him united.[16] But when an Assembly of men is made Soveraigne; then no man imagineth any such Covenant to have past °in the Institution;° for no man is so dull as to say, for example, the People of Rome, [17]made a Covenant with the Romans, to hold the Soveraignty on such or such conditions; which not performed,[17] the Romans might lawfully depose the Roman People. That men see not the [18]reason[18] to be alike in a Monarchy, and in a Popular Government, proceedeth from the ambition of [19]some, that are kinder to the goverment of an Assembly, whereof they may hope to participate, than of Monarchy, which they despair to enjoy.[19]

3 No man can without injustice protest against the Institution of the Soveraigne declared by the major part.

Thirdly, [20]because the major part hath by consenting voices declared a Soveraigne; he that dissented must now consent with the rest; that is, be contented to avow all the actions he shall do, or else justly be destroyed by the rest. For if he voluntarily entered into the Congregation of them that were assembled, he sufficiently declared thereby his will (and therefore tacitely covenanted) to stand to what the major part should ordayne: and therefore if he refuse to stand thereto, or make Protestation against any of their Decrees, he does contrary to his Covenant, and therfore unjustly. And whether he be of the Congregation, or not; and whether his consent be asked, or not, he must either submit to their decrees, or be left in the condition of warre he was in before; wherein he might without injustice be destroyed by any man whatsoever.[20]

7 and] om. MS 10 example,] example, that MS 27 might] may MS

---

is accused, and each individual is accusing himself. Therefore to wish to oblige the sovereign by covenants is to wish to oblige the commonwealth itself. But if we grant that the sovereign can both make and break covenants with the commonwealth, who will decide the controversy when he has broken a covenant and then denied that he has broken it? If it is not decided, there is a return to anarchy, and the commonwealth is no more. If it is decided by the commonwealth, it is decided by him who bears the person of the commonwealth, that is, by the present sovereign. Those who think that he is obliged by covenants seem to be deceived by their failure to distinguish between obligations, which are made by words, and ligatures, which are made by ropes; and they do not consider words in themselves to be weak. Once a sovereign power has been set up and armed, only then do even words become like ropes, thanks to the might of such a great power. They are also partly deceived insofar as they have imagined that a multitude of men gathering together in one place, even before they have agreed about the sovereign power, are not only persons but a person – one that speaks and acts apart from the individual men.

obligari existimant, eo videntur decepti esse, quod non distinguant inter obligationes quae fiunt per Verba, & ligationes quae fiunt per capistra; nec cogitant verba per se infirma esse. Postquam autem Summa Potestas constituta & armata est, tum demum vi tantae Potestatis etiam verba capistra fiunt. Partim etiam eo decepti sunt, quod multitudinem hominum in unum locum convenientium, etiam antequam de Summa Potestate consenserint, non modo Personas, sed Personam esse, & seorsim à singularibus Loqui & [88] Agere imaginati sint. Quando vero in coetu Populari Potestas Summa collocata est, Pactum talem intervenisse nemo dicit. Quis enim adeo hebes est, ut Populum (exempli causa) Romanum, qui Imperium Romae Summum habuit quondam, Summam illam Potestatem tenuisse per Pactum cum Romanis, & proinde Populum Romanum à Romanis (nisi bene regnasset) deponi potuisse dicat? Quod autem in Monarchia, & Statu Populari quaestionem hanc eandem esse non omnes videant, causa est ipsorum Ambitio, Coetui potius quam uni homini faventium; quia sub uno homine Vulgus sunt, sed sub coetu Regnantis pars sunt.

Tertiò, Si consensu partis majoris Summa Potestas semel constituta sit, nemini eorum cui factum displicet, suffragii sui in contrarium testes poscere, vel memoriam rei extare, postulare licitum est. Postulatio enim talis factum mutare volentis est; & per consequens, paci factae renuntiantis, & Bellum contra caeteros denuntiantis, & in conditionem Naturae, quam fugiebat (contra finem, quem habuit quando cum caeteris in conventum venit) redeuntis.

20 est; & per consequens, this edn.] est, & per consequens; 68, 70

[17] which once had sovereign power at Rome, held that sovereign power by a covenant with the Romans, and thus if it did not rule well, [18] issue [19] those who prefer an assembly to one man; because under one man they are the common people, but under an assembly they are part of the ruler.

[20] if the sovereign power has once been instituted by the consent of the majority, it is not lawful for any of those who dislike what has been done to invoke his own contrary vote, or to demand that it be recorded. For such a demand is the demand of one who wishes to change what has been done, and consequently to renounce the peace that has been made, to declare war on the others, and to return (contrary to the purpose which he had when he came into the meeting with the others) to the condition of nature which he was fleeing.

4 The Soveraigns Actions cannot be justly accused by the Subject.

Fourthly, because every [21]Subject is by this Institution Author of all the Actions, and Judgments of the Soveraigne Instituted; it followes, that whatsoever he doth, it can be no injury to any of his Subjects; nor ought he to be by any of them accused of Injustice. For he that doth any thing by authority from another, doth therein no injury to him by whose authority he acteth: But by this Institution of a Common-wealth, every particular man is Author of all the Soveraigne doth; and consequently he that complaineth of injury from his Soveraigne, complaineth of that whereof he himselfe is Author; and therefore ought not to accuse any man but himselfe; no nor himselfe of injury; because to do injury to ones selfe, is impossible. It is true that they that have Soveraigne power, may commit Iniquity; but not Injustice, or Injury in the proper signification.[21]

5. What soever the Soveraigne doth, is unpunishable by the Subject.

Fiftly, °and consequently to that which was sayd last,° no man that hath Soveraigne power can °iustly° be put to death, or otherwise in any manner by his [22]Subjects punished. For seeing every Subject is Author of the actions of his Soveraigne; he punisheth another, for the actions committed by himselfe.[22]

The Soveraigne is judge of what is necessary for the Peace and Defence of his Subjects.

[23]And because the End of this Institution, is the Peace and Defence of them all;[23] and whosoever has right to the End, has right to the Means; it belongeth °of Right,° to whatsoever Man, or Assembly that hath the Soveraignty, to be Judge both of the meanes of Peace and Defence; [24]and also of the hindrances, and disturbances of the same; and to do whatsoever he shall think necessary to be done, both before hand, for the preserving of Peace and Security, by prevention of Discord at home, and [91] Hostility from abroad; and, when Peace and Security are lost, for the recovery of the same. And therefore,[24]

1–5 The Soveraigns . . . Subject] {The soueraigne can {doe*? page cut*} no injury to his subiect added by TH} MS 5 acteth] does MS 11–12 but not Injustice . . . signification] Iniustice or injury in the proper signification not MS 18 The this edn.; {6. del. by TH} The MS] 6. The H, B 20 that] om. MS 22 hindrances] hinderance MS

---

[21] one of those who conferred the sovereign power is, by this institution, author of all the actions of the man on whom they conferred it, it is evident that no injury can be done by the sovereign to any of those who conferred it. For whatever he does is the deed of its author, that is, of each individual; and no one can do an injury to himself. I have not denied that the sovereign can act iniquitously [or: 'inequitably']. For that which is done against the law of nature is called 'iniquitous', and that which is done against the civil law is called 'unjust'. For justice and injustice did not exist before the commonwealth was set up.

[22] citizens rightfully punished. For he who cannot do an injury cannot even be accused – still less, condemned. For whatever he has done, the author of it is each individual citizen.

[23] Sixthly, because the end of the institution of the commonwealth is peace and defence;

[24] and to judge, either at a moment of danger or (for the sake of prevention) before that moment, what needs to be done, either to preserve peace among the citizens and security against enemies, or to repair the damage sustained by the commonwealth.

Quartò, Quoniam per Institutionem ipsam, omnium Actionum illius in quem Summam contulerunt Potestatem, Author est conferentium unusquisque; manifestum est, Quod ab habente Summam Potestatem nemini conferentium fieri posse Injuriam. Nam factum Authoris, id est uniuscujusque est quicquid ille fecerit. Sibi ipsi autem Injuriam facere nemo potest. Quin is qui Summam habet Potestatem facere iniquè possit, non negaverim. Iniquum enim quod contra Legem Naturae, Injustum quod contra Legem Civilem factum est, appellatur. Nam Iustum aut Injustum ante Civitatem constitutam nihil erat.

Quintò, non potest qui Summam habet Potestatem à Civibus occidi, aut quomodocunque Iure puniri. Nam qui Injuriam facere non potest, ne Reus quidem fieri, multo minus condemnari potest. Quicquid enim fecit, facti Author est Civium unusquisque.

Sextò, Quia Civitatis instituendae finis Pax est & Defensio; & quicunque in finem Ius habet, Ius etiam in media habet, sequitur, ut cuicunque sive Homini, sive Coetui tribuitur Potestas Summa eidem etiam de mediis ad Pacem & Defensionem Iudicatio tributa sit, & ut tum in ipso periculo, tum (praeventionis causa) ante periculum, judicet, quid factu necessarium sit, tum ad Pacem Civium inter se, & securitatem contra hostes conservandam, tum ad damna Civitatis resarcienda.

4 posse Injuriam] possit Injuria 70

6. And Iudge of what Doctrines are fit to be taught them.

[25]Sixtly,[25] it is annexed to the Soveraignty, to be Judge of what [26]Opinions and Doctrines[26] are averse, and what conducing to Peace; and °consequently,° on what occasions, how farre, and what, men are to be trusted withall, in speaking to Multitudes of people; and [27]who shall examine the Doctrines of all bookes before they be published.[27] For the Actions of men proceed from their Opinions; and in the wel governing of Opinions, consisteth the well governing of [28]mens Actions, in order to their[28] Peace, and Concord. And though in matter of Doctrine, [29]nothing ought to be regarded but the Truth; yet this is not repugnant to regulating of the same by[29] Peace. For Doctrine repugnant to Peace, can no more be True, than Peace and Concord can be [30]against the Law of Nature.[30] It is true, that in a Common-wealth, where by the negligence, or unskilfullnesse of Governours, and Teachers, false Doctrines are by time generally received; °the contrary° Truths may be generally offensive: Yet the most sudden, °and rough° busling[c] in of a new Truth, that can be, does never breake the Peace, but only somtimes awake the [31] Warre. For those men that are so remissely governed, that they dare take up Armes, to [32]defend, or introduce an Opinion, are still in Warre; and their condition not Peace, but only a Cessation of Armes for feare of one another; and they[32] live as it were, in the procincts[d] of battaile °continually.° It belongeth therefore to him that hath the Soveraign Power, to be Judge, [33]or constitute all Judges of[33] Opinions and Doctrines, as a thing [34]necessary to Peace; therby to prevent[34] Discord and Civill Warre.

1 6. this edn.; {6. added by TH} MS] om. H, B 1 Iudge] om. MS 3 withall, in] w^th^ MS
4 Doctrines] doctrine MS 6 of] om. MS 16 that they dare take up] as they dare take MS
18 a Cessation of Armes] cessation of armes in them MS

[25] Seventhly, [26] things [27] what books shall be published, and who shall examine them.
[28] citizens, from which there proceeds [29] the sole aim is truth; doctrines, if they are true, are not opposed to [30] ^ said to be [31] ^ slumbering
[32] introduce a new opinion, already had an intention to rebel. The fact that they had not attacked was due to fear – namely, the fear felt by people who [33] of all
[34] that is very often the cause and origin of [c] = bustling, probably in the sense of 'scuffling, contending, elbowing one's way through a crowd' (OED 'bustle', v.[1], 3; the Latin has 'apparitio', 'appearance').

[d] See above, Ch. 11, note g.

Septimò, Summae Potestati adhaeret, quae ad conservationem vel [89] violationem Pacis tendunt decernere, & quando, quatenus, quibus apud multitudinem concionari permittendum sit, & qui libri publicandi, & à quibus examinandi sint. Actiones enim ab Opinionibus ortum habent: in harum ergo regulatione consistit regulatio Civium, unde oritur Pax & Concordia. Quanquam autem Doctrinarum, veritas sola scopus sit, Paci tamen, si verae sunt, non repugnant. Doctrinae enim Paci contrariae verae esse non possunt, nisi etiam Pax & Concordia contrariae dicantur Legibus naturalibus. In Civitatibus quidem, Rectorum Doctorumque negligentiâ aut imperitiâ, errores progressu temporis universaliter pro veris recipi, & veritates displicere possunt, veritatis tamen novae utcunque subita apparitio, etsi sopitum Bellum aliquando excitare possit, Pacem tamen nunquam violat. Qui enim adeo remissè regnatur ut Opinionis novae introducendae causa, capere arma audeat, etiam tunc animum rebellandi habuit. Quod autem non aggressus sit, à metu est, viventis nempe quasi in procinctu praelii. Ad Summam ergo Potestatem attinet Opinionum & Doctrinarum omnium Iudicatio, ut quae discordiarum Bellique Civilis saepissimè causa & origo esse solent.

1 adhaeret this edn.] adhaerent 68, 70

7 The Right of making Rules, whereby the Subjects may every man know what is so his owne, as no other Subject can without injustice take it from him.

[35]Seventhly, is annexed to the Soveraigntie, the whole power of prescribing[35] the Rules, whereby every man may know, what Goods he [36]may enjoy, and what Actions he may doe,[36] without being molested by any of his fellow [37]Subjects: And this is it men call Propriety.[37] For before the constitution of Soveraign Power °(as hath already been shewn)°[e] all men had right to all things; which °necessarily° causeth Warre: and therefore [38]this Proprietie, being necessary to Peace, and depending on Soveraign Power, is the Act of that Power, in order to the publique peace. These Rules of Propriety (or Meum and Tuum)[f] and of Good, Evill, Lawfull, and Unlawfull in the actions of Subjects, are[38] the Civill Lawes; that is to say, the Lawes of [39]each Common-wealth in particular;[39] though the name of Civill Law be now restrained to the antient Civill Lawes of the City of Rome; [40]which being the head of a great part of the World, her Lawes at that time were in these parts the Civill Law.[40]

8 To him also belongeth the Right of all Judicature and decision of Controversies:

[41]Eightly,[41] is annexed to the Soveraigntie, the Right of Judicature; that is to say, of hearing [42]and deciding all Controversies, which may arise concerning Law, either Civill, or Naturall, or concerning Fact. For without the decision of Controversies,[42] there is no protection of one [43]Subject,[43] against the injuries of another; the Lawes concerning Meum and Tuum[g] are in vaine; and [44]to every man remaineth, from the naturall and necessary appetite of his own conservation, the right of protecting himselfe by his private strength, which is the condition [92] of Warre; and contrary to the end for which every Common-wealth is instituted.[44]

9. And of making War, and Peace, as he shall think best:

[45]Ninthly,[45] is annexed to the Soveraignty, °the Right of° making Warre, and Peace with other Nations, and Common-wealths[46]; that is to say, of Judging [47]when it is for the publique good, and how great forces are to be assembled, armed, and payd for that end; and to levy mony upon the Subjects, to defray the expenses thereof.[47] For the Power by which the people are to be defended, consisteth in their Armies; and the strength of an Army, in the [48]union of their strength under one Command; which Command the Soveraign Instituted, therefore hath; because the command of the Militia, without other Institution, maketh him that hath it Soveraign. And therefore whosoever is made Generall of an Army, he that hath the Soveraign Power is alwayes Generallissimo.[48] [h]

2 Goods] goods euery MS 4–5 every man know] know euery man MS 4 the MS] om. H, B 24 9.] 4. B

Octavò, ejusdem Summae Potestatis Ius est, Regulas praescribere, quibus, quid sit suum unusquisque sciat & fruatur, sine molestia à concivibus; & quid Agere licitè possit, & quid licitè non possit; id est regulas praescribere circa rerum Proprietatem. Nam ante Summam Potestatem constitutam Ius erat omnibus in omnia, quod erat causa Belli. Regulae ergo quibus definiuntur Meum, & Tuum; & in Actionibus Bonum, Malum, Licitum, Illicitum, à quibus dependet Pax Civium, ab habente Potestatem Summam praescribendae sunt. Vocantur autem Regulae illae Leges Civiles, sive Civitatis illius Leges cujus Civibus praescribuntur, quanquam nomen illud Lex Civilis restringatur hodie ad significandum Leges Romanas antiquas, quia Civitatis Romanae propter Imperium Romanum latè expansum nos etiam olim pars fuimus.

Nonò, Summae Potestatis etiam est, Ius Iudicandi, id est causas omnes, tum Iuris tum Facti cognoscendi, & controversias omnes decidendi. Nam alioqui Civibus ab Injuriis mutuis protectio nulla esset, & Leges de Meo & Tuo frustra essent, manerentque homines in conditione Belli omnium contra omnes.

Decimò, Ejusdem Summae Potestatis est cum aliis Civitatibus Bellum & Pacem facere suo arbitrio, id est Iudicare utrum Bono an Malo Civitatis Bellum futurum sit necne, quantaeque copiae comparandae, & quomodo à Civibus alendae sint. Civium enim tutela ab [90] exercitibus dependet, exercituum robur à Civitatis Vnitate, Civitatis Vnitas ab unica Summam habentis Potestatem Persona. Etiam Militiae Ius (etiam solum) Summa est Potestas; quia Ius in milites est Ius in Potentiam totius Civitatis.

22 Etiam] om. 70 23 milites est this edn.] milites est, 68; milites, est 70

---

35 Eighthly, it is a right of the sovereign power to prescribe 36 owns, and enjoy them,
37 citizens; and what he may, or may not, lawfully do, that is, to prescribe the rules concerning the ownership of things.
38 the rules defining mine and thine, and (in actions) good, evil, lawful, and unlawful, on which the citizens' peace depends, must be prescribed by the sovereign. Those rules are called 39 that commonwealth to whose citizens they are prescribed;
40 because, thanks to the wide extent of the Roman Empire, we too were once part of the Roman commonwealth. 41 Ninthly,
42 all cases, both concerning law and concerning fact, and of deciding all controversies. For otherwise 43 citizen 44 men remain in the condition of a war of all against all. 45 Tenthly,
46 ^ as it chooses
47 whether a war will benefit or harm the commonwealth, the size of the forces that are to be assembled, and by what means they are to be maintained by the citizens.
48 unity of the commonwealth, and the unity of the commonwealth in the single person of the sovereign. Furthermore, the right over the militia, even by itself, is the sovereign power; because the right to the soldiers is the right to the power of the whole commonwealth.

---

e See above, Chs. 13, pp. 190–93; 14, pp. 198–201. f = 'mine' and 'thine'. g See above, note f.
h = supreme commander of more than one military force (OED, 'generalissimo').

10. And of choosing all Counsellours, and Ministers, both of Peace, and Warre:

[49]Tenthly,[49] is annexed to the Soveraignty, the choosing of all Counsellours, Ministers, Magistrates, °and Officers,° both in Peace, and War. For [50]seeing the Soveraign is charged with the End, which is the common Peace and Defence; he is understood to have Power[50] to use such Means, as he shall think most fit for his discharge.

11. And of Rewarding, and Punishing, and that (where no former Law hath determined the measure of it) arbitrarily:

[51]Eleventhly,[51] to the Soveraign is committed the Power of Rewarding with riches, [52]or honour; and of Punishing with corporall, or pecuniary punishment, or with ignominy every Subject[52] according to the Law he hath formerly made; or if there be no [53]Law made,[53] according as he shall judge most to conduce to the encouraging of [54]men to serve the Common-wealth, or deterring of them from doing dis-service to the same.[54]

12. And of Honour and Order.

Lastly, considering what values men are naturally apt to set upon themselves; [55] what respect they look for from others; [56]and how little they value other men;[56] from whence continually arise amongst them, °Emulation,° Quarrells, Factions, and at last Warre, [57]to the destroying of one another, and diminution of their strength against a Common Enemy; It is necessary that there be Lawes of Honour, and a publique rate of the worth of such men as have deserved, or are able to deserve well of the Common-wealth; and that there be force in the hands of some or other, to put those Lawes in execution. But it hath already been shewn, that not onely the whole Militia, or forces of the Common-wealth; but also the Judicature of all Controversies, is annexed to the Soveraignty. To the Soveraign therefore it belongeth also to give titles of Honour; and to appoint what Order of place, and dignity, each man shall hold; and what signes of respect, in publique or private meetings, they shall give to one another.[57]

1 all] all his MS 11 arbitrarily this edn.; arbitrarily MS] arbitrary H, B 22 it] om. MS

[49] Eleventhly,
[50] he who is charged with procuring peace and defence is also given the right
[51] Twelfthly, [52] and honours; and of punishing transgressors
[53] punishment fixed by law, to make penal laws, [54] the virtuous and deterring of the wicked.[i]
[55] ^ and [56] , whom they think unworthy of the same respect;
[57] we shall acknowledge that disputes about the honour and rank of citizens also tend to the dissolution of the commonwealth, and that they need the coercive action of the sovereign power. Therefore it is necessary that there be laws defining the honour that each man should give to another, in public and private meetings. So it is a right of that same sovereign power to confer titles and decide the ranks of citizens.

[i] Hobbes's translation seems to abridge the sense in a misleading way; it is emended here.

Vndecimò, Ejusdem potestatis est Consiliarios, Magistratus, Ministrosque omnes tam Pacis quam Belli eligendi Ius. Cui enim Pacis & Defensionis procurandae imponitur onus, eidem Ius conceditur Mediis quibus se exoneret pro arbitrio suo utendi.

Duodecimò, Ejusdem Potestatis Ius est Praemia, ut Divitias Honoresque bene merentibus tribuendi, & transgressoribus Poenas Legibus praefinitas infligendi. Vel si poena Lege statuta non sit, faciendi Leges poenales quae sibi ad excitandos probos & terrendos improbos[i] videbuntur commodissimae.

Postremò, si cogitemus quanti unusquisque se aestimet, quantumque ab aliis sibi honoris deferri cupit, quibus ipse tantundem tribuere indignum putat, unde Simultates, Factiones, & Bellum denique nasci solet, fatebimur ad Civitatis dissolutionem tendere etiam controversias de Honore & Ordine Civium, & Potestatis Summae coërcitione indigere. Necessariae ergo sunt Leges quibus quis cuique Honor tribuendus sit, in congressibus & alloquiis definiatur. Itaque conferendi Titulos, Ordinesque Civium distinguendi,

8 ad excitandos probos & this edn.] ad excitandos & 68; ad 70

13 coërcitione 68-Errata] coërcione 68; coërtione 70

These Rights are indivisible.

[58]These are the Rights, which make the Essence of Soveraignty; and which are the markes, whereby a man may discern in what Man, or Assembly of men, the Soveraign Power is placed, and resideth. For these are incommunicable,[j] and inseparable. The Power to coyn Mony; to dispose of the estate and persons of Infant heires; to have praeemption[k] in Markets; and all other Statute Praerogatives, may be transferred by the Soveraign; and yet the Power to protect his Subjects be retained. But if he transferre the Militia, he retains the Judicature [93] in vain, for want of execution of the Lawes: Or if he grant away the Power of raising Mony; the Militia is in vain: or if he give away the government of Doctrines, men will be frighted into rebellion with the feare of Spirits. And so if we consider any one of the said Rights, we shall presently[l] see, that the holding of all the rest, will produce no effect, in the conservation of Peace and Justice, the end for which all Common-wealths are Instituted, without it. And this division is it, whereof it is said,[58] a Kingdome divided in it selfe cannot stand:[m] For unlesse [59]this division precede, division[59] into opposite Armies can never happen. [60]If there had not first been an opinion received of the greatest part of England, that these Powers[60] were divided between the King, and the Lords, and the House of Commons, [61]the people had never been divided, and fallen into this Civill Warre; first between those that disagreed in Politiques; and after between the Dissenters[n] about the liberty of Religion; which have so instructed men in this point of Soveraign Right, that[61] there be few now (in England,) that do not see, that these Rights are inseparable, and will be °so° generally acknowledged, at the next return of Peace; and so continue, till their miseries are forgotten; and no longer, except the vulgar be better taught °than they have hetherto been.°

13–14 Instituted, without it this edn.; instituted without it MS] Instituted H, B
19–21 those that disagreed . . . Religion] the temporall factions of parlamentarians and royalists, by the name of Roundheads and Caualiers, and since betweene the doctrinall factions of presbyterians and Independants MS 22 see] see, though too late MS 24–5 and no longer, except . . . been] and (except . . . haue hetherto bene) no longer

[58] And these are the principal rights of the sovereign, as has been amply demonstrated here, and could have been demonstrated more briefly by the following single argument. No one will deny that all these rights belong to the commonwealth; but the commonwealth can neither speak nor act except through its person (namely, the sovereign). Therefore all these rights are the rights of the sovereign in the commonwealth, whether it be a man or an assembly of men. The same sovereign also has other rights, but lesser ones, and ones that differ in different commonwealths; these, however, can be given away without losing the power to protect the citizens, and they can be transferred to private citizens. But those greater rights which we have enumerated cannot be transferred. For if the right over the militia is given away, the right of judicature will be in vain, for lack of power. If the right of raising money is given away, there will be no soldiers. If the right to govern doctrines is given away, superstitious citizens will be moved to rebellion by their own imaginings. In sum, if any one of the above rights be absent, all the rest will fail, and there will be the division of which Christ himself spoke when he said, ejusdem Summae Potestatis Ius est. Atque haec sunt Iura Summam habentis Potestatem principalia, ut ampliter hic demonstratum est, & brevius demonstrari potuit unico hoc argumento. Iura enim haec omnia quin Civitatis sint negabit nemo; Civitas autem nisi per Personam suam (nempe eum qui Summam habet Potestatem) neque Loqui neque Agere potest. Sunt ergo Iura haec omnia illius, qui in Civitate Summam habet Potestatem, sive is Homo sit, sive Coetus hominum. Sunt autem & alia Iura ejusdem, sed minora, & in diversis Civitatibus diversa, quibus tamen amissis Cives protegendi potentia non amittitur, & quae transferri possunt ad Cives privatos. Sed illa quae enumeravimus Iura majora transferri non possunt. Iure enim Militiae amisso, Ius Iudicandi propter defectum Potentiae frustra erit. Iure exigendi pecuniam amisso, milites nulli erunt. Iure Regulandi doctrinas amisso, animabuntur Cives superstitiosi ad rebellionem à suis ipsorum Phantasiis. Summatim, si Iurium dictorum quodlibet unum desit, caetera cessabunt omnia, fietque divisio de qua Christus ipse loquens dixit, Regnum divisum in seipso stare non potest.[m] Nisi enim Iurium horum divisio antecedat, divisio populi in exercitus oppositos nulla erit. Opinio docentium Iura Regni Anglicani divisa esse inter [91] Regem, Proceres, & Coetum Communium, causa fuit Belli quod sequutum est Civilis; etiam disputationes de quaestionibus Politicis & Theologicis, quibus tamen populus ita nunc de Iure Regio eruditus est, ut in Anglia pauci (puto) nunc sint qui Iura praedicta inseparabilia esse non videant; nec publice agnituri sint simul atque redierit Pax, & quamdiu calamitatum praeteritarum meminerint; sed non diutiùs, nisi meliùs erudiatur populus.

22 nec this edn.] & 68, 70 23 calamitatum 70] calamitatem 68

[59] the division of these rights precede, the division of the people

[60] The opinion of teachers that the rights of the Kingdom of England

[61] was the cause of the civil war that followed; another cause was the disputes about political and theological issues, by which, however, the people has been so instructed about the right of the King, that (I think)

---

[j] = incapable of being imparted or shared (OED, 'incommunicable', a., 1).

[k] = prerogative power of the King to buy household goods at special rates, in preference to others, and without the consent of the owner (OED, 'pre-emption', n., 1.a).

[l] = immediately (OED, 'presently', adv., 1.a).

[m] Mark 3: 24; cf. also Matt. 12: 25; Luke 11: 17.

[n] = those who disagreed ('dissenter' had not yet acquired its special sense of 'Protestant non-conformist': see OED, 'dissenter').

And can by no Grant passe away without direct renouncing of the Soveraign Power.

And because they are essentiall and inseparable Rights[62], it follows necessarily, that in whatsoever words any of them seem to be [63] granted away, yet if the Soveraign Power it selfe be not in direct termes renounced, [64]and the name of Soveraign no more given by the Grantees to him that Grants them, the Grant is voyd: for when he has granted all he can, if we grant back the Soveraignty, all is restored, as inseparably annexed thereunto.[64]

This great Authority being Indivisible, and inseparably annexed to the Soveraignty, there is little ground for the opinion of them, that say of [65]Soveraign Kings,[65] though they be singulis majores, of greater Power than every one of their Subjects, yet they be Universis minores, of lesse power than them all together.[p] For if by all together, they mean [66]not the collective body as one person, then all together, and every one, signifie the same; and the speech[66] is absurd. But if by all together, they understand them as [67]one Person (which person the Soveraign bears,) then the power of all together, is the same with the Soveraigns power; and so again the speech[67] is absurd: which absurdity they see well enough, when the Soveraignty is in an Assembly of the people; but in a Monarch they see it not; and yet the power of Soveraignty is the same in whomsoever it be placed.

The Power and Honour of Subjects vanisheth in the presence of the Power Soveraign.

And as the [68]Power, so also the Honour of the Soveraign, ought to be greater, than that of any, or all the Subjects. For in the Soveraignty is the fountain of Honour. The dignities of Lord, Earle, Duke, and Prince are his Creatures.[68] As in the presence of the Master, the Servants [69] are equall, and without any honour at all; So are the [70]Subjects, in the presence of the Soveraign.[70] And though they shine some more, some lesse, when they are out of his sight; yet in his presence, they shine no more than the Starres in presence of the Sun. [94]

9 of greater Power] {et del. by TH} greater {in added by TH} Power MS 10 their] his MS
19–23 marg. one para. higher in MS, H, B

[62] ^ of the sovereign power, [63] ^ separated and [64] the grant is void, and while the sovereign power, that is, the person of the commonwealth, is retained, all the things that have been granted return to it, inseparably.
[65] kings who bear the person of the commonwealth, that [66] the person of the commonwealth, they mean the king himself. Therefore the king will be less than himself; which [67] the dissolved multitude, they mean individuals. Therefore the king, who is greater than the individuals, will also be greater than them all together; which again[q]
[68] sovereign power is greater than the power of any citizen, so too the honour due to it is greater than the honour that is owed to each and any number of the citizens. For the sovereign is the fountain of all honours and dignities. [69] ^ and sons [70] citizens all equal among themselves, in the presence of him who bears the person of the commonwealth.

Quoniam autem Iura haec Summae Potestati essentialia & inseparabilia sunt, sequitur, ut quibuscunque Verbis separari & aliis concedi videantur, nisi Potestati Summae simul & expressis verbis renunciatum sit, concessionem nullam esse, sed concessa omnia, Summâ Potestate, id est Personâ Civitatis retentâ, inseparabiliter redire.

Cum ergo Authoritas haec ingens indivisibilis sit, & habenti Summam Potestatem inseparabiliter adhaereat, quis color inveniri potest opinioni eorum, qui dicunt de Regibus Civitatis Personam gerentibus, quod etsi Singulis majores, Vniversis tamen minores sunt? Nam si per universos intelligunt Civitatis Personam, ipsum intelligunt Regem. Itaque Rex seipso minor erit; quod est Absurdum. Sin per universos Multitudinem intelligunt solutam, singulos intelligunt. Itaque Rex, qui major singulis est, major quoque erit universis; quod iterum[q] est absurdum. In Civitate autem ubi Summa Potestas est in Coetu Populari, absurda haec esse satis vident; in Monarchia non vident, quanquam Potestas Summa ubicunque collocatur eadem est.

Sicut autem Potestas Summa, Civis cujuscunque Potestate major est, ita & Honor ipsi debitus Honore, qui debetur cuicunque & quotcunque Civibus major est. Qui Potestatem habet Summam, Honorum & Dignitatum omnium fons est; & sicut coram Domino familiae servi filiique omnes inter se aequales, & sine Honore sunt; ita & Cives coram eo qui gerit Personam Civitatis omnes inter se aequales sunt, quanquam extra praesentiam illius alii aliis magis splendeant; nam coram illo non amplius splendent quam stellae praesente Sole.

4 nullam esse 68-Errata] nullam; esse 68 5 redire] remanere 70 7 opinioni eorum this edn.] opinioni 68, 70

[p] For a typical use of the mediaeval maxim 'maior singulis, minor universis', see Hooker, Lawes of Ecclesiastical Politie, VIII.ii.7, in Hooker, Works, iii, pp. 336–7. The argument Hobbes attacks here was popularized by the parliamentarian writer Henry Parker in his Observations: 'the King, though he be singulis Major, yet he is universis minor' (p. 2).

[q] The phrasing here seems misleadingly abridged; the intended sense appears to be 'which again means that the speech is absurd'.

Soveraigne Power not so hurtfull as the want of it, and the hurt proceeds for the greatest part from not submitting readily, to a lesse.

But a man may here object, that the Condition of Subjects is °very° miserable; as being obnoxious[r] to the lusts, and [71]other irregular passions of him, or them that have so unlimited a Power in their hands.[71] And commonly they that live under a Monarch, think it the fault of Monarchy; and they that live under [72]the government of Democracy, or other Soveraign[72] Assembly, attribute all the inconvenience to that forme of Common-wealth; whereas the Power in all formes, if they be [73]perfect enough[73] to protect them, is the same; not considering that the estate of Man can never be without some incommodity or other; and that the greatest, that in any forme of Government can possibly happen °to the people in generall,° is scarce sensible, in respect of[s] the °miseries, and horrible° calamities, that accompany a Civill Warre; [74]or that dissolute condition of masterlesse men, without subjection to Lawes, and a coërcive Power to tye their hands from rapine, and revenge:[74] nor considering that the greatest [75]pressure[t] of Soveraign Governours, proceedeth not from any delight, or profit they can expect in the dammage, or weakening of their Subjects, in whose vigor, consisteth their own strength and glory; but in the restiveness of themselves, that unwillingly contributing to their own defence, make it[75] necessary for their Governours to draw from them [76]what they can in time of Peace, that they may have means on any emergent[u] occasion, or sudden need, to resist, or take advantage on[v] their Enemies. For all men[76] are by nature provided of notable multiplying glasses,[w] °(that is their Passions and Selfe-love,)° through which, every little payment appeareth a great grievance; but are destitute of those prospective glasses,[x] (namely °Morall and Civill° Science,) to see a farre off the miseries that hang over them, and cannot without such payments be avoyded.

13 hands H-Errata; {lands corr. to Hands by TH} MS] lands H, B

[71] passions of the rulers. [72] an [73] able

[74] and those that accompany the natural condition of men living by rapine, without lord or law.

[75] burdens that are imposed by the sovereign proceed not from the desire to impoverish or weaken them, given that it is very much to the advantage of rulers that they should be rich and strong; rather, they proceed from the obstinacy of the citizens, who refuse to contribute [70: burdens are not imposed by the sovereign from the desire to impoverish or weaken them, it being as much as possible to his advantage that the citizens should be rich and strong; rather, they are imposed because of the obstinacy of the citizens in refusing to contribute at that time] those things that are necessary for peace and their own defence. For that reason it is very often

[76] as much money as they can in time of peace, so that they may have ready what they need for war. But citizens

Dicet fortasse aliquis conditionem Civium esse miseram, ut qui libidini & passionibus Regentium sunt obnoxii. Id autem qui sub Monarchia vivunt, Monarchiae; qui sub Coetu plurium vivunt, illi regiminis Formae imputare solent; quanquam in omni Forma quae protegere eos possit, potestas aequalis sit. Non enim cogitant quod res humanae sine incommodo esse non possunt; nec quod incommoda quae in qualibet Civitatis Forma accidere possunt maxima, prae Belli calamitatibus, & quae in conditione hominum naturali, sine Domino, sine Lege, ex rapto viventium contingunt, vix sensibilia sunt; nec [92] denique quod gravissima onera, quae ab habente Potestatem Summam imponuntur, non ab eo, quod illos aut pauperes, aut debiles fieri cupiat proficiscuntur, quippe divites & fortes eos esse Regentium commodo maximè expedit, sed ab ipsorum Civium tenacitate, ea contribuere quae ad Pacem & Defensionem suam necessaria sunt, recusantium. Inde autem Regentibus plerumque nascitur, dum Pax est, Pecuniam exigendi quantam possunt, necessitas, ut quae opus sunt ad Bellum, parata habeant. Sed Civibus data sunt à Natura quasi vitra, quae Objecta majora, quam sunt, videri faciunt, per quae si Tributum videant quantulumcunque, magnam putant esse oppressionem. Telescopiis carent, nempe Scientiis, quibus à longinquo prospicere possent miserias illas impendentes, quae sine pecuniarum contributionibus sunt inevitabiles.

2 Monarchia 70] Monarchiam 68 3 Coetu 70] Coetum 68 9–12 quae ab habente Potestatem Summam imponuntur, non ab eo, quod illos aut pauperes, aut debiles fieri cupiat proficiscuntur, quippe divites & fortes eos esse Regentium commodo maximè expedit, sed ab ipsorum Civium tenacitate, ea this edn.] quae ab habente Potestatem Summam imponuntur, non ab eo, quod illos aut pauperes, aut debiles fieri cupiat proficiscuntur, quibus divites & fortes eos esse Regentium commodo maximè expedit, sed ab ipsorum Civium tenacitate, ea 68; non ideo ab habente Potestatem Summam imponuntur, ut illos aut pauperes, aut debiles fieri cupiat, cui divites & validos esse cives quam maximè expedit, sed ob ipsorum Civium tenacitatem, ea in tempore 70 13–14 autem] enim 70 15–16 Sed Civibus] Civibus autem 70

[r] = liable, exposed, subject (OED, 'obnoxious', adj., 1–2).
[s] = in comparison with (OED, 'respect', n., 3).
[t] = oppression (OED, 'pressure', n.[1], 1–2).
[u] = unexpectedly arising, not specially provided for (OED, 'emergent', a. and n., A5).
[v] This 'on', occurring in MS, H, and B, is not an error. Although unrecognized by OED, to 'take advantage on' (= of) was common usage: e.g. Bradford, Relation or Iournall, p. 43: 'thinking to take advantage on vs'; Wroth, Countesse of Mountgomerie's Urania, p. 104: 'taking aduantage on this'.
[w] = magnifying glasses (OED, 'multiplying-glass', n., 1).
[x] = telescopes (OED, 'prospective glass', n., 2–3).

CHAP. XIX.

Of the °severall° Kinds of Common-wealth by Institution, and of Succession to the Soveraigne Power.

The different Formes of Common-wealths but three.

THE difference of Common-wealths, consisteth in the difference of the Soveraign, °or the Person representative of all and every one of the Multitude.° And because the Soveraignty is either in one Man, or in [1]an Assembly of more than one; and into that Assembly either Every man hath right to enter, or not every one, but[1] Certain men distinguished from the rest; °it is manifest,° there can be but Three kinds of Common-wealth. [2]For the Representative must needs be One man, or More: and if more, then it is the Assembly of All, or but of a Part. When the Representative[2] is One man, then is the Common-wealth a MONARCHY: when an Assembly of [3]All that will come together,[3] then it is a DEMOCRACY, or Popular Common-wealth: when an Assembly [4]of a Part onely,[4] then it is called an ARISTOCRACY. Other kind of Common-wealth there can be none: for either One, or More, or All, must have the Soveraign Power °(which I have shewn to be indivisible) entire.° [95]

Tyranny and Oligarchy, but different names of Monarchy, and Aristocracy.

There be other names of Government, in the Histories, and books of Policy;[a] as Tyranny, and Oligarchy:[b] But they are not [5]the names of other Formes of Government, but of the same Formes misliked.[5] For they that are discontented under Monarchy, call it Tyranny; and they that are displeased with Aristocracy, called it Oligarchy: So also, they which find themselves grieved under a Democracy, call it Anarchy, [6](which signifies want of Government;) and yet I think no man believes, that want of Government, is any new kind of Government: nor by the same reason ought they to believe, that the Government is of one kind, when they like it, and another, when they mislike it, or are oppressed by the Governours.[6]

[1] several; and if in several, either in all (so that each has the right to enter into the assembly), or in
[2] When the sovereign
[3] men (in which assembly any citizen at all is admitted),
[4] of citizens called aristocrats,
[5] properly so; for they signify not the object of thought, but the feeling, of him who uses them.
[6] yet it does not follow that anarchy is any kind of government.

[a] = the art, study, or practice of government (OED, 'policy', n.[1], 1.a).
[b] Aristotle, Politics, III.7, 1279a5–10.

CAPVT XIX.

De Generibus Civitatum per Institutionem, & de Successione ad Summam Potestatem.

Distinctio Civitatum à distinctione oritur Personae Summam habentis Potestatem. Quoniam ergo Summa Potestas Vnius hominis est vel plurium, & siquidem plurium, aut omnium (ita, ut in Curiam conveniendi unicuique Ius sit) aut certorum hominum à caeteris distinctorum, Tria tantum esse possunt Civitatum genera, nempe Monarchia, ubi Summa Potestas in uno homine est; Democratia, ubi Summa Potestas in Coetu hominum est (in quem Coetum quilibet Civis admittitur) & Aristocratia, ubi Summa Potestas in Coetu Civium est, qui Optimates dicuntur. Alia Civitatis species nulla est; cum necessarium sit ut Summam Potestatem habeat vel unus homo, vel plures, vel omnes.

Alia quidem Civitatum in Historiis librisque Politicorum occurrunt nomina, ut Tyrannis, & Oligarchia,[b] sed non sunt propria; significant enim Affectum, non Conceptum ejus, qui illis utitur. Nam qui Monarchae irati sunt Tyrannum appellant; qui Optimates oderunt, statum eorum Oligarchiam dicunt, & qui Demagogos non amant statum Democraticum Anarchiam vocant; nec tamen inde sequitur speciem aliquam Regiminis esse Anarchiam.

7 distinctorum, this edn.] distinctorum. 68, 70

Subordinate Representatives dangerous.

It is manifest, that [7]men who are in absolute liberty, may, if they please, give Authority to One man, to represent them every one; as well as give such Authority to any Assembly of men whatsoever; and consequently may subject themselves, if they think good, to a Monarch, as absolutely, as to any other Representative.[7] Therefore, where there is already erected a [8]Soveraign Power, there can be no other Representative of the same people,[8] but onely to certain particular ends, by the Soveraign limited. [9]For that were to erect two Soveraigns; and every man to have his person represented by two Actors, that by opposing one another, must needs divide that Power, which (if men will live in Peace) is indivisible; and thereby reduce[c] the Multitude into the condition of Warre, contrary to the end for which all Soveraignty is instituted. And therefore as it is absurd, to think that a Soveraign Assembly, inviting the People of their Dominion, to send up their Deputies, with power to make known their Advise, or Desires, should therefore hold such Deputies, rather than themselves, for the absolute Representative of the people: so it is absurd also, to think the same in a Monarchy.[9] And I know not how this so manifest a truth, should of late be so little observed; that in a Monarchy, he that had the Soveraignty from a descent of 600 years,[e] [10]was alone called Soveraign,[10] had the title of Majesty from °every one of° his Subjects, and was °unquestionably° taken by them for their King, was notwithstanding never considered as [11]their Representative; that name without contradiction passing for the title of those men, which at his command were sent up by the people to carry their Petitions, and give him (if he permitted it) their advise.[11] Which may serve as an admonition, for those that are [12]the true, and absolute Representative of a People, to instruct men in the nature of that Office, and to take heed how they admit of any other generall Representation upon any occasion whatsoever, if they mean to discharge the trust committed to them.[12]

8 represented] borne MS 9 that by] w^ch^ by MS 12 therefore] {therefore del. by TH} MS
14 should] they should MS 16 And] Yet MS 17 that in] as in MS
20 was notwithstanding] yet was MS

---

[7] a multitude of men, before they came together in one commonwealth, could, if they wanted to, confer sovereign power on one man, and had just as much right to do so as to confer it on an assembly; that is, they could subject themselves no less absolutely to a monarch than to an assembly.

[8] monarchy, there can be no other person rightfully chosen to represent the multitude,

[9] , and only when commanded to do so by him. For otherwise two or more persons would be sovereigns in the same commonwealth, which would thereby be brought back to the condition of a war of all against all, contrary to the purpose of its institution. But just as, when a sovereign assembly summons those citizens who are its subjects to come together through deputies, for purposes defined by the assembly, such as giving their advice on difficult matters[d] or removing grievances, a man would be thought mad if he regarded those deputies as being the sovereign; so too should he be thought mad if, when they came together for the same purposes in a monarchy, at the monarch's command, he regarded the deputies as bearing the person of the commonwealth.

Quod multitudo, antequam in Vnam Civitatem coaluerint, potuit, si voluisset, Potestatem Summam in Vnum hominem, non minore [93] Iure quam in Coetum contulisse, id est Monarchae se subjecisse non minus absolutè quàm Coetui manifestum est. Vbi ergo Monarchia semel Instituta est, alia Persona ad multitudinem repraesentandam Iure eligi non potest, nisi ad certa & à Monarcha definita Negotia, neque hoc Monarchae Injussu. Alioqui enim Summam Potestatem haberent duae simul aut plures Personae in eadem Civitate, quae inde in conditionem Belli omnium contra omnes reduceretur, contra finem Institutionis. Sicut autem in Coetu populi Summam habente Potestatem, qui Cives sibi subditos, per homines deputatos convenire juberet, ad negotia à Coetu definita, puta ad consilium in rebus arduis[d] impertiendum, vel ad nocumenta tollenda, Insanus haberetur, qui homines ita convocatos Summam Potestatem habere, & totius Civitatis multitudinem representare & Personam Civitatis gerere arbitraretur; ita etiam insanus haberi debet si de iisdem negotiis in Monarchia, Monarchae jussu convenerint, convenientes putaret gerere Personam Civitatis. Atque hoc ita manifestum est, ut mirum sit non animadversum esse ab iis, qui Regem suum post sexcentorum annorum[e] successionem, sine contradictione legitimum, quem & Regem agnoverunt & cui Majestatem attribuerunt, non tamen ut Civitatis Personam consideraverunt, sibimet ipsis totius Civitatis Anglicanae Repraesentationem assumentes. Moneantur hinc qui Summam habent in quocunque Civitatis genere Potestatem, Cives suos Officii tanti Iura edocere, sed eadem Iura ipsi prius doceri, si Potestatem Summam retinere cupiant.

1 coaluerint] coaluere 70 3 absolutè 68-Errata] absolutà 68

[10] (never lawfully contested),

[11] the person of the commonwealth – they arrogating to themselves the representation of the entire English commonwealth.

[12] sovereigns in any kind of commonwealth, to instruct their citizens in the rights of so great an office, but first to instruct themselves in the same rights, if they wish to keep the sovereign power.

---

[c] = lead back, bring back (OED, 'reduce', v., 2).

[d] The phrase 'in rebus arduis' ('on difficult matters') may be a reminiscence of the phrase used in writs of summons to the English Parliament, 'de arduis negotiis' ('about difficult business').

[e] The basis of this calculation is unclear. It could be a rounded figure, calculated from the Norman Conquest of 1066; however, in Behemoth Hobbes wrote that in 1640 Charles was King 'by right of a descent continued above six hundred years' (ed. Seaward, p. 107 (fo. 2r)), which implies a starting-point before 1040. Hobbes may have regarded the succession as having been broken by the reigns of Canute and his sons Harold and Hardicanute; but the last of these ruled until 1042, and the next king, Edward the Confessor, was himself the son of an earlier king.

Comparison of Monarchy, with Soveraign Assemblyes.

The difference between these three kindes of Common-wealth, consisteth not in the difference of Power; but in the difference of Convenience, or Aptitude to produce the Peace, and [13]Security[13] of the people; for which end they were instituted. And to compare Monarchy with the other two, we may observe; °First,° that whosoeuer beareth the Person of the [14]people,[14] or is one of that Assembly that bears it, [15]beareth also his own[15] naturall Person. And though he be carefull in [96] his politique Person to procure the common interest; yet he is °more, or° no lesse carefull to procure the private good of himselfe, his family, kindred and friends; and for the most part, if the publique interest chance to crosse the private, he preferrs the private: for the Passions of men, are commonly more potent than their Reason. From whence it follows, that where the publique and private interest are most closely united, there is the publique most advanced. Now in Monarchy, the private interest is the same with the publique. The riches, power, and honour of a Monarch arise onely from the °riches,° strength and reputation of his Subjects. For no King can be rich, nor [16]glorious,[16] nor secure; whose Subjects are either poore, or contemptible, or [17]too weak through want, or dissention, to maintain a war against their enemies:[17] Whereas in a Democracy, °or Aristocracy,° the publique prosperity conferres[f] not so much to the private fortune of one that is [18]corrupt,[18] or ambitious, as doth [19]many times[19] a perfidious advice, a treacherous action, or a Civill warre.

Secondly, that a Monarch receiveth counsell of whom, when, and where he pleaseth; and consequently may heare the opinion of men versed in the matter about which he deliberates, of what rank or quality soever, [20] and as long before the time of action, °and with as much secrecy,° as he will. But when a Soveraigne Assembly has need of Counsell, [21]none are admitted but such as have a Right thereto from the beginning;[21] which for the most part are [22]of those who have beene versed more in the acquisition of Wealth than of Knowledge; and are to give their advice in long discourses, which may, and do commonly excite men to action, but not governe them in it. For the Understanding is by the flame of the Passions, never enlightned, but dazled:[22] Nor is there any place, or time, wherein an Assemblie can receive Counsell with [23] secrecie, because of their owne Multitude.

4 were] haue {bene added by TH} MS 20 is] should be MS

[13] defence [14] commonwealth, [15] is a [16] great, [17] weak. [18] wicked, avaricious, [19] sometimes [20] ^ without the false colouring of oratory, secretly,
[21] it can have no counsellors other than its own members;
[22] unskilled in civil affairs; and the others, being orators, give their opinions in speeches that are either falsely coloured or ill-informed, thereby either troubling the commonwealth or doing nothing to help it.
[23] ^ expedient

Differentia inter tria haec Civitatum genera non consistit in diversitate Potestatis, sed in diversitate aptitudinis Civitatum ad finem suum, nempe Pacem & Defensionem. In comparatione autem Monarchiae cum duabus reliquis, notandum est, eum qui Personam Civitatis gerit, vel, si Coetus sit, quemlibet ex Coetu Personam naturalem esse; & quanquam in Persona sua Politica, Civitati studeat, non tamen ideo ad rem familiarem suam, & cognatorum, & amicorum minus respicere; & saepissimè si contingat Bonum Publicum cum Privato non congruere, Privatum Publico anteferre. Nam Passiones hominum Ratione plerumque fortiores sunt. Quando ergo Bonum Publicum & Privatum arctissimè uniuntur, tunc maximè procuratur Bonum Publicum. In Monarchia autem Bonum Publicum & Privatum idem est. Regis enim Divitiae, Potentia, & Honor à viribus & existimatione Civium proficiscuntur. Nam Rex cujus Subditi Pauperes, debiles aut viles sunt, neque Dives, neque Magnus, neque securus esse potest. In Democratia autem Bonum Publicum minus aliquando [94] hominis improbi, avari, vel ambitiosi Bono Privato expedit, quam Consilium perfidum, actio proditoria, vel Bellum Civile.

Secundò, Monarcha quem, quando, ubi vult consulit. Itaque eorum qui in re de qua deliberat versatissimi sunt, qualiscunque sint ordinis, sine fuco oratorio, ante exequendi tempus, quantum vult, & secretò consilia audire potest. Coetus autem ubi consilio opus est, consiliarios nullos extra corpus suum habere potest, quorum maxima pars rerum civilium imperiti sunt; caeteri cum Oratores sint orationibus aut fucosis aut ineptè doctis sententias dicentes, Civitatem aut turbant, aut nihil juvant. Neque omnino Coetui hominum Consilii quod tacitum esse expedit capiendi, propter multitudinem tempus aut locus est.

1 Civitatum this edn.] Civium 68, 70 7 & cognatorum] cognatorumque 70 7 & saepissimè] ac saepissimè 70 16–17 quam Consilium perfidum, actio proditoria, vel Bellum Civile] Consilio perfido, actione proditoria, Bello Civili 70 19 sint] sunt 70

[f] = contributes (OED, 'confer', v., 2.b).

Thirdly, that the Resolutions of a Monarch, are subject to no other Inconstancy, than that of Humane Nature; but in Assemblies, besides that of Nature, there ariseth an Inconstancy from the Number. For the absence of a few, that [24]would have the Resolution once taken, continue firme, (which may happen by security,[g] negligence, or private impediments,) or the diligent appearance of a few of the contrary opinion, undoes to day, all that was concluded yesterday.[24]

Fourthly, that a Monarch cannot disagree with himselfe, out of envy, or interest; but an Assembly may; and that to such a height, as may produce a Civill Warre.

Fifthly, that in Monarchy there is this inconvenience; that [25]any Subject, by the power of one man, for the enriching of a favourite or flatterer, may be deprived of all he possesseth; which I confesse is a great and inevitable inconvenience.[25] But the same [26]may as well happen,[26] where the Soveraigne Power is in an Assembly: For their power is the same; [27] and they are as subject to [28]evill Counsell, and to be seduced by Orators, as a Monarch by Flatterers; and becoming one an others Flatterers,[28] serve one anothers Covetousnesse and Ambition by turnes. And whereas [29]the Favorites of Monarchs, are few, and they have none els to advance but their owne Kindred; the Favorites of an Assembly, [97] are many; and the Kindred much more numerous, than of any Monarch.[29] Besides, there is no Favourite of a Monarch, which cannot as well succour his friends, as hurt his enemies: But Orators, that is to say, Favourites of °Soveraigne° Assemblies, though they have [30]great[30] power to hurt, have little to [31]save.[31] For to accuse, requires lesse Eloquence (such is mans Nature) than to excuse; and condemnation, than absolution more resembles Justice.

1 that] om. MS 8 that] om. MS 9 height] degree MS 11 that] om. MS

[24] made the resolution, causes today's resolution to be revoked tomorrow.

[25] a monarch may, in order to enrich some friend of his, deprive a good citizen of all his possessions (though we have never read of an example of this).

[26] happens not infrequently [27] ^ they too may err;

[28] being deceived by the flattering of rhetoricians and orators, as a monarch by the flatteries of courtiers, and more subject; for in an assembly they

[29] a monarch, being one man, has few relations and friends that he wishes to enrich, an assembly has many relations and friends who prosper as favourites, because of the need to have a faction.

[30] more than enough [31] help.

[g] = a (culpable) lack of anxiety (OED, 'security', 3).

Tertiò, Monarcharum decreta inconstantiam nullam habent praeter eam, quae naturam sequitur humanam; sed in Coetibus accedit inconstantia alia ab ipso numero hominum. Nam paucis eorum, qui decretum fecerant absentibus, quod decretum est hodie, cras rescinditur.

Quartò, Monarcha à seipso (invidia aut avaritia) dissentire nequit. Coetus autem dissensionem in seipso habere potest, eamque tantam, ut producat Bellum Civile.

Quinto, In Monarchia Incommodum quidem est, ut possit Monarcha ad ditandum amicum aliquem, fortunis omnibus Bonum Civem (quod tamen nunquam factum legimus) spoliare. Sed idem contingit non rarò ubi Summa Potestas in Coetu est. Eadem enim est utrobique Potentia, utrique errare possunt; nec minus facile decipi potest Coetus à Rhetoribus & Oratoribus blandis quam Monarcha à blanditiis Aulicorum, sed facilius; nam in Coetu alter alterius Avaritiae & Ambitioni vicissim inservit. Sunt autem Monarchae, ut unius hominis cognati & amici quos ditare velit pauci. Qui vero gratia apud Coetum valent, propter necessitudinem Factionis cognati & amici multi sunt. Is cui Monarcha favet amicis aequè prodesse, & inimicis obesse potest; at Oratores, id est quibus favet Coetus, Potestatis nocendi plusquam satis, juvandi parum habent. Accusatio enim (ut est natura hominum) minore Eloquentia indiget quam Defensio, majoremque habet cum Iustitia similitudinem Condemnatio quam Absolutio.

13 sed] & 70 17 prodesse, 70] prodesse; 68

°Sixtly, that° it is an inconvenience in Monarchie, that the Soveraigntie may descend upon an Infant, or one that cannot discerne between Good and Evill: [32]and consisteth in this,[32] that the use of his Power, must be in the hand of another Man, [33]or of some Assembly of men, which are to governe by his right, and in his name; as Curators,[h] and Protectors of his Person, and Authority. But to say there is inconvenience, in putting the use of the Soveraign Power, into the hand of a Man, or an Assembly of men; is to say that all Government is more Inconvenient, than Confusion, and Civill Warre. And therefore all the danger that can be pretended, must arise from the Contention of those, that for an office of so great honour, and profit, may become Competitors.[33] To make it appear, that this inconvenience, proceedeth not from that forme of Government we call Monarchy, we are to consider, that the precedent Monarch, hath appointed who shall have the Tuition[i] of his Infant Successor, either expressely by Testament, or tacitly, by not controlling[j] the Custome in that case received: And then [34]such inconvenience[34] (if it happen) is to be attributed, not to the [35] Monarchy, but to [36]the Ambition, and Injustice of the Subjects; which in all kinds of Government, where the people are not well instructed in their Duty, and the Rights of Soveraignty, is the same.[36] Or else the precedent Monarch, hath not at all taken order for such Tuition; And [37]then[37] the Law of Nature hath provided this sufficient rule, That the Tuition shall be in him, that hath by Nature most interest in the preservation of the [38]Authority[38] of the Infant, and to whom least benefit can accrue by his death, or diminution. For seeing every man °by nature° seeketh his own benefit, °and promotion;° to put an Infant into the power of those, that can promote themselves by his destruction, °or dammage,° is not Tuition, but Trechery[39]. So that sufficient provision being taken, against all just quarrell, about the [40]Government under[40] a Child, if any contention arise to the disturbance of the publique Peace, it is not to be attributed to the forme of Monarchy, but to the ambition [41] of Subjects, and ignorance of their Duty. On the other side,

1 that] om. MS 19 at] om. MS

---

[32] so

[33] for example, a guardian or protector. But the inconvenience consists in the fact that for such a great honour, and so lucrative an office, competition will arise between the more powerful citizens, which will lead to war. [34] competition or war [35] ^ form of government of

[36] unjust and ambitious citizens. [37] for this inconvenience [38] rights and person

[39] ^ , as if one were to commit the guardianship of a lamb to a hungry wolf [40] guardianship of

[41] ^ and injustice

---

[h] = guardians (OED, 'curator', 1). [i] = protection, guardianship (OED, 'tuition', 1).

[j] = challenging, objecting to (OED, 'control', v., 3.b; cf. the Latin, 'contradicendo', 'contradicting').

In Monarchia incommodum est, quod Summa Potestas descendere ad Infantem potest, vel ad virum qui inter Bonum & Malum discernere nesciat, unde Potestatis usus in alio erit, puta Curatore aut Protectore. Sed incommodum in eo consistit, quod propter tantam [95] dignitatem, & Officium tam lucrosum, nascetur inter Potentiores Cives Competitio, & ex Competitione Bellum. Verum quòd incommodum hoc non à forma Regiminis Monarchici oritur, argumento est, quod Monarcha praecedens tutelam successuri Infantis quis habiturus sit declaravit, idque vel expressè per Testamentum; vel tacitè, nempe consuetudini circa quaestiones similes non contradicendo; tunc autem si competitio, vel Bellum subsequatur, formae regiminis Monarchici culpa non est, sed Injustorum & Ambitiosorum Civium. Etsi autem Monarcha praecedens Tutelam nemini commisserit, incommodo tamen huic satis provisum est à Iure naturali, Nimirum ut Tutela illi committatur cujus per naturam maximè interest, Infantis Iura & personam conservari, & cui minimum à morte vel à diminutione ejus accessurum est emolumentum. Cum enim omnes Bonum sibi quaerant, si Tutela Infantis homini committeretur qui se per illius mortem promovere posset, Tutela non esset, sed Proditio, tamquam si quis Tutelam agni committeret impranso lupo. Itaque cum provisum sit ne contentionis de Infantis Tutela causa Iusta esse possit, non est, si Pax turbetur, formae regiminis Monarchici, sed Ambitiosis & Injustis Civibus officia sua ignorantibus attribuendum. Contra autem

3 Protectore] Prorectore 70 10 formae this edn.] forma 68, 70 17 committeretur] committetur 70

there is [42]no[42] great Common-wealth, the Soveraignty whereof is in a great Assembly, which is not, [43]as to consultations of Peace, and Warre, and making of Lawes, in the same condition, as if the Government were in a Child. For as a Child wants the judgement to dissent from counsell given him, and is thereby necessitated to take the advise of them, or him, to whom he is committed:[43] So an Assembly wanteth the liberty, to dissent from the counsell of the major part, [44]be it good, or bad. And as a Child has need of a Tutor,[k] or Protector, to preserve his Person, and Authority: So also (in great Common-wealths,) the Soveraign Assembly, in all great dangers and [98] troubles, have need of [44] Custodes libertatis;[l] that is °of° Dictators, or Protectors °of their Authoritie;° which are as much as Temporary Monarchs; [45]to whom for a time, they may commit the entire exercise of their Power;[m] and have (at the end of that time) been oftner deprived thereof, than Infant Kings, by their Protectors, Regents, or any other Tutors.[45]

Though the Kinds of Soveraigntie be, as I have now shewn, but three; that is to say, Monarchie, °where One Man has it;° or Democracie, °where the generall Assembly of Subjects hath it;° or Aristocracie, °where it is in an Assembly of certain persons nominated, or otherwise distinguished from the rest:° Yet he that shall consider the particular Common-wealthes that have been, and are in the world, will [46]not perhaps easily reduce them to three, and may thereby be inclined to think there be other Formes, arising from these mingled together.[46] As for example, Elective Kingdomes; where Kings have the Soveraigne Power put into their hands for a time; or Kingdomes, wherein the King [47]hath a power limited:[47] which Governments, are nevertheles by most °Writers° called Monarchie. Likewise if a Popular, or Aristocraticall Common-wealth, [48]subdue an Enemies Countrie, and govern the same, by a President,[n] Procurator, or other Magistrate; this may seeme perhaps at first sight,[48] to be a Democraticall, or Aristocraticall Government. But it is not so. For [49]Elective Kings, are not Soveraignes, but Ministers of the Soveraigne; nor limited Kings[49] Soveraignes, but Ministers of them that have the Soveraigne Power: Nor are those Provinces which are in subjection to a Democracie, or Aristocracie of another Common-wealth, Democratically, or Aristocratically governed, but Monarchically.

11 much as] much as a MS 12 may] om. MS 25 Monarchie] monarchy's MS

Civitas magna in qua Summam Potestatem habet Coetus, vix ulla est quae curatore tanquam Infans aliquando non indigeat, nam ut Infans à consilio curatoris dissentire propter inscitiam non potest; ita Coetui à sententia majoris partis dissentire non est liberum. Et ut Infantibus dantur Tutores; ita Coetibus in rebus arduis Dictatores,[m] Custodes Libertatis,[l] Protectores dari insolitum non est; quorum regimen pro tempore est Monarchicum; & à quibus saepius Coetibus sublata est Potestas Summa quàm Monarchis Infantibus à Curatoribus suis.

Quanquam Civitatum genera (ut dixi) tria tantùm sint, Monarchia, Democratia, & Aristocratia; considerantibus tamen Civitates singulares quae nunc sunt, & quae per terrarum orbem olim fuere, plura fortasse videbuntur. Exempli causa, Regnum quod vocatur Electivum, ubi Summam Potestatem pro certo aliquo tempore habet Rex. Vel qui Potestatem Summam haereditariam quidem habet, à Civibus autem limitatam; Quae formae regiminis à plerisque Monarchiae appellantur. Item Civitas Democraticè vel Aristocraticè gubernata, si Civitatem aliam Bello victam sibi obedire cogat, & per Praefectum aliumvè Ministrum regat, videri forte potest (propter Coetum Regentem) regimen Democraticum vel Aristocraticum esse. Sed non est ita. Neque enim Reges temporarii, neque Reges quibus [96] Potestas circumscripta est, Summi sunt, sed Summorum Ministri. Neque Provincia quae Demo aut Optimatibus subjecta est, regitur à Civitate dominante, Democraticè aut Aristocraticè, sed Monarchicè.

[42] scarcely any

[43] sometimes in need of a guardian, like a child. For as a child lacks the knowledge to dissent from the counsel of its guardian, [44] . And as children are given guardians; so too it is not unusual for assemblies, at times of crisis, to be given [45] and by whom assemblies have more often been deprived of the sovereign power, than infant monarchs have been by their guardians. [46] perhaps think that there are more.

[47] does indeed have hereditary sovereign power, but it is limited by the citizens:

[48] defeat in war another commonwealth and force it to obey, ruling it by means of a prefect or other minister, this may perhaps seem (because the ruler is an assembly)

[49] temporary kings, and kings whose power is circumscribed, are not

---

[k] = guardian (OED, 'tutor', n., 1–2).

[l] = protectors (or 'keepers') of liberty. This was not a technical term in the Roman constitution; the phrase seems to be derived from Livy's description of Lucius Junius Brutus, the founder of the Roman Republic, who, when he had expelled King Tarquin, 'was then no less fierce a protector of liberty than he had been a demander of it' ('non acrior vindex libertatis fuerat, quam deinde custos fuit': Ab urbe condita, II.1). In 1649 the phrase was revived by the parliamentarian régime: by Acts of 29 Jan. [/8 Feb.] and 17 [/27] Feb., writs were issued and courts were held in the name not of the King, but of the 'Keepers of the liberty of England by the authority of Parliament' ('Custodes libertatis Angliae authoritate Parliamenti') or 'Keepers of the Liberty of England': see Firth and Rait, eds., Acts and Ordinances, i, 1262–3; ii, 6–9.

[m] A 'dictator', in the Roman Republic, was a magistrate appointed for a specific function (e.g., commanding an army) in an emergency; the office had a maximum duration of six months.

[n] = an appointed governor of a province or colony (OED, 'president', n., 1).

And first, concerning [50]an Elective[50] King, whose power is limited to his life, as it is in many places of Christendome at this day;[p] or [51]to certaine Yeares or Moneths,[51] as the Dictators power amongst the Romans; If he have Right to appoint his Successor, he is no more [52]Elective but Hereditary.[52] But if he have no Power to elect his Successor, then there is some other Man, or Assembly [53]known,[53] which after his decease may elect a [54]new, or else the Common-wealth dieth, and dissolveth with him, and returneth to the condition of Warre. If it be known who have the power to give the Soveraigntie after his death, it is known also that the Soveraigntie was in them before: For none have right to give that which they have not right to possesse, and keep to themselves, if they think good. But if there be none that can give the Soveraigntie, after the decease of him that was first elected; then has he power, nay he is obliged by the Law of Nature, to provide, by establishing his Successor, to keep those that had trusted him with the Government, from relapsing into the miserable condition of Civill warre. And consequently he was, when elected, a Soveraign absolute.[54]

Secondly, that King [55]whose power is limited, is not superiour to him, or them that have the power to limit it; and he that is not superiour, is not supreme; that is to say not Soveraign. The Soveraignty therefore was alwaies in that Assembly which had the right to Limit [99] him; and by consequence the government not Monarchy, but either Democracy, or Aristocracy; as of old time in Sparta; where the Kings had a priviledge to lead their Armies; but the Soveraignty was in the Ephori.[55] [q]

1–2 an Elective . . . this day] Electiue Kings whose powers are limited to their life, as in many places now of christendome they are MS 3–4 he have Right . . . he is] they haue right to appoint their successor they are MS 5 he have no . . . elect his] they haue no power to Elect their MS
9 For] For that MS

[50] a
[51] him who does indeed have the sovereign power, but has to give it up, either after a fixed time, or at the wish of someone else, [52] a temporary king, but possesses rule, for himself and his heirs.
[53] that has it,
[54] new king. But whoever can do this had the sovereign power before. For no one can give to another that which he himself does not have. But if there is no one who can give the succession, whoever had the power before can retain it and choose his successor – indeed he should, lest, contrary to the law of nature, he allow the citizens who put their faith in him to relapse into the condition of nature and perish with the abandonment of sovereign power.
[55] who is elected to limited power is inferior to the one that limits it (whether a man or an assembly), and therefore is not supreme. So the right of choosing the successor always belongs to whoever is the sovereign. The form of government in this case is not properly a monarchy, but either a democracy or an aristocracy.

Primò autem Rex cujus Potestas cum vitâ terminatur, quales nonnulli hodie sunt in orbe Christiano;[p] aut is qui Summam quidem habet Potestatem, sed post tempus certum, vel ad alicujus alterius voluntatem deponendam, qualis erat quondam Romae Dictator, si Successoris eligendi Potestatem habeat, non est amplius Monarcha temporarius, sed imperium habet sibi & haeredibus suis. Sin Potestate illa careat, alter habet vel Homo vel Coetus, qui post illius obitum Regem novum eligere potest. Sed is qui hoc potest Summam Potestatem antè habuit. Dare enim alteri quod ipse non habet nemo potest. Quod si Successionem dare potest alius nemo, is qui Potestatem ante habuit retinere, & Successorem suum eligere potest, immò debet, ne contra Legem naturae Cives fidei suae commissos deserta Potestate Summa in conditionem naturae relabentes perire patiatur.

Secundò, Rex Electus ad Potestatem praescriptam, praescribente (sive is Homo sit sive Coetus) minor est, & proinde non est Summus. Potestatem ergo Summam habenti Ius Successoris eligendi semper haeret. Regiminis autem ejus forma non propriè Monarchia, sed vel Democratia vel Aristocratia est.

[p] The King of Poland; the King of Denmark (until 1660); the Holy Roman Emperor; the Pope (as monarch of the Papal States); and perhaps (with quasi-monarchical status) the Doge of Venice.

[q] The Ephors of Sparta were five elected magistrates, who exercised general control over the kings' conduct.

[56]Thirdly, whereas heretofore the Roman People, governed the land of Judea (for example) by a President;[r] yet was not Judea therefore a Democracy; because they were not governed by any Assembly, into the which, any of them, had right to enter; nor by an Aristocracy; because they were not governed by any Assembly, into which, any man could enter by their Election: but they were governed by one Person, which though as to the people of Rome was an Assembly of the people, or Democracy; yet as to people of Judea, which had no right at all of participating in the government, was a Monarch. For though where the people are governed by an Assembly, chosen by themselves out of their own number, the government is called a Democracy, or Aristocracy; yet when they are governed by an Assembly, not of their own choosing, 'tis a Monarchy; not of One man, over another man; but of one people, over another people.[56]

Of the Right of Succession.

Of all these Formes of Government, the matter [57] being mortall, so that not onely [58]Monarchs,[58] but also whole Assemblies dy, it is necessary [59]for the conservation of the peace of men, that as there was order taken for an Artificiall Man, so there be order also taken, for an Artificiall Eternity of life; without which, men that are governed by an Assembly, should return into the condition of Warre in every age; and they that are governed by One man, assoon as their Governour dyeth. This Artificiall Eternity,[59] is that which men call the Right of Succession.

There is no perfect forme of Government, where the disposing of the Succession is not in the present Soveraign. For if it be [60]in any other particular Man, or private Assembly, it is in a person subject, and may be assumed by the Soveraign at his pleasure; and consequently the Right is in himselfe. And if it be in no particular man, but left to a new choyce; then is the Commonwealth dissolved; and the Right is in him that can get it; contrary to the intention of them that did Institute the Common-wealth, for their perpetuall, and not temporary security.[60]

[56] The Roman people ruled Judaea when Pompey had conquered it. How, then, are we to describe the form of government of the Jews under the Roman people? It was not a democracy, nor an aristocracy, since it was not ruled by an assembly of Jews. What then? Was it a monarchy, when the sovereign power resided not in one man but in the Roman assembly? Why not? Although the sovereign power of the Roman people was an aristocracy or a democracy with regard to the Roman citizens, with regard to the Jews it was nevertheless a monarchy. For as the rule of many men by one man is monarchy, so too is the rule of many commonwealths by one commonwealth.

[57] ^ (that is, men) [58] individuals,

Populus Romanus victam Pompejo duce Iudaeam rexit. Regiminis ergo Iudaeorum forma sub populo Romano quo nomine appellabitur? Democratia non erat, neque Aristocratia, quia non regebatur à Coetu hominum Iudaeorum. Quid ergo, an Monarchia erat cum Summa Potestas non in homine uno, sed in Coetu Romano resideret? Quidni? Populi Romani quanquam Summa Potestas in Cives Romanos Aristocratia erat vel Democratia, in Iudaeos tamen Monarchia erat. Tam enim Civitatis unius in Civitates plures, quam unius hominis in plures homines imperium Monarchia est.

Quaecunque Civitatis Forma est, Materia (id est homines) Mortalis est. Nam homines tum singuli tum Coetus integri morti subjecti sunt. Itaque quemadmodum ad Civitatis constitutionem necessarius erat Artificialis homo, ita etiam ad conservationem Civitatis necessaria erat Artificialis vita, sine qua post aetatem unam, moriente Monarcha Civitas omnis interiret. Vita autem haec Artificialis ea est, quam vocant Ius Successionis.

Perfecta Civitatis Forma esse non potest, ubi Successorem eligendi [97] Ius non sit in Antecessore. Nam si in illo non est, in subdito est; ideoque ab eo qui Summam habet Potestatem assumi sibi potest. Illius ergo aut nullius est; & sic Civitas dissolvitur contra instituentium intentionem.

16–17 ab eo qui Summam habet Potestatem assumi sibi] à Summam habente Potestatem Subdito extorqueri 70 18 & sic] si hoc, 70

[59] that, just as an artificial man was needed for the constitution of the commonwealth, so too for the conservation of the commonwealth there should be an artificial life, without which, at the end of one lifetime the whole commonwealth would perish with the death of the monarch. Now this artificial life

[60] not in him, it is in a subject, and therefore can be acquired from him [the subject] by the sovereign. So it is either his, or no one's – in which case the commonwealth is dissolved, against the intention of those who instituted it.

---

[r] See above, note n.

In a Democracy, the whole Assembly cannot faile, unlesse the [61]Multitude that are to be governed[61] faile. And therefore questions of the right of Succession, have in that forme of Government no place at all.

In an Aristocracy, [62]when any of the[62] Assembly dyeth, the election of another into his room belongeth to the Assembly, [63]as the Soveraign, to whom belongeth the choosing of all Counsellours, and Officers. For that which the Representative doth, as Actor, every one of the Subjects doth, as Author. And though the Soveraign Assembly, may give Power to others, to elect new men, for supply of their Court; yet it is still by their Authority, that the Election is made; and by the same it may (when the publique shall require it) be recalled.[63] [100]

The present Monarch hath Right to dispose of the Succession.

The greatest difficultie about the right of Succession, is in Monarchy: [64]And the difficulty ariseth from this, that at first sight, it is not manifest who is to appoint the Successor; nor many times, who it is whom he hath appointed. For in both these cases, there is required a more exact ratiocination, than every man is accustomed to use. As to the question, who shall appoint the Successor, of a Monarch that hath the Soveraign Authority; that is to say, who shall determine of the right of Inheritance, (for Elective Kings and Princes have not the Soveraign Power in propriety, but in use only,)[64] we are to consider, that either he that is in possession, has right to dispose of the Succession, or else that right is °again° in the dissolved Multitude. [65]For the death of him that hath the Soveraign power in propriety, leaves the Multitude without any Soveraign at all; that is, without any Representative in whom they should be united, and be capable of doing any one action at all: And therefore they are incapable of Election of any new Monarch; every man having equall right to submit himselfe to such as he thinks best able to protect him; or if he can, protect himselfe by his owne sword; which is a returne to Confusion, and to the condition of a War of every man against every man, contrary to the end for which Monarchy had its first Institution. Therfore it is manifest, that by the Institution of Monarchy, the disposing of the Successor, is alwaies left to the Judgment and Will of the present Possessor.[65]

And for the question °(which may arise sometimes)° who it is that the Monarch °in possession,° hath designed[s] to the succession and inheritance of his power; it is determined by his °expresse Words, and° Testament; or by other °tacite° signes sufficient.

26–7 he thinks best . . . owne sword] they thinke best able to protect them; or if they can, to protect themselues by their owne swords MS

In Democratia Coetus totus deficere nisi deficientibus Civibus non potest. Quaestiones igitur de Iure Successionis ad Democratiam non pertinent.

In Aristocratiis autem si quis ex Coetu Summo moriatur, alterum in illius locum à Coetu ipso, vel ipsius Authoritate, substituendum esse (propter eam quam habet Potestatem Summam) manifestum est.

Difficultas de Iure Successionis maxima in Monarchiis est. Circa quam duae quaestiones esse possunt, altera an Monarchae praesenti Ius sit quem vult eligendi; altera quis sit quem vult. Ad primam autem considerandum est, aut Ius illud Monarchae praesentis esse, vel multitudinis solutae. Nisi Monarchae sit praesentis, moriente illo Civitas dissolvitur, quia nullus est qui Ius illud postulare sibi potest homo singularis; multitudo autem neque agere quicquam aut loqui potest, ut quae Persona amplius non est. Redeunt ergo omnia ad conditionem belli, & per consequens Successoris constitutionem ad Monarcham praesentem pertinere ex ipsa Civitatis Institutione manifestum est. Quaestio autem quis ille sit, quem Monarcha Successorem, sive Haeredem sibi esse voluit, aut per ipsius Testamentum, aut per alia signa idonea judicandum est.

9 vel] aut 70 9 Nisi this edn.] Si 68, 70

[61] citizens

[62] it is obvious that when any member of the sovereign

[63] or should be made by authority of the assembly (because of the sovereign power it possesses).

[64] . Two questions can be asked about it. One is whether the present monarch has the right to choose whomsoever he wishes. The other is: whom does he wish? As to the first question, [65] Unless it belongs to the present monarch, on his death the commonwealth is dissolved, because there is no individual man who can claim it for himself; and the multitude can neither do nor say anything, as it is no longer a person. Everything therefore returns to the condition of war; and consequently it is obvious that from the very institution of the commonwealth the appointment of a successor belongs to the present monarch.

---

[s] = appointed, assigned (OED, 'design', v., 5).

Succession passeth by expresse Words;

By °expresse Words, or° Testament, when it is declared by him °in life time,° viva voce,[t] °or by Writing;° as the first Emperours of Rome declared who should be their Heires. For the word Heire does not of it selfe imply the Children, or nearest Kindred of a man; but whomsoever a man [66]shall any way declare, he would have to succeed him in his Estate.[66] If therefore a Monarch declare expresly, that such a man shall be his Heire, °either by Word or Writing,° then is that man immediatly after the decease of his Predecessor, Invested in the [67]right of being Monarch.[67]

Or, by not controlling[u] a Custome;

But where Testament, and expresse Words are wanting, other naturall signes of the Will are to be followed: whereof the one is [68] Custome. And therefore where the Custome is, that the next of Kindred [69]absolutely succeedeth, there also the next of Kindred hath right to the Succession;[69] for that, if the will of him that was in posession had been otherwise, he might easily have declared the same in his life time. And [70]likewise where the Custome is, that the next of the Male Kindred succeedeth, there also the right of Succession is in the next of the Kindred Male, for the same reason. And so it is if the Custome were to advance the Female. For whatsoever Custome a man may by a word controule, and does not, it is a naturall[70] signe he would have that Custome stand.

Or, by presumption of naturall affection.

But where neither Custome, nor Testament hath preceded, there it [101] is to be understood, First, that °a Monarchs will is, that° the government remain Monarchicall; because he hath approved that government [71]in himselfe. Secondly, that a Child of his own, Male, or Female, be preferred before any other; because men are presumed to be more enclined by nature, to advance their own children, than the children of other men; and of their own,[71] rather a Male than a Female; because men, are naturally fitter than women, for actions of °labour and° danger. Thirdly, where his own Issue faileth, rather a Brother than a stranger; and so still the neerer in bloud, rather than the more remote; because it is °alwayes° presumed that the neerer of kin, is the neerer in affection; [72]and 'tis evident that a man receives alwayes, by reflexion, the most honour from the greatnesse of his neerest kindred.[72]

[66] wishes to succeed him in his power. [67] sovereign power. [68] ^ local [69] succeeds, then he has the sovereign power on his predecessor's death;
[70] the same rule applies, whether the proximity of kindred [specified by the custom] be male or female. For if a ruler could easily, by a word, have removed a custom, and has not done so, it is a [71] by reigning, and has not said anything in disapproval of it. Secondly, it is to be understood that he wished his children, rather than any others, to be promoted to such a great dignity; and, of his children, [72] other things being equal.

---

[t] = in actual speech.
[u] = challenging, objecting to (OED, 'control', v., 3.b: cf. the Latin for 'controule' later in this para., 'tolli', 'tollitur', 'remove').

Per Testamentum, si viva voce[t] Successorem declaraverit, ut fecerunt Imperatores Romanorum primi Haeredibus nominatis. Vox enim Haeres non semper filium aut cognatum significat, sed quemcunque quisque Potestatis suae Successorem esse velit. Si ergo Monarcha Successorem suum dissertè nominaverit, Summa Potestas simul atque mortuus est Antecessor, in nominato est.

Vbi vero Testamentum & verba aperta desunt, ibi voluntatis ejus alia signa naturalia observanda sunt. Quorum signorum unum est Consuetudo loci. Vbi ergo succedere consuevit is, qui genere est proximus, illius est Potestas Summa, Antecessore mortuo; quia si alium succedere sibi voluisset, facile illum vivens nominare potuisset. Eadem autem regula est, sive proximitas illa Maris fuerit sive Foeminae. Consuetudo enim quae Principis verbo tolli facile potuit, nec tollitur, signum est sublatam esse Nolentis.

Vbi vero neque Testamentum neque Consuetudo anteivit, ibi intelligendum est, Primò, Regimen manere Monarchicum, quia formam [98] illam regnando commendaverat, neque verbo improbaverat. Secundò, liberos suos, potius quam alios ad tantam dignitatem promovere voluisse; & ex liberis Marem quam Foeminam, ut per naturam ad sustinenda pericula aptiorem. Tertiò, si prole careat, fratrem quam alium, atque ita semper propinquiorem quam remotiorem. Praesumitur enim sanguine propinquiorem, amore quoque, caeteris paribus, potiorem esse.

13 potuit] potest 70

To dispose of the Succession, though to a King of another Nation, not unlawfull.

But if it be lawfull for a Monarch to dispose of the Succession [73] by words of Contract, or Testament, [74]men may perhaps object[74] a great inconvenience: for he may [75]sell, or give his Right of governing[75] to a stranger; which, because strangers [76](that is, men[76] not used to live under the same government, nor speaking the same language) do commonly undervalue [77] one another, may turn to the oppression of his Subjects; [78]which is indeed a great inconvenience: but it proceedeth not necessarily from the subjection to a strangers government, but[78] from the unskilfulnesse of the Governours, [79]ignorant of the true rules of Politiques. And therefore the Romans when they had subdued many Nations, to make their Government digestible, were wont to take away that grievance, as much as they thought necessary, by giving sometimes to whole Nations, and sometimes to Principall men of every Nation they conquered, not onely the Privileges, but also the Name of Romans; and took many of them into the Senate, and Offices of charge,[v] even in the Roman City.[79] And this was it our most wise King, King James, aymed at[80], in endeavouring the Union of his two Realms of England and Scotland.[w] Which if he could have obtained, had in all likelihood prevented the Civill warres, which make both those Kingdomes, at this present, miserable. It is not therefore any injury to the [81]people, for a Monarch to dispose of the Succession by Will;[81] though by the fault of [82]many Princes,[82] it hath been sometimes found inconvenient. [83]Of the lawfulnesse of it, this also is an argument, that whatsoever inconvenience can arrive by giving a Kingdome to a stranger, may arrive also by so marrying with strangers, as the Right of Succession may descend upon them: yet this by all men is accounted lawfull.[83]

12 sometimes to whole] sometime to whole MS 14 them] them euen MS 14 even] {euen del. by TH} MS 15 King,] {King, del. by TH} MS

---

73 ^ to whomsoever he wishes 74 it seems that to the commonwealth there may arise
75 transfer the sovereign power 76 (because they are perhaps 77 ^ or hate
78 but this inconvenience arises not from the fact that a stranger is sovereign, but either
79 or from the obstinacy of the citizens in refusing to accept, as would be fair, one another's customs. The Romans, long ago, removed this inconvenience by giving the rights of Roman citizens to many strangers from the commonwealths they had put under their rule – and sometimes to whole commonwealths.
80 ^ (but in vain) 81 citizens if a monarch makes a stranger his successor;
82 the rulers, or of the citizens themselves,
83 The same is obvious from the fact that when kingdoms pass, by marriage, to strangers, they are usually described, without contradiction, as having been lawfully acquired (although the same inconveniences follow).

---

v = of importance (OED, 'charge', n., 9).
w James VI and I pressed for a union of Scotland and England in the early years of his English reign; an Act was passed in 1604, authorizing English commissioners to treat with Scottish ones about 'further union' (Prothero, ed., Select Statutes, pp. 251–2), but nothing came of it.

Verum si Monarchae per Testamentum aut Contractum, Successorem constituere quem velit liceat, magnum inde videtur oriri posse Civitati incommodum. Nam Potestatem Summam in hominem alienigenam transferre poterit; id quod (quia alienigenae neque eidem forte regiminis formae assueti sunt, neque eodem utentes sermone se mutuo contemptui aut odio habent) in Civitatis oppressionem tendere verisimile est. Sed incommodum hoc non ab eo nascitur, quod Summam Potestatem habeat alienigena, sed vel ab imperitia regentis, vel à contumacia Civium quorum alteri alterorum mores, ut aequum est, ferre nolunt. Quod incommodum Romani olim ex Civitatibus, quas sibi subjecerant, impertiendo alienigenis multis, & interdum totis Civitatibus Ius Civium Romanorum sustulerunt. Idem etiam conatus est, sed frustra per Regnorum Angliae & Scotiae Vnionem, Rex noster sapientissimus Jacobus.[w] Quod si perfecisset, Bellum Civile quod utramque gentem miseram facit, nasci potuisse non videtur. Civibus ergo, si Monarcha Successorem alienigenam constituat, Injuriam nullam facit, quanquam culpa Regentium, vel ipsorum Civium, incommodum inde aliquando oriatur. Idem etiam ex eo manifestum est, quod Regna in alienigenas per cognationem descendentia, (quanquam eadem sequutura sint incommoda) pro licitè acquisitis sine contradictione haberi solent.

CHAP. XX.

Of Dominion PATERNALL, and DESPOTICALL.

A Common-wealth by Acquisition.

A Common-wealth by Acquisition, [1]is[1] that, where the Soveraign Power is acquired by Force; And it is acquired by force, when men singly, or many together by plurality of voyces, for fear of death, or bonds, do [2]authorise all the [102] actions of that Man, or Assembly, that hath their lives and liberty in his Power.[2]

Wherein different from a Common-wealth by Institution.

And this kind of Dominion, or Soveraignty, differeth from Soveraignty by Institution, onely in this, That [3]men who choose their Soveraign, do it for fear of one another, and not of him whom they Institute: But in this case, they subject themselves, to him they are afraid of.[3] In both cases they do it for fear: which is to be noted by them, that hold all such Covenants, as proceed from fear °of death, or violence,° voyd:[a] which if it were true, no man, in any kind of Common-wealth, could be obliged to Obedience. It is true, that in a Common-wealth [4]once Instituted, or acquired, Promises proceeding from fear of death, or violence, are no Covenants, nor obliging, when the thing promised is contrary to the Lawes; But the reason is not, because it was made upon fear, but because he that promiseth, hath no right in the thing promised. Also, when he may lawfully performe, and doth not,[4] it is not the Invalidity of the Covenant, that absolveth him, but the Sentence of the Soveraign. Otherwise, whensoever a man lawfully promiseth, he unlawfully breaketh: °But when the Soveraign, who is the Actor, acquitteth him, then he is acquitted by him that extorted the promise, as by the Author of such absolution.°

The Rights of Soveraignty the same in both.

But the Rights, °and Consequences° of Soveraignty, [5] are the same in both. His Power cannot, without his consent, be Transferred to another: He [6]cannot Forfeit it: He cannot be Accused by any of his Subjects, of Injury: He cannot be Punished by them: He is Judge of what is necessary for Peace; and Judge of Doctrines: He is Sole Legislator; and Supreme Judge of Controversies; and of the Times, and Occasions of Warre, and Peace: to him it belongeth to choose Magistrates, Counsellours, Commanders, and all other Officers, and Ministers; and to determine of Rewards, and Punishments, Honour, and Order.[6] The reasons whereof, are the same which are alledged[b] in the precedent Chapter,[c] °for the same Rights, and Consequences of Soveraignty by Institution.°

18 promiseth, hath] {promiseth hath corr. to promised had by TH} MS
24 Rights] Right B 28 and] om. MS 28 and] om. MS 29 it] om. MS

CAPVT XX.

De Dominio Paterno & Despotico.

Civitatem per Acquisitionem voco, ubi Summa Potestas acquisita est per vim, ita, ut mortis vel vinculorum metu, imperata facere unius personae, sive singuli, sive pluralitate suffragiorum cuncti se obligaverunt.

Atque hoc Dominii (sive Summae Potestatis) genus ab eo, quod fit per Institutionem, in hoc tantùm differt, quòd hic metu mutuo, ibi metu unius Cives imperium in se admittunt. Vtrique tamen id faciunt [99] Metu. Id quod ab iis qui Pacta propter metum inita irrita esse universaliter pronuntiare solent,[a] notandum est.

Id enim si verum esset, Civitatis forma nulla esset, in qua obedientiam Civium Civitas exigere jure posset. In Civitate quidem, ubi vis prohibetur, & latrocinia indicare jubent leges, Promissa terrore extorta irrita sunt, non autem ex natura Pactorum irrita sunt. Etiam ubi Promissa metu facta invalida sunt, Promissorem absolvit non Pacti invaliditas, sed sententia Summae Potestatis. Alioqui universaliter verum est Promissum licitum illicitè violari.

Jura autem Summae Potestatis sive Institutae, sive Vi Acquisitae eadem sunt, neque sine habentis consensu auferri, vel transferri possunt. Itaque qui ea possidet neque puniri, neque Reus fieri jure potest. De Pace & Bello, & de Doctrinis publicè docendis & de controversiis omnibus judicat. Magistratuum, Consiliariorum in Pace, Ducum in Bello, Ministrorumque Publicorum constitutor solus est. Premiorum, Poenarum, Honoris, & Ordinis Arbiter, Legum denique omnium Author Latorque est propter rationes capite praecedente[c] allegatas.

[1] I call [2] oblige themselves to do what is ordered by one person.
[3] in the latter case the citizens agree to be ruled for fear of one another, but in the former case they do so for fear of one man.
[4] , where force is prohibited, and the laws decree that robberies be prosecuted, promises extorted by fear are void; but the reason does not lie in the nature of covenants. Even where a man's promises made from fear are invalid, [5] ^ whether instituted or acquired by force,
[6] therefore who possesses them cannot be punished, nor can he rightfully be accused. He judges concerning peace and war, and about which doctrines should be taught publicly, and about all disputes. He is the sole appointer of magistrates, counsellors in peace, commanders in war, and public ministers. He is the arbiter of rewards, punishments, honour, and rank; and, finally, he is the author and proposer of all laws.

---

[a] Cicero, De officiis, I.32: 'For who does not see that he who has been forced to promise by fear is not obliged to keep those promises?' ('Iam illis promissis standum non esse, quis non videt, quae coactus quis metu . . . promiserit?'). Cf. also Ames, Conscience, p. 227: 'the consent which is wrested by extreame feare, is not sufficient for a firme Contract' (noting, however (p. 228), that contracts made from fear of lawful punishment were binding). [b] = adduced (OED, 'allege', *v.*², 3). [c] Correctly: Ch. 18.

Dominion Paternall how attained.

Not by Generation, but by Contract;

Dominion is acquired [7]two wayes;[7] By Generation, °and by Conquest. The right of Dominion by Generation, is that, which the Parent hath over his Children;° and is called PATERNALL. [8]And is not so derived from the Generation, as if therefore the Parent had[8] Dominion over his Child because he begat him; but from the Childs Consent, [9]either expresse, or by other sufficient arguments declared. For as to the Generation, God hath ordained to man a helper; and[9] there be alwayes two that are °equally° Parents: the Dominion therefore over the Child, should belong °equally° to both; [10]and he be equally subject to both, which is impossible; for no man can obey two Masters.[10] [d] And whereas some have attributed the Dominion to the Man onely, as being of the more excellent Sex;[e] they misreckon in it. For there is not alwayes that difference of strength, or prudence between the man and the woman, as that the right can be determined without War. In Common-wealths, [11]this controversie is decided by the Civill Law: and for the most part, (but not alwayes) the sentence is in favour of the Father; because for the most part Common-wealths have [103] been erected by the Fathers, not by the Mothers of families. But the question lyeth now[11] in the state of meer Nature; where there are °supposed° no lawes of Matrimony; [12]no lawes for the Education of Children; but the Law of Nature, and the naturall inclination of the Sexes, one to another, and to their children. In this condition of meer Nature,[12] either the Parents °between themselves° dispose of the dominion over the Child by Contract; or do not dispose thereof at all. If they dispose thereof, [13]the right passeth according to the Contract. We find in History that[13] the Amazons Contracted with the Men of the neighbouring Countries, °to whom they had recourse for issue,° that the issue Male should be sent back, but the Female remain with themselves: °so that the dominion of the Females was in the Mother.°[g]

25 the issue] the issues MS

[7] in another way, [8] The father does not have this

[9] or because of some other reasons. For in the generation of every son or daughter

[10] , if the right of dominion were determined only by generation; and it is impossible to obey both of them.

[11] the civil law applies. Therefore, where the male reigns, dominion over the royal children is given to the male; where the female does so, to the female.[f] But the question now is about the right of dominion

[12] , other than the mutual love of the sexes and the natural inclination to care for one's children. There,

[13] they do so by contract, and who has the dominion is stated by the contract. Thus

Est etiam Dominii Acquisiti genus aliud per Generationem, quod Paternum dicitur. Cujus jus Patris est, non quia filium genuit, sed quia consensit filius, vel propter alia aliqua argumenta. In uniuscujusque enim filii vel filiae Generatione, duo concurrunt Generantes. Si ergo Dominii Jus sola Generatione definiretur, duo essent Domini, quibus ambobus obedire impossibile est.[d] Quod autem scripserunt aliqui Dominium Patris esse propter praestantiam sexus,[e] non rectè dicitur. Neque enim Mas Foeminae tantum aut viribus aut prudentia semper praestat, ut Dominium determinari possit sine Bello. In Civitatibus obtinet Jus Civile. Itaque ubi Mas regnat, ibi Mari, ubi Foemina, ibi Foeminae Dominium tribuitur in filios regios.[f] Sed quaestio nunc est de Jure Dominii in conditione naturali, ubi Leges Matrimoniales nullae sunt praeter sexuum amorem mutuum & prolis curam naturaliter insitam, ubi Pater & Mater de Dominio in Infantem aut Pacto disponunt, aut omnino non disponunt. Si ergo disponunt, per Pactum id faciunt, & Dominium cujus sit à Pacto indicatur. Sic Amazones cum Maribus vicinorum Pacti sunt, ut geniti pueri ad illos remitterentur, puellae apud matres remanerent.[g]

4 Dominii Jus] Domini Ius 70 8 determinari this edn.] determinare 68, 70

[d] Matt. 6: 24; Luke 16: 13.

[e] These 'some' included Aristotle: Politics, I.12 (1259b1–4).

[f] Hobbes's Latin, as translated here, makes sense in itself, but little sense in the context of the argument at this point, which is about the general practice of families within the commonwealth. Possibly he wrote 'regit', 'governs' (not 'regnat', 'reigns'), and 'in filios regendos', 'over governing the children' (not 'in filios regios', 'over the royal children'); perhaps 'regendos' was mis-set by the compositor as 'regios', and 'regit' then changed to 'regnat' to accord with it.

[g] Quintus Curtius, Historia Alexandri, VI.v.30–31.

Or Education;

If there be no Contract, the Dominion is in the Mother. For in the condition of meer Nature, where there are no Matrimoniall lawes, it cannot be known who is the Father, unlesse it be declared by the Mother: and therefore the right of Dominion over the Child dependeth on her will, and is consequently hers. Again, seeing the Infant is [14]first[14] in the power of the Mother, so as she may either [15]nourish, or expose[15] it; if she nourish it, it oweth its life to the Mother; and is therefore obliged to obey her, rather than any other; and by consequence the Dominion over it is hers. But if she expose it, and another find, [16] and nourish it, the Dominion is in him that nourisheth it. For [17]it ought to obey him by whom it is preserved; because[17] preservation of life being the end, for which one man becomes subject to another, °every man is supposed to promise obedience, to him, in whose power it is to save, or destroy him.°

Or Precedent subjection of one of the Parents to the other.

If the Mother be the Fathers subject, the Child, is in the Fathers power: and if the Father be the Mothers subject, (as when a Soveraign Queen marrieth one of her subjects,) the Child is subject to the Mother; because the Father also is her subject.

If a man and a woman, Monarches of two severall Kingdomes, have a Child, and contract concerning who shall have the Dominion of him, the Right of the Dominion passeth by the Contract. If they contract not, the Dominion followeth the Dominion of the [18]place of his residence. For the Soveraign of each Country hath Dominion over all that reside therein.[18]

He that hath the Dominion over the Child, hath Dominion also over the Children of the Child; °and over their Childrens Children.° For he that hath Dominion over the person of a man, hath Dominion over all that is his; °without which, Dominion were but a Title, without the effect.°

The Right of Succession followeth the Rules of the Right of Possession.

The Right of Succession to Paternall Dominion, proceedeth in the same manner, as doth the Right of Succession to Monarchy[19]; of which I have already °sufficiently° spoken in the precedent chapter.

18 and a] and B

[14] born [15] rear it, or expose or kill [16] ^ preserve,
[17] the preserver is always the master of the preserved;
[18] kingdom in which he is born; for whoever has dominion over a commonwealth is master of all the citizens born in it. [19] ^ by institution

Sin Pactum nullum interveniat, Dominium Matris est. In conditione enim naturali, ubi Leges Matrimoniales nullae extant, quis Pater est ignoratur, nisi indicante Matre. A matris ergo arbitrio [100] dependet Dominium. Ipsius ergo est. Rursus Infans in Potestate Matris nascitur, ita ut penes illam sit aut educare aut exponere vel interficere. Si ergo alat, Matri vitam debet Infans, & propterea illi prae omnibus aliis obedire obligatur. Dominium ergo Matris est. Sin exponat illum Mater, alius autem repertum servet alatque, alentis Dominium est. Servati enim semper Dominus est Servator; quia finis propter quem alteri alteris se subjiciunt Conservatio est.

Si Pater Matris Dominus sit, etiam Infantis Dominus est. Sin Mater Patris sit Domina, ut fit quando Regina Summam habens Potestatem subdito suo nubit, Dominus Infantis Mater est, ut quae Domina est mariti sui.

Si Vir & Vxor Potestatem in diversis Civitatibus Summam habentes Filium habeant, & de Dominio in illum contrahant, Dominium dependet à Contractu. Si non contrahant, Dominus vel Domina est cui Dominium Regni est, in quo nascitur Filius; quia is, qui Civitatis Dominium habet, Civium omnium in ea natorum Dominus est.

Qui Dominus Filii est, Dominus quoque est Filiorum filii; quia qui Jus in personam habet, Jus quoque habet in ea, quae sunt personae.

Jus Successionis ad Dominium Paternum, eodem modo procedit, quo in Monarchia per Institutionem, de qua dictum est in Capite praecedente.

Despoticall Dominion how attained.

Dominion acquired by °Conquest, or° Victory in war, is that which some Writers call DESPOTICALL, °from Δεσπότης, which signifieth a Lord, or Master;° and is the Dominion of the Master over his Servant.[h] And this Dominion is then acquired to the Victor, when the [104] Vanquished, to avoyd the present stroke of death, covenanteth °either in expresse words, or by other sufficient signes of the Will,° that so long as his life, and the liberty of his body is allowed him, [20]the Victor shall have the use thereof, at his pleasure.[20] And after such Covenant made, the Vanquished is a SERVANT, and not before: for by the word Servant (whether it be derived from Servire, to Serve, or from Servare, to Save, which I leave to Grammarians to dispute)[i] is not meant a Captive, which is kept in prison, or bonds, [21]till the owner of him that took him, or bought him of one that did, shall consider what to do with him: (for such men, (commonly called Slaves,) have no obligation at all; but may break their bonds, or the prison; and kill, or carry away captive their Master, justly:) but one, that being taken, hath corporall liberty allowed him; and upon promise not to run away, nor to do violence to his Master, is trusted by him.[21]

Not by the Victory, but by the Consent of the Vanquished.

It is not therefore the Victory, that giveth the right of Dominion over the Vanquished, but his own Covenant. Nor is he obliged because he is [22]Conquered; that is to say, beaten, and taken, or put to flight; but because he commeth in,[j] and Submitteth to the Victor;[22] Nor is the Victor obliged [23]by an enemies rendring himselfe, (without promise of life,) to spare him for this his yeelding to discretion; which obliges not the Victor longer, than in his own discretion hee shall think fit.[23]

And that which men do, when they [24]demand (as it is now called) Quarter, (which the Greeks called Ζωγρία, taking alive,) is to evade the present fury of the Victor, by Submission, and to[24] compound for their life, with Ransome, or Service: [25]and therefore he that hath Quarter, hath not his life given, but deferred till farther deliberation; For it is not an yeelding on condition of life, but to discretion.[25] [k] And then onely is [26]his life in security, and his service due,[26] when the Victor hath trusted him with his corporall liberty. °For Slaves that work in Prisons, or Fetters, do it not of duty, but to avoyd the cruelty of their task-masters.°

1–2 Despoticall . . . attained.] {Dominion Despoticall added by TH} MS 10 Grammarians] grammar schollers MS 12 (for] for MS 14–16 Master, justly:) . . . Master, is] Master, if they can) iustly; but not such as beeing taken haue corporall liberty allowed them, vpon promise not to run away nor to do violence to their Master, and are MS 27 Service] seruice if they can MS 29 security] surety MS

Dominium per Victoriam in Bello acquisitum, ab aliquibus Scriptoribus Despoticum appellatur, quod est Dominium Herile in Servos.[h] Per Victoriam autem Acquisitum tunc est, quando victi vitandae mortis imminentis causa facturos se paciscuntur, pro Vita & Libertate Corporis concessa, quicquid à Victore imperabitur. Post Pactum illud Victus Victoris Servus est. Quod nomen utrum an à Servare an à Servire derivetur disputent Grammatici.[i] Significat autem non captum illum qui carcere concluditur, aut catenis constringitur, sed captum illum qui Pacto servire obligatur. Vinctus enim vel incarceratus, ut qui cum Victore nihil Pactus est, nullo Iure teneri potest quin carcerem, si potest, effringere, vincula dirumpere, victorem interficere, aut in servitutem vicissim adducere jure possit. Captus autem qui pro Libertate corporea fideliter servire Pactus est, idem facere sine Pacti violatione, id est sine Injuria non potest.

Non ergo à Victoria jus Dominii, sed à Victi Pacto nascitur; neque eo obligatur quod Captus est, sed quod voluntati capientis se [101] submisit. Neque ob submissionem ejus, obligatur Victor vitam ei condonare, nisi antè id promiserit.

Quod soleant homines vitam ab instante hoste petere, ideo faciunt, ut declinata morte quae ab irato hoste statim expectatur, possint postea aut pecunia aut servitute vitam redimere; non quod Victor redemptionis pretium accipere teneatur. Tunc demum servus vitae securus est quando corpus suum sibi creditur. Sin opus faciat aut quomodocunque sine Pacto serviat, non id vi juris, sed metu mortis facit.

[20] he will do whatever the victor commands.

[21] but a captive who is obliged by covenant to be a servant. For he who is kept in bonds or prison, as he has made no covenant with the victor, cannot rightfully be under any obligation not to break out of prison (if he can), break his bonds, and either kill the victor, or carry him off, in turn, into servitude. But a captive who, for the sake of corporeal liberty, has covenanted to be a faithful servant, cannot do the same without violating the covenant – that is, without injury. [22] captured, but because he has submitted to the will of the captor. [23] by his submission to spare his life, unless he previously promised to do so.

[24] beg for their lives at the hands of an enemy, they do so that, when the threat of instant death from their furious enemy has been lifted, they may [25] not because the victor is bound to accept the price of the person's ransom.

[26] the servant secure in his life,

---

[h] Aristotle, Politics, I.2, 1255b17–21; III.14, 1285a17–28. In the Latin, Hobbes adds the term 'herilis' as a synonym for 'despoticus'; this was the Latin equivalent (from 'herus' or 'erus', meaning 'master of servants'), preferred by humanist writers (e.g., Aristotle, ed. and tr. Sepúlveda, De republica, fo. 98v; Grotius, De iure belli ac pacis, III.viii.2).

[i] The generally accepted (though incorrect) etymology in the early modern period was that of Isidore of Seville, Etymologiarum, V.xxvii.32: '"Servitude" is so called from "saving" [servando]; for among the ancients, those who were saved from death in war were called "slaves" [servi]' ('Servitus a servando vocata. Apud antiquos enim qui in bello morte servabantur, servi vocabantur').

[j] = submits, yields (OED, 'come', v., 63.f). [k] = 'at discretion', a military phrase meaning 'at the enemy's mercy', 'at the enemy's disposal' (OED, 'discretion', 5).

The Master of the Servant, is Master also of all he hath; and [27]may exact the use thereof; that is to say, of his goods, of his labour, of his servants, and of his children, as often as he shall think fit. For he holdeth his life of his Master, by the covenant of obedience; that is, of owning, and authorising whatsoever the Master shall do. And in case the Master, if he refuse, kill him, or cast him into bonds, or otherwise punish him for his disobedience, he is himselfe the author of the same; and cannot accuse him of injury.[27]

In summe, the Rights °and Consequences° of both Paternall and Despoticall Dominion, are the very same with those of a Soveraign by Institution; and for the same reasons: which reasons are [28]set down[28] in the precedent chapter.[1] So that for a man that is Monarch of divers Nations, whereof he hath, in one the Soveraignty by Institution [29]of the people assembled, and in another by Conquest, that is by the Submission of each particular, to avoyd death or bonds; to demand of one Nation more than of the other, from the title of Conquest, as being a Conquered Nation, is an act of ignorance of the Rights of [105] Soveraignty. For the Soveraign is absolute over both alike; or else there is no Soveraignty at all; and so every man may Lawfully protect himselfe, if he can, with his own sword, which is the condition of war.[29]

Difference between a Family and a Kingdom.

By this it appears, that a great Family if it be not part of some Common-wealth, is [30]of it self, as to the Rights of Soveraignty, a little Monarchy;[30] whether that Family consist of a man and his children; or of a man and his servants; or of a man, and his children, and servants together: wherein the Father or Master is the [31]Soveraign.[31] But yet a Family is not properly a Common-wealth; unlesse it be of that power by its own number, or by other opportunities, as not to be subdued without °the hazard of° war. For where a number of men are manifestly too weak to defend themselves united, every one may use his [32]own reason[32] in time of danger, to save his own life, either by flight, or by submission to the enemy, as hee shall think best; in the same manner as a °very° small company of souldiers, [33]surprised by an army, may[33] cast down their armes, and demand quarter, or run away, rather than be put to the sword. And thus much shall suffice; concerning what I find by °speculation, and° deduction, of Soveraign Rights, from the nature, [34]need, and designes of men, in erecting of Common-wealths, and putting themselves under Monarchs, or Assemblies, entrusted with power enough for their protection.[34]

15 as] {or added by TH} as MS 24 that] {that of corr. to such by TH} MS 31 sword] sword, whether their Captayne will or not MS

Dominus Servi omnium bonorum quae habet Servus Dominus est, & Domino acquiritur quicquid acquirit Servus. Continetur enim hoc in natura Servitutis.

Jura denique omnia Dominii Paterni tum Despotici sive Herilis eadem sunt quae Summae Potestatis in Civitate per Institutionem; & propter rationes easdem; quae rationes in capite praecedente[1] satis explicatae sunt. Itaque Monarcha qui duarum aut plurium Civitatum summam habet Potestatem, in una per Institutionem, in altera per acquisitionem, si praetextu Victoriae, uni quam alteri duriorem se praebeat, aut per iniquitatem, aut per Iuris Naturalis ignorantiam id facit. Constat hinc Familiam magnam, nisi Civitatis alicujus pars sit, quantum ad Iura attinet, Civitatem esse parvam, sive illa Familia ex Patre & Filiis, sive ex Domino & Servis, vel ex Patre & Filiis & Servis constet; & in ea Familia Monarcham Dominum Patremque esse. Familia tamen propriè Civitas non est, nisi tantae sit Potentiae vel per numerum suum, vel per alias oportunitates, ut subjici sine Bello non possit. Ubi enim homines manifestè debiliores sunt quam ut tueri se possint uniti, unusquisque eorum, periculo imminente, ad vitae suae conservationem, sive fuga sive deditione potest pro suo arbitrio jure uti; quemadmodum faciunt milites magno exercitu circumventi, si ipsi pauci sint, arma deponere, vitam petere, vel fugere potius solent quam ab hostibus occidi. Atque haec de juribus eorum qui Summam habent Potestatem sufficiant ex rei natura deducta.

[27] whatever the servant acquires is acquired by the master. For this belongs to the nature of servitude.
[28] sufficiently explained
[29] and in another by acquisition, if he shows himself harsher towards one than towards another, on the pretext that he conquered it, he acts either out of iniquity, or out of ignorance of natural right.
[30] , so far as its rights are concerned, a little commonwealth; [31] monarch. [32] right [33] surrounded by a large army, usually [34] of the matter.

[1] Correctly: Ch. 18.

The Rights of Monarchy from Scripture.

Let us now consider what the Scripture teacheth in the same point. To Moses, the children of Israel say thus. * Speak thou to us, and we will heare thee; but let not God speak to us, lest we dye. [35]This is[35] absolute obedience to Moses. Concerning the Right of Kings, God himself by the mouth of Samuel, saith, * This shall be the Right of the King you will have to reigne over you. He shall take your sons, and set them to drive his Chariots, and to be his horsemen, and to run before his chariots; [36] and gather in his harvest; and to make his engines of War, and Instruments of his chariots; and shall take your daughters to make perfumes, to be his Cookes, and Bakers. He shall take your fields, your vine-yards, and your olive-yards, [37] and give them to his servants. °He shall take the tyth of your corne and wine, and give it to the men of his chamber, and to his other servants.° He shall take your man-servants, and your maid-servants, and the choice of your youth, [38] and employ them in his businesse. He shall take the tyth of your flocks; and you shall be his servants. This is absolute power, [39]and summed up in the last words, you shall be his[39] servants. Againe, when the people heard [40]what power their King was to have,[40] yet they consented thereto, and say thus, * [41]We will be as all other nations, and our King shall[41] judge our causes, and goe before us, to conduct our wars. Here [42]is confirmed the Right[42] that Soveraigns have, both to the Militia, and to all Judicature; in which is conteined as absolute power, as one man can possibly transferre to another. Again, the prayer of King Salomon to God, was [43]this.[43] * Give to thy servant understanding, to judge thy people, and to discerne between Good and Evill. It belongeth therefore to the [44] Soveraigne to bee [106] Judge, and to praescribe the Rules of °discerning° Good and Evill: °which Rules are Lawes;° and therefore in him is the Legislative Power. Saul sought the life of David; yet when it was in his power to slay Saul, and his Servants [45]would have done[45] it, David forbad them, saying, * God forbid I should do such an act against my Lord, the anoynted of Exod. 20. 19.

*1 Sam. 8. 11, 12, &c.

Verse. 19. &c.[m]

*1 Kings 3. 9.

*1 Sam. 24. 9.[n]

4 by the . . . Samuel, saith] {illeg. corr. to hath declared by by TH} the mouth of Samuel MS
5–6 8. 11, 12, &c] 8. {12 corr. to 11 by TH} MS 5 to] om. MS 7 and to] to MS 10 your olive-yards] the places where your oliue trees grow MS 10 tyth] tenth B 16 say] sayd B
16 19. &c. H-Errata] 10 MS, H, B {Note:'10' was probably an error in the copy-MS for '20'.}
21 3. 9] 1. 3. 9 MS 26 to slay . . . done it] and his seruants would haue slayne Saul MS

[35] Thus the people of Israel owed complete and [36] ^ and he will appoint him captains over thousands, and captains over fifties; and will set them to ear his ground, [AV] [37] ^ even the best of them, [AV] [38] ^ and your asses, [AV]
[39] that is to say, all citizens are the king's [40] the right of their king,
[41] we will have a king over us; that we also may be like all the nations; and that our king may [AV]
[42] are confirmed all the rights [43] for this power: [44] ^ civil [45] urged him to do

[m] Correctly: v. 20. [n] Correctly: 24: 6.

Videamus jam de eadem re quid docent Scripturae Sacrae. Ad Mosem populus Israeliticus sic loquitur: Loquere tu nobiscum, & audiemus; sed nobiscum ne loquatur Deus, ne moriamur. Debebatur ergo Mosi à populo Israelitico plenissima, & absoluta obedientia. De Iure Regum Deus ipse (1 Sam. 8. vers. 11. &c.) per Samuelem dicit: Haec erit ratio ipsa Regis qui regnabit super vos; filios vestros accipiet, ut sibi disponat in curribus suis, & in equitibus suis, & ut currant ante currum [102] suum; & ad disponendum sibi Chiliarchos, & praefectos quinquagenis; & ad arandum arva sua, & ad metendum messem suam, & ad faciendum instrumenta bellica sua, & instrumenta curruum suorum, Similiter filias vestras accipiet in unguentarias, in coquas, & in pistrices; etiam agros vestros, & vineas vestras, ac oliveta vestra optima accipiet, & dabit servis suis; servosque vestros, & ancillas vestras, ac juvenes praestantissimos, & asinos vestros accipiet, adhibebitque ad opus suum. Greges vestros decimabit; denique vos eritis ei servi. Potentia haec absoluta est, nempe Cives omnes Regis servi sunt. Rursus, audita ratione Regis sui populus assensit tamen dicens, sed Rex praeerit nobis, ut simus nos quoque sicut omnes istae gentes; & vindicet nos Rex noster, & procedens ante nos gerat Bella nostra. Confirmata hic sunt iis, qui habent Summam Potestatem, jura omnia tum Militiae tum Iudiciorum, quae adeo absoluta est Potentia, ut homo ad hominem, Potentiam majorem transferre non possit. Praeterea Potentia quam à Deo petivit Salomon, haec erat: Des servo tuo animum intelligentem ad judicandum populum tuum discernendo inter bonum & malum. Quamobrem jus Iudiciorum & jus praescribendi regulas Boni & Mali, id est jus Legum ferendarum pertinent ad illum qui Summam habet Potestatem Civilem. Quaesivit Davidem Saulus ut eum occideret; cum tamen Saulum occidere potuit David, & ut faceret hortati sunt eum servi ejus; vetuit eos David dicens, absit ut facerem rem hanc Domino meo, uncto Iehovae, extendendo manum meam contra eum; nam unctus Iehovae est. Confirmatur

17 qui this edn.] ut 68, 70 20 Potentia this edn.] Potentiam 68, 70

*Coll. 3. 20.[p] God[46]. For obedience of servants St. Paul saith, * Servants obey your masters
*Verse 22.[q] in All things; and, [47] * Children obey your Parents in All things. [48]There is simple obedience in those that are subject to Paternall, or Despoticall Dominion.
*Math. 23. 2, 3. Again,[48] * The Scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses chayre, and therefore All that they shall bid you observe, that observe and do. There again is simple obedience.
*Tit. 3. 2.[r] And St Paul, * Warn them that they subject themselves to Princes, and to those that are in Authority, & obey them. This obedience is also simple. Lastly, our Saviour himselfe [49]acknowledges,[49] that men ought to pay such taxes as are by [50]Kings[50] imposed, where he sayes, Give to Caesar that which is Caesars;[s] and payed such taxes himselfe. And that [51]the Kings word, is sufficient to take any thing from any Subject, when there is need; and that the King is Judge of that need: For he himselfe, as King of the Jewes, commanded his Disciples to take
*Mat. 21. 2, 3. the Asse, and Asses Colt to carry him into Jerusalem, saying,[51] * Go into the Village over against you, and you shall [52] find a shee Asse tyed, and her Colt with her, unty them, and bring them to me. And if any man [53]ask you, what you mean by it,[53] Say the Lord hath need of them: And [54]they will let them go.[54] They will not ask whether his necessity [55]be a sufficient title;[55] nor whether he be judge of that necessity; but acquiesce in the will of [56]the Lord.[56]

* Gen. 3. 5. To these places may be added also that of Genesis, * You shall be as Gods, knowing Good and Evill. And verse 11. Who told thee that thou wast naked? hast thou eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee thou shouldest not eat? For the Cognisance or Judicature of Good and Evill, being forbidden by the name of the fruit of the tree of Knowledge[57], as a triall of Adams obedience; The Divel to enflame the Ambition of the woman, to whom that fruit already seemed beautifull, told her that °by tasting it,° they should be as Gods, knowing Good and Evill. Whereupon having both eaten, they did indeed take upon them [58]Gods office,[58] which is Judicature of Good and Evill; but acquired no new ability to distinguish between them °aright.° And whereas it is sayd, that hav-

2 Verse] om. MS 5 simple] absolute MS 7 simple] simple and absolute MS

[46] ^ , to stretch forth mine hand against him, seeing he is the anointed of Jehovah. [AV]
[47] ^ on the obedience of children, he says,
[48] Therefore simple obedience is owed by children and servants to their fathers and masters. Again, Christ says, [49] teaches [50] the civil sovereign
[51] whatever the sovereign may take from his subject is taken rightfully, when he has need of it, and that he is to judge whether there is need of it or not, can be shown by Christ's words when he commanded his disciples: [52] ^ straightway [AV] [53] say ought unto you, [AV]
[54] straightway he will send them. [AV] [55] or need gives the Lord the right to take them;
[56] God. [57] ^ of good and evil [58] the office which was God's alone,

[p] Correctly: 3: 22. [q] Correctly: 20. [r] Correctly: 3: 1. [s] Matt. 22: 21; Mark 12: 17.

hic Regum impunitas. De Servorum obedientia dicit Sanctus Paulus, Servi obedite Dominis vestris in omnibus. De obedientia Filiorum dicit, Filii obedite Parentibus in omnibus. Debita ergo à Filiis & Servis Patribus suis & Dominis est obedientia simplex. Porrò (Matth. 23. 2, 3.) dicit Christus, In Cathedra Mosis sedent Scribae & Pharisaei; omnia ergo quae dixerint vobis ut servetis, servate & facite. Ecce rursus obedientiam simplicem. Etiam Sanctus Paulus Tit. 3. 1. Ipsis suggere ut sese subjiciant Principibus, ac Potestatibus obtemperent. Obedientia haec simplex est. Postremo Servator noster ipse docet tributa imposita à Summa Potestate Civili solvenda esse, ipse solvens, & date (inquiens) Caesari ea quae Caesaris sunt.[s] Item quod quicquid is qui Summam habet Potestatem exegerit à subdito suo rectè exigitur, quando opus erit, & quod utrum opus sit necne ipse judicabit, ostendi potest ex verbis Christi Discipulis suis mandantis: Ite in vicum qui vobis est ex adverso, & statim invenietis asinam ligatam & pullum cum ea; solventes eos adducite ad me. Et si quis vobis aliquid dixerit, dicite, Domino his opus est; statim autem mittet eos. Non interrogabunt utrum [103] necessitas illa sive opus jus eos capiendi Domino tribuat, neque utrum Dominus necessitatis illius Iudex sit, sed in voluntate Dei acquiescent.

His locis addi etiam potest quod dicitur Gen. 3. 5. Eritis sicut Dii, scientes boni & mali; & vers. 11. quis indicavit tibi nudum esse te? An de fructu illius arboris, de quo interdixeram tibi ne comedas ex eo, comederis? Cognitio id est Iudicatio boni & mali vetabatur sub nomine fructus arboris scientiae boni & mali, in experimentum obedientiae Adami. Diabolus autem ut ambitionem faeminae, cui fructus ille pulcher jam visus erat, incenderet, dixit illi, fore illos quasi Deos scientes boni & mali. Cum igitur comedissent ambo, arrogarunt quidem officium quod Dei solius erat, nempe Iudicationem boni & mali sibimet ipsis; quanquam facultatem novam discernendi inter bonum & malum nullam acquisierant. Quod dicitur autem, quod cum comedissent, ing eaten, they saw they were naked; no man hath so interpreted that place, as if they had been formerly blind, and saw not their own skins: the meaning is plain, that it was then they first judged their nakednesse (wherein it was Gods will to create them) to be uncomely; and by being ashamed, did tacitely censure [59]God himselfe.[59] And thereupon God [60]saith,[60] Hast thou eaten, &c. as if he should say, doest thou that owest me obedience, take upon thee to judge of my Commandements? Whereby it is cleerly, (though Allegorically,) signified, that the [61]Commands of them that have the right to command,[61] are not by their Subjects to be censured, nor disputed.

21 comedas] comederes 70 21 comederis] comedisti 70 24 incenderet, dixit illi, 70] incenderet dixit, illi 68 28 dicitur autem, quod] autem dicitur, 70

Soveraign Power ought in all Common-wealths to be absolute.

So that it appeareth plainly, to my understanding, both from Reason, and Scripture, that the Soveraign Power, whether placed in One [107] Man, as in Monarchy, or in one Assembly of men, as in Popular, and Aristocraticall Common-wealths, is as great, as possibly men can be imagined to make it. And though of so unlimited a Power, men may fancy many evill consequences, yet the consequences [62]of the want of it, which is perpetuall[62] warre of every man against his neighbour, are much worse. The condition of man in this life shall never be without Inconveniences; but there happeneth in no Common-wealth any great Inconvenience, but what proceeds from the Subjects disobedience, and breach of those Covenants, from which the Common-wealth hath its being. And whosoever thinking Soveraign Power too great, will seek to make it lesse; [63]must subject himselfe, to the Power, that can limit it; that is to say, to a greater.[63]

The greatest objection [64] is, that of the Practise; when men ask, where, and when, such Power has by Subjects been acknowledged. But one may ask them again, when, or where has there been a [65]Kingdome long[65] free from Sedition and Civill Warre. In those Nations, whose Common-wealths have been long-lived, and not been destroyed, but by forraign warre, the Subjects never did dispute of the Soveraign Power[66]. But howsoever, an argument from the Practise of men, that have [67]not sifted to the bottom, and with exact reason weighed the causes, and nature of Common-wealths, and suffer daily those miseries, that proceed from the ignorance thereof,[67] is invalid. For though °in all places of the world,° men should lay the foundation of their houses on the

[59] God's work. [60] asks Adam, [61] deeds of sovereigns [62] attending a limited power, namely the [63] will subject himself to a greater power, which will seem to be able to limit sovereign power.
[64] ^ to absolute power [65] commonwealth where the power was not absolute, [66] ^ of their princes [67] never deeply looked into the causes and nature of civil matters, viderunt se nudos esse, nemo locum illum ita interpretatus est, quasi coeci antè fuerint neque suas ipsorum cutes viderint. Sensus autem manifestus est, quòd eo primùm tempore nuditatem suam (in qua Deo visum est illos creare) indecoram esse judicarunt; & pudore suo Dei opus tacitè condemnarunt. Interrogat ergo Adamum Deus, Comedisti &c. tanquam si dixisset, Tu qui obedientiam mihi debes, arrogasti tibi Potestatem de actionibus meis Iudicandi? Vnde perspicuè (quanquam Allegoricè) significatur, facta eorum quibus Summa est Potestas, à subditis suis non esse reprehendenda, nec disputanda.

Itaque manifestè (quantum ego intelligo) non modo ex Ratione, sed etiam ex Scriptura Sacra, Summam Potestatem, sive ea in uno homine, ut in Monarchiis, sive in uno Coetu, ut in Democratiis & Aristocratiis, collocata sit tantam esse apparet quantam facere eam possunt homines. Quanquam autem de Potestate indefinita multa incommoda homines imaginari sibi possunt, incommoda tamen quae Potestatem limitatam comitantur (nempe bellum uniuscujusque contra vicinum suum) multo sunt majora. Conditio hominum in hac vita sine incommodis nunquam erit. Neque est in Civitate quacunque incommodum magnum, nisi quod plerumque à Civium ipsorum contumacia & à violatione Pactorum illorum in quibus essentia Civitatis consistit ortum sit. Quicunque autem Potestatem Summam nimiam esse putans, diminuere conabitur, subjiciet se Potestati majori quae Summam limitare posse videbitur.

Maxima contra Potestatem absolutam objectio desumitur ab eo quod fieri solet, & eorum est qui interrogant ubi & quando Potestas absoluta à subditis agnita fuerit. Sed vicissim ego illos interrogo ubi, [104] & quando libera à Seditione & Bello Civili extitit Civitas, ubi Potestas absoluta non fuerit. In gentibus illis ubi Civitates diu duraverunt, nec nisi Bello externo perierunt, subditi de Potentia Summa suorum principum nunquam disputaverunt. Argumentum autem à consuetudine hominum sumptum, qui in causas, & naturam rerum Civilium nunquam profundè inspexerunt, invalidum est. Etsi sand,[t] it could not thence be inferred, that so it ought to be. The [68]skill[68] of making, and maintaining Common-wealths, [69]consisteth in certain Rules, as doth Arithmetique and Geometry; not (as Tennis-play)[69] on Practise onely: which Rules, [70]neither poor men have the leisure, nor men that have had the leisure, have hitherto had the curiosity, or the method to find out.[70]

21 diminuere] diminuere eam 70

3 on] {on corr. to in by TH} MS 5 have hitherto had] hitherto {>had} MS

[68] science
[69] has certain and infallible rules, no less than arithmetic and geometry; and does not depend [70] poor men have not had the leisure to find out; and those who have had the leisure and the will to do so have not understood by what method it should be done.

[t] Cf. Matt. 7: 26–7.

enim homines fundamenta domorum suarum super arenam collocarent,[t] non tamen inde inferri potest, ut ita fieri debeat. Scientia constituendi conservandique Civitates, regulas certas habet & infallibiles non minùs quam Arithmetica & Geometria; neque ab usu tantùm dependet. Quas regulas excogitandi otium neque habuerunt pauperes, neque qui otium & voluntatem habuere, qua methodo id faciendum erat intellexerunt.

2 potest, ut ita fieri debeat] posset, ita fieri debere 70 6 qua 70] quae 68

CHAP. XXI.

Of the LIBERTY of [1]Subjects.[1]

Liberty what. LIBERTY, or FREEDOME, signifieth (properly) the absence of °Opposition; (by Opposition, I mean° externall Impediments of motion;) and may be applyed no lesse to Irrationall, and Inanimate creatures, than to Rationall. For whatsoever is so tyed, or environed, as it cannot move, but within a certain space, which space is determined by °the opposition of° some externall body, we say it hath not Liberty to go further. And so of all living creatures, whilest they are imprisoned, or restrained, with walls, or [2] chayns; °and of the water whilest it is kept in by banks, or vessels, that otherwise would spread it selfe into a larger space, we use to say,° they are not at Liberty, to [3]move in such manner, as without those externall impediments[3] they would. But when the impediment of motion, is in the constitution of the thing it selfe, we use not to say, it wants the Liberty; but the Power °to move;° as when °a stone lyeth still, or° a man is fastned to his bed by sicknesse[4]. [108]

What it is to be Free. And according to this proper, and generally received meaning of the word, A FREE-MAN, is he, that in those things, which by his strength and [5]wit[5] he is able to do, is not hindred to doe what he has a will to. But when the words Free, and Liberty, are applyed to any thing but Bodies, they are abused; for that which is not subject to Motion, is not subject to Impediment: And therefore, when 'tis said (for example) The way is Free, no Liberty of the way is signified, but of those that walk in it °without stop.° And when we say a Guift is Free, there is not meant any Liberty of the Guift, but of the Giver, °that was not bound by any law, or Covenant to give it.° So when we [6] speak Freely, [7]it is not the Liberty of voice, or pronunciation, but of the man, whom no law hath obliged to speak otherwise then he did. Lastly, from the use of the word Free-will, no Liberty can be inferred of the will, desire, or inclination, but the Liberty of the man; which consisteth in this, that he finds no stop, in doing what he has the will, desire, or inclination to doe.[7]

[1] citizens. [2] ^ tied to a fixed place by [3] go where otherwise
[4] ^, he is said to be deprived of the power, not the liberty, to go [5] skill [6] ^ are said to [7] the liberty is not of the speech, but of the speaker. Lastly, free-will is the liberty not of the will, but of the willer.

CAPVT XXI.

De Libertate Civium.

Libertas significat propriè absentiam impedimentorum motus externorum; & dicitur non minus de rebus irrationalibus & inanimatis quam rationalibus. Quicquid enim ita ligatur vel concluditur, ut nisi in spatio ab externis Corporibus determinato moveri nequeat, id ulterius progrediendi Libertate carere dicimus. Itaque animalia dum muris includuntur, vel catenis ad locum certum alligantur, eundi quò alioqui itura essent Libertate carent. Quando vero impedimentum in ipsa est natura rei, non Libertate, sed Potentia carere dicitur; sic Homo qui morbo affixus lecto est, eundi potentia non Libertate privari dicitur.

Iuxta hanc propriam & receptam vocis significationem Liber dicitur is, qui ex iis quae viribus & arte propria facere potest, quin faciat quicquid vult non impeditur. Sed voces Liber & Libertas qui ad alias res praeter corpora applicant, abutuntur. Quod enim motui subjectum non est, non est obnoxium impedimento. Quoties ergo dicunt (exempli causa) Via Libera est, non significatur Libertas Viae, sed Viatoris. Item quando dicimus Donum liberum est, non rei datae sed Datoris Libertatem intelligimus. Etiam quando quis liberè loqui dicitur, non Sermonis, sed loquentis Libertas est. Liberum denique arbitrium, non Voluntatis Libertas sed Volentis est.

15 applicant] applicans 70

Feare and Liberty consistent.

Feare, and Liberty [8]are consistent;[8] as when a man throweth his goods into the Sea for feare the ship should sink, he doth it nevertheless °very° willingly, and may refuse to doe it if he will:[a] It is therefore [9]the action, of one that was free: so a man sometimes[9] pays his debt, °only° for feare of Imprisonment, [10]which because no body hindred him from detaining,[b] was the action of a man at liberty. And generally[10] all actions which men doe in Common-wealths, for feare of the law, are [11]actions, which the doers had liberty to omit.[11]

Liberty and Necessity consistent.

Liberty, and Necessity [12]are consistent;[12] as in the water, that hath not only liberty, but a [13] necessity of descending by the Channel; so likewise [14]in the Actions which men voluntarily doe: which, because they proceed from their will, proceed from liberty; and yet, because every act of mans will, and every desire, and inclination proceedeth from some cause, and that from another cause, in a continuall chaine, (whose first link is in the hand of God the first of all causes,) they proceed from necessity.[14] So that to him that could see the connexion of [15]those causes, the necessity of all mens voluntary actions, would appeare manifest.[15] And therefore God, that seeth, and disposeth all things, seeth [16]also that the liberty of man in doing what he will, is accompanied with the necessity of doing that which God will, & no more, nor lesse.[16] For though men may do many things, which [17]God does not command, nor is therefore Author of them;[17] yet they can have no passion, nor appetite [18]to any thing, of which appetite Gods will is not the cause.[18] And did not his will [19]assure the necessity of mans will, and consequently of[19] all that on mans will dependeth, the liberty of men would [20]be a contradiction, and impediment to the[20] omnipotence and liberty of God. And this [21] shall suffice, (as to the matter in hand) of that naturall liberty, which only is properly called liberty.

2 he] om. MS 10 in] of MS 14–15 cause, in a continuall chaine, (whose first link is in . . . causes,) they proceed some H {see Register of In-press Variants}] cause, w^ch^ causes in a continuall chayne {, corr. to (by TH} whose first linke in . . . causes {) added by TH} proceed MS; cause, which causes in a continuall chaine (whose first link in . . . causes) proceed some H {see Register of In-press Variants}; cause, in a continuall chaine, (whose first link is in . . . causes,) proceed B 24 and] and {an added by TH} MS

---

[8] can co-exist at the same time in the same action; [9] done freely: so a man who

[10] pays it freely, because he was free to pay or not to pay. Similarly,

[11] free if they were able not to do them. [12] can co-exist at the same time: [13] ^ natural

[14] all voluntary actions, which are by their nature free, are necessary, because they nevertheless have causes, and those causes have other causes, and so on continually as far as the first cause of all causes, namely the divine will.

[15] all causes, the necessity of all actions, even voluntary ones, would be obvious[c] [70: all causes of all actions, it would also be clearly understood that they are voluntary].

[16] the necessity, proceeding from his own will, of all actions.

[17] are contrary to the divine laws, that is, many things of which God is not the author;

Metus & Libertas simul consistere in eadem actione possunt, ut quando aliquis Metu Naufragii bona sua in mare projicit; nam libenter [105] id facit, potuitque (si noluisset) non facere.[a] Liberè ergo fecit. Sic ille qui Metu carceris debitum solvit, Liberè solvit, quia Liberum illi erat vel solvere, vel non solvere. Similiter Actiones Civium omnes quas Metu Legum faciunt, si non facere potuerunt, Liberae erant.

Etiam Libertas & Necessitas consistere simul possunt. Nam aqua per fluminis alveum, tum Liberè tum Necessitate naturae versus declivia movetur. Item actiones omnes voluntariae quae sua natura Liberae sunt, quia tamen causas habent, & causae illae alias causas, & sic perpetuò usque ad causarum omnium Causam primam, nempe divinam voluntatem, necessariae sunt; adeò ut illis qui causarum omnium connexionem viderent actionum omnium, etiam voluntariarum necessitas manifestè esset.[c] Deus ergo qui videt & disponit omnia, necessitatem videt omnium actionum à sua ipsius voluntate proficiscentem. Homines enim quanquam multa faciant contra Leges divinas, id est multa quorum Deus non est Author, nullam tamen Passionem, Voluntatem aut Appetitum habent cujus causa prima & plena non sit à voluntate Dei. Nisi enim Voluntas Dei Necessitatem Voluntati humanae imponeret, & per consequens actionibus omnibus ab ea dependentibus; Libertas voluntatis humanae omnipotentiam, & omniscientiam & libertatem Dei tolleret. Atque haec (quatenus ad institutum praesens) de naturali & propriè dicta Libertate disputata sufficiant.

12–13 illis qui causarum omnium connexionem viderent actionum omnium, etiam voluntariarum necessitas manifestè esset this edn.] illis qui causarum omnium connexionem viderent actionum omnium, etiam voluntariarum manifestè essent 68; si qui causarum omnium omnium actionum connexionem viderent, etiam voluntarias esse manifestè deprehenderent 70

18 , nor will, of which the first and full cause does not proceed from the will of God.
19 give necessity to man's will, and consequently to 20 take away the omniscience, 21 ^ discussion

[a] Cf. Aristotle, Nicomachaean Ethics, III.1, 1110a4–14.
[b] = withholding (OED, 'detain', v., 2.a).
[c] This passage, which makes no sense in 68 and has been corrected in 70 in a way that misunderstands Hobbes's argument, is emended here to reflect the meaning of the English, on the assumption that 'necessitas' was mistakenly omitted from the MS, and 'esset' then changed by the compositor to 'essent'.

Artificiall Bonds, or Covenants.

But as men, for the atteyning of peace, and conservation of themselves °thereby,° have made an Artificiall Man, which we call a Common-wealth; so also have they made Artificiall Chains, called Civill Lawes, which they themselves, by mutuall covenants, have [109] fastned at one end, to the lips of that Man, °or Assembly,° to whom they have given the Soveraigne Power; and at the other end to their own Ears.[d] These Bonds in their own nature but weak, may neverthelesse be made to hold, by the danger, though not by the difficulty of breaking them.

Liberty of Subjects consisteth not in Liberty from covenants.

[22]In relation to these Bonds only it is, that I am to speak now, of the Liberty of Subjects. For seeing there is no Common-wealth in the world, wherein there be Rules enough set down, for the regulating of all the actions, and words of men, (as being a thing impossible:) it followeth necessarily, that in all kinds of actions, by the laws praetermitted,[22] [e] men have the Liberty, of doing what [23]their own reasons shall suggest, for the[23] most profitable to themselves. For if wee take [24]Liberty in the proper sense, for corporall Liberty; that is to say,[24] freedome from chains, and prison, it were very absurd for [25]men to clamor as they doe, for the Liberty they so manifestly enjoy. Againe, if we take Liberty, for an exemption from Lawes, it is no lesse absurd, for men to demand as they doe, that Liberty, by which all other men may be masters of their lives. And yet as absurd as it is, this is it they demand; not knowing that the Lawes are of no power to protect them, without a Sword in the hands of a man, or men, to cause those laws to be put in execution. The Liberty of a Subject, lyeth therefore only in those things, which in regulating their actions, the Soveraign hath praetermitted: such as is the Liberty to buy, and sell, and otherwise contract with one another; to choose their own aboad,[f] their own diet, their own trade of life, and institute[g] their children as they themselves think fit; & the like.[25]

6–7 Bonds in . . . neverthelesse] Bonds, commonly called Duty, and obligation, in their owne nature are but weake, neuerthelesse they be such, as might MS 11 not this edn.; {nowhere*? corr. to* not by TH} MS] om. H, B 13 kinds] kind MS 18–20 men to demand . . . their lives] a man to demand (as men do) that liberty by w^ch^ euery other man, may be master of his life MS

[22] These artificial bonds are the ones I understand to be opposed to the liberty of citizens. For since it is impossible to prescribe laws for all actions, a citizen is said to have liberty to do those actions, and only those actions, about which no restriction is set down in the laws. In these, therefore,

[23] seems to them [24] civil liberty to mean

[25] our rebels to complain and demand liberty today, having rebelled at a time when they very manifestly enjoyed it. The liberty of subjects consists, therefore, only in those things which the legislator has passed over when making laws.

Quemadmodum autem homines Pacis & Conservationis suae causâ Hominem fecerunt Artificialem (quem vocant Civitatem) ita etiam Vincula excogitarunt Artificialia (quae vocantur Leges Civiles) quae Vincula ipsi mutuis inter se Pactis ab una parte ad illius cui Summam dederunt Potestatem Labra, ab altera parte ad suas ipsorum Aures alligarunt.[d] Vincula autem haec etsi natura sua fragilia, satis tamen tenacia sunt, non à difficultate sed à periculo quo frangantur.

Vincula haec Artificialia ea sunt, quae opponi intelligo Libertati Civium. Cum enim actionibus Leges praescribere omnibus, impossibile sit; Libertatem habere Civis dicitur ad illas actiones de quibus in Legibus nihil definitur, & ad eas solas. In his ergo unicuique id quod sibi maximè videbitur expedire, facere Liberum est. Sin de Libertate corporis à carcere & catenis Libertas Civilis intelligeretur absurdissimè conquererentur Libertatemque flagitarent hodie rebelles nostri qui ea manifestissimè fruentes rebellaverunt. Libertas igitur Civium in iis tantum rebus consistit, quas in Legibus ferendis Legislator praetermisit.

[d] Hobbes uses here the image of 'Hercules gallicus', as described in Lucian, Heracles, 1–3; the image, sometimes used to symbolize an orator (e.g., Puttenham, Arte of English Poesie, p. 142), was associated with the ruler in French political iconography (e.g., Anon., Labyrinthe royale).

[e] = left out, not mentioned (OED, 'pretermit', v., 2.a).

[f] = abode, dwelling-place (OED, 'abode', n.[1], 5).

[g] = educate (OED, 'institute', v., 3).

Liberty of the Subject consistent with the unlimited power of the Soveraign.

Neverthelesse [26]we are not to understand, that by such Liberty, the Soveraign Power of life, and death, is either abolished, or limited.[26] For it has been already shewn, that [27]nothing the Soveraign Representative can doe to a Subject, on what pretence soever, can properly be called Injustice, or Injury; because every Subject is Author of every act the Soveraign doth; so that he never wanteth Right to any thing, otherwise, than as he himself is the Subject of God, and bound thereby to observe the laws of Nature.[27] And therefore it may, and doth often happen in Common-wealths, that [28]a Subject[28] may be put to death, by the command of the Soveraign Power; and yet [29]neither doe the other wrong:[29] As when Jeptha caused his daughter to be [30]sacrificed:[h] In which, and the like cases, he that so dieth, had Liberty to doe the action, for which he is neverthelesse, without Injury put to death. And the same holdeth also in a Soveraign Prince, that putteth to death an Innocent Subject. For though the action be against the law of Nature, as being contrary to Equitie, (as was the killing of Uriah, by David;)[i] yet it was not an Injurie to Uriah; but to God. Not to Uriah, because the right to doe what he pleased, was given him by Uriah himself: And yet to God, because David was Gods Subject; and prohibited all Iniquitie by the law of Nature. Which distinction, David himself, when he repented the fact,[j] evidently confirmed, saying,[30] To thee only have I sinned.[k] [31] In the same manner, the people of Athens, when they banished [110] [32]the most potent of their Common-wealth for ten years, thought they committed no Injustice; and yet they never questioned what crime he had done; but what hurt he would doe: Nay they commanded the banishment of they knew not whom; and every Citizen bringing his Oystershell into the market place, written with the name of him he desired should be banished, without °at all° accusing him, sometimes banished an Aristides, for his reputation of Justice; And sometimes a scurrilous Jester, as Hyperbolus, to make a Jest of it.[l] And yet a man cannot say, the Soveraign People of Athens wanted right to banish them; or an Athenian the Libertie to Jest, or to be Just.[32]

5 Subject] one of them MS 5 the Soveraign] he MS 23 would] could MS 26 at all MS] actuall H, B [26] this civil liberty does not hinder the holder of sovereign power from being judge of the life and death of the citizens.

[27] no injury can be done to the citizens by the sovereign (that is, by the commonwealth), even though he may be injurious to God, by acting iniquitously. [28] even an innocent person [29] without injury:

[30] killed. Also, in the killing of Uriah,[i] even though King David acted iniquitously, and gravely sinned against God, he nevertheless did not sin against Uriah, who had made himself the author of that deed. The words of David himself to God are:

Libertas tamen haec Civilis, quin is qui Summam habet Potestatem, vitae & necis Civium arbiter sit, impedimento non est. Ostensum [106] enim est, Civibus ab eo qui Summam habet Potestatem (id est à Civitate) Injuriam fieri non posse, etsi per Iniquitatem Injurius esse in Deum possit. Contingere ergo potest, & contingit saepe in Civitatibus Iussu Summam habentis Potestatem, Innocentem etiam sine Injuria interfici; ut quando filiam suam occidi jussit Ieptha.[h] Etiam in occisione Vriae,[i] etsi Rex David iniquè fecit, & contra Deum graviter peccavit, contra Vriam tamen non peccavit, qui facti illius Authorem se fecerat. Tibi soli peccavi[k] sunt verba ipsius ad Deum Davidis. Deo enim solo obligari potuit Rex. Etiam Populus Atheniensis cum Civem per Ostracismum in exilium mitteret, non illum criminis accusabat, sed quemcunque exulare voluit, numerus concivium maximus, is exulabat; non quia violator legum erat, sed quia (propter nimiam potentiam) violare Leges impunè posse videbatur. Itaque Aristidem, cui cognomen Iusti ipsi ante dederant, Ciuitate expulerunt. Expulerunt item Hyperbolum imi ordinis hominem scurram,[l] quem nemo metuebat; quia voluerunt; joculariter forte, non autem injustè, cum id jure fecerint Civitatis.

12 voluit] vellet 70

[31] ^ For the king could be obliged only to God.

[32] a citizen by ostracizing him, did not accuse him of a crime, but whoever was desired by the majority of the citizens to go into exile, that person went into exile; not because he had broken the laws, but because he seemed (on account of his excessive power) capable of breaking them with impunity. So they banished from the commonwealth Aristides, to whom they themselves had previously given the title 'the Just'. They also banished Hyperbolus, a scurrilous man of the lowest rank,[l] who was feared by no one; because they wished to do so; perhaps jestingly; but not unjustly, since they did it by the right of the commonwealth.

---

[h] Judg. 11: 30–40. [i] 2 Sam. 11: 2–24. [j] = evil deed (OED, 'fact', n., 1.c). [k] Ps. 51: 4.

[l] Plutarch, Life of Aristides, VII (saying that Aristides was banished because his reputation was resented; that ostracism meant exile for ten years; and that Hyperbolus was a base and ignoble man); Thucydides, Peloponnesian War, VIII.73 (saying that Hyperbolus, a contemptible man, was ostracized because he was dishonourable to the city).

The Liberty which writers praise, is the Liberty of Soveraigns; not of Private men.

The Libertie, whereof there is so °frequent, and° honourable mention, in the Histories, and [33]Philosophy[33] of the Antient Greeks, and Romans, and in the writings, and discourse of those that [34]from them have received all their learning in the Politiques,[34] is not the Libertie of Particular [35]men;[35] but the Libertie of the Common-wealth: which is the same with that, which every man then should have, if there were no °Civil° Laws, nor Common-wealth at all. °And the effects of it also be the same.° For as amongst [36]masterlesse men, there is perpetuall[36] war, of every man against his neighbour; no inheritance, to transmit to the Son, °nor to expect from the Father;° no propriety of Goods, °or Lands;° no security; but a full and absolute Libertie in every Particular man: So in States, and Common-wealths not dependent on one another, every Common-wealth, °(not every man)° has an absolute Libertie, to doe what it shall judge [37](that is to say, what that Man, or Assemblie that representeth it, shall judge) most conducing to their benefit.[37] But withall, they live in the condition of a perpetuall war, and [38]upon the confines[m] of[38] battel, with °their frontiers armed, and° canons planted against their neighbours round about. [39]The Athenians, and Romanes were free; that is, free Commonwealths: not that any particular men had the Libertie to resist their own Representative; but that their Representative had the Libertie to resist, or invade other people.[39] There is written on the [40]Turrets[40] of the city of Luca in great characters at this day, the word LIBERTAS;[n] yet no [41]man can thence inferre, that a particular man has more Libertie, or Immunitie from the service of the Commonwealth there, than in Constantinople. Whether a Common-wealth be Monarchicall, or Popular, the Freedome is still the same.[41]

18 to] to so MS

[33] political works [34] make the Greek and Roman politics their own, [35] citizens;
[36] men without law and without rule, there is [37] advantageous. [38] ready for [39] Thus neither any Athenian nor any Roman was free (from the laws); but their commonwealths were.
[40] gates and walls
[41] citizen of Lucca enjoys more liberty than a citizen of Constantinople; for in both places they are bound by the civil laws.

[m] = on the edge of, in the region bordering (OED, 'confine', *n.*², 1; and cf. Ch. 11, note g).
[n] = 'liberty'. It is carved over the Porta San Pietro (1566), on what was the main road into Lucca.

Libertas illa, de qua in Graecorum Romanorumque veterum Libris Historicis & Politicis; hodieque in Sermone & Scriptis eorum, qui Graecam & Romanam Politicam suam faciunt, tam magnifica fit mentio, non Civium singularium, sed Civitatis Libertas est, eademque quae hominum singularium fuisset, nisi constitutae Civitates & Leges fuissent. Sicut enim inter homines, sine Lege, sine Imperio, Bellum unicuique contra vicinum est, nulla autem haereditas filiis transmittenda, nulla Proprietas bonorum, nulla securitas, sed Libertas unicuique plena & absoluta; ita inter Civitates, quarum una alteri non subiicitur, unicuique Civitati Libertas faciendi quicquid sibi commodum videbitur absoluta est. Sed tamen ita viuunt perpetuò ac si Bellum esset, parati ad pugnam, tormentis Bellicis contra vicinos undequaque collocatis. Itaque neque Atheniensis, neque Romanus quisquam Liber (à Legibus) erat, sed Civitates eorum. In portis murisque Vrbis Luccae etsi inscribatur magnis characteribus LIBERTAS,[n] Luccensis tamen nemo majore Libertate fruitur quam Constantinopolitanus, vtrobique enim Legibus Civilibus vinciuntur.

5 Civitates] Civitatis 70

But it is an easy thing, for men to be deceived, by the [42]specious[42] name of Libertie; and for want of Judgement to distinguish, [43]mistake[43] that for their Private Inheritance, °and Birth right,° which is the right of the [44]Publique[44] only. And when the same errour is confirmed by the authority of men in reputation for their writings in this subject, it is no wonder if it produce sedition, and change of Government. In these westerne parts of the world, we [45]are made to receive[45] our opinions concerning the Institution, and Rights of Common-wealths, from Aristotle, Cicero, and other men, Greeks and Romanes, that living under [46]Popular[46] States, derived those Rights, not from the Principles of Nature, but transcribed [47]them into their books, out of [111] the[47] Practise of their own Common-wealths, °which were Popular;° as the Grammarians describe the Rules of Language, out of the Practise of the time; °or the Rules of Poetry, out of the Poems of Homer and Virgil.° And because the Athenians were taught, (to keep them from desire of changing their Government,) that [48]they were Freemen,[48] and all that lived under Monarchy were slaves; therefore Aristotle puts it down in his Politiques, (lib. 6. cap. 2.) In democracy, Liberty is to be supposed: [49]for 'tis commonly held, that[49] no man is Free in any other Government.[p] And as Aristotle; so Cicero,[q] and other Writers have grounded their Civill doctrine, on the [50]opinions[50] of the Romans, who were taught to hate Monarchy, at first, by them that having deposed their Soveraign, shared amongst them the Soveraignty of Rome; °and afterwards by their Successors.° And by reading of these Greek, and Latine Authors, men [51] from their childhood have gotten [52] a habit (under a false shew[r] of Liberty,) of favouring tumults, and of °licentious° controlling[s] the actions of their Soveraigns; and again of controlling those controllers, with the effusion of so much blood; as I think I may truly say, there was never any thing so deerly bought, as these Western parts have bought the °learning of the° Greek and Latine tongues.

21 afterwards] after ward MS 24 and of] and MS 26 say,] say that MS

[42] sweet [43] claim [44] commonwealth [45] have received [46] democratic and aristocratic [47] into their political books the custom and [48] only those people were free who lived in a popular commonwealth,
[49] and [50] custom [51] ^ of our country, being fed with those opinions [52] ^ eventually

[p] Aristotle, Politics, VI.2, 1317a40–1317b1 ('The basis of a democratic state is liberty; which, according to the common opinion of men, can be enjoyed only in such a state').
[q] Cf. Cicero, De re publica, I.42–3. [r] = appearance (OED, 'show', n.[1], 5–7).
[s] = challenging, finding fault with (OED, 'control', v., 3).

Dulci autem nomine Libertatis, facile decipiuntur homines, qui distinguere nescientes, id quod Civitatis solius Ius est, pro sua cujusque haereditate privata sibi arrogant. Qui error quoties Authoritate eorum, qui propter ea, quae scripserunt Politica, celebres sunt confirmatur, mirandum non est si Seditionem & Status mutationem pariat. In partibus orbis terrarum occiduis opiniones nostras de Institutione [107] & Iuribus Civitatum accepimus ab Aristotele, Cicerone, aliisque Graecis & Romanis, qui cum degerent in Civitatibus Democraticis & Aristocraticis jura illa non à Principiis naturae deduxerunt, sed usum & consuetudinem Civitatum suarum, in Libros suos Politicos transcripserunt, non aliter, quam Regulas loquendi ex usu temporis sui describere solent Grammatici. Quoniam ergo Athenienses ne Statum mutare cuperent, liberos solos esse eos, qui in Civitate viverent populari, servosque esse, qui sub Monarcha essent, docebantur; ideo Aristoteles in Politicis (Lib. 6, cap. 2) Libertatem supponi in Democratia scripsit, neminemque in alia Civitatis forma esse liberum.[p] Sicut autem Aristoteles; ita quoque Cicero,[q] aliique Scriptores, Politicam doctrinam suam super Romanorum consuetudinem fundaverunt; qui Romani Monarchiam odisse didicerant, ab illis primis, qui cum Summum Imperantem, nempe Regem suum, deposuissent, Summam Romae Potestatem inter se diviserant. Lectione autem Librorum horum à Graecis & Latinis Scriptorum, factum est, ut homines nostri ab Infantia opinionibus illis innutriti, sub Libertatis falsa specie habitum tandem contraxerint tumultibus favendi, actiones eorum, qui Summam habent Potestatem reprehendendi, & rursus reprehendendi reprehensores illos; idque cum tanti sanguinis effusione, ut verè possim (puto) affirmare nunquam quicquam tam carè emptum esse, quam Graecorum Latinorumque linguas emerunt partes hae mundi Occidentales.

8 non this edn.] mox 68, 70 17 consuetudinem] consuetudine 70 18 illis] aliis 70

Liberty of Subjects how to be measured.

To come now to the particulars of the true Liberty of a [53]Subject;[53] that is to say, what are the things, which though commanded by the Soveraign, he may neverthelesse, without Injustice, refuse to do; we are to consider, what Rights we passe away, when we make a Common-wealth; or (which is all one,) what Liberty we deny our selves, by [54]owning[54] all the Actions (without exception) of the Man, or Assembly we make our Soveraign. For in °the act of° our Submission, consisteth both our Obligation, and our Liberty; which must therefore be inferred by arguments taken from thence; there being no Obligation on any man, which ariseth not from some Act of his own; for all men equally, are by Nature Free. And because such arguments, must either be drawn from the expresse words, I Authorise all [55]his Actions,[55] or from the Intention of him that submitteth himselfe to his Power, (which Intention is to be understood by the End for which he so submitteth;) The Obligation, and Liberty of the [56]Subject,[56] is to be derived, either from those Words, °(or others equivalent;)° or else from [57]the End of the Institution of Soveraignty; namely, the Peace of the Subjects[57] within themselves, and their Defence against a common Enemy.

Subjects have Liberty to defend their own bodies, even against them that lawfully invade them;

First therefore, seeing [58]Soveraignty by Institution,[58] is by Covenant of every one to every one; °and Soveraignty by Acquisition, by Covenants of the Vanquished to the Victor, or Child to the Parent;° It is manifest, that every Subject has Liberty in all those things, the right whereof cannot by Covenant be transferred[59]. I have shewn before in the 14. Chapter, that Covenants, not to defend a mans own body[60], are voyd. Therefore,

Are not bound to hurt themselves;

If the Soveraign command a [61]man[61] (though justly condemned[62],) to kill, wound, or mayme himselfe; or not to resist those that assault him; or to abstain from the use of food, ayre, medicine, or any other [112] thing, without which he cannot live; yet hath that man the Liberty to disobey.

7 and our] and MS 16 Subjects] Subject B 23 voyd. Therefore,] voyd, therefore. MS

[53] citizen; [54] individually making ourselves the authors of [55] the actions of that man to whom we give the sovereign power, [56] individual citizens
[57] that intention. But the end of the institution of the commonwealth is the peace of the citizens
[58] the institution of the commonwealth [59] ^ or abandoned. [60] ^ against violence
[61] citizen [62] ^ to death

Ut veniamus jam ad ea in quibus Libertas Civium vera consistit, id est, ut dicamus, quaenam illae actiones sunt, quae jussae ab eo qui Summam habet Potestatem, possunt tamen sine Injustitia praetermitti; considerandum est, quaenam jura illa sint, quae in Civitate instituenda deponimus, sive (quod idem est) quas Libertates nobismetipsis denegemus tunc, quando omnium actionum simpliciter Hominis vel Coetus quem Summum facimus, Authores nos facimus singuli. In ipsa submissione consistit tum Obligatio tum Libertas. Itaque ex eadem submissione, Obligationis & Libertatis argumenta sumi debent. Nulla enim tenetur Obligatione quisquam, quae à sui ipsius actione non procedat; cum per naturam homines Libertatem aequalem omnes habent. Quoniam autem argumenta illa vel ab ipsis verbis, nempe Actionum omnium ejus hominis cui Summam tribuimus Potestatem Authorem me facio, vel ab intentione ejus, qui Potestati Summae se submittit, (quae intentio intelligitur à Fine propter quem se submittit) sumenda sunt; Obligatio & Libertas Civium Singulorum ab illis Verbis vel ab illâ Intentione demonstrandae sunt. Finis autem [108] Institutionis Civitatis est Pax Civium inter se, & defensio contra hostem Publicum.

Primò ergo, quia Institutio Civitatis fit per Pacta uniuscujusque cum unoquoque, manifestum est, Libertatem Civi manere circa res illas omnes, quarum jus per Pactum transferri vel abjici non potest. Sed ostensum est Cap. 14. Pacta de seipso contra vim non defendendo invalida esse. Ergo

Si Summam habens Potestatem, Civem (quanquam jure morti condemnatum) seipsum interficere, mutilare vel vulnerare; aut vi personam ejus invadenti non resistere; aut ab alimentis, medicinâ, aëre vel alia re sine qua vivere non potest se abstinere jusserit; habet Civis ille recusandi Libertatem.

2 sunt] sint 70 10 procedat] procedit 70 15 sunt. 70] sunt 68 16 Civitatis 70] Civilis 68 21 defendendo invalida 70] defendendi invalidum 68

If a [63]man[63] be interrogated by the Soveraign, or [64] his Authority, concerning a crime done by himselfe, he is not bound (without assurance of Pardon) to confesse it; because no man (as I have shewn [65]in the same Chapter)[65] can be obliged by Covenant to accuse himselfe.

Again, the [66]Consent of a Subject to Soveraign Power,[66] is contained in these words, I [67]Authorise, or take upon me, all his actions;[67] in which there is no restriction at all, of °his own former° naturall Liberty: For by allowing him to kill me, I am not bound to kill my selfe when he commands me. 'Tis one thing to say, Kill me, or my fellow, if you please; another thing to say, I will kill my selfe, or my fellow. It followeth therefore, that

No man is bound by the words themselves, either to kill himselfe, or [68]any other man;[68] And consequently, that the Obligation a man may sometimes have, upon the Command of the Soveraign to execute any dangerous, or dishonourable Office, dependeth not on the [69] Words of our Submission; but on the Intention; which is to be understood by the End [70]thereof.[70] When therefore our refusall to obey, frustrates the End for which the [71]Soveraignty was ordained;[71] then there is no Liberty to refuse: otherwise [72]there is.[72]

Nor to warfare, unlesse they voluntarily undertake it.

Upon this ground, a man that is commanded °as a Souldier° to fight against [73]the[73] enemy, though his Soveraign have Right enough to punish his refusall °with death,° may neverthelesse in [74]many[74] cases refuse, without Injustice; as when he substituteth a sufficient Souldier in his place: for in this case he deserteth not °the service of° the Common-wealth. And there is allowance to be made [75] for naturall timorousnesse, not onely to women, (of whom no such dangerous duty is expected,) but also to men of feminine courage. When Armies fight, there is [76] on one side, or [77]both,[77] a running away; yet when they do it not out of trechery, but fear, they are not esteemed to do it unjustly, but [78] dishonourably. For the same reason, to [79] avoyd battell, is not Injustice, but Cowardise. But he that inrowleth himselfe a Souldier, °or taketh imprest

5 Again] Secondly MS 12 sometimes] some time MS

[63] citizen [64] ^ on [65] above)[t] [66] submission of a citizen
[67] am author of all the actions of him to whom we give the sovereign power. [68] to kill his fellow;
[69] ^ express [70] of the institution of the commonwealth. [71] commonwealth was instituted;
[72] one can use one's natural liberty. [73] a public [74] some [75] ^ by the sovereign right to some people [76] ^ eventually [77] the other, [78] ^ basely or [79] ^ try to

[t] See Ch. 14, pp. 214–15.

Si quis Civis interrogetur à Summam habente Potestatem, vel per Authoritatem ejus de crimine quod ipse Civis commisit, fateri Crimen (nisi facti veniâ datâ) non obligatur; quia nemo (ut ostensum est suprà)[t] obligari Pacto potest, seipsum accusare. Praeterea submissio Civis continetur his verbis, Author sum omnium Actionum ejus cui Summam tribuimus Potestatem. Sed in his verbis Libertatis naturalis restrictio nulla est. Etsi enim ut me occidat concedam, non obligor ut Iussu ejus occidam meipsum. Aliud enim est dicere occide me, vel concivem meum, si vis; aliud autem dicere occidam me aut concivem meum. Sequitur ergo neminem aut ad occidendum seipsum, aut concivem ex ipsis verbis obligari. Itaque obligatio quam quis habere interdum possit, jussu Summae Potestatis faciendi actionem aliquam periculosam aut indignam, non à verbis dependet expressis quibus se submisit, sed ab intentione; quae intelligitur ex fine Institutionis Civitatis. Quando ergo negatio obedientiae Finem Institutionis Civitatis frustaneam facit, Libertas recusandi nulla est; alioqui Libertate sua naturali uti potest.

Itaque si quis jubeatur contra hostem Publicum pugnare (quanquam si recuset, Potestati Summae puniendi eum non desit Ius) potest tamen aliquando sine Injustitia recusare, ut quando alium militem non minus idoneum substituit. Tunc enim Civitatem non deserit. Praeterea à Summo Iure detrahendum est aliquid propter quorundam hominum timiditatem naturalem, non solum foeminarum (à quibus officia tanti periculi nunquam expectantur) sed etiam virorum quibus animus foemininus est. Quando praelium committitur, fuga tandem fit ab una vel altera parte; si tamen non à perfidia, sed à metu fuga oritur, non injustè fugere dicuntur, sed turpiter, vel inhonestè. Propter eandem rationem, si quis praelium [109] conetur evitare Injustitia non est, sed Ignavia. Veruntamen qui militem se conscribi jubet mony,° [u] taketh away the excuse of a timorous nature; and is obliged, not onely to go to the battell, but also not to run from it, without his Captaines leave. And when the Defence of the Common-wealth, requireth at once the help of all [80]that are able to bear Arms, every one is obliged;[80] because otherwise the Institution of the Common-wealth, which they have not the purpose, or courage to preserve, was in vain.

13 Institutionis Civitatis this edn.] Institutione Civilis 68; quo Civitas instituitur 70
23 animus] animis 70

To resist the Sword of the Common-wealth, in defence of another man, guilty, or innocent, no man hath Liberty; because such Liberty, takes away from the Soveraign, the means of Protecting [81]us;[81] and is therefore destructive of the very essence of [82]Government.[82] But in case °a great° many men together, have [83]already resisted the Soveraign Power unjustly, or committed some Capitall crime, for which every one of them expecteth death,[83] whether have they not the Liberty then to joyn together, and °assist, and° defend one another? Certainly they have: For they but defend their lives, which the Guilty [113] man may as well do, as the Innocent. There was indeed injustice in the first breach of their duty; Their bearing of Arms subsequent to it, [84]though it be to maintain what they have done,[84] is no new unjust act. °And if it be onely to defend their persons, it is not unjust at all.° But the offer of pardon taketh from them, °to whom it is offered,° the plea of self-defence, and maketh their perseverance in assisting, °or defending° the rest, unlawfull.

The Greatest Liberty of Subjects, dependeth on the Silence of the Law.

As for other Lyberties, they depend on the Silence of the Law. In cases where the Soveraign has prescribed no rule, there the Subject hath the Liberty to do, or forbeare, °according to his own discretion.° And therefore such Liberty is in °some places more, and in some lesse; and in° some times more, in other times lesse, according as they that have the Soveraignty shall think most convenient.[v] °As for Example, there was a time, when in England a man might enter in to his own Land, (and dispossesse such as wrongfully possessed[w] it,) by force. But in after-times, that Liberty of Forcible Entry, was taken away by a Statute made (by the King) in Parliament.[x] And in some places of the world, men have the Liberty of many wives: in other places, such Liberty is not allowed.°

21 Lyberties] Libertie B 26 convenient] inconvenient B 30 have] had MS

[80] citizens, each one of them who can either bear arms, or contribute something, however little, to the victory, is obliged to join the militia; [81] the citizens; [82] the commonwealth.

[83] committed some capital crime against the sovereign power, for which, unless they defend themselves, they expect death, someone will ask

[84] to defend themselves, timiditatis naturalis excusationem perdit, obligaturque non modo praelium inire, sed etiam invito ductore suo non fugere. Quando autem defensio Civitatis Civium simul omnium uno & eodem tempore auxilium postulat, unusquisque qui vel arma gestare potest, vel ad victoriam aliquid quantulumcunque contribuere, ad Militiam obligatur; quia alioqui Institutio Civitatis quam conservare Cives nolunt, vel non audent, vana esset.

Contra arma Civitatis, defendendi alterius causâ, sive nocentis sive innocentis arma sumere, Liberum nemini est; quia Libertas talis Summam habenti Potestatem media ad defensionem Civium aufert, ipsamque Civitatis essentiam destruit. Quid autem si multi simul, contra Civitatis Potestatem Summam crimen aliquod commiserint capitale, propter quod, nisi se defendant, expectant mortem, quaeret aliquis utrum Libertatem illi conjunctis viribus se mutuò defendendi habeant. Habent certè. Nam vitas suas defendunt tantùm; id quod & Innocenti & Nocenti aequè licet. Injustitia quidem erat officii violatio prima; sed quod arma postea ad se defendendos sumpserint, crimen novum non est. Excusatio autem sui defensionis oblatâ veniâ tollitur; facitque ut si assistere caeteris perseverent Injusti sint.

Reliqua Civium Libertas dependet à Legum Silentio. Ubi enim non definit Lex, unicuique faciendi vel non faciendi Libertas est; eaque pro arbitrio

5 alioqui 70] aliqui 68

[u] = money paid to soldiers in advance (OED, 'imprest', a. and n.[1], A).

[v] = suitable, fitting (OED, 'convenient', a. and n., 4).

[w] 'Possessed' here may have the sense of 'took possession of', 'obtained', 'seized' (OED, 'possess', v., 5.a; cf. the pairing of 'possesse' and 'dispossesse' above, Ch. 13, at note c).

[x] There were statutes of forcible entry in 1378 (2 Richard II, stat. 1, c. 6) and 1381 (5 Richard II, stat. 1, c. 7); in civil actions based on these statutes it was a defence to plead that one had a lawful right of entry, but in proceedings on indictments under a series of statutes from 1391 (15 Richard II, c. 2) onwards, that was no defence. See Sutherland, Assize of Novel Disseisin, pp. 174–5.

If a [85]Subject[85] have a controversie with his Soveraigne, of debt, or of right of possession of lands or goods, or concerning any service required at his hands, or concerning any penalty, corporall, or pecuniary, grounded on a precedent Law; he hath the same Liberty to sue °for his right,° as if it were against a [86]Subject; and before such Judges, as are appointed by the Soveraign.[86] For seeing the Soveraign demandeth by force of a former Law, and not by vertue of his [87] Power; he [88]declareth thereby, that he requireth[88] no more, than shall appear to be due by that Law. The [89]sute therefore is not[89] contrary to the will of the Soveraign; °and consequently the Subject hath the Liberty to demand the hearing of his Cause; and sentence, according to that Law.° But if he [90] demand, °or take° any thing by pretence of his Power; there lyeth[91], in that case, no action of Law: for all that is [92]done[92] by him in Vertue of his [93] Power, is [94]done by the Authority of every Subject,[94] and consequently, he that brings an action against the Soveraign, brings it against himselfe.

If a Monarch, or Soveraign Assembly, grant a [95]Liberty to all,[95] or any of his Subjects, which Grant standing, he is disabled to provide for [96]their[96] safety, the Grant is voyd; unlesse he directly renounce, or transferre the Soveraignty to another. For in that he might openly, (if it had been his will,) and in plain termes, have renounced, or transferred it, and did not; it is to be understood it was not his will[97]; but that the Grant proceeded from ignorance of the repugnancy between such a Liberty and the Soveraign Power: and therefore the Soveraignty is still retayned; and consequently all those [98]Powers,[98] which are necessary to the exercising thereof; such as are the Power of Warre, and Peace, of Judicature, of appointing Officers, and [99]Councellours, of levying Mony,[99] and the rest named in the 18th Chapter. [114] [85] citizen [86] fellow-citizen; but the judge of that controversy will be the sovereign.

[87] ^ sovereign [88] is understood to wish to demand
[89] citizen from whom it is demanded [70: who makes the demand] therefore does nothing
[90] ^ who holds the sovereign power [91] ^ for the citizen [92] demanded [93] ^ sovereign [94] demanded by the authority of the citizen himself, [95] privilege, that is, a right or private liberty, to many, [96] the people's [97] ^ to renounce or transfer it [98] rights, [99] magistrates,

Summae Potestatis aliquando major, aliquando minor est. Si inter Civem & eum qui Summam habet Potestatem controversia sit de Iure agros vel bona possidendi, vel de debita pecunia, vel opera, vel de poena corporea, vel pecuniaria quae in Lege aliqua praecedente fundata sit, Libertas Civi Lege agendi est contra eum qui Summam habet Potestatem eadem quam haberet contra Concivem; controversiae autem illius Iudex erit is qui Summam habet Potestatem. Quoniam enim qui Summam habet Potestatem virtute petit Legis praecedentis, non virtute Potestatis Summae non amplius petere velle intelligitur quam quod Lege illa debitum esse apparebit. Nihil ergo facit Civis à quo petitur contra voluntatem ejus qui habet Summam Potestatem. Sed si qui habet Summam Potestatem virtute Potestatis peteret, agere contra illum Lege Civis non potest. Quicquid enim virtute Potestatis Summae petit, Authoritate petit ipsius Civis, & proinde qui agit contra Summam Potestatem, contra seipsum agit.

Si Monarcha vel Summam habens Potestatem Coetus, uni vel pluribus [110] Civibus Privilegium, id est Ius sive Libertatem privatam concedat, qua concessa salutem populi procurare non potest, Concessio illa invalida est, nisi simul apertis verbis Summae Potestati renunciet, vel in alterum eam transferat. Eo enim quod potuit (si voluisset) Summae Potestati verbis perspicuis renunciasse, vel eam in alium transtulisse, nec fecit, intelligendum est neque renuntiare neque transferre voluisse; & proinde concessionem illam ab ignorantia profectam esse repugnantiae inter concessum privilegium, & Potestatem Summam. Retinetur ergo Potestas Summa, & per consequens Iura omnia retinentur quae ad exercitium ejus sunt necessaria; qualia sunt Potestas Belli & Pacis, Iudiciorum, Magistratuum & Ministrorum constitutio, & caetera quae Cap. 18. enumerantur.

5 eadem this edn.] eâdem 68, 70 10 à quo petitur] petens 70

In what Cases Subjects are absolved of their obedience to their Soveraign.

The Obligation of [100]Subjects[100] to the Soveraign, is understood to last as long, and no longer, than the power lasteth, by which he is able to protect them. For the right men have by Nature to protect themselves, when none else can protect them, can by no Covenant be relinquished. The [101]Soveraignty[101] is the Soule of the Common-wealth; which once departed from the Body, the members doe no more receive their motion from it. The end of Obedience is Protection; which, wheresoever a man seeth it, either in [102]his own, or in anothers sword,[102] Nature applyeth his obedience to it, and his endeavour to maintaine it. And though Soveraignty, in the intention of them that make it, be immortall; yet is it in its own nature, not only subject to violent death, by forreign war; but also through the ignorance, and passions of men, it hath in it, from the very institution, many seeds of °a naturall° mortality, by [103]Intestine[y] Discord.[103]

In case of Captivity.

If a [104]Subject[104] be taken prisoner in war; or his person, or his means of life be within the Guards of the enemy, and hath his life and corporall Libertie given him, on condition to be Subject to the Victor, he hath Libertie to accept the condition; and having accepted it, is the subject of him that took him; because he had no other way to preserve himself. °The case is the same, if he be deteined on the same termes, in a forreign country.° But if a man be held [105] in prison, or bonds, or is not trusted with the libertie of his bodie; he [106]cannot be[106] understood to be bound by Covenant °to subjection;° and therefore may, if he can, make his escape [107] by any means whatsoever.

In case the Soveraign cast off the government from himself and his Heyrs.

If a Monarch shall relinquish the Soveraignty, both for himself, and his heires; [108]His Subjects[108] returne to the absolute Libertie of Nature; because, though Nature may declare who are his Sons, and who are the nerest of his Kin; yet it dependeth on his own will, (as hath been said in the precedent chapter,)[z] who shall be his Heyr. If therefore he will have no Heyre, there is no Soveraignty, nor Subjection. The case is the same, if he dye without known Kindred, and without declaration of his Heyre. For then [109]there can no Heire be known, and consequently no Subjection be due.[109]

23 case] case of B

[100] citizens [101] sovereign [102] himself or in another, [103] the discords of the citizens themselves. [104] citizen [105] ^ by the enemy [106] is not
[107] ^ or save himself, rightfully, [108] the citizens
[109] no obedience is due to anyone, since it is not known to whom it should be given.

[y] = internal, civil (OED, 'intestine', a., 1).
[z] Correctly: Ch. 19 (to which the brief comment on this topic in Ch. 20 refers).

Obligatio quam Cives habent erga eum qui Summam habet Potestatem, tam diu nec diutius permanere intelligitur, quam manet Potentia Cives protegendi. Ius enim hominum seipsos protegendi naturale, quando à nemine alio protegi possunt, nullo Pacto extingui potest. Is enim, qui Summam habet Potestatem, Civitatis Anima est, quae simul atque à corpore separata est, membra motum ab illa amplius non accipiunt. Obedientiae finis est Protectio; quam ubicunque quis viderit, sive in se, sive in alio, ad illam, obedientiam ejus & conatum ad illam conservandam applicat natura. Quanquam autem Potestas Summa ex intentione Instituentium immortalis sit sua tamen natura, non solum morti violentae à Bello externo subjecta est sed etiam propter Ignorantiam & Passiones hominum, habet in se, ab ipsa Institutione, semina multa mortalitatis à discordiis Civium ipsorum.

Si Civis Bello captus sit; vel Persona aut vitae ejus necessaria intra praesidia hostium sint; hostes autem vitam & corporis Libertatem illi permittant, ea conditione, ut Victori Subditus sit, Civis ille conditionem accipiendi Libertatem habet; & cum acceptaverit, Victoris subditus est; nam alia ratione conservare se non potuit. Si quis autem ab hoste in carcere aut vinculis detineatur, nec credatur sibi corpus suum, Pacto vinctus non intelligitur, ideoque aufugere vel servare se quocunque modo jure potest.

Si Monarcha Summae Potestati pro se & haeredibus suis renuntiet, redeunt Cives ad Libertatem Naturae absolutam. Quanquam enim, quis illi filius sit vel cognatione proximus indicet natura; quis tamen illi haeres sit dependet (ut ostensum est capite praecedente)[z] à sua ipsius voluntate. Itaque si Haeredem habere nolit, Summa Potestas, & Subjectio perit. Idem contingit si moriatur sine cognatis cognitis, & [111] sine Haeredis declaratione. Tunc enim nulla cuiquam debetur obedientia, cum cui praestanda sit ignoretur.

8 ejus] om. 70 8 illam conservandam this edn.] illum conservandum 68; illam conservandum 70
13 Persona this edn.] Personae 68, 70 18 sibi] ipsi 70

In case of Banishment.

If the Soveraign Banish his Subject; during the Banishment, he is not Subject. But he that is sent [110]on a message,[110] [aa] or hath leave to travell, is still [111] Subject; but it is, by Contract between [112]Soveraigns, not by vertue of the covenant of Subjection.[112] For whosoever entreth [113]into anothers dominion,[113] is Subject to all the Laws thereof; unlesse he have a privilege by the amity of [114]the Soveraigns, or by speciall licence.[114]

In case the Soveraign render himself Subject to another.

If a Monarch subdued by war, render himself Subject to the Victor; his [115]Subjects[115] are delivered from their former obligation, and [116]become obliged[116] to the Victor. But if he be held prisoner, °or have not the liberty of his own Body;° he is not understood to have [117]given away the Right of Soveraignty;[117] and therefore his Subjects are obliged to yield [118] obedience to the Magistrates formerly [119]placed, governing not in their own name, but in his.[119] For, his Right remaining, the question is only of the Administration; that is to say, of the Magistrates [115] and Officers; which, if he have not means to [120]name,[120] he is supposed to approve those, which he himself had formerly appointed.

[110] on some business to a foreign commonwealth, [111] ^ citizen and [112] commonwealths, or by the law of nations,[ab] not by virtue of someone's covenant.
[113] within the borders of a foreign commonwealth, [114] both commonwealths. [115] citizens [116] owe obedience [117] lost the sovereign power which he had in his commonwealth;
[118] ^ their usual [119] appointed by him, who govern[ac] in his name, although he is in captivity.
[120] appoint as he wishes,

[aa] = mission (OED, 'message', n. and adj., 1.a).

[ab] 'jure Gentium' is translated here as 'by the law of nations'; despite his strictures on the distinction between 'jus' and 'lex', Hobbes did use the phrase 'jus gentium' in the traditional way (see p. 553).

[ac] The Latin lacks a word for 'who govern' (such as 'regentibus', supplied here); without such a word, the phrase is not grammatically impossible, but its meaning, 'appointed by him, and in his name', both fails to translate the English and makes a redundant point, as any officer appointed by the monarch is self-evidently appointed 'in his name'.

Si Potestatem habens Summam Subditum in exilium mittat; manente exilio Subditus ei non est. Sed qui in Civitatem alienam mittitur de negotio aliquo, vel is cui peregrinari permittitur, Civis & Subditus manet. Sed hoc per contractum inter Civitates, vel jure Gentium[ab] fit; non vi Pacti alicujus. Quicunque enim intra fines alienae Civitatis intrauerit, illius Civitatis Legibus Subjectus est, nisi Ius habeat ab amicitia inter se ambarum Civitatum.

Si Monarcha Bello superatus Subditum se victori faciat, priore obligatione Cives liberantur debentque Victori obedientiam. Verùm si captus detineatur, Potestatem quam habebat in Civitate sua Summam, perdidisse non intelligitur. Quare subditi ejus obligantur obedientiam Magistratibus ab eo ante constitutis & nomine ejus regentibus[ac] quanquam in captivitate existentis, solitam praestare. Manente enim Iure ejus, quaestio de sola Administratione est, id est de Magistratibus & Ministris; quos quia ipse constituere suo Arbitrio non potest, illos quos ipse antè constituerat, probare intelligitur.

2 Sed] Verùm 70 4 vel] non 70 4 non] aut 70 10–12 obligantur obedientiam Magistratibus ab eo ante constitutis & nomine ejus regentibus quanquam in captivitate existentis, solitam this edn.] obligantur obedientiam Magistratibus ab eo ante constitutis & nomine ejus quanquam in captivitate existentis, solitam 68; quanquam in captivitate existentis, obligantur obedientiam solitam Magistratibus ab eo ante constitutis & nomine ejus 70

CHAP. XXII.

Of SYSTEMES [1]Subject, Politicall, and Private.[1]

The divers sorts of Systemes of People.

Having spoken of the Generation, Forme, and Power of a Common-wealth, I am °in order° to speak next of the parts thereof. °And first of Systemes, which resemble the similar[a] parts, or Muscles of a Body naturall.° By SYSTEMES; I understand any numbers of men joyned in [2]one Interest, or one[2] Businesse.[b] Of which, some are Regular, and some Irregular. Regular are those, where one Man, or Assembly of men, [3]is constituted Representative[3] of the whole number. All other are Irregular.

Of Regular, some are Absolute, and Independent, subject to none but their own Representative[4]: such are only Common-wealths; Of which I have spoken already in the 5. last precedent chapters. Others are [5]Dependent; that is to say, Subordinate to some Soveraign Power,[5] to which every one, as also their Representative is Subject.

Of Systemes subordinate, some are Politicall, and some Private. Politicall (otherwise Called Bodies Politique, °and Persons in Law,°) are those, which are made by authority from the Soveraign Power of the Common-wealth. Private, are those, which are constituted by [6]Subjects amongst themselves, or by authoritie from a stranger. For no authority derived from forraign power, within the Dominion of another, is Publique there, but Private.[6]

And of Private Systemes, some are Lawfull; some Unlawfull: Lawfull, are those which are allowed by the Common-wealth: all other are Unlawfull. Irregular Systemes, are those which having no [7]Representative,[7] consist only in concourse of People; which if not forbidden by the Common-wealth, nor made on evill designe, (such as are conflux[c] of People to markets, or shews, or any other harmelesse end,) are Lawfull. But when the Intention is evill, or (if the number be considerable) unknown, they are Unlawfull.

5–6 SYSTEMES] a Systeme MS

[1] of citizens. [2] their common [3] bears the person [4] ^ person
[5] subordinate, that is, to the sovereign power of the commonwealth,
[6] citizens, or by some foreign authority – which authority, because it is derived from a foreign power, is not public. [7] person.

CAPVT XXII.

De Systematibus Civium.

De Generatione, Forma & Potestate Civitatis dictum est. Dicendum nunc est de partibus ejus. Per Systema intelligo numerum quemcunque hominum in rem ipsorum communem congredientium. Quorum alia Regularia, alia Irregularia sunt, Regularia quidem ea sunt, in quibus Homo vel Coetus unus Personam gerit omnium. Coetera autem omnia sunt Irregularia.

Regularium alia Absoluta sunt sive Independentia, id est nemini subdita praeterquam suae propriae Personae Repraesentativae; quales sunt Civitates, & quidem solae. De quibus dictum jam est in quinque proximè superioribus Capitibus. Alia sunt Subordinata, nempe Summae Potestati Civitatis, cui tum singuli tum etiam qui ipsorum Personam gerit, subiiciuntur.

De Systematibus Subordinatis alia Politica sunt, alia Privata. Politica (quae vocari etiam solent Corpora Politica) ea sunt, quae ab Authoritate Summae Potestatis Civilis constituta sunt. Privata ea sunt, quae constituuntur ab ipsis Civibus, vel Authoritate aliqua extranea; quae Authoritas quia à Potestate extranea derivatur, Publica non est. [112]

Systematum Privatorum alia Licita sunt, alia Illicita. Licita ea sunt quae probantur à Civitate; caetera Illicita.

Systemata Irregularia sunt quae cum Personam non habeant consistunt in concursu tantùm Populi; quae si Lege Civili non sint vetita & sine mala intentione fiant (qualis est confluxus populi ad Forum, vel Pompam, vel alium finem innoxium) Licita sunt. Quando autem consilio malo confluunt, vel (si multitudo magna sit) incognito, Illicita sunt.

3 est] om. 70

[a] = homogeneous, composed of the same substance (OED, 'similar' a. and n., 1, citing 'similar parts' as an anatomical term).

[b] Hobbes's use of the English word in this sense was peculiar to him; it seems to have been derived from the Greek, where σύστημα could mean a corps of soldiers, a college of priests or magistrates, or any body of people sharing the same institutions or laws.

[c] = flowing together (OED, 'conflux', 1).

In all Bodies Politique the power of the Representative is Limited.

In [8]Bodies Politique,[8] the power of [9]the Representative is alwaies Limited: And that which prescribeth the Limits thereof, is the Power Soveraign. For Power Unlimited, is absolute Soveraignty. And the Soveraign, in every Commonwealth, is the absolute Representative of all the subjects;[9] and therefore no other, can be Representative of any part of them, but so far forth, as [10]he shall give leave:[10] And to give leave to a Body Politique of [11]Subjects, to have an absolute Representative to all intents and purposes, were to abandon the government of so much of the Commonwealth,[11] and to divide the Dominion, contrary to their Peace and Defence, which the Soveraign cannot be understood to doe, by any Grant, that does not [116] plainly, and directly discharge them of their subjection. For consequences of words, are not the signes of his will, when other consequences are signes of the contrary; but rather signes of errour, and misreckoning; to which all mankind is °too° prone.

The bounds of that Power, which is [12]given to the Representative of [12] a Bodie Politique, are to be taken notice of, from two things. One is °their Writt, or° Letters from the Soveraign: the other is the Law of the Common-wealth.

By Letters Patents:

For though in the Institution or Acquisition of a Common-wealth, °which is independent,° there needs no Writing, because [13]the Power of the Representative[13] has there no other bounds, but °such as are set out by° the unwritten Law of Nature; yet in subordinate bodies, there are such diversities of Limitation necessary, concerning their businesses, times, and places, as can neither be remembred without Letters, nor taken notice of, unlesse such Letters be Patent,[d] [14]that they may be read to them, and withall sealed, or testified, with the Seales, or other permanent[14] signes of the Authority Soveraign.

And the Lawes.

And because such Limitation is not alwaies easie, or perhaps [15] possible to be described in writing; the [16]ordinary Lawes, common to all Subjects, must determine, what the Representative may lawfully[16] do, in all Cases, where the Letters themselves are silent. °And therefore°

13–14 to which . . . prone] w^ch^ all mankind is subiect to MS 20 as] om. MS

[8] subordinate systems, [Note: this term ('systema subordinatum'), or 'system' ('systema') becomes hereafter the standard translation of 'body politic' (or 'body'); it is not separately noted, and Hobbes's English terms are used in the version of the Latin given here.]

[9] their person is always limited by the civil sovereign power; otherwise it would be not a body politic, but a commonwealth, whose person is the person of all the citizens together;

[10] shall seem good to the person of the commonwealth:

[11] citizens to represent a part of the people in all things, would be to abandon the government of the commonwealth (so far as concerned part of the citizenry),

[12] possessed by [13] sovereign power (as we have said) [14] and signed with the

[15] ^ altogether [16] civil laws must determine what it is lawful or unlawful for the body politic to

In Systematibus Subordinatis Potestas personae eorum semper terminatur à Potestate Civili Summa; alioqui Systema Subordinatum non esset, sed Civitas, cujus Persona Civium cunctorum Persona est; & proinde pars Civium nulla repraesentari ab alio potest, nisi quatenus Personae Civitatis visum erit. Permittere enim ut Systema Civium Subordinatum partem populi in rebus omnibus repraesentaret, deserere esset Civitatis (quatenus ad partem Civium) regimen & Dominium dividere contra pacem & salutem populi; id quod is qui Summam habet Potestatem, nulla concessione facere intelligitur, qua non perspicuis verbis subjectione sua Cives exonerat; Verborum enim consequentiae, voluntatis signa non sunt, ubi consequentiae aliae signa sunt in contrarium; sed erroris potius & falsae ratiocinationis, quibus humana natura subjicitur, signa sunt.

Potestatis quam habet Systema Subordinatum limites cognoscuntur duabus rebus, nempe Literis ab eo qui Summam habet Potestatem & Lege Civitatis.

Quanquam enim in Civitatis Institutione vel Acquisitione Literis scriptis opus non sit, quia Potestas ibi Summa (ut diximus) limites nullos habet praeter Naturae Legem non scriptam; in Systematibus tamen Subordinatis, tot limitationes circa agenda, tempora, & loca necessariae sunt, ut neque sine literis scriptis memoria retineri neque nisi Literae illae Patentes[d] sint, & Summae Authoritatis signis signatae, cognosci possint.

Et quoniam Limitationes non semper facile, aut fortasse omnino describi Literis possunt; determinatio quid Systemati Licitum vel Illicitum factu erit, ad Leges Civiles (ubi Literae ipsae silent) necessariò pertinet.

10 signa] signo 70

[d] = [literally] open, public; 'letters patent' were open letters from the king, authorizing or commanding an action, granting a privilege or title, etc. (OED, 'patent', adj., 1).

When the Representative is one man, his unwarranted Acts are his own onely.

In a Body Politique, if the [17]Representative[17] be one man, whatsoever he does in the Person of the Body, which is not warranted in his Letters, nor by the [18] Lawes, is his own act, and not the act of the Body, nor of any other Member thereof besides himselfe: Because further than his Letters, or the Lawes limit, he [19]representeth[19] no mans person, but his own. But what he does according to these, is the act of every one[20]: For of the Act of the Soveraign every one is Author, because °he is their Representative unlimited; and° the act of him that recedes[e] not from the Letters [21] of the Soveraign, is the act of the Soveraign, and therefore every member of the Body is Author of it.

When it is an Assembly, it is the act of them that assented onely.

But if the [22]Representative[22] be an Assembly; whatsoever that Assembly shall [23] Decree, not warranted by their Letters, or the Lawes, is the act of the [24]Assembly, or Body Politique,[24] and the act of every one by whose Vote the Decree was made; but not the act of any man that °being present° Voted to the contrary; nor of any man absent, °unlesse he Voted it by procuration.°[f] It is the act of the Assembly, because Voted by the major part; and if it be a crime, the Assembly [25]may[25] be punished, as farre-forth as it is capable, as by dissolution, °or forfeiture of their Letters,° (which is to such °artificiall, and° fictitious Bodies, capitall,) or (if the Assembly have a Common stock, °wherein none of the Innocent Members have propriety,°) by pecuniary Mulct.[g] For from corporall penalties Nature hath exempted all [26]Bodies Politique.[26] But they that gave not their Vote, [27]are therefore Innocent,[27] because the Assembly cannot Represent any man in things unwarranted by their Letters, °and consequently° are not involved in their Votes.

2–3 nor by the Lawes,] om. MS 4–5 or the Lawes] om. MS 6 these] his Letters MS
11 or the Lawes,] om. MS 23 not H-Errata] om. H, B

[17] person [18] ^ civil [19] has [20] ^ of those who compose the body [21] ^ and laws [22] person of the body [23] ^ do or [24] whole body, [25] should [26] bodies of this kind.
[27] to a crime decreed by the body, are innocent; and those innocent people, [e] = departs (OED, 'recede', v.[1], 1, 3).

[f] = formal authorization to act on someone's behalf (OED, 'procuration', n., 2).
[g] = fine, or compulsory payment (OED, 'mulct', 1).

Vbi in Systemate Subordinato Persona est unus homo quicquid ille facit in Persona Systematis, absque Literarum suarum & Legum Civilium Authoritate, suum ipsius, non Systematis, neque alicujus ejus membri praeterquam sui ipsius, Factum est; propterea quod ultra limites Literis & Legibus praescriptos neminis praeterquam suam [113] ipsius Personam habet. Quicquid autem juxta Leges & Literas facit Factum est uniuscujusque hominis eorum qui Systema constituunt; quod enim à Summa Potestate fit, ipsum facientem Authorem habet; quia Factum quod à Literis & Legibus Summae Potestatis non recedit, ipsius Summae Potestatis Factum est; & proinde singula Systematis membra Authores habet.

At si Persona Systematis Coetus sit, quicquid ille Coetus praeter Legum & Literatum suarum Authoritatem fecerit vel decreverit Factum est totius Systematis, & praeterea uniuscujusque eorum quorum suffragiis decretum fuerit; sed neque hominis contra cujus suffragium Factum aut decretum erat, neque hominis absentis Factum est. Coetus enim ipsius ideo Factum est, quia majoris partis est; & siquidem crimen sit, puniendus Coetus est, quatenus poenae capax est. Exempli causa, per dissolutionem Systematis (quae quidem ejusmodi Corporibus Fictitiis capitalis est) vel (si modo aerarium commune habeat Coetus) per mulctam pecuniariam. Nam hujusmodi Systemata à poenis corporeis ipsa exemit Natura. Qui autem crimini à Systemate decreto suffragium suum non dederunt, innocentes sunt; & quia Coetus per Litteras suas neminem in Illicitis repraesentare potest, innocentes illi in suffragiis nocentium non comprehenduntur.

When the Representative is one man, if he borrow mony, or owe it, by Contract; he is lyable onely, the members not.

If the person of the Body Politique being in one man, borrow mony of a stranger, that is, of one that is not of the same Body, [28](for no Letters need limit borrowing, seeing it is left to mens own inclinations [117] to limit lending) the debt is the Representatives. For if he should[28] have Authority from his Letters, to make the members pay what he borroweth, °he should have by consequence the Soveraignty of them; and therefore the grant were either voyd, as proceeding from Errour, commonly incident to humane Nature, and an unsufficient signe of the will of the Granter; or if it be avowed by him, then is the Representer Soveraign, and falleth not under the present question, which is onely of Bodies subordinate.° No member [29] therefore is obliged to pay the debt so borrowed, but the [30]Representative himselfe:[30] because he that lendeth it, being a stranger to the °Letters, and to the qualification of the° Body, understandeth those onely for his debtors, that [31]are engaged; and seeing the Representer can ingage himselfe, and none else, has him onely for Debtor; who[31] must therefore pay him, out of the common stock °(if there be any,)° or °(if there be none)° out of his own estate.

If [32]he come into debt by Contract, or[32] Mulct,[h] the case is the same.

When it is an Assembly, they onely are liable that have assented.

But when the [33]Representative is[33] an Assembly, and the debt to a stranger; all they, and onely they are responsible for the debt, that gave their votes to the borrowing of it, °or to the Contract that made it due, or to the fact[i] for which the Mulct[j] was imposed;° because every one of those in voting did engage himselfe for the payment: °For he that is author of the borrowing, is obliged to the payment,° even of the whole debt, though when payd by any one, [34]he[34] be discharged.

12 being] is MS 13 Body,] Body, {and added by TH} MS 20 of] om. MS 21 because every . . . those] For euery {one added by TH} of these MS 22 For] because MS

[28] the debtor is he who has the person of the body, and no one else is held responsible for paying it. For otherwise he would [29] ^ of a body politic

[30] person of the body (whenever it is a man):

[31] promised to pay it; for the only person he knows as the borrower of the loan is the natural person of that man himself. So that man alone is the debtor, and

[32] the person of a body politic, borne by one man, is subjected by the person of the commonwealth to a pecuniary [33] person of the body is in [34] all

---

[h] See above, note g.

[i] = action, deed; with the connotation 'evil deed, crime' (OED, 'fact', n., 1.a, 1.c).

[j] See above, note g.

Si Persona Systematis sit in homine uno, & is pecuniam mutuam sumpserit ab extraneo, id est ab eo, qui membrum Systematis ejus non est; debitor est is qui habet Personam Systematis neque ad solutionem tenetur alius quicunque. Alioqui Literarum suarum Authoritate facere posset, ut quicquid ipse mutuum sumeret, alii solverent. Systematis ergo Subordinati membrum ad solutionem pecuniae quam Persona Systematis (quoties homo est) mutuam sumpserit teneri non potest. Qui pecuniam mutuam dat cum Systemati extraneus sit pro debitoribus habet eos solos, qui solvere promiserant, Personam enim, mutuum accipientem, nullam praeter ipsius hominis naturam cognoscit. Solus ergo debitor is est, & solvere debet, vel ex communi thesauro, vel ex pecunia propria. Idem dicendum est de Mulcta si contingat Personam Systematis Subordinati, quam gerit homo unus, à persona Civitatis pecuniâ mulctari.

Quando autem persona Systematis in Coetu est, debeturque pecunia extraneo, tenentur ad solutionem illi omnes, & soli, quorum suffragiis pecunia mutuò sumpta est. Unusquisque enim eorum eo ipso quod mutuum sumi suffragiis suis voluerunt, ad solutionem obligantur etiam totius debiti, quod cum quilibet unus solverit omnes liberantur. [114]

9 accipientem 70] accipiente 68 18 quilibet unus] unus illorum 70

If the debt be to one of the Assembly, the Body onely is obliged.

But if the debt be to one of the Assembly, the Assembly onely [35] is obliged to the payment, [36]out of their common stock (if they have any:) For having liberty of Vote,[36] if he Vote the Mony shall be borrowed, he Votes it shall be payd; If he Vote it shall not be borrowed, or be absent, yet because in lending, he voteth the borrowing, he [37]contradicteth his former Vote, and is obliged by the later,[37] and becomes both borrower and lender, and consequently cannot [38] demand payment from any particular man, but from the [39]common Treasure onely; which fayling[39] he hath no remedy, nor complaint, but against himselfe, that [40]being privy to the acts of the Assembly, and to their means to pay, and not being enforced,[k] did neverthelesse through his own folly[40] lend his mony.

Protestation against the Decrees of Bodies Politique sometimes lawful; but against Soveraign Power never.

It is manifest by this, that in Bodies Politique subordinate, and subject to [41]a Soveraign Power,[41] it is sometimes not onely lawfull, but expedient, for a particular man [42] to make open protestation against the decrees of the °Representative° Assembly, and [43]cause[43] their dissent to be Registred, °or to take witnesse of it;° because otherwise they may be obliged to pay debts contracted, °and be responsible for crimes committed° by other men: But in a Soveraign Assembly, [44]that liberty is taken away,[44] both because he that protesteth there, denies their Soveraignty; and also because whatsoever is [45]commanded[45] by the Soveraign Power, is [46]as to the Subject (though not so alwayes in the sight of God) justified by the Command; for of such command every Subject is[46] the Author.

[35] ^, that is, the body itself, [36] . For he to whom the money is owed, being present,
[37] votes for the payment, [38] ^ by right
[39] body itself; therefore if the body is unable to pay (from its common treasury), [40] did willingly and imprudently [41] the power of the commonwealth,
[42] ^ who is a member of a body [43] require [44] such protests are not lawful, [45] done [46] done by each and every citizen as [k] = forced, compelled (OED, 'enforce', v., 8, 10).

Quod si pecunia uni alicui ex ipso Coetu debeatur, ad solutionem tenetur solus Coetus ipse, id est ipsum Systema. Is enim cui debetur, si pecuniam illam mutuam dari praesens suffragio suo voluit, etiam solvi voluit; sin Suffragio suo mutuam dari noluit, vel si absens fuerit, quia tamen mutuam dando, mutuam dari voluit, solvi voluit, idem ergo mutuam sumit & dat; & proinde debitum suum à nemine poscere praeterquam à Systemate ipso Iure potest. Itaque si Systema (ex thesauro communi) solvendo non est, remedium habet nullum, neque potest nisi de seipso conqueri, qui sponte sua imprudenter pecuniam suam mutuam dedit.

Manifestum hinc est, in Systematibus Subordinatis, subditisque Potestati Civitatis, interdum privato homini Systematis membro contra decretum Coetus protestari aliquando dissentire & dissentionis suae conservari memoriam postulare non modo Licitum esse, sed etiam expedire, ne alioqui debita ab aliis contracta ipse solvere obligetur. Sed in Coetu Summam habente Civitatis Potentiam, Protestationes hujusmodi Licitae non sunt, propterea quod Potestatis Summae totidem sunt negationes; etiam quia quicquid fit à Summa Potestate, Authoribus fit Civibus omnibus & Singulis.

14 contracta 68-Errata] contractata 68

Bodies Politique for Government of a Province, Colony, or Town.

The variety of Bodies Politique, is almost infinite: for they are not onely distinguished by the severall affaires, for which they are [118] constituted, wherein there is [47]an unspeakable[47] diversitie; but also by the times, places, and numbers, [48]subject to many limitations. And as to their affaires, some are ordained for Government; As first, the Government of a Province may be committed to an Assembly of men, wherein all resolutions shall depend on the Votes of the major part; and then this Assembly is a Body Politique, and their power limited by Commission. This word Province signifies a charge, or care of businesse, which he whose businesse it is, committeth to another man, to be administred for, and under him; and therefore when in one Common-wealth there be divers Countries,[l] that have their Lawes distinct one from another, or are farre distant in place, the Administration of the Government being committed to divers persons, those Countries where the Soveraign is not resident, but governs by Commission, are called Provinces.[48] But of the government of a Province, by an Assembly residing in the Province it selfe, there be few examples. The Romans [49]who had the Soveraignty of many Provinces; yet governed them alwaies by[49] Presidents,[m] and Praetors;[n] and not by Assemblies, as they governed the City of Rome, °and Territories adjacent.° In like manner, when there were Colonies sent °from England,° to Plant Virginia, and Sommer-Ilands; though the [50]government of them here,[50] were committed to Assemblies in London, yet did those Assemblies [51]never commit the Government under them to any Assembly there; but did to each Plantation send one Governour;[51] [p] For though every man, where he can be present, °by Nature° desires to participate of government; yet where they cannot be pre-

1 variety] varieties B 5 As first . . . of a] {illeg. corr. to For a by TH} MS
20 Sommer-Ilands] sommers Islands MS 23–4 present, by Nature this edn.; present, by nature MS] present by Nature, H, B

[47] much
[48] which must all be defined. For sometimes they are made for the government of a province, with their power limited by letters issued by the commonwealth.
[49] governed their provinces by procurators,
[50] sovereign power over them
[51] administer those provinces by governors;[p]

[l] = regions, districts (OED, 'country', 1–2).
[m] = appointed governors of provinces or colonies (OED, 'president', n., 1).
[n] = elected magistrates, subordinate to the consuls particularly in the administration of the provinces (OED, 'praetor', n., 1).
[p] The Virginia Company, founded in 1606, began to colonize Virginia in 1607; a governor was sent there in 1610. The first settlement of Bermuda ('Somers Island') occurred in 1609 when the flagship of a small fleet under Sir George Somers, on its way to Virginia, was wrecked there; a governor was sent there in 1612, and a Somers Islands Company was formed in 1615. Hobbes was a member of both companies.

Systematum Subordinatorum infinita ferè est varietas. Distinguuntur enim non solum ab Agendis, propter quae constituuntur & multorum generum sunt, sed etiam à temporibus, locis & numeris, quae omnia definiri debent. Constituuntur enim aliquando ad regendam Provinciam cum Potestate Literis Civitatis terminata. Sed Provinciarum quae à Coetibus in ipsa Provincia residentibus gubernantur, pauca sunt exempla. Romani Provincias suas Praesidibus, Praetoribus, vel Procuratoribus administraverunt, non Coetibus sicut administrabatur ipsa Roma. Similiter emissae ad Virginiam & Bermudam Coloniae, quanquam Summa Potestas in illas commissa esset Coetui Londinensium, Coetus tamen ille Colonias illas per Praefectos administravit.[p] Quanquam enim unusquisque regiminis partem exercere cupiat, ubi adesse ipse potest; ubi tamen adesse non potest, rem com-sent, they are by Nature °also° enclined, to commit the Government of their common Interest rather to a Monarchicall, then [52]a Popular[52] form of Government: which is also evident in those men that have great private estates; who when they are unwilling to take the paines of administring the businesse that belongs to them, choose rather to [53]trust one[53] Servant, then [54]an Assembly[54] either of their friends or servants. [55]But howsoever it be in fact, yet we may suppose[55] the Government of a Province, or Colony committed to an Assembly: and when it is, °that which in this place I have to say, is this; that° whatsoever debt is by that Assembly contracted; or whatsoever unlawfull Act is decreed, is the Act onely of those that assented[56], and not of any that dissented, or were absent, for the reasons before alledged.[q] Also that an Assembly residing out of the bounds of that Colony whereof they have the government, [57]cannot execute[57] any power over the persons, or goods of any of the Colonie, [58]to seize on them for debt, or other duty,[58] in any place without the Colony it selfe, as having no Jurisdiction, nor Authoritie elsewhere, °but are left to the remedie, which the Law of the place alloweth them.° And though the Assembly have right, to impose a Mulct[r] upon any of their members, that shall break the Lawes they make; yet out of the Colonie it selfe, they have no right to execute the same. And that which is said here, of the °Rights of an Assembly, for the° government of a Province, or a Colony, is appliable also to an Assembly for the Government of a Town, an University, or a College, or a Church, °or for any other Government over the persons of men.° [119]

And generally, in all Bodies Politique, if any particular member [59]conceive himself Injuried[s] by[59] the Body it self, the Cognisance of his cause belongeth to °the Soveraign, and° those the Soveraign hath ordained for [60] Judges °in such causes, or shall ordaine for that particular cause;° and not to the Body it self. For the whole Body is in this case his fellow [61]subject,[61] which in a Soveraign Assembly, is otherwise: for there, if the Soveraign be not Judge, though in his own cause, there can be no Judge at all.

4 who] amongst whom MS 6 their] his MS 8 it is] it is {so added by TH} MS
27–8 Soveraign Assembly] Commonwealth MS

[52] an aristocratic or democratic [53] entrust the care of their estates to one friend or [54] to a body [55] Yet it is possible to have [56] ^ by their votes
[57] does not have [58] by which it might rightfully demand their goods, for money owed, [59] has a cause [sc. legal action] against [60] ^ civil [61] citizen,

[q] = adduced (OED, 'allege', v.², 3). [r] See above, note g. [s] = wronged (OED, 'injury', v., 1).

munem Monarchicè quam vel Aristocraticè, vel Democraticè administrari mavult naturaliter. Quod manifestum etiam est in privatis hominibus, qui multas habent possessiones; qui labore administrandi negotia propria levari cupientes Amicum vel Famulum unum potius eligunt, cui possessionum suarum curam committant, quam Amicorum vel Famulorum plurium Systemati. Potest tamen Provinciae vel Coloniae cura etiam Coetui committi. Quando autem id fit, quodcunque ab eo Coetu debitum contractum fuerit; [115] & quodcunque decretum ab eo Coetu Illicitum fuerit, factum est illorum tantùm qui per Suffragia sua assenserunt, non autem ejus qui dissensit vel abfuit, propter rationes supra adductas. Coetus extra fines Coloniae quam administrat, Potestatem in personas vel bona Coloniae non habet, qua bona eorum in loco quocunque extra ipsam Coloniam propter debitam pecuniam exigere jure potest; quia extra Coloniam ipsam Iurisdictionem nullam habet. Idem Coetus quanquam mulctandi membra singularia jus habeat, si Leges suas fregerint; mulctam tamen illam exequi extra Coloniam ipsam jure non potest. Quod autem hic dictum est de administratione Provinciae vel Coloniae, dicendum quoque est de regimine Oppidi, vel Vniversitatis, vel Collegii, vel Ecclesiae.

In omnibus Systematibus Subordinatis, si quis ex Systemate causam habeat contra Systema ipsum, cognitio causae pertinet ad Iudicem Civilem qui à Summa Potestate Civitatis ordinatur, non ad ipsum Systema quod membro suo concivis est. In Coetu Summam habente Potestatem Civitatis, aliter res se habet; ibi enim is, qui Summam habet Potestatem, etiam in sua ipsius causa Iudex erit, aut Iudex erit omnino nullus.

1 quam vel] quam 70 13 potest] possit 70 16 potest 70] possunt 68 17–18 vel Vniversitatis, vel Collegii] Vniversitatis, Collegii 70

Bodies Politique for ordering of Trade.

In a Bodie Politique, for the well ordering of forraigne Traffique, the most commodious [62]Representative[62] is an Assembly of all the members; that is to say, [63]such a one, as every one that adventureth[t] his mony, may be present at all the Deliberations, and Resolutions of the Body, if they will themselves. For proof whereof, we are to consider the end, for which men that are Merchants, and may buy and sell, export, and import their Merchandise, according to their own discretions, doe neverthelesse bind themselves up in one Corporation. It is true,[63] there be few Merchants, that [64]with the Merchandise they buy at home, can[64] fraight a Ship, °to export it; or with that they buy abroad, to bring it home;° and have therefore need to joyn together in one [65]Society; where every man may either participate of the gaine, according to the proportion of his adventure;[u] or take his own, and sell what he transports, or imports, at such prices as he thinks fit. But this is no Body Politique, there being no Common Representative to oblige them to any other Law, than that which is common to all other subjects. The End of their Incorporating, is to make their gaine the greater; which is done two wayes; by sole buying, and sole selling, both at home, and abroad. So that to grant to a Company of Merchants to be a Corporation, or Body Politique, is to grant them a double Monopoly, whereof one is to be sole buyers; another to be sole sellers. For when there is a Company incorporate for any particular forraign Country, they only export the Commodities vendible in that Country; which is sole buying at home, and sole selling abroad. For at home there is but one buyer, and abroad but one that selleth: both which is gainfull to the Merchants, because thereby they buy at home at lower, and sell abroad at higher rates: And abroad there is but one buyer of forraign Merchandise, and but one that sels them at home; both which againe are gainfull to the adventurers.[65]

23 Merchants this edn.; marchants MS] Merchant H, B 26 adventurers] aduentures MS

[62] person

[63] an assembly of all those whose business is to be ordered; in which each one of those who adventure their money may, if he wishes, be present and vote.

[64] can buy and

[65] body. Now the purpose of a body of merchants is to be able to conduct their business more easily and more profitably, according to rules, devised certainly by themselves, but confirmed by letters from the sovereign power. If it is granted by these letters that they may be sole buyers of what it suits them to export from the commonwealth, and sole sellers of what it suits them to import, in accordance with the rules of their body, they will have a double monopoly.

---

[t] = risks (OED, 'adventure', v., 2).

[u] = venture, commercial investment (OED, 'adventure', n., 7).

Systematis Subordinati ad Regulanda negotia Mercatorum constituti Persona commodissima Coetus est, Coetus (inquam) eorum omnium quorum negotia regulanda sunt; in quem convenire, Suffragia habere unusquisque eorum, qui pecunias suas conferunt, si velit, possit. Mercator, qui navem emere, & mercibus onerare potest, rarus est. Opus ergo habent, ut in unum Systema plures conjungantur. Finis autem Systematis Mercatorii is est, ut possint & facilius & utilius negotiari, juxta regulas à se quidem excogitatas, sed à Summa Potestate Literis confirmatas. Quibus Literis si concessum sit, ut possint ea quae à Dominio Civitatis exportari expedit, soli emere, & quae in Civitatis Dominium importari soli vendere juxta Systematis sui regulas;

9 à {see Register of Literal Faults}] è 70 9 soli 70] solis 68 10 soli 70] solis 68

[66]Of this double Monopoly one part is disadvantageous to the people at home, the other to forraigners. For at home by their sole exportation they set what price they please on the husbandry, and handy-works of the people; and by the sole importation, what price they please on all forraign commodities the people have need of; both which are ill for the people. On the contrary, by the sole selling of the native commodities abroad, and sole buying the forraign commodities upon the place,[v] they raise the price of those, and abate the price of these, to the disadvantage of the forraigner: For where but one selleth, the Merchandise is the dearer; and where [120] but one buyeth the cheaper: Such Corporations therefore are no other then Monopolies; though they would be very profitable for a Common-wealth, if being bound up into one body in forraigne Markets they were at liberty at home, every man to buy, and sell at what price he could.[66]

[67]The end then of these Bodies of Merchants, being not a Common benefit to the whole Body, (which have in this case no common stock, but what is deducted out of the particular adventures, for building, buying, victualling and manning of Ships,) but the particular gaine of every adventurer, it is reason that every one be acquainted with the employment of his own; that is, that every one be of the Assembly, that shall have the power to order the same; and be acquainted with their accounts. And therefore the Representative of such a Body must be an Assembly, where every member of the Body may be present at the consultations, if he will.[67]

If a Body Politique of Merchants, contract a debt to a [68]stranger by the act of their Representative Assembly,[68] every Member is lyable by himself for the whole. For [69]a stranger can take no notice of their private Lawes, but considereth them as so many particular men, obliged every one to the whole payment, till payment made by one dischargeth all the rest:[69] But if the debt be to one of the Company, the creditor is [70]debter for the whole to himself, and cannot[70] therefore demand his debt, but only from the [71] common stock, if there be any.

6 of the native . . . buying] om. MS

[66] Both of these are gainful to the merchants themselves, but harmful, in part, to the rest of the citizens. For since they are the sole buyers of the citizens' goods at home, they buy at lower rates; what is gain to them is loss to the other citizens. Similarly, since they are the sole sellers in foreign countries, they sell at higher rates; what is gain to them, once more, is loss to the foreigners. Thirdly, as the sole buyers of foreign merchandise, they buy them at lower rates; which is profitable for them, but harmful to the foreigners. Fourthly, as the sole sellers at home of foreign merchandise, they sell at higher rates; which is also gainful to them, but a cause of loss to their fellow citizens. It would therefore benefit the commonwealth if the letters permitted them to be sole sellers of merchandise outside their own commonwealth, and sole buyers of foreign merchandise; but it would be bad for the citizens if they had discretion to sell imports at home at whatever price they wished.

duplum habebunt Monopolium. Quorum utrumque ipsis Mercatoribus lucrosum est, sed Civibus caeteris ex parte noxium. Quoniam enim soli bona Civium domi emunt, viliùs emunt; id quod sibimetipsis lucro, reliquis autem Civibus damno est. Similiter quia in Dominiis externis soli vendunt, cariùs vendunt; id quod sibimet ipsis rursus lucro, exteris damno est. Tertiò quia Merces externas soli emunt, viliùs emunt, id quod sibi quidem utile, externis autem noxium est. Quartò quia Merces externas soli vendunt domi, cariùs vendunt; id quod sibi adhuc lucrosum, sed concivibus suis damnosum est. Bono ergo Civitatis esset, si Literis [116] concessum esset, ut soli foris Civitatis suae Merces venderent, & Merces externas soli emerent; sed ut domi arbitrio suo, quo velint pretio importata venderent, civibus malum esset. Expedit autem singulis hujusmodi Systematis membris, ut qui pecunias suas contulerunt, & expectant lucrum singuli pecuniae suae collatae proportionale, consultationibus Systematis adesse, librosque Rationum suarum inspicere, id est ut persona Systematis sit in ipso Coetu seu Curia, ad formam Democratiae.

Si Systema Mercatorum homini, qui Systematis membrum non sit, sed extraneus, pecuniam debeat, unumquodque membrorum seorsim obligatur ad solutionem totius debiti. Is enim, qui Systematis membrum non est Personae artificialis notitiam nullam habet, sed Personas naturales eorum omnes obligari sibi supponit. Verum si Creditor sit Systematis membrum, Debitor quoque idem est, neque debitum suum nisi à Systemate ipso, id est à [67] It is to the advantage of the individual members of this kind of body, that those who have adventured their money, and expect the gain to the individual to be in proportion to the money he adventured, should be present at the body's discussions, and inspect its books of accounts – that is, that the person of the body should be in the assembly or court itself, in the form of a democracy.

[68] man who is not a member of it,

[69] he who is not a member of the body takes no notice of the artificial person, but supposes that all their natural persons are obliged to him.

[70] himself also a debtor, and cannot rightly

[71] ^ body, that is, the

